Secondly, they differ in their manner of falling into the same sins. For the faithfull herein finde in themselues some reluctancie and conflict, whilest the Spirit opposeth and lusteth against the flesh, the one approuing, the other disallowing, the one willing, the other nilling; the one loueing and delighting in, the other hating and loathing the sin into which they are falling or already falne: whereas a wicked man hath no such conflict but falleth into his sinne againe and againe with full consent of will, and with much pleasure and delight; or if there bee in him any conflict at all, it is not in the same faculties, as the iudgement against the iudgement, the will against the will, the affection against the affection, as it is alwayes in the conflict betweene the flesh and the spirit: but betweene diuers faculties, as the vnderstanding and the will; the conscience and the passions and carnall concupiscence. Againe, the godly fall suddenly, being surprized before they bee aware, by some sudden passion which transporteth them out of their vsuall way, and for the time maketh them to be not themselues, like one taken captiue of the same enemy by some canning stratagem or secret ambushment; but the wicked vpon serious deliberation wherein they preferre the pleasures or profits of the sin which they intend to commit, before the hurt and disaduantage. Finally, it is no common practice of the godly to fall often into the same sinnes which are hainous in fact, howsoeuer being full of imperfections in their sanctification, they cannot but faile many times in their best actions, and fall often into many sinnes through frailtie and infirmitie: But the wicked doe commonly and ordinarily fall into the same sinne, which they finde pleasant or gainfull, and do walke in it as in their vsuall and common way.

Thirdly, there is great difference in them in respect of the effects; for first though the godly may diuers times commit the same sinne, yet they doe not lie in it, but as often as they fall, so often also they rise againe, by vnfained repentance, taking occasion thereby to renew their couenant with God, as they haue renewed their sins: But the wicked falling often do securely liue in their sins without not shame or sorrow, or purpose of amendment, vnlesse they bee so wel rid out of it; by some heauier iudgement, or the terrour of some approching guilt.

Secondly, the faithfull though they may fall diuers times, yet they alwayes get ground of their sinnes and make aduantage by their fals, both for the weakning of the flesh and subduing of their corruptions, and the strengthening of the spirit, and their spirituall graces. For they conceiue of sin as of their mortall enemy, and therefore the more often that they are surprised and led captiue by it, the more they hate it, the more carefully they keepe their Christian watch, that they be not againe ouertaken by it: and if they bee, they take occasion thereby of doubling their repentance as they haue doubled their sinnes: the more conscionable and diligent, they are in the vse of the meanes whereby they may be armed against it, as applying preseruatiues out of the word which will strengthen them against the infecting of such a sin; as hath so often maimed them, frequent and feruent prayers vnto God against it, and such like: by all which holy exercise, as their corruptions are weakned, so the graces of Gods Spirit are much increased in them. And as a man that hath bin diuers times cheated with a cosener, will thereby grow the wiser, shun his company and all dealing with him, or at least more carefully watch ouer him that hee be not againe deceiued: so will the Christian deale with that sin, with the deceitfulnesse whereof he hath beene often ouer-taken. Whereas a wicked man by frequent committing the same sinne and not repenting of it, doth grow into familiar acquaintance and friendship with it, and by many acts groweth to an habit and custome, which is as preualent as a second nature; it being the nature of sin to leaue a staine and poysonous taint behind it, which will daily more and more deadned and mortally infect the Sinner, vnlesse it be washed and purged out by true and vnfained repentance: So that in him corruption by his fals getteth ground daily in him, and the more hee sinneth the more hee may sin, vnlesse it bee such sinnes as forsake him, through debilitie of nature and want of meanes and opportunities, and then only he is hindred in the acts, but not purged from the loue of them. All power of resistance is more and more weakned, yea till willes resist is taken away; and whereas at first hee committed the sinne with some conflict and pangs of conscience, after he hath often falne, hee beginneth to excuse, then to defend and iustifie his sin, and soone after to commend and glory in it. And from hence we may obserue the last signe of difference betweene them, In that the godly man relapsing into the same sin, misliketh what he doth, and himselfe for doing it, and therefore is neuer at rest till hee haue recouered out of it; like a man who being forcibly led captiue by an enemy doth hate his bondage and him that caused it, being neuer at quiet till he be freed from it. Neither is it possible that hee should willingly continue in this captiuitie, because hee hath a naturall loue and propensitie to his libertie, nor that hee should abide in it if he recouer his strength whereby he is enabled to ouercome his enemy, as we see in the example of Sampson, who chose rather to die with the Philistims, then to liue in bondage with them? And so the child of God neither will nor can liue in that sinne which hath led him captiue vpon some disaduantage, for with the Apostle, he doth the euill which he would not, yea which he hateth, neither can he continue in his sin, because there is a seed of spirituall grace and strength which opposeth and ouercommeth his corruptions, and an inward principle of life which conquering his disease will bring him out of the wound of sin, so as he cannot die in it: whereas a wicked man relapsing into sin approueth what he doth, and so willingly continueth in it; he loueth and liketh his prison and iaylour, and therfore desireth not his liberty, nor to come out thraldome. Yea if by force or feare he be compelled to leaue it, yet still it hath his heart, and hauing a naturall inclination to sinne and auerlinesse to all goodnesse, hee may directly contradict and peruert the speech of the Apostle, and say, that he doth the good he hateth, and leaueth vndone the euill which hee loueth.

CHAP. IX.

How Sathan laboureth to hinder and discourage the weake Christian in the course of sanctification, by casting into his minde blasphemous suggestions.

AND thus haue I answered Sathans temptations, drawne from those sins which the weake Christian hath indeed falne into, but if he cannot preuaile, then will hee falsely and maliciously accuse them of those sins, which they neuer committed, or at least not in that manner and measure as hee chargeth them. And these are principally of two sorts; the first are impious suggestions, and horrible blasphemies, directly against the Maiestie of God himselfe, the other is that vnpardonable Sin against the Holy Ghost. Concerning the former, when as Satan cannot preuaile to charge the conscience of the weake Christian, by ripping vp and aggrauating those sins which he hath in truth committed, nor can driue him desperately to desist from going forward in the course of sanctification; then he suggesteth into his minde horrible blasphemies against Gods Majestie, and continually turmoileth him with most impious thoughts, that hereby he may distract his minde from holy meditations, and vtterly discourage him in all Christian exercises. And as the King of Moab when hee could not breake through the forces of the Israelites nor make them surcease their victorious fight, presented vnto their view an horrible & abominable spectacle, sacrificing vnto his Idols vpon the wall his deare Son and heire of his Kingdome, that being not able to indure such an inhumane murther they might flee the fight thereof, & giue ouer their victorious course; so when the Prince of darkneſſe is foiled in the spirituall fight, by our resolued proceeding in the course of godlineſſe; for his last refuge he vseth this Deuillish policie, to present vnto our cogitations most odious and hellish blasphemies, that so he may possesse our minds with horrour and feare, and may cause vs to make a stay in our Christian race, and to turne our backes in the spirituall fight, that so wee may avoide these horrible suggestions, and most inhumane impieties.

2. Kings 3. 27.

§. Sect. 2. Of blasphemous suggestions which seeme to haue some ground whence they rise.

Now these his hellish suggestions, are of two sorts; first, such as seeme to haue some ground in corrupted reason, for the suggesting whereof hee oftentimes vseth our sinfull flesh as his wicked instrument. And these arise sometime from ouer great prosperitie, whereby men are not onely brought to forget and neglect the Lord; but euen like pampered horses to kicke against their Master who hath so bountifully fed them: sometimes from the grieuousnes of afflictions, whereby men are moued to murmur against God, and to repine against his judgements: sometimes from some offence vnjustly taken from Gods Word or Workes; as namely from the simplicitie of the Scriptures, the foolishnesse of the Gospell preached, the vnequall administration both of Gods benefits and punishments; from whence arise such tentations as these; that there is no God, or if there bee, yet no particular prouidence; that he hath not eyes to see all things, nor power to rule them; that he is not just in his judgements, but an accepter of persons; that his Word is not true either in his promises or threatnings; that he maketh little account of vertue to reward it, or of sin to punish it; neither yet hath prouided either a Heauen for the godly, or a Hell for the wicked: that let men take what course they will, yet in the end either all or none shall be saued, and a thousand such like.

For the withstanding of which tentations we are to take this course, first we are as soon as they are suggested to reiect them as abominable, saying to our hearts, God forbid that I should entertaine such a blasphemous conceit of the most mighty, wise, just and most gracious God of Heauen and Earth; especially hauing no reason to perswade mee hereunto but the false suggestion of the Deuill, who is a liar from the beginning, and by his lies seeketh my destruction; or the sinfull imagination of mine owne corrupt flesh blinded and misled with Satan, whose slaue it is. But if wee cannot be thus rid of these tentations, let vs flee vnto the Lord by earnest Prayer, desiring him to inlighten our minds with his Spirit, that we may clearely discerne his truth, and the impious falshood of Satans blasphemous suggestions; and that he will incline and rule our hard hearts that wee may submit our iudgement to his truth, and reiect Satans damnable lies. And for as much as the Lord regardeth not the prayers of the idle, but of such as vse all good meanes to attaine vnto their desires; wee must in the next place endeauour, to enrich our minds with such a measure of knowledge, as may enable vs to answer all Satans cauils. To this end wee are diligently to studie and meditate in the holy Scriptures, which are all-sufficient to make vs wise vnto saluation, and sufficiently skilfull to confute all Satans cunning sophistrie. And if he impudently call this truth of God in question, let vs seeke to confirme our faith in the full assurance thereof by all these reasons which I haue before alleadged. To these wee may adde these arguments which haue their ground on the light of nature: for howsoeuer through our fall it be much darkened and corrupted, yet the small sparkes which remaine doe sufficiently discouer the palpable falshood of Satans blasphemies, and teach vs to conclude that there is a iust God who made heauen and earth, and to thinke reuerently of him who vpholdeth all things with his power and goodnesse. With this light of nature we may also ioyne the light which we haue attained vnto by our owne experience, and out of the diligent obseruation of Gods workes, and the administration of his mercies and iudgements, both in respect of others and especially our selues, wee may easily be perswaded not onely of Gods being, but also of his infinite wisdome, power, iustice, mercy, truth, goodnesse, all-ruling prouidence, and the rest of the diuine attributes. Or if we be not able through our ignorance and simplicitie, or because our minds are astonished or distracted through the violence of Satans blasphemous suggestions, to vse the meanes before spoken of; then are wee to lay open our estate to some able friend, who may teach vs how to confute these tentations; and when we cannot find any ease by our owne meanes, we are to discouer our infirmities to the spirituall physitions of our soules, who may teach and apply vnto vs speciall remedies for euery particular tentation, when our our own weakneſſe will not ſuffer vs to take and vſe them. And in any caſe let vs take heed of that foolish bashfulneſſe which maketh men to keepe the Diuils wicked counſailes to their perdition for feare of ſhaming themſelues by diſcouering of them, knowing that it is no ſhame to be ſubiect to theſe temptations which are incident to Gods deareſt children, or though it were, yet it is better to indure ſuch a ſhame as ſhall be recompenced with a glorious conqueſt, than to be foyled by concealing theſe temptations, and ſo be in danger of eternall ſhame and confuſion at the day of Iudgement.

The other kind of blaſphemous ſuggeſtions are ſuch, as are without all ſhew of reaſon or appearance of truth, ſenſelelly abſurd, and no leſſe abominable for their ſottiſhneſſe, than for their hellish impiety: theſe are ſometime ſuggested into the minds of carnall worldlings, or of any other who remaine the vaſſals of Satan, vnleſſe it bee ſuch as match himſelfe in impious malice againſt God; for they are aboue the pitch of carnall corruption, and appeare odious and abominable euen by the light of nature; they ſtrike horror and feare euen into the heart of a naturall man, and ſeeme ſtrangly wicked to thoſe who are wholly ſwaied with the fleſh and the luſts thereof. And therefore it ſtandeth not with Satans policie, to ſuggeſt ſuch abominable thoughts into the minds of ordinarie ſinners, and ſecure worldlings, leſt hereby he ſhould wake their ſleeping conſciences, rouſe vp their dead hearts, and leaſt hauing vnreſiſtable occaſion to ſee, miſlike and bewaile theſe horrible blaſphemies, they ſhould hereby be moued to repent, not onely for theſe, but alſo their other ſinnes: But theſe hellish blaſphemies which cannot without trembling bee thought on, much leſſe named by a Chriſtian, he vſually caſteth into the mind of ſuch, as endeuoureth with all of the power of darkneſſe, and to ſerue the Lord in vprightneſſe of heart, and walke (as they ſpeake) before the face of the Lord, as in other ſinnes, ſo in theſe, as inſtruments for their impoſing, but alſo thoſe blaſphemies are ſo horrible, wicked, that they are aboue the conceit of corrupted nature, but caſteth themſelues into the mind with great violence and violence by the diuine immediate ſuggeſtion. Although the ſoule be vexed herein, yet it is not with any delight, but rather feare and horror, finding there is not any pleaſure, or profit to be had in theſe deuiliſh hookes, but only the vexation of fearefull and ſpeedy vengeance, if they ſhould ſwallow it by conſenting vnto it.

How Satan makes this ſnare herein, is not vnknowne to euery Chriſtian, to giue ſuggeſtion and approbation vnto theſe horrible blaſphemies (although ſuch is his impudencie and audacious boldneſſe, that he will not ſticke to tempt them to the moſt helliſh wickedneſſe) ſeeing hee cannot draw a prophane worldling thus farre with his greateſt power and skill; but hee chiefly aimeth at other ends, as namely, that hereby he may worke in them ſuch aſtoniſhment of mind, horror of conſcience, diſtraction in their thoughts, by reaſon that hee perſwadeth them to thinke that they are their owne wicked imaginations, as that they may become vtterly vnfit to performe any holy exerciſe or dutie which they owe vnto God, as namely prayer, hearing the word, receiuing the Sacrament, reading, meditation and ſuch like, knowing that if either hee can moue them hereby to neglect theſe holy duties, or make them through the vnquietneſſe of their thoughts altogether vnprofitable, hee ſhall ſo infeeble them that hee may quickly obtaine ouer them an eaſie victory. So alſo becauſe hee knoweth that the aſſurance of our ſaluation, dependeth vpon our ſerious and ſound repentance, therfore hee mainely by theſe ſuggeſtions indeuoureth to hinder them in this holy action: for whileſt he wholly exerciſeth their minds and thoughts about theſe horrible ſinnes, which in truth they neuer committed, ſo much as in the leaſt approbation and aſſent, hee cauſeth them to neglect the fight, ſcale and ſorrow which they ought to haue, of and for thoſe ſinnes, wherewith indeed they haue offended the Maieſtie of God. Againe, hee labours hereby to ouerthrow their faith, and to bring them to vtter deſpaire of Gods mercy, putting them out of all hope that euer hee will bee mercifull vnto them, and forgiue them ſuch outragious ſinnes, ſeeing they doe ſo impiouſly (as he perſwadeth them) blaſpheme him to his face. And therefore leaſt they ſhould by their longer abode in this life mainely theſe horrible ſinnes, and increaſe the feareſull meaſure of their iuſt condemnation, he tempteth them to lay violent hands vpon themſelues, and ſo ſeeke the mitigation of their helliſh torments by haſtening their death. Laſtly, after he hath by manifold experience learned, that by theſe ſuggeſtions hee little aduanceth any of theſe curſed ends; yet ſuch is his inueterate malice towards Gods poore ſaints, that hee will not forceaſe theſe blaſphemous temptations, ſo long as God permitteth him, that he may if poſſible ouercome and vexe thoſe whom he hath no power to ouercome. And finding that theſe fiery darts of Chriſtians hearts ſtrike more terrour, yea (if it were poſſible) a thouſand deaths, than they would haue their hearts a treaſure for all the ſpirituall blaſphemies, therefore he labours to bring them into the ſnare of [illegible] hee endeuoureth a hell in their conſciences in this life, and tormenteth their ſoules with

§. Sect. 6. Consolations to strengthen vs against wicked blasphemies.

Now that wee may bee armed against these impious suggestions, I will first propound some consolations which may vphold vs in this terrible conflict: and then I will adioyne some meanes whereby wee may bee preserued from the danger of these tentations. Concerning the former, weare to know and consider, that they are not our owne thoughts but Satans suggestions, and therefore they shall not be laid to our charge as being our sinnes, but shall be set vpon Satans score, vnto whom of right they doe appertaine, together with the punishment due vnto them. Yea, but how shall wee know that they are Satans suggestions and not our owne thoughts? I answer, it will manifestly appeare by these infallible signes: first, in that these blasphemous thoughts are in themselues so outragiously wicked, that euen nature though much corrupted is not capable of them, vnlesse by long custome of malicious sinning against God it is become plainely diabolical. For through Gods mercy there are some little sparkes of the light of nature, and some small and diuine relemblances renewed in euery man, which make him to haue a reuerend estimation of Gods Maiestie, and to abhorre these outragious blasphemies: so that though hee remaine destitute of any dram of grace, or sparke of true pietie, and continue a carnall worldling, securely liuing in sin; yet hee hath no liking or approbation of these diuellish thoughts, but rather is affrighted with horror and feare when as they are suggested in his mind. And therefore how much lesse are those capable of them, who haue receiued some measure of grace, and in vprightnesse of heart desire to feare, loue, and serue the Lord? So may plainely be discerned to be Satans suggestions, by the manner of their infusion: which is not voluntarie, vpon deliberation and choice, or seldome, as mans owne thoughts vsually are, but sudden like a flash of lightning, with such vnauoidable violence, that they cannot by any wit or strength of the partie bee preuented, and that consequently one following in the necke of another. Lastly, whereas mans owne thoughts being naturall worke no extraordinary perturbation of mind, contrariwise these blasphemous suggestions strike the heart with such horror, that therewith the ioynts of the ſtaffe are shaken, the heart quaketh, the whole body is affected, the ioynts trembles, and the haire of the head standeth an end: which plainely appeareth, that seeing these suggestions are so contrary to nature, and worke therein such grieuous and terrible effects, they are meerely praeternaturall and diuelliſh: and doe not arise from our owne corrupt lusts, with which they haue so little familiarity and agreement. But though it were supposed, that these hellish Blasphemies were equally to be ascribed to the flesh and Sathan, yet is there no cause why the weake Christian should bee discouraged hereby: seeing the flesh, that is, the corruption of nature and the sinning sin is no lesse wicked and malicious than the diuell himselfe, and both alike mortall enemies to the regenerate man, in all things opposite and contrarie vnto him, and he to them. For what the flesh liketh, the spirit disliketh, what that willeth, this Nilleth, and what this loueth and desireth, that loatheth and abhorreth. And therefore the wicked lusts of the flesh shalbe no more imputed to the spirituall man than the suggestions of the diuell, because fighting on Gods part against them, it resisteth, hateth and abhorreth them both alike. Yea if hee could put difference betweene them, hee would hate the lusts of the flesh more than the suggestions of the diuell; euen as the attempts of an inward secret traytor are more to be hated than the outward and open assaults of a professed enemie. And therefore the man regenerate is no more guiltie of the sinfull lusts of the flesh, than of the suggestions of Sathan; Seing he professeth as lesse enmitie against the one than against the other, condemning in his iudgment, and in his affection hating them both alike. And in this regard the Apostle Iohn saith, that he that is borne of God sinneth not, and that hee who sinneth is of the diuell, 1. Iohn 3. 8, 9. And the Apostle Paul giueth the reason of it, because it is no more he that doth it, but sinne that dwelleth in him, Rom. 7. 17.

1. That these blasphemous suggestions are not our owne sinnes.

Secondly, let such as are vexed with these suggestions know to their comfort, that howsoeuer Satan to make their estate more desperate perswadeth them that none, any that belong vnto God haue such blasphemies cast into their minds; yet the truth is as I haue found by manifold experience, that there is no kind of tentations commonly incident to Gods deare seruants afflicted in mind, and exercised in these spirituall conflicts, than this tentation of blasphemous thoughts. Yea so ordinarily doth Satan fight with this weapon, that he darst assault therewith our Saviour Iesus Christ, howsoeuer hee was the vnspotted Lambe of God, in whom there was no manner of sin, no not so much as the least degree of carnall concupiscence; for what more horrible blasphemie could be imagined, then to renounce God and his pure worship and seruice, and like Satans deuoted vassall to fall downe and worship him? And therefore seeing no tentation hath taken ken hold of vs which appertaineth not to others, and seeing many of Gods seruants who haue beene thus tempted, are now by his grace deliuered from this tormenting furie, and in peace of their consciences, and assurance of Gods loue, doe him faithfull seruice, and glorifie his name by their holy life and conuersation: yea seeing our head Iesus Christ was in the selfe same manner tempted like vs, and is therefore touched with the feeling of our infirmities, let vs not bee discouraged by these suggestions, but the more that Satan seeketh to dishonor God in our hearts, the more zealous let vs shew our selues in seeking the aduancement of his glory; and the more furiously he assaulteth vs, the more resolutely let vs make resistance, and with all the powers of our soules repell these hellish blasphemies, and then we may assure our selues, that (like other of Gods Saints who haue gone before vs) we shall haue an happy issue out of all these tentations, and inioy a calme peace after all these dangerous stormes and blustering tempests.

Thirdly, let them know, that it is not a sin simplie to bee tempted, if wee doe not yeeld to the tentation, but resist it with all our power. It is no fault in a chaste person if a filthie harlot intice him to vncleannesse, nor in a mercifull man if hee be prouoked to commit some horrible murther; so long as they resist these tentations, and shew their vtter detestation of these sins: and so in like manner, when as Satan being a spirit, doth after a spirituall manner, inwardly suggest immediatly by himselfe into our imagination or vnderstanding his wicked blasphemies against God, as his euill instruments suggest their tentations, according to their kind by the outward senses, if we withstand and abhorre them as wicked and diabolical, shewing no kind of liking of them, they shall neuer be imputed vnto vs as our sins, but vnto Satan who is the author of them. For euen Christ himselfe was tempted after the like manner, but was free from sin, because he withstood the tentation and repelled the tempter. Neither doth our gracious God who is most iust, and most mercifull, require any thing at our hands which is and euer hath beene impossible vnto vs, but not to be assaulted with Satans most impious tentations, was neuer in our power, no not in the state of innocencie, before the fall; and therefore the Lord doth not require that we should not bee tempted at all, of which himselfe alone hath the absolute power and no creature, but only that being assaulted by the diuell wee make resistance, and that putting on the whole spirituall armour, wee fight valiantly in this spirituall conflict against the enemies of our saluation. Neither hath the Lord promised that wee shall not be tempted (yea contrariwise hee hath giuen vs manifold warning of the malice, furie, and dangerous assaults of our spirituall enemies) but onely that hee will giue a good issue to the tentation, and not suffer vs to bee tempted aboue our power.

§. Sect. 9. How we may be assured that we resist these blasphemies.

But heere the weake Christian will bee readie to demand, How hee may be assured that he hath resisted these blasphemous suggestions, and not faintly yeelded vnto them, seeing his mind is continually troubled and molested with them? I answere, that in the outward man we resist them, when as we do not so actually yeeld by our words or deeds, as that our yeelding is subiect to our senses; & inwardly we resist them, when wee neither approue them in our iudgement, nor imbrace them with our will, nor incline vnto them in our affection, with the least liking or delight. And therfore when in our iudgement we condemne these blasphemous suggestions, as false and damnably wicked, when our will shunneth them with great dislike and is most auerse vnto them; and when in our affection wee abhorre and detest them, and are much vexed and grieued that such horrible tentations should enter into our minds; when wee are affrighted and astonished at their first appearance, and desire aboue all things in the world to bee freed from them; then doe wee make that courageous resistance which God requireth, and shall in the end find that gracious promise verefied vnto vs, that thus resisting the diuell, he will flee from vs, Iam. 4. 7.

Iames 4. 7.

Lastly, let them know to their comfort, that these Satanicall suggestions with which they are so much vexed and molested, howsoeuer they are to Satan most damnable and outragious sinnes, yet to them who thus resist them they are not euill; or (if euill at all) the euill of punishment, and not the euill of sinne, which the Lord in his infinit wisdome and goodnesse turneth to the good of his children. For when those who belong to Gods election, securely liue in their sins, and put off the time of their true conuersion, the Lord suffereth Satan to scourge them with this three-stringed whip, that they may be moued hereby to flee vnto him by serious repentance; and to discharge against them these cannons of most fearefull tentations, that hee may awake them out of their deepe sleepe of sinne, and moue them through this extremitie of danger, to buckle vnto them the spirituall armour, whereby they may be enabled to make resistance, not onely against these blasphemous suggestions, but likewise all other satanicall tentations, which either draw or allure them to any sinne. More particularly, when they haue not made that conscience which they ought, of their sinfull and wicked thoughts, either not regarding them when they are conceiued, ceiued, or not repenting of them afterwards: the Lord doth oftentimes correct this negligence in his children, and by these heauy crosses mouth them not only to set a watch before their lips, that they offend not with their tongue, and carefully obserue their actions, that they doe not scandalously transgresse his Commandements, but also that they keepe their hearts with all diligence, least they offend the Lord in their secret thoughts.

Psal. 39. 1. Prou. 4. 23.

Q. Sect. 11. That though our corrupt flesh be tainted with these blasphemies, yet there is no cause of despaire.

But it may bee the afflicted Christian will further complaine, that hee so much reuolueth these blasphemous tentations in his minde, and hath beene so negligent and slow in rejecting of them, that hee greatly doubteth lest hee hath yeelded vnto them some liking and approbation, and lest his sinfull flesh be somewhat tainted with them, as being the Deuils instrument, either in admitting or entertaining them. To this I answer, that as there is nothing more vsuall, than for a secure conscience to excuse, when it is guiltie: so nothing is more common, than for an afflicted conscience to accuse when it is innocent, & to lay an heauy burthen vpon it selfe where the Lord giueth a plaine discharge. But that we may imagine the worst, let all these accusations bee admitted as true & just, yet there is no cause why they should be thus desperatly discouraged: first, because their sin being committed through infirmitie is pardonable, and therefore if they vse the meanes of true repentance, as namely, to bewaile their corruption, to hate and abhorre it, to striue and endeuour to mortifie and subdue it, the Lord will surely according to his gracious promises remit and pardon it. Secondly, it is not committed by the Christian man if wee speake properly, but by the flesh and the vnregenerate part, the spirituall part in the meanetime loathing and abhorring it, and therefore labouring and striuing against it; as may appeare by that spirituall conflict which any in this case find in their hearts and consciences. And therefore it shall neuer be imputed to the spirituall man, who all hee may resisteth these suggestions, but vnto the flesh and part vnregenerate, the which alone shall beare the punishment, as when it is mortified and subdued by Gods Spirit, vsing as his instruments for this purpose, not only the hammer of his Word, but also temporary crosses and afflictions. Lastly, they are to know for their comfort and incouragement, that the Lord measureth not our sins, according to the nature and matter of the sins themselues, but rather according to the affection of the Sinner, which giueth the forme and being thereunto; in regard whereof the most outragious sin being entertained by the first concupiscence onely, and then smothered, choaked and crushed, like an Embrio in the wombe, is esteemed by God a farre lesse and more pardonable sin, than the least degree of wickednes which is willingly committed, nourished or defended. And therefore if they haue not so much as giuen their assent and approbation vnto these hellish blasphemies, but heartily abhorring them, haue earnestly laboured to bee rid of them, their suite for pardon shall at the throne of grace find an easie passage, if it bee sollicited and followed by heartie sorrow and vnfained repentance.

And so much concerning the consolations. Now the best courses and meanes which we can vse to free our minds from these blasphemous suggestions, are briefly these. First, earnest and frequent prayer, wherein wee are to intreate the Lord that hee will rebuke Sathan, and restraine his malice; that hee will keepe a narrow watch ouer our imaginations, minds & hearts with his holy Spirit, and restraine the tempter by his power, that he may not cast this hellish wild-fire of blasphemous thoughts into them, or at least, that hee will presently quench them at the first entrance, that they doe not inflame our concupiscence with the least liking of them.

Secondly, seeing Satan will often terrifie and astonish vs, by laying these blasphemies to our charge, as being our sins; wee are often to appeale vnto the Lord, the searcher of the heart and reines as our supreame Iudge; and hauing the testimony of our owne consciences to beare witnesse with vs, we are to protest our innocencie; and so to disauow these wicked suggestions, and to professe such hatred of them, that we would rather die a thousand deaths, than yeeld vnto them the least assent or approbation. And so this often cleering of our selues, will ease our minds of the burthen of Satans slanders, inflame our hearts with true loue towardes God, when we are not guiltie to our selues that we haue thus desperately offended him, and finally preserue vs from the least liking of these hellish blasphemies.

Thirdly, we are not to ouer-value, or so much to esteeme of these deuillish suggestions, as that thereby our vnderstandings should be dulled, our minds distracted, our senses astonished, and our hearts vtterly discouraged, and so bee made vnwilling, and vtterly vnfit to performe any good duties of pietie towards God, as prayer, reading, meditation and such like, the duties of charitie towards our brethren, and the duties of our owne particular callings. For at this marke Satan principally aymeth in these his suggestions, and therefore if wee let them so farre preuaile with vs, he hath attained his desire. But contrariwise rejecting them as abominable, and not worth either the thinking on or answering, let vs with a peaceable and resolued mind goe forward in these holy and honest honest exercises. Yea the more violent and importune Satan is, in urging and pressing vs with these blasphemous suggestions, that thereby wee may dishonour Gods holy Name, the more earnest and frequent let vs be in performing these Christian duties, and the greater zeale let vs labour to shew in glorifying our gracious God, whom Satan seeketh thus malitiously to dishonour. And thus when we shall with vndaunted courages continue all Christian duties, and take occasion by Sathans suggestions to bee more zealous and diligent in Gods Seruice, then hee being frustrated of his ends, will take no pleasure to labour not only in vaine, but to losse, but will voluntarily put an end to his owne tentations. And herein our Sauiour Christ, hath propounded himself as an example for our imitation; for when he was tempted by Satan to fall downe and worship him, he did not only repell instantly this blasphemous suggestion, saying, auoid Satan, but also tooke occasion hereby to be put in remembrance of that true worship and seruice which hee was to performe to his heauenly Father, as being proper and peculiar to him alone, saying, It is written, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serue.

But heere the afflicted Christian will bee ready to obiect, that howsoeuer this were a good course indeed for men of quiet thoughts; yet it would little auaile him who is so distracted in all holy duties with these blasphemous suggestions, and so molested and troubled in his mind, that hee can neither pray, nor read, nor conferre with any sense or vnderstanding; but euer and anon hee is disturbed in these holy exercises with these hellish tentations; so that his hearing, praying and reading, doe not only become vnprofitable, but also are turned (as he feareth) into sin. I answere, that howsoeuer they cannot performe these duties as they would, yet they must doe them as well as they can; yea and the more they are incumbred and troubled, the more earnest and instant must they bee in doing of them. For these exercises are our best spirituall weapons, whereby we repell the force of the enemy: and therefore let not Satan perswade vs, to cast away our weapons in hope of peace, because wee cannot manage them according to our desire, for then being vtterly disarmed, hee will obtaine an easie victory, and make vs his slaues. They are the Ordinance of God, & means of saluation, which he hath enjoyned vs to vse; and therefore though we find no present good, nor haue any other reason to moue vs to spend our time in them, yet let this be sufficient that God hath commanded them, and consequently setting aside all manner of disputation, let vs be diligent in performing of them in obedience to Gods Commandement. And so in the end we shall finde, that howsoeuer for the present these exercises seeme not onely vnprofitable vnto vs, but also hurtfull and sinfull, yet the Lord will graciously forgiue our infirmities, and wash them all away in the bloud of Christ, hee will accept of all our imperfect endeauours, and giue such a blessing vnto them with his holy Spirit; as that they shall bring comfort and joy to our hearts, and eternall peace to our troubled consciences.

Fourthly, if we would be freed from these blasphemous suggestions, we must not much reuolue them in our minds, nor suffer them to haue a continuall residence in our thoughts, but forcibly withstand them, euen when we find them entring into our minds, lifting vp our hearts vnto God in prayer, shewing our detestation of them, and desiring the assistance of his good Spirit to confirme and strengthen vs against them; or if they be at vnwares entred, we are presently to reject them, and not suffer them to lodge in our hearts; and hauing giuen them a repulse, we are to harbour in our mindes some holy and heauenly meditations, which hauing taken vp the roome, will keepe them from making so easie a re-entrance. Q. Sect. 16. 4. We must not reuolue these blasphemies in our minds.

Fiftly, wee must haue a speciall care to auoid both idlenesse and solitarinesse: And contrariwise we must spend our whole time, partly in the religious duties of prayer, reading, and holy conferences, and partly in the honest workes of our lawfull callings, frequenting as much as conueniently we can, the company of such as being indued with Christian wisdome, are ready in time of need to minister a word of instruction or consolation. For idlenesse prepareth vs for all tentations, and maketh our hearts like vnmanured grounds fit for nothing but for the weeds of Sathans impious suggestions; and solitarinesse in this case, if in any, bringeth an heauy woe with it; for as much as the weake Christian being falne and foiled in the conflict of tentations, hath none present to helpe him vp againe, but receiueth in his conscience one wound after another, being altogether vnable to make any resistance. And this was the reason why Sathan being to tempt our Sauiour Christ, made choice of the wildernesse, because by manifold experience he had found these solitary places fittest for his purpose. Q. Sect. 17. 5. We must auoid idlenesse & solitarines. Eccles. 4. 10.

Lastly, if by the vse of all these meanes we cannot be rid of these blasphemous suggestions, then must wee not too earnestly striue against them, or bee ouermuch vexed and grieued with them: but knowing that they are not ours, but the sins of the tempter (as before hath beene shewed) which shall not be laid to our charge, who abhorre and striue against them, but be put vpon Satans reckoning, who is the chiefe author of them; Q. Sect. 18. 6. We must not too earnestly striue against these blasphemies.

them; let vs quietly goe forward in our constant course of godlinesse and righteousnesse, & not striue ouer much with these suggestions, but let them passe as they come without any great dismayednesse. For if we stop the passage of these furious wild beasts with too much opposition and contention, they will be ready to run ouer and suppresse vs; whereas they will not much molest vs, if wee suffer them to haue an easie egresse. Neither will Sathan cease to ply vs with these hatefull suggestions, so long as hee perceiueth that wee are vexed and turmoyled with them; for hee thinketh his labour well spent, though hee cannot ouercome vs, yet if hee can by molesting and grieuing our afflicted mindes, hinder vs from quiet performance of all holy duties. As therefore a man who is trauailing in a journey of great importance, doth not much regard the barking and bawling of little Curres which set vpon him in his way, but constantly holdeth on in his course, because hee knoweth they cannot hurt him: Whereas if he should run after euery Dogge that commeth out of the doores and barketh at him, hee should vainly spend his time and hinder his journey, yea by resistance make these Curres much more fierce and eager in pursuing him, which will soone be quiet and leaue to follow him, if he neglect them and keepe on in his way: so if whilest wee are trauayling in the wayes of Godlinesse towards our heauenly Country, wee are ready to re-encounter these wicked spirits which lying in our way doe labour to stop vs in our journey with these hellish tentations: which haue no more reason in them than the barking of a Dogge; we shall hereby hinder our journey and loose our time, and make them more fierce and busie in setting vpon vs, because they see that they hinder vs in our way; whereas if wee neglect them and quietly hold on our Christian course, as not regarding them, they will soone leaue vs, and quickly be weary of this bootlesse labour.

CHAP. XII.

Sathans tentations perswading the Christian that hee hath sinned against the Holy Ghost, answered.

§. Sect. 1. Of the sinne against the Holy Ghost.

AND so much for answere vnto those tentations which arise from Sathans blasphemous suggestions. Now wee are to come vnto those, whereby hee endeuoureth to perswade afflicted Christians that they haue committed the sin against the Holy Ghost; for taking aduantage vpon the ignorance of weake Christians, hee moueth them to beleeue that they haue committed this vnpardonable sin, that so being past all hope of repentance or remission, he may plunge them into desperation, and so vtterly discourage them from going forward in the course of godlinesse. The which his tentation is so vsuall and common, that there is scarce any who are exercised in this spirituall warfare, if they be conuerted vnto God out of their ignorance, whom he doth not encounter with this weapon. For as much therefore as ignorance is the chiefe ground of this tentation, therefore the best meanes to strengthen our selues against it, is to know what this sin is, which if we once vnderstand, there is no danger of being foiled in this assault.

The sin against the Holy Ghost, is a generall deniall and oppugning of the truth & all Religion, of which the vnderstanding and conscience by the illumination of the Spirit are perswaded and conuicted, proceeding from an obstinate will and purposed malice against God and his Truth. The which sin is committed of two sorts of men; first, of those who haue made profession of the truth, and afterwards become Apostataes, not from some part only, but from all Religion, condemning, blaspheming, and persecuting as heretical and impious, that truth which before they professed, and of which they were perswaded. And thus did Hymenaeus and Alexander sin, of whom Paul speaketh, 1. Tim. 1.20. Secondly, of those who were neuer professors thereof, whose consciences notwithstanding are conuicted of that Truth which they do oppugne: an example whereof we haue in the Scribes and Pharises, Mat. 12.24,38. and in many of the learned Papists in these dayes, who maliciously deny and persecute that Truth which they know and are conuicted of.

Hereby therefore it appeareth, that not euery grieuous sinne against knowledge and conscience is the sin against the Holy Ghost: for thus Dauid offended, who was a man according to Gods owne heart; nor euery denying of the knowne Truth, if it proceed from feare and infirmitie, and not from malice and obstinate rebellion, for thus Peter sinned in denying his Master; nor all kinde of opposing and persecuting of the Truth, if it be not against knowledge and conscience, but vpon blindnesse and ignorance, for thus Paul offended before his conuersion, as appeareth, 1. Tim. 1.13. and many of the Iewes who crucified Christ, as the Apostle Peter testifieth, Acts 3.17. nor all malicious opposing against euery knowne Truth, but of the truth in generall and all true Religion; for this sin is an vniuersall Apostasie from God and his Truth, and not onely a defection from some particular point thereof. So that though a man sinne against knowledge and conscience, through infirmitie, and not of malice; though hee deny the Truth through feare feare and weaknesse; though hee persecute it through blindnesse and ignorance; though he wittingly oppose against, and willingly persecute some particular point thereof, and yet hold and professe the generall, howsoeuer he hath most hainously offended, yet he hath not committed this vnpardonable sin against the holy Spirit, and therefore is not excluded from repentance, nor vpon his repentance from pardon and forgiuenesse. Whereby it manifestly appeareth that these poore Christians which labour vnder the burthen of sin, are meerely deluded by Satans false suggestions, and grosly abused through their owne ignorance, when as hee maketh them beleeue that they haue sinned against the Holy Ghost. But let such know to their comfort, that so long as they would not commit this sin, or feare lest they haue already falne into it, they are as yet most free from it, seeing it is not done of infirmitie or at vnawares, but vpon a malitious will, cleere knowledge and setled resolution.

But here the poore Christian is ready to complaine, that hee is continually troubled with impious thoughts, and horrible blasphemies against God and his holy Spirit, which hee feareth to bee the sin against the Holy Ghost. I answere as before, that seeing these thoughes are a trouble vnto him, and and seeing hee feareth to commit this sinne, thereby it is manifest that he is not falne into it, as appeareth by that which hath beene said. Secondly, hee is to know that his state is common with Gods faithfull children, who are thus vexed especially in the conflict of tentations, and before they haue received a great measure of faith, and fulnesse of perswasion of Gods loue and fauour, whereby they are moued intirely to loue him againe. Neither needs this to seeme strange vnto any who considereth of that masse of naturall corruption which remaineth in vs, euen after regeneration, which continually boyleth and fometh vp the filthy scum of wicked thoughts and blasphemous imaginations: and of the malice of our spirituall enemy Sathan, who is still ready to tempt vs by his suggestions to the most horrible and outragious sins, if not in hope to ouercome vs, yet at least to vexe and trouble vs. As we may see in the example of the holy man Iob, whom hee spared not to tempt vnto fearefull blasphemy. But though wee cannot keepe the Deuill from assaulting vs, let not this discourage vs, yea, rather let vs be moued hereby with more care and watchfulnesse to withstand him, for if wee resist him, hee will flee from vs, Iam. 4.7. But in this our resistance, two things especially must be obserued: the first is the meanes whereby we must giue him the repulse; which is partly by the Sword of the Spirit, the Word of God, whereby wee beate backe the tentation, prouing the wickednesse thereof by some testimony of Scripture, according to our Sauiours example; and partly by lifting vp our minds vnto God in prayer, desiring strength to withstand the tentation. Secondly, we must take heed that we doe not reuolue the tentation in our minds, but presently repell it, least these hellish sparkes taking hold of the tinder of our corruptions, doe at length inflame vs with horrible wickednesse, which at their first falling might easily haue beene extinguished. And if we thus speedily repell these horrible blasphemies suggested by Sathan, they shall neuer be imputed vnto vs, but vnto him from whome they proceede, and that both in respect of the fault and punishment.

Chap. XIII.

Arguments to proue the certaintie of our perseuerance grounded vpon Gods will and immutabilitie.

Q. Stil. 1. Satans tentation mouing the Christian to doubt of his perseuerance.

AND thus haue I answered Sathans tentations which concerne our sanctification. Now in the last place wee are to intreate of our perseuerance which hee impugneth with no lesse subtiltie and violence. For though the Christian man haue attained to some assurance, that hee is elected, called, justified, and sanctified, yet Sathan will not giue him ouer, but laboureth to perswade him, that notwithstanding all this hee may finally fall away and become a reprobate. Let it bee granted (will hee say) that thy state now is such as thou supposest, yet thou art in no safetie, neither canst promise vnto thy selfe any assurance of attaining vnto euerlasting life and happines, seeing those only which continue vnto the end shall be saued: whereas thou hast no assurance of thy perseuerance; nay, contrariwise, thou art in respect of thy frailtie and mutabilitie certaine of nothing more than thine vncertaintie. Call to thy remembrance the example of thy first parents, who were perfectly righteous and holy, more accomplished in all graces than any of their posteritie, more strong and able to endure and resist all tentations, as being indued with free will, and therefore able both to chuse the good and refuse the euill, who notwithstanding all this were ouercome, and of the children of God made the slaues of Sin and Satan. Did they therefore fall who were perfectly righteous, and canst thou, who art most imperfect, hope to stand? were not they who were full of all grace able to indure the encounter in the day of triall, and canst thou hope to make resistance who art full of sin and corruption? were they vanquished

quished who were strong champions, and doest thou, who art weake and feeble, hope for victorie? were they allured by Satans tentations, to commit sinne, and fall from God, who could freely will the good and nill the euill; and canst thou hope to perseuere and continue constant, whose will is captiued and ouerruled by thy corruption? Consider further thy mutabilitie and vnconstancy, thy exceeding weakenesse and frailtie, thy corruptions and imperfections; and on the other side set before thee, the mightie power, the subtill policie, the vigilant watchfulnesse, and vnwearied diligence, of thy spirituall enemies who continually assault thee; and then thinke with thy selfe if there be any possibilitie, that thy weaknes should withstand their power; thy ignorant simplicitie their prudent wisdome, and thy carelesse negligence their carefull diligence. Lastly, call to mind the manifold examples which thou hast both read and seene, of such as haue beene of greater gifts and graces, and made a much fairer shew than thou, of holinesse towards God and righteousnesse towards men, who notwithstanding haue finally fallen away and become reprobates, and therefore why maist not thou be one of this number? Seeing then the case thus standeth, doe not foolishly flatter thy selfe with a vaine hope, that because thou art elected, called, iustified, and sanctified, therefore thou shalt bee saued; for though now thou art elected, yet hereafter thou maist become a reprobate; though to day thou art a child of God, and in his fauour, yet to morrow thou maiest through thy sinnes, bee a child of the diuell, and in Gods displeasure bee reiected; though now thou art a member of Christ, thou maist become a limme of Satan; and though now thou art indued with the spirit of God, and with all the graces and gifts thereof, yet by thy sinne thou maiest easily lose both it and them; and bee wholly and finally giuen ouer to runne on in thy former wickednesse vnto eternall death and condemnation.

Sect. 2. The generall meanes to strengthen the Christian against the former tentation.

And thus doth Satan perswade the Christian man to doubt of his perseuerance. The which tentations, if wee would withstand, it behoueth vs not to ground the certaintie of our perseuerance vpon our owne resolution, strength and graces which we haue receiued, for these are altogether insufficient to vphold vs against the assaults of our spirituall enemies, who are farre more strong than wee; but wholly distrusting in our owne abilitie, let vs rest and rely onely vpon the Lord: for as it is he alone who hath bestowed vpon vs all the gifts and graces which we haue receiued, so also haue we our growth and perseuerance in them from him onely. And so wee may bee assured of our perseuerance, notwithstanding our owne weaknesse, and inconstancy, for it is God which stablisheth vs in Christ, as it is, 2. Cor. 1, 21. Though in respect of any thing that is in vs we might euery houre fall away, yet wee are sure to continue in those graces which we haue receiued, mauger the malice and power of all our enemies, for wee stand not in our owne strength, but are kept by the power of God through faith vnto saluation, as the Apostle speaketh, 1. Pet. 1. 4. Though wee should euery day lose euerlasting life and happinesse through negligence, or sell it away for the vanities of the world and pleasures of sinne, if it were in our owne hands, yet all this is not sufficient to disinherit vs of our heauenly patrimonie, for it is not at our owne disposition, but our life is hid with Christ in God, as it is Col. 3. 3. And therefore though in our selues wee are as weake as reedes, and as vnconstant and changeable as the wind and weather, yet are wee tenne thousand times more sure to perseuere in that grace which wee haue receiued vnto euerlasting life, than Adam in the state of innocencie; for he stood by his owne strength, which though it were great yet it was finite, but we by the almightie power of God; he by the vertue of his own free will, which was mutable and subiect to alteration, but wee by the will of God, which being immutable admitteth of no change.

Sect. 3. The head of the controuersie.

But let vs come more specially to speake of this maine controuersie betweene the true Christian and the enemies of his saluation, the state whereof standeth thus; whether he that is elected in Gods eternall counsaile, and is effectually called that is, seuered from the world, giuen to Christ, and ingrafted into him by the spirit of God and a liuely faith, iustified, sanctified, and indued with the sauing gifts and graces of Gods spirit, may after all this fall away, lose the spirit of God and the graces therof, and become as prophane and wicked as euer hee was before his conuersion, lose also his iustification, be cut off from the body of Christ, and finally become a reprobate. This the enemies of our saluation affirme, but we deny as being a thing impossible, not in regard of our owne strength, constancie, or great measure of grace which wee haue receiued, but in respect of Gods will and power who vpholdeth vs, Christs intercession who prayeth for vs, and Gods holy spirit alwayes dwelling in vs, whereby wee are so strengthened and confirmed, that all the power of hell cannot preuaile against vs.

Sect. 4. The first argument proued vpon Gods will.

This our assertion wee will first confirme by vnfallible reasons, and afterwards answere the contrarie obiections which are made against this truth by the enemies of our saluation. The reasons which may bee al-alleaged for this purpose are many; the fifth sort are taken from Gods owne nature, as it is described in his word, and exercised in his works towards vs. As first wee may bee assured of our perseuerance, because it is grounded vpon Gods will, which may be considered either in his secret counsaile and decree of election, or in his will reuealed in his word. From the first wee may thus reason. Whomsoeuer the Lord in his eternall counsaile hath elected to euerlasting life, they shall most certainely be saued, and persuere in the meanes tending thereunto, which are no lesse contained in Gods decree then our saluation it selfe. But the Lord in in his eternall counsaile hath elected all the faithfull vnto eternall life. And therefore nothing can hinder their saluation, nor yet their perseuerance, without which it is impossible they should be saued. The first part of this reason is cleere and manifest; for not to effect that which one hath decreed and purposed, ariseth either impotencie and want of power, or inconstancie, neither of which without blasphemie can bee ascribed vnto God; for there is nothing hard vnto him, Ier. 32. 17. but he doth whatsoeuer hee will, Psal. 115. 3. yea euen those things which vnto men are impossible are possible vnto him, Mat. 19. 26. for he can do all things, Iob. 42. 2. Neither is the will of God mouable, for this ariseth a want of wisdome, whereas his wisdome is infinite and knoweth no end, Psal. 145. 5. and hee perfectly seeth and knoweth all things in one view, past, present and to come, Heb. 4. 13. and therefore we may conclude with the Apostle, that the purpose of God in his election remaineth sure, Rom. 9. 11. and the foundation of God (that is, his vnchangeable decree) continueth sure, and hath this seale, The Lord knoweth who are his, 2. Tim. 2. 19. Whosoeuer then are elected, they shall most certainely be saued, neither is it possible that they should fall away: as our Sauiour implieth, Mat. 24. 24. whereas hee saith, that the false Prophets should shew such great signes, that if it were possible they should deceiue the very Elect. Noting hereby that this is altogether a thing impossible, that they should bee deceiued and seduced with false Christs and false Prophets. The second part of this reason, namely, that all the faithfull are elected, is also of most vndoubted truth; for whosoeuer haue a true faith they are iustified, whosoeuer are iustified are also effectually called, elected, and shall be glorified. What said I? shall bee? may are already glorified, as the Apostle affirmeth, to proue the vndoubted certainty of their saluation, Rom. 8. 30. Moreouer the Apostle maketh faith an inseperable fruit of our election, and proper & peculiar vnto the elect, calling it the faith of Gods elect, Tit. 1. 1. And Act. 13. 48. it is said, that as many as were ordained vnto eternal life beleeued. where hee maketh Gods election the cause of faith. And contrariwise our Sauiour telleth vs, that they beleeue not, who are not his sheep, Iob. 10. 26. So that it is manifest that those who beleeue are elected, & those who are elected shall be saued.

Iob. 10. 26.

Q. Sect. 5. The second reason, grounded on his will reuealed.

The second reason may be taken from his will reuealed in his word; for whatsoeuer God thus willeth, that shall most certainely come to passe: but God willeth, that all should haue euerlasting life whom he hath giuen to Christ, in which number are all those who are effectually called, as our Sauiour testifieth, Iohn. 6. 39. And this is the fathers will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath giuen me I should lose nothing, but should raise it vp againe at the last day. And he willeth likewise, that he that beleeueth in the son should be saued, as it is vers. 40. And therfore those who are effectually called and beleeue in Christ, cannot possibly perish, but shall most certainely haue eternall life.

Iob. 6. 39. 40.

Q. Sect. 6. The third reason, taken from Gods immutability in his loue.

The third reason may be taken from the constancie & immutabilitie of God, both in his loue towards vs, and also in his gifts. In the former respect wee may thus reason: Whomsoeuer the Lord loueth with a constant and immutable loue, those shall most certainely be saued, seeing it is the nature of loue to desire the good of the partie beloued, and to seeke his welfare as much as it can; but the Lord loueth his faithfull ones with a constant and perpetuall loue, as himselfe testifieth, Ier. 31. 3. I haue loued thee with an euerlasting loue, therefore with mercie haue I drawne thee. So Ioh. 13. 1. Forasmuch, as hee loued his owne which were in the world, vnto the end he loued them. And therefore all the faithfull may assure themselues that they shall bee saued, and being once assured of Gods loue, they may with the Apostle be vndoubtedly perswaded, that nothing in the world shall bee able to separate them from the loue of God which is in Christ Iesus our Lord.

Iob. 13. 1.

Q. Sect. 7. An obiection against the former reason, answered.

But against this it may be obiected, that the sinnes of the faithfull doe prouoke the Lord vnto anger, and moue him to cast them off in his iust displeasure, and to withdraw from them his wonted loue & fauour: and therfore seeing sinne separateth them from Gods loue, it may also plunge them into condemnation. To which I answere, that indeed the sinnes of the faithfull doe in themselues deserue the euerlasting wrath of God and eternall death, if they were not taken away by Christ, who hath by his precious bloodshed satisfied his Father in full measure, and that euen now they so offend by their sinnes their gracious Father, that they had need to renew their faith and repentance, before they can haue any sensible assurance that they are reconciled vnto him, and receiued into his loue and fauour. It is most true that God is displeased with the sinnes of his children, according to that Esa. 64. 5. Behold thou art angrie, for wee haue sinned. But this anger doth not exclude them out of his loue, seeing it is not the anger of an enemie but of a gracious Father, who is not angrie with their persons to destroy them, but with their sinnes to conuert and saue them. As therefore children with their faults prouoke their parents to anger, and moue them to turne their fatherly smiles into bitter frownes, and the fruits of their loue into the effects of hatred in outward shew, as namely seuere countenances, sharpe reproofes, and rigorous chastisements; and in respect of these outward signes and effects of their anger they are vsually said to be out of fauour and in their Fathers displeasure, howsoeuer in truth at the same time they intirely loue them, and vse all this wholesome seueritie not because they hate, but because they would reforme them: So Gods children when by their sins they doe offend him and prouoke his anger against them, are said to bee out of his fauour, not that God doth euer change his Fatherly affection, or purposeth vtterly to reiect them, but because hee changeth the effects of his loue into the effects of hatred in outward shew; as when inwardly he suffreth them to bee vexed with the terrors of conscience, and with the apprehension of his anger and displeasure, and outwardly whippeth and scourgeth them with temporarie afflictions; all which he doeth not for any hatred to to their persons, for he neuer hateth those whom hee hath once loued in Christ, but for the hatred of their sinnes, and loue of the sinner, whom by this meanes he bringeth by the rough and vnpleasant way of repentance, vnto the eternall pleasures of his kingdome.

Esa. 64. 5. How God is said to be angrie with his children.

Q. Sect. 8. Our perseuerance proued by Gods immutabilitie in his gifts.

And thus it appeareth that Gods loue and anger may stand together, and that notwithstanding his momentanie displeasure, his loue may be eternall. Now secondly we are to know, that as God is immutable in his loue, so also in his gifts, as faith, repentance, hope, affiance, charitie, &c. according to that Rom. 11. 29. The gifts and calling of God are without repentance. But yet this is to be vnderstood with diuers cautions; for first it is not to be vnderstood of all the gifts of God, not of temporarie gifts, nor of the gifts of the spirit which are common to the wicked with the godly; for these being not essentiall to Christian nor necessary to saluation, they end and giue ouer or take away, as in his infinite wisdome hee thinketh best; neither yet are we to vnderstand it of all gifts of the spirit which are proper to the elect, for some also of these being not of the essence of faith, but onely effects and fruits thereof, he taketh away from his children for a time, as namely, the puritie of their conscience, and the peace which doth accompanie it, the sense and feeling of Gods loue and fauour, cheerefulnesse of spirit, ioy in the holy Ghost, patience, the gift of prayer and such like, because his loue and the saluation of the faithfull may stand with the want of these gifts for a time. Neither are we to vnderstand this of the actions and sensible fruits of Gods graces, for these also haue their intermissions, the graces themselues notwithstanding remaining. For as the Sunne doth alwaies shine, and yet sometimes the beames thereof are not discerned, being hindred from spreading themselues by the interposition of the clouds, or of the earth, and the fire doth continue light and hot in it selfe, and yet being couered with ashes doth giue neither light nor heate to the standers by; so these graces of Gods spirit, faith, hope, affiance, loue and such like, may in respect of their substance habitually remaine in vs, and yet for a time not send forth the light and heate of ioy, comfort, peace and the rest; & though they remaine their nature still, yet they may be hindred from exercising their actions and functions; as namely, when as the conscience is wounded with some wilfull sinne committed against knowledge, or in the spirituall conflict of tentations, as before I haue shewed at large. Lastly, this is not to be vnderstood of their measure and degree at least in our sense and feeling, or in their actions and operations, for these graces haue their full and waine, their ebbe and tide, their perfect strength and their faint languishing; but of their substance, habits and true being, in which respect they neuer faile, but continue without intermission vnto the end, for as the gift of faith, so all other the like graces are the worke of God, as our Sauiour teacheth vs, Ioh. 6. 29. and we may assure our selues of this, That he that hath begunne this good worke in vs, will also finish and perfect it vntil the day of Iesus Christ, as the Apostle speaketh Phil. 1. 6.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the fourth and fifth reason to proue the certaintie of our perseuerance, grounded vpon Gods power and truth.

THe fourth reason may be taken from Gods omnipotencie and almighty power: for if God in respect of his immane loue, be willing that we shall be saued & persevere in the meanes of our saluation, and be immutable also and vnchangeable in his loue and will, and likewise in respect of his power infinit and almightie, able to effect whatsoeuer hee willeth: then surely being assured that we are in the state of grace, and in Gods loue and fauour: there is no doubt, but we shall be saued, and persuere in the meanes which are inseparably ioyned with our saluation. But as the Lord in respect of his loue is most willing, so in respect of his power he is able, continually to vphold vs in the state of grace, and to frustrate and defeate all the malice and might of all our enemies, who labour to hinder our saluation, for hee is mightie to saue, as it is Esa. 63.1. And though through our frailtie and weakeneſſe wee might continually bee vanquiſhed and driuen from God, yet now there is no doubt hereof, ſeeing wee doe not ſtand in our owne ſtrength, but are kept by the power of God through faith vnto ſaluation, as it is, 1. Pet. 1. 5. though in our ſelues we are impotent and feeble, yet we are ſtrong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, and being armed with the armour of God, we are inabled to ſtand againſt the aſſaults of the diuell, as the Apoſtle ſpeaketh Epheſ. 6. 10, 11. Though wee are of little force in regard of our owne ſtrength and able to doe nothing, yet are we able to do all things through the helpe of Chriſt which ſtrengtheneth vs, as it is, Phil. 4. 13. though we be weake in faith, and vnable to ſtand, yet being the ſeruants of God we ſhall be eſtabliſhed, for God is able to make vs ſtand, Rom. 14. 4. In a word, though our ſpirituall enemies are ſtronger then we, yet ſhall they not bee able to plucke vs from Chriſt: For the father which gaue vs to him is greater then all, and none is able to take vs out of the fathers hand, as our Sauiour reaſoneth, Iohn 10. 28. 29. And therefore when wee are diſcouraged and ready to faint, in the fight and ſenſe of our owne weakneſſe, and our enemies mightie power, let vs comfort our ſelues in the Lord, ſaying with the Apoſtle, I know whom I haue beleeued, and I am perſwaded hee is able to keepe that which I haue committed to him againſt that day, as it is 2. Tim. 1. 12.

The fifth reaſon is grounded vpon Gods truth and fidelitie, which is ſo infallible, that whatſoeuer he hath ſpoken, promiſed, or commanded, that he will moſt certainely performe: for God is a faithfull and true witneſſe, Apoc. 1. 5. and all his promiſes in Chriſt are Yea and Amen, 2. Corinth. 1. 20. So that it is more eaſie that heauen and earth ſhould paſſe away, then that one title of Gods word ſhould fall vnfulfilled, Luke 16. 17. Now the Lord in his word hath aſſured all that beleeue, that he will vphold and preſerue them vnto euerlaſting life, againſt all the furie of their enemies; as may appeare both by his couenant which he hath made with his Church in generall, and alſo by particular promiſes made to al the faithfull. Concerning the firſt, the Lord maketh this couenant with his Church Eſa. 59. 21. I will (ſaith hee) make this my couenant with them: my ſpirit that is vpon thee, and my words which I haue put in thy mouth, ſhall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy ſeede, nor out of the mouth of the ſeede of thy ſeede, ſaith the Lord, from henceforth euen for euer. If therefore Gods ſpirit neuer departeth from them, and they for euer confeſſe and profeſſe his word and truth, then certainly they can neuer fall away nor loſe their heauenly inheritance. For, if the ſpirit of him that raiſed vp Ieſus from the dead dwell in vs, hee ſhall alſo quicken our mortall bodies, becauſe his ſpirit dwelleth in vs, as it is Rom. 8. 11. And as many as are led by the ſpirit of God, they are the ſons of God verſ. 14. And if we be children, wee are alſo heires, &c. verſe. 17. So Ier. 32. 38. I will bee their God, and they ſhall be my people. Verſ. 39. And I will giue them one heart and one way, that they may feare me for euer, for the wealth of them and of their children after him, 40. And I will make an euerlaſting couenant with them, that I will neuer turne away from them to doe them good, but I will put my feare in their hearts, that they ſhall not depart from me, &c. If therefore the Church and people of God ſhall feare him for euer, If his couenant be euerlaſting, if hee will neuer depart from them, nor they from him, then certainely there is no doube of their perſeuerance. And chap. 31. 31. 32. The Lord ſaith that hee will make a new couenant with his Church, not according to the couenant which he made with their Fathers. 33. But this ſhall bee the couenant that I will make with the houſe of Iſrael, after thoſe daies (ſaith the Lord) I will put my Law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will bee their God, and they ſhall be my people, &c. And I will forgiue their iniquitie, and I will remember their ſinnes no more. In which words the Lord couenanteth, that his Law ſhould euer remaine ſo deeply ingrauen in their hearts, that nothing ſhould blot it out, and that they ſhould continually meditate and delight themſelues therein; for thus this phraſe of writing in the heart is vſually taken in the Scriptures. So likewiſe he aſſureth them of the perpetuall pardon of their ſinnes, ſo that their ſinnes ſhould neuer make fruſtrate that couenant which he had made with them. So Heſ. 2. 19. And I will marry thee vnto me for euer, yea, I will marry thee vnto me in righteouſneſſe and iudgement, and in mercy and compaſſion, 20. I will marry thee vnto me in faithfulneſſe, and thou ſhalt know the Lord. If therefore the Church of God ſhall bee married vnto him for euer in righteouſneſſe, and in kindneſſe and in mercie and compassion, then can neither their faith and righteousnesse towards God, nor his mercy and compassion towards them faile, but both shall continue vnto the end. Seeing then the couenant which is betweene God and vs, doth assure vs of the continuance of his loue and mercy, and of our perseuerance in his feare and holy obedience, wee need not to doubt either of the ceasing of his loue, or our falling away. For though the mountaines remooue, and the hils fall downe, yet shall not his mercy depart from his children, neither shall the couenant of his peace fall away. As the Lord himselfe protesteth, Esay 54.10.

Esay 54.10.

Q. Sect. 3. An obiection taken from our faultinesse, answered.

And thus haue I proued the certaintie of our perseuerance, by the Couenant of grace which God hath made with his Church; for whatsoeuer the Lord promiseth to the whole body of the Church, that hee also promiseth to euery particular member thereof, seeing the whole containeth all its parts: so that whatsoeuer belongeth to the whole body, that also belongeth to all the members. But it may be obiected, that howsoeuer this Couenant on Gods part is firme and eternall, yet by our fault and transgression it may bee made void and frustrate. I answere, that so likewise the Couenant made with the Israelites was firme on Gods part, yet made frustrate by their sinne: but the Lord hath made a new Couenant with vs, not of workes but of grace, vpon the condition of faith and repentance, which being obserued on our part, our sinne and vnworthinesse cannot make it frustrate and of none effect, as before I haue shewed more at large.

Q. Sect. 4. Of the particular promises of our perseuerance. Psal. 1.3. Ezech. 47.12.

Secondly, we are assured of our perseuerance, by Gods particular promises made to his faithfull ones. Psal. 1.3. it is said of the righteous man, that hee shall be like a tree planted by the riuers of waters, that will bring forth her fruits in due season, whose leafe shall not fade, &c. As therefore the tree planted by the Riuer side doth not wither, because continually it sucketh moysture, whereby it is quickened and refreshed: so the righteous man perseuereth in his righteousnesse, because he is continually reuiued and quickened with that spirituall moysture, whilest hee sucketh from Christ who is the fruitfull roote, whereof he is a branch. Psal. 15.5. Psal. 37.24.

Psal. 125.1.

Verse 9. Psal. 125.1.

water which I shall giue him, shall be in him a well of water, springing vp to euerlasting life. Where by this water we are to vnderstand the Holy Ghost, as appeareth, Iohn 7. 38. He that beleeueth in me, as saith the Scripture, out of his belly shall flow riuers of the water of life. 39. This (saith the Euangelist) spake he of the Spirit which they that beleeued in him should receiue. So that to drinke of this water is through faith in Christ to bee made partakers of the Holy Ghost, whom whosoeuer receiueth shall retaine him vnto the end. As therefore he that hath a liuing fountaine continually springing in him cannot be a thirst; so they who haue this fountaine of life perpetually springing in them, they shall neuer thirst any more but it shall continually refresh and quicken them, till they haue attained vnto euerlasting life. Iohn 6.35. I am the bread of life, he that commeth to me shall not hunger, and he that beleeueth in me shall neuer thirst. And Verse 37. All that the Father giueth me shall come vnto me, and him that commeth to me I cast not away. And Verse 51. I am the liuing bread which came downe from heauen, if any man eate of this bread he shall liue for euer. And Verse 54. Whosoeuer eateth my flesh and drinketh my bloud, hath eternall life, and I will raise him vp at the last day, &c. Now whosoeuer beleeue in Christ, they eate his flesh, and drinke his bloud; for faith is the mouth of the soule, whereby wee feed on this heauenly food, and therefore all the faithfull shall haue euerlasting life; yea, as hee saith, they haue it already, and shall not come into condemnation, but haue passed from death to life, as it is 1 John 3.14. and Iohn 10. 28. I will giue vnto them eternall life, and they shall neuer perish, neither shall any plucke them out of my hand. 29. My Father which gaue them me is greater then all, and none is able to take them out of my Fathers hand. In which words he both sheweth his will in his promise, and his power to performe it, and therefore whosoeuer are the sheepe of Christ, they cannot be taken from him, neither for a time nor eternally: for so it should follow (if Christs reason be of any force) that they who tooke them from him should bee stronger than Christ and his Father, which were a horrible blasphemy for any to imagine.

John 3.36. and 5.24.

But here it is obiected, that these promises are made to all the faithfull so long as they continue faithfull, and to the sheep of Christ so long as they are his sheepe, who abide in his word and follow him. But when they cease to beleeue and to bee his sheepe, they doe not appertaine vnto him, for they only remaine the Disciples of Christ who abide in his word, and haue his word abiding in them. John 8.31. and 15.7. To which I answere, that this is an idle trifling in a particular disputation, and a vaine begging of the que-question is controuerted. For the question is, whether the faithfull may bee assured of their perseuerance in faith, whether a member of Christ may bee assured to continue a member of Christ, whether a sheepe of Christ may assure himselfe that hee is to remayne for euer a sheepe of Christ. We hold the affirmatiue part, and proue it by diuers testimonies; they denie that these promises are absolute, but on this condition, that wee are assured none can plucke vs from Christ, so long as wee continue and retaine the nature of the members and sheepe of Christ. But I would faine know what it is to bee separated and plucked from Christ, but to cease to bee a member or sheepe of Christ, and to lose their nature? and what is it to bee a sheepe of Christ but to heare his word and to follow him? When as then our Sauiour Christ promiseth that none shall plucke his sheepe from him, hee promiseth that none shall be able to make them cease to be his sheepe, nor deprive them of their nature, which is the effectuall forme that maketh them to be his sheepe, rather then either who neither heare his voice nor follow him. Wherefore therefore they affirme, that these promises doe assure vs to perseuere so long as wee continue and retaine the nature of the sheepe and members of Christ, what is it, but idely to repeate the same thing? namely, that Gods promises doe assure vs to perseuere, so long as we doe perseuere; that we shall not be plucked from Christ, so long as wee remayne with Christ; that wee shall continue the members and sheepe of Christ, so long as we continue to be his sheepe and members, that we shall not lose our faith, so long as we continue faithfull. And what is it to say that the sheepe of Christ shal so long continue to bee his sheepe as they retaine their nature, but to grant also that they may lose their nature, and consequenely cease to bee Christs sheepe, and so bee plucked from him, which is quite contrary to his promise?

CHAP. XV.

Of eight other Reasons which proue the certainty of our perseuerance.

The first reason to assure vs of our perseuerance may bee taken from the intercession of Christ for vs to God the Father. For whatsoeuer Christ himself maketh request for in the behalfe of his faithfull, that without doubt the Father graunteth vnto him, for God heareth him alwayes, Iohn 11.42. But he continually maketh request for them that their faith faile not, as appeareth, Luke 22.32. He prayeth for them, Iohn 17.9. that the Father would keepe through his Name whom he had giuen him; That they may be one, as he and the Father are one, Verse 11. That he would preserue them from euill, Verse 15. and what greater euill then to fall from grace and God also? That they all may be one, as the Father is in Christ, and Christ in him, Verse 21. That they be with Christ where he is, and may behold his glory, Verse 24. Hee maketh also intercession for all those whom he hath redeemed, that they may bee saued, notwithstanding their sins into which they fall through the infirmity of their corruptions, as appeareth 1. Iohn 2.1,2. And therefore all these things are granted vnto him by the Father, for the faithfull. So that now they may say with the Apostle, Rom. 8.33. It is God that iustifieth. 34. Who shall condemne? It is Christ which is dead, yea or rather which is risen againe, who is also at the right hand of God, and maketh request for vs. 35. Who shall separate vs from the loue of God, &c? And though our corruptions bee many, and our weaknesse great, yet we need not doubt of our perseuerance to euerlasting life. For wee haue an high Priest who is able perfectly to saue them that come vnto God by him, seeing hee euer liueth to make intercession for them, as it is Heb. 7.25.

Q. Sect. 2. The seuenth reason taken from our vnion with Christ.

The seuenth reason may bee taken from that vnion which is betweene Christ and the faithfull, whereby hee becommeth their head, and they his members. For there is no head that will willingly permit any of its members to bee rent and torne from it, because then it should haue a mayned and vnperfect body. But Christ Iesus is the Head of all the faithfull, and they the members of his body, Ephes. 5.30. And therefore he will not suffer any of them to bee pulled from him, and so perishing make a mayme in his bodie, seeing he is also omnipotent and able to saue all those who depend vpon him. Moreouer, seeing our Sauiour Christ who is our head, hath past all dangers, and now liueth and raigneth with God his father, we are also assured that we shall liue and raigne with him. For hee hath obtained this eternall glorie, not for himselfe alone, but also for all the members of his bodie, as appeareth, Iohn 17.21.24. and therefore now there is no doubt at all of our perishing, seeing our life is hid with Christ in God, as it is Col. 3.3. and consequenely no lesse safe then his who now raigneth and triumpheth ouer his enemies. Wherefore it is that they are said in respect of the certaintie of their inheritance, to haue already euerlasting life, and to haue passed from death to life, Iohn 5.24. 1. Iohn 3.14.

Ephes. 5.30.

Iohn 17.21.24.

Col. 3.3.

Iohn 5.24. 1. Iohn 3.14.

Q. Sect. 3. The eight reason

The eight reason may bee taken from the Spirit of God dwelling in vs, for so long as is hath his abiding with vs, we must needes perseuere in grace; neither is it possible wee should fall away, seeing it is the fountaine and roote from which all graces flow and spring, and seeing it continually fighteth against, and subdueth the flesh and the lusts thereof. But after we haue receiued the Spirit of God, it continually dwelleth and abideth with vs; for this is that spirituall water, of which whosoeuer drinketh shall neuer haue more athirst, but it shall bee a well of water springing vp into euerlasting life, as it may appeare by comparing Iohn 4. 14. with Chap. 7. 39. So Iohn 14. 16. I will pray the Father, and he shall giue you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for euer. 17. Euen the spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receiue, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but you know him, for he dwelleth with you and shall be in you. And 1. Iohn 3. 9. Whosoeuer is borne of God sinneth not, (that is, with full consent of will) for his seed remaineth in him; neither can he sinne, because he is borne of God; where the Spirit is called the seed of God, because by vertue thereof we are begotten vnto him. If therefore by the vertue of this Spirit we are so vpheld and preserued that wee cannot sinne with full consent of will, nor haue it raigning in vs as it did before our regeneration, then certainly wee shall be preserued thereby from falling away, and notwithstanding our sinnes wee shall perseuere in grace to euerlasting life.

Iohn 4. 14. and 7. 39. Rom 14. 16.

1. Iohn 2. 27.

1. Iohn 3. 9.

Ibid. 4. The ninth reason taken from the effects of the spirit. 1. Iohn 2. 20, 27. Rom. 8. 14, 17.

The ninth argument may be taken from the effects of the spirit dwelling in vs; for first it teacheth and guideth vs in the way of Gods Truth, as appeareth, 1. Iohn 2. 20, 27. And as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sonnes of God, Rom. 8. 14. and those that are sonnes are also heires, euen the heires of God, and coheires with Christ, Verse. 17. Neither is it possible that those who are guided with the spirit should sinne with full consent of will, much lesse fall away. For whosoeuer is borne of God sinneth not, namely, after this manner, neither can euer their spirituall enemies finally preuaile against them; for hee that is begotten of God keepeth himselfe, and the wicked one toucheth him not, as it is, 1. Iohn 5. 18. Secondly, the Spirit of God witnesseth to our spirits that we are the sonnes of God, and consequently heires of his Kingdome, as it is Rom. 8. 17. and his testimony is true and infallible. It also is the earnest of our inheritance, and a pledge to assure vs that God will make good his promises vnto vs, Ephes. 1. 14. 2. Cor. 1. 22. and thereby also wee are sealed vnto the day of redemption, Ephes. 4. 30. And therefore seeing the Lord hath confirmed our assurance by the testimony of his spirit, by this earnest, pledge and seale, wee ought not to feare our falling away, or to doubt of our perseuerance. But of this I haue already written at large in treating of the certainty of our election.

1. Cor. 1. 22.

Ephes. 1. 14. 2. Cor. 1. 22. Ephes. 4. 30.

Lib. 2. cap. 20. §. Sect. 4. The seuenth reason, taken from Gods continual aid.

The seuenth reason may be taken from Gods continual aid in all trials & temptations; for if hee be alwayes ready to strengthen and support vs, we can neuer finally be ouerthrown, but though we fall, yet wee shall not fall away, but shall be raised vp againe in despite of all our enemies. For God is faithfull, and will not suffer vs to bee tempted aboue our power, but will giue a good issue with the temptation, that we may be able to beare it, as it is, 1. Cor. 10. 13. And he knoweth to deliuer the godly out of tentation, as the Apostle speaketh, 2. Pet. 2. 9. And therefore be our weaknesse neuer so great, yet let vs not feare our finall falling away, but knowing whom we haue beleeued, let vs perswade our selues of our perseuerance, knowing that he is able to keepe that which we haue committed vnto him, as it is, 2. Tim. 1. 12.

1. Cor. 10. 13.

2. Pet. 2. 9.

2. Tim. 1. 12. §. Sect. 5. The eleuenth reason, taken from the nature of faith.

And these are the reasons drawne from Gods nature in himselfe and his actions towards vs, whereby we may vndoubtedly be assured of our perseuerance. The second sort of arguments may be taken from our selues, and first from the nature of true faith wherewith we are endued, which is not temporary but constant and permanent. For he that hath a true and liuely faith, is like the house builded vpon the roeke, which neither the raine, nor floods, nor windes could ouerthrow, Matth. 7. 24, 25. neither shall the gates of Hell ouercome him, Chap. 16. Ver. 18. He is like the good ground in which the seed falling is not stolne away, nor choked vp, nor withereth for want of roote, but he receiueth the seed and keepeth it, and bringeth forth fruit with patience, as it is Luke 8. 15. And contrariwise, it is a most vndoubted marke of an Hypocrite who neuer was indued with a true faith, when as his faith is temporary, and he falleth away, according to that 1. John 2. 19. They went out from vs, but they were not of vs; for if they had been of vs, they would haue continued with vs. But this commeth to passe that it might appeare that they are not all of vs.

Matth. 7. 24, 25. and 16. 18. Luke 8. 15. 1. John 2. 19.

§. Sect. 6. The twelfth reason, taken from examples.

The second reason may be taken from the example of those who haue grieuously falne, and yet haue continued in the state of grace, and haue beene raised and restored againe by vnfained repentance: And thus did Dauid fall, and that most grieuously, and yet was not depriued of Gods Spirit, as appeareth, Psal. 51. 10, 11. Thus did Peter fall by denying his Master, Noah by drunkennesse, Lot by incest, and yet they were not depriued of those graces which they had receiued, howsoeuer for the time they were much eclypsed and weakned; neither were they rejected by God, but vpon their true repentance were receiued into his former loue and fauour.

Psal. 51. 10, 11.

The

The last reason may bee taken from the weakneſſe and inabilitie of the cauſes which ſhould hinder our perſeuerance and make vs fall away. For there is nothing in the world ſo powerfull, but it is altogether too weak to worke this defection. For firſt, afflictions cannot deprive vs of grace, nor hinder our perſeuerance, as it is Rom. 8. 35. for though they are the fiery triall, yet they do not burne vs, but refine vs from our droſſe, neither doe they hinder our ſaluation, but rather cauſe vnto vs a farre moſt excellent and eternall weight of glory, as it is 2. Cor. 4. 17. Nor yet our fleſh: for though it bee neuer ſo ſtrong, yet the Spirit of God dwelling in vs, will in the end mortifie and ſubdue it. Nor the world: for our Captaine Chriſt hath ouercome it, not onely for himſelfe, but alſo for his members, Iohn 16. 33. yea and he enableth vs alſo by his holy Spirit to ouercome it. For all that is borne of God ouercommeth the world, and this is the victorie that ouercommeth the world, euen our faith, as it is 1. Iohn 5. 4. Nor the Deuill, but if wee reſiſt him, he will flee from vs, Iames 4. 7. And he that is borne of God keepeth himſelfe, and the wicked one toucheth him not, 1. Iohn 5. 18. Not our ſinnes, for they are puniſhed and fully ſatisfied for in Chriſt, and if wee ſinne, we haue an Aduocate with the Father, &c. 1 Iohn 2. 1, 2. And for the corruption of ſin, though it dwell in vs, yet it ſhall not raigne in vs, Rom. 6. 12. Though wee fall into it, yet not with full conſent of will, 1. Iohn 3. 9. for the regenerate man ſinneth not, but his corrupt fleſh dwelling in him, as it is Rom. 7. 17. Nor any tentation, for the Lord is faithfull, and will not ſuffer vs to bee tempted aboue our power, but will giue a good iſſue vnto it, 1. Cor. 10. 13. Not any thing in the world, Rom. 8. 38, 39. for all things whatſoeuer ſhall be ſo diſpoſed by the wiſe prouidence of God, that though they be neuer ſo hurtfull in their owne nature, and apt to draw vs from God, yet they ſhall worke together for the beſt vnto them which loue God, as it is Rom. 8. 28.

CHAP. XVI.

Obiections againſt the doctrine of perſeuerance, taken from teſtimonies of holy Scripture out of the Old Teſtament, anſwered.

HAuing ſo much concerning thoſe reaſons whereby the certaintie of our perſeuerance may be proued. Now we are to anſwere the Obiections which are made againſt this truth by the enemies of our ſaluation, all which are reduced to three heads: firſt, teſtimonies: ſecondly, examples: thirdly, reaſons. The teſtimonies which are alleaged to this purpoſe are many. The firſt is grounded vpon the prayer of Moſes, Exod. 32. 32. Therefore now if thou pardon their ſinne, thy will ſhall appeare; but if thou wilt not, I pray thee race me out of thy Booke which thou haſt written. From which place they thus reaſon: Whoſoeuer may bee blotted out of the Booke of life, they may alſo fall away and periſh; but a faithfull man may be blotted out of the Booke of life; and therefore a faithfull man may fall away and periſh. The aſſumption or ſecond part of this reaſon which wee deny as falſe, they indeuour to proue: firſt, by the petition of Moſes, for, ſay they, hee requireth to bee blotted out of the Booke of life; and therefore he might bee blotted out. To which I anſwere: firſt, that Moſes requeſt is not abſolute, but to be vnderſtood with this condition, if it ſhould ſtand with Gods will, and if hee approoued of his petition. Secondly, though it had bin abſolute, yet it followeth not that becauſe he requeſted this, therefore it might come to paſſe; ſeeing God (as appeareth in the Verſe following) diſalloweth and refuſeth to grant his requeſt, ſaying: whoſoeuer hath ſinned againſt me, I will put him out of my Booke.

Exod. 32. 32.

Q. Sect. 2. Of Dauids Prayer.

Yea, will the tempter ſay, but though Moſes could not be blotted out, yet it appeareth by Gods anſwere that Sinners may, for hee ſaith, that hee will blot out him that ſinneth againſt him: and this his Obiection hee will further proue out of the prayer of Dauid, Pſal. 69. 28. Let them bee put out of the Booke of life, &c. I anſwere, that theſe phraſes of writing in a Booke, and blotting out of it, are metaphoricall and borrowed from the practice of men, and are vſed in the Scriptures, that the things thereby ſignified may be made plaine and eaſie to our capacitie and vnderſtanding. Neither muſt we imagine that God hath a Booke for to helpe his memory, or that he writeth or bloteth out; for all things paſt, preſent, and to come are in his ſight. But he is ſaid to write men in the Booke of life, either when he electeth them in his ſecret counſell, or when he executeth this Decree by receiuing them into his Couenant, and enrolling them in the number of his Church and Family; which is alſo done two wayes: the firſt is proper to the faithfull, who in deed and truth are within the Couenant, and are true members of the inuiſible Church: the other common to the titularie Chriſtian, who profeſſeth and eſteemeth himſelfe to bee in the number of thoſe who are in the Couenant of grace, and elected to euerlaſting life, and is ſo alſo reputed by others, becauſe he is a member of the viſible Church, and made partaker of the Word and Sacraments. Now hee is ſaid to blot men out of the Booke of life, in this laſt reſpect, when as he manifeſtly declareth and

maketh it knowne, both to the partie himselfe and others that hee is no true member of the Church, not within the Couenant of grace, and consequently not in the state of saluation. For as for those that are enrolled in his Decree and Booke of election, and also in the catalogue of his Saints in the Church inuisible, they can neuer be raced out; for his purpose remaineth in his eternall counsell; & the foundation of God continueth sure, and hath this twofold seale, Gods knowledge whereby he acknowledgeth that they are his; & their regeneration wrought by his holy Spirit. Moreouer, if any thing could blot out them who are thus inrolled, it must be the filthinesse and polluted spots of their sinnes and vnworthinesse: but our sins and vnworthinesse cannot mooue the Lord to race vs out of this Booke; for then the foresight and knowledge of them in his eternall counsell would much more haue hindred him from chusing and inrolling vs in the Booke of his election, seeing euery one knoweth that a lesse cause will hinder the choice of any, then mooue them to reject the person chosen. Yea rather because the Lord hath chosen vs, therefore hee will giue vs his holy Spirit, whereby he will preserue vs from falling into sin with full consent of will, and from giuing our selues thereunto with malicious greedinesse. And as he hath freely chosen vs to eternall saluation without any respect of our worthinesse, so also he will freely execute this Decree by giuing vs all the good meanes whereby we may be saued.

2.Tim.1.19.

§. Sect.3.

But let vs fit this generall answere to the particular places which are obiected; first, those words of the Lord, Exod.32.33. are a threatning not denounced against the true members of the Church, who are inrolled in the Booke of Life, but those who are the members of the visible Church only; and in profession alone, and not in practise; in shew, and not in truth; in their owne or others opinion, and not in Gods estimation, of the Lords family, and in the number of his seruants. Secondly, it is not to be vnderstood of all that commit sinne, but of such as suffer it to raigne in them, committing it with full consent of will, purposely, and maliciously. Thirdly, whereas he saith, that he will blot such out of his Booke, we are not to vnderstand hereby that he would blot them out of the Booke of his election vnto eternall life, wherein they were neuer written, or that he would reiect them whom he had chosen, but that he would race them out of the Booke and roll of his visible Church, and declare and make it euident to themselues that they are neuer true members of his Church inuisible, nor belonging to his eternall election.

Exod.32.33.

Secondly, whereas the Psalmist prayeth that some might be blotted out of the Booke of life; Psal.69.28. it proueth not that the faithfull who are inrolled in the Booke of Gods election may be cast out and rejected; for as it appeareth by the rest of the Psalme, he speaketh only of the obstinate and malicious enemies of Gods Kingdome. And whereas he prayeth that they might be blotted out of the Booke of life, hee doth not desire that those who were in truth written in this Booke should be blotted out, but that it might be manifestly declared that they who in their owne opinion, and in respect of their outward profession, in the opinion of others, seemed written in this Booke, were not in truth euer inrolled. As though he should haue said; Doe not, O Lord, reckon them in the number thy of faithfull ones; & if in respect of their outward profession they are reputed of thy Church and people, discouer and display them, that it may manifestly appeare that they were neuer written in thy Booke, and so thrust them out of the company of thy Church and children, that all men may know that they were but Hypocrites. For in regard that Gods Decree of election is vnsearchable and incomprehensible to mans knowledge and reason, those in respect of their opinion are said to be elected, who are outwardly called and added to the visible Church, professing themselues members thereof, which are the outward but not the infallible signes of Gods election, because they are common to the Hypocrite with the true Professor; and so likewise those are said to be blotted out of Gods Booke, whose hypocrisie is discouered, and who are thrust out of the company of the faithfull. And therefore Dauid because hee would haue Gods vengeance against these wicked ones plainly manifested, desireth the Lord to discouer them, that all might sensibly discerne them to be but reprobates.

Psal.69.28.

The second place is Psal.51.10. Create in me a cleane heart O God, and renew a right spirit within me. From which place they thus reason: They that may lose cleanesse of heart and Gods Spirit, may also fall away: but the faithfull may lose both, as appeareth by the prayer of Dauid; and therefore the faithfull may fall away. I answere, that this assumption is false, neither can it be confirmed out of this place. For first it followeth not, that because Dauid in his sense and feeling discerned not his cleanesse of heart, nor the Spirit of God, that therefore he was destitute of them, seeing the iudgement of the sense is often deceiued, as before I haue shewed, the gifts and graces of God not appearing in grieuous tentations, or being for a time couered with our corruptions. Secondly, Dauid in praying for these, doth not proue that he was destitute of them, but rather that he was indued with them in some measure: for vnlesse his heart had been clensed, he could not haue desired cleanesse, and §. Sect.5. Psal.51.10. Dauid had cleanesse of heart and Gods Spirit.

Rom.4.16.

if he had not beene indued with Gods spirit; he could neuer haue made this effectuall prayer that Gods spirit might bee renewed. Thirdly, this phrase of creating doth not proue that he was vtterly deprined of cleannesse of heart, for it is improperly vsed, as appeareth by the next phrase of renewing, whereby hee expounded his meaning: hee therefore he thus speaketh, that hee might in all humility confesse his great corruption, which made him think that a little purging was not sufficient, vnlesse the Lord, as it were created al anew. Fourthly, this is not so much to bee vnderstood of the spirit of God it selfe once giuen, as of the gifts of the spirit, which were not vtterly lost, but for a time did lie hidden, and in respect of their measure and degree which in his sense and feeling were impaired and diminished through his grieuous fall, and therefore he desireth to haue them renewed and increased. Lastly, Dauid taketh away the force of this obiection in the next verse, where hee desireth that the spirit of God should not be taken from him; whereby he implieth that yet hee was not deprived of it. Yea but Dauid (will some say) sheweth by this speech that he might lose Gods spirit, otherwise he would not haue prayed vnto God, not to take it from him. I answer, that this rather proueth that he could not be deprived of it, seeing he prayeth in faith and full assurance to be heard, and to haue his request granted, according to that, 1. Iohn 5. 14. 15. Secondly, as the Lord hath purposed to continue his grace and holy spirit vnto his children, so he hath ordained, that they should vse the meanes whereby they may retaine them, one of the chiefest whereof is effectuall prayer. And therefore when we vse this meanes of prayer, it doth not proue that wee are in danger to lose them, but rather assureth vs that wee shall preuaile in them, seeing the meanes and the end for which we vse them, are ioyned together in Gods purpose and counsell. The third place obiected, is Esay 1. 21. How is the faithfull Citie become an harlot? it was full of iudgement, and righteousnesse lodged therein, but now murderers. etc. I answer, there is no strength in this argument: for he doth not say, that those that are faithfull may fall away and become harlots, but he speaketh of the whole citie which was in deed full inhabited with the faithfull, but most of them degenerate, and idolaters supplied their places: so that hee speaketh not of some persons, but of diuers men in the same place, as appeareth plainly by the words following: Thy siluer is turned into drosse, thy wine mingled with water. Secondly, [illegible] who were indeed of the true faith, may fall into many foule sinnes, yea into all sinnes, and yet not vtterly fall away from the true religion, amongst which were more hypocrites then true beleeuers: but as for the true beleeuers and professors they were reserued by God in this great Apostasie, as he sheweth, verse 9. Lastly, though the faithfull had thus fallen, yet this proueth not that their defection was finall, and they vtterly reiected, seeing the Lord inuiteth them to turne vnto him by true repentance, and offereth them mercie and forgiuenesse, verse. 18.

The fourth place obiected is Ezech. 18. 26. When a righteous man turneth away from his righteousnesse, and committeth iniquitie, hee shall euen die for the same, &c. From which is inferred that hee who is iustified may fall away and die in his sinnes. I answere, first, that he speaketh not of one truly iustified by Christs imputed righteousnesse, but of such an one as hauing done some outward workes of legall righteousnesse, is therefore iust in his owne conceit, or the opinion of others. And this appeareth, first, by the description of this righteousnesse which hee speaketh of, expressed verse 5. vnto the ninth; where he setteth downe diuers outward duties of legal iustice. Secondly, in that hee calleth it his owne righteousnesse, vers. 24. 26. Whereas the righteousnesse whereby wee are iustified is the righteousnesse of God, imputed vnto vs, Rom. 3. 22. that is, of Christ God and man. Thirdly, he speaketh of such a iust man as turning away from his righteousnes doth according to all the abhominations that the wicked man doth, which is not incident vnto those who are truely iustified and sanctified, for whosoeuer is borne of God sinneth not. 1. Ioh. 3. 9. that is, committeth not sinne with greedinesse, delight, and full consent of will as the wicked man doth who is not regenerate. This place then is impertinently alleaged, because it is to bee vnderstood of those, not which are truly iust, but in their own and others opinion, as our Sauiour also meaneth, whereas he saith, that he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance: Matth. 9. 13. Secondly, though this place were vnderstood of one truly iust, yet it maketh nothing against perseuerance: for hee doth not absolutely say that the iust man may fall away, but if hee turne away, vers. 24. Which speech being conditional, doth not proue that the iust man may turne from his righteousnesse, but onely serueth as a threatning or profitable admonition, whereby God vpholdeth them in their course of righteousnesse, and preserueth them from defection by stirring them vp with this commination to care and watchfulnesse and keeping them from reckelesse securitie. Thirdly, this speech being a commination or threatning is to bee vnderstood conditionally, if hee goe on in his wickednesse without repentance; but he that is truly iust, though hee fall, yet he riseth vp againe, and notwithstanding his fall, hee shall not be cast off; for the Lord putteth vnder his hand, as hee hath promised Psal. 37. 24. The like place vnto this is that, Ezech. 33.13. and therefore we may fit vnto it the like answere.

CHAP. XVII.

Obi. Sect.1. Mat.7.22.23.

THe fifth place obiected is, Matth. 7. 22. Many will say vnto me in that day, Lord, Lord, haue we not by thy name propheciedl &c. From which is inferred, that if those who haue receiued these excellent gifts of the spirit, prophecy and power to worke miracles, may lose them and perish, then those likewise who haue receiued other gifts, as faith, hope, charitie, &c. I answere, it followeth not, forasmuch as men may haue these gifts, and yet not bee in the estate of grace, elected or loued of God, as our Sauiour plainely sheweth in his answere to them, verse 23. Then will I professe vnto them I neuer knew you; that is, I neuer acknowledged you for my seruants; depart from mee yee that worke iniquitie, that is, yee that haue giuen ouer your selues to worke wickednesse. Secondly I answere, this place is impertinent to the purpose, for the question is not of all gifts of the spirit, but onely of such sanctifying graces as are necessary to saluation, in which number the gifts of prophecie and working miracles are not, seeing the wicked may haue them, as appeareth in the example of Iudas; and the godly may want them, as we know by experience.

Obi. Sect.2.

The first place is Matth. 24.12. And because iniquitie shall be increased, the loue of many shall bee cold. Out of which place they thus reason: They whose charitie may waxe cold, may lose grace, and so fall away: but the elect, who haue this grace of loue may haue it waxe cold, and therefore the elect may lose it and so fall away. I answere, first, to the proposition, that our Sauiour Christ doth not say, that those who are indued with true charity, may haue it extinguished, as the phrase to waxe cold may seeme to proue; but he saith, that the loue of many shall bee cold, that is, they shall bee destitute of this grace of loue, and that which they haue not they cannot lose. Secondly, I answere to the assumption, that is is false, and receiueth no confirmation from this place; for our Sauiour saith not, that the true charitie of the elect shall be cold, but that the charitie of many, that is, the loue of hypocrites to the Gospell, whereof they once made outward profession, which was grounded vpon carnall and worldly respects, should bee cold when they saw it persecuted, and when they were seduced by the false Prophets. And of such he speaketh verse 10. where he saith that many should be offended, when they should see the grieuous persecution which should bee raised against the Gospell, and should betray one another: which cannot be vnderstood of the faithfull, but of hypocrites, who made profession of the truth for worldly respects, which failing, their profession and loue towards the truth also failed. Lastly, though this should be vnderstood of the elect, and that it should be thus read that their loue should waxe cold; yet this proueth not that their loue should bee quite extinguished and perish, but onely that through the iniquitie of the times it should in its actions and operations languish and decrease. But they further obiect, that it is said in the verse following, that he who indureth to the end shal be saued; by which, say they, is implied that some shall not indure to the end, and therefore shall bee condemned. I answer, first, that all this being rightly vnderstood may bee granted; for our Sauiour heere speaketh not of perseuerance in the sanctifying graces of his spirit, but of continuing and induring in the profession of his Gospell, notwithstanding the great persecutions which should bee raised against the professors thereof, which hypocrites, who loue the world better than Gods truth would not doe, and therefore should bee condemned. Secondly I answere, that though this were to bee vnderstood of perseuerance in grace, it maketh nothing against it: for our Sauiour saith not that some of the Elect shall not perseuere, but onely maketh a gratious promise of life and saluation to those that doe persuere to the end, that hereby they may bee incouraged and confirmed in their perseuerance.

The fourth place obiected is Luke 8. 13. Those ships on the rocks; are they which when they haue heard, receiue the word with ioy; but they haue no roots, which for a while beleeue, but in the time of tentation goe away. From which place they thus reason: They that heare and receiue the word with ioy and beleeue, may fall away, but such haue true faith; and therefore those that haue true faith may fall away. I answere, that the assumption, namely, that these heere described haue true faith, is false; neither are these the inseparable properties of a true, liuely and iustifying faith, but common with the temporary faith, which is the faith of hypocrites. For not onely the faithfull full and elect doe heare and receiue the word with ioy, and also beleeue, that is, after an historicall manner giue their assent vnto it, but also hypocrits and reprobates as the Apostle sheweth, Heb. 6.4.5. But it will bee obiected that Christ heere speaketh of true faith, seeing he saith that they beleeue, and therefore they want not faith, but onely perseuerance. I answere, that as faith it selfe is of diuers kinds, so also there are diuers kinds of beleeuing, according to the seuerall sorts of faith, whereof they are also. There is a generall faith, whose act is generally to beleeue and giue assent to the truth of the Scriptures; there is a temporarie faith, which not onely giueth assent, but also conceiueth some kind of ioy in that which it beleeueth; and there is a true iustifying faith, which not onely assenteth to the truth, but also apprehendeth and applieth that which it beleeueth to the vse and benefit of the beleeuer. Though therefore the temporarie faith beleeueth, that is, assenteth to the doctrine of faith as being true, and sheweth it selfe in an outward profession, and is ioyned with a reioycing in that truth which it beleeueth and professeth, yet are there diuers things wanting in it, which are the life and soule of true iustifying faith; for first this liuely faith bringeth forth the ripe fruits of true godlinesse, but this temporarie faith nothing else but the blade of an outward profession. Secondly, the true faith is a particular perswasion, this onely a generall notion or opinion; that apprehendeth and applieth peculiarly all the promises of life and saluation to the beleeuer, but this is destitute of this apprehension and application: that is constant and permanent, but this, as it is grounded vpon worldly and carnall respects, so when they faile (as they doe in the time of tentation) then this faith also faileth.

Now our Sauiour Christ in this place speaketh not of this true iustifying faith, of which onely the question of perseuerance is vnderstood, but of the other temporarie faith of hypocrites, as may appeare in the text it selfe; for first it is said that such haue no roote, but onely beare the leaues of an outward profession, which in the day of tentation, when the sunne of affliction ariseth, withereth and dieth; whereas they who haue a true faith, haue for the roote thereof a certaine perswasion of Gods loue, and fauour in Christ, the remission of their sins, and eternall life and happinesse; from which roote spring not only the faire greene leaues of an outward profession, but also the ripe fruits of holines and righteousnesse. Secondly, it is said, that they beleeue for a time only, and in the time of tentation goe away; whereas they who truly beleeue, are like vnto mount Sion, which cannot bee moued, but standeth fast for euer, as it is Psal. 125. 1. they are built vpon the rocke Iesus Christ, so that though the winds of affliction, and floods of persecution blow and beate against them, yet they shall not fall, because they are grounded vpon this rocke, as it is Matth. 7.25. Lastly, they receiuing the seed of the word, bring forth only a blade, which is but a shew of godlinesse, and continueth not, but by and by is scorched and withereth; but they who are indued with a true faith, like the good ground, receiuing the seed of the word in an honest and good heart, keepe it, and bring forth fruit with patience. Seeing therefore this place alleaged, is not to be vnderstood of true iustifying faith, but of the faith of hypocrits, which is nothing else but a shadow or vaine opinion of faith; and the falling away, nothing else but the casting off an outward profession, therefore it maketh nothing against the perseuerance of those who are truly faithfull.

Matth. 7. 25.

Q. Sect. 5. Iohn 15. 2. Of true and rotten branches.

The eight place obiected is Iob. 15. 2. Euerie branch that beareth not fruit in me he taketh away, &c. From which place they thus reason: All the branches which are in Christ are elected and indued with true faith: but some branches which are in Christ not bearing fruit, are cut from his body, and so perish: therefore some who are elected and indued with faith, may be seuered from Christ and so perish. I answere, that the proposition is false; for a branch in Christ is nothing else but a member of the Church, and both of them generally vnderstood, doe signifie such an one as is outwardly admitted into the Church, which is the body of Christ, by the Sacrament of baptisme, and being outwardly called by the ministerie of the word, doth make profession of the doctrine of faith therein taught, and communicateth in the vse of the Sacraments. And so generally to be ingrafted into Christ, is to bee ioyned as a member to the visible Church. Now as of members, so also of branches there are two sorts; for some are not onely ioyned to the visible Church by the Sacrament of baptisme, and by an outward profession of the Faith, but also are truely vnited vnto Christ their head, and ingrafted into the inuisible Church by the spirit of God and a liuely Faith, and so communicating of the life and vertue which is in Christ their head, & sucking liuely iuyce from this diuine and holy roote, doe liue in him and bring forth the fruits of godlinesse and righteousnesse. And whosoeuer are thus ingrafted into Christ Iesus, they shall euer remaine fruitful branches, and be neuer cut off and wither, yea rather Christ the good husbandman will purge and prune them, and continually water them with the dew of his grace and holy spirit, that they may bring forth fruit in more abundance, as it is in this place. So he saith, verſ. 16. that whom hee hath choſen, hee hath ordained that they ſhould bring forth fruit, and that their fruit ſhould not fade and wither, but remaine, and continually flouriſh like a tree planted by a riuer of waters, as it is Pſalm. 1.3.

*Q. Sect.*6. But there are other members and branches which are onely intertained into the viſible Church, and accounted members thereof, becauſe they haue receiued the ſacrament of baptiſme, and make an outward profeſſion of religion, though in their liues they deny the power therof; which notwithſtanding were neuer truly vnited vnto Chriſt, nor ingrafted into the inuiſible Church, being altogether deſtitute of the bond of this vnion, the ſpirit of God and a liuely faith, and conſequently hauing no communion with our head and root Chriſt Ieſus, nor receiuing any life and vertue from him, they are dead and rotten members, and branches, which hauing onely a ſhew and ſhape of an outward profeſſion, and wanting life, bring forth no fruits of true godlineſſe, and therefore ſhall bee cut off, not from the true bodie of Chriſt the inuiſible Church, into which they were neuer planted and ingrafted, but from the outward body of the viſible Church whereof they were members in ſhew and profeſſion. The which is done when as their vizard being pulled off, they are diſcouered to be but meere hypocrites.

*Q. Sect.*7. Of a twofold liuing in the vine Chriſt. But heere it is obiected, that it cannot bee called a branch which hath not ſometime liued in the vine: for branches are not tranſplanted, but doe grow in the vine, not dead but liuing; and ſo the faithfull are borne againe in Chriſt, and when they are borne againe, they are not dead but liuing: and yet notwithſtanding if after they are borne againe, they refuſe to beare the fruit of good workes, they are cut off and periſh. I anſwere, that there is a twofold liuing in the vine, in ſhew and outward appearance, and indeed and truth; the firſt is common to the hypocrite, who after a ſort may bee ſaid to be ingrafted into the bodie of Chriſt, and in reſpect of his ſhew and outward profeſſion to liue in him; but the other is proper and peculiar to the faithfull, who are the true branches. But al branches (ſay they) doe firſt truly liue in their vine before they can die and wither. I anſwere, that this is true of all naturall branches, which originally ſpring out of the ſtocke, but not of thoſe which are tranſplanted and ingrafted: For we know that ſome cions being ingrafted into another ſtocke, doe receiue no life and nouriſhment from it, and yet notwithſtanding they ſeeme for a time to liue, till the heate of the ſunne ſcorching them, for want of inward moiſture they wither, and ſo appeare to bee dead, and neuer to haue receiued life and nouriſhment from the ſtocke. Now that I may fit this ſimilitude, wee are not naturall branches ſprung from Chriſt, but from Adam, who is our roote, and are tranſplanted and ingrafted into Chriſt, but after a diuers manner, ſome into the viſible bodie of the Church, and (as it were) but into the outward barke, who for want of the attractiue vertue of faith, doe receiue no life nor nouriſhment from him: and therefore though they ſeeme to liue for a time in ſhew and outward profeſſion, yet in truth they are dead branches, and ſo will appeare to be, when the ſunne of perſecution and affliction ſcorcheth and withereth them; but other branches are ingrafted into the inuiſible Church and very body of Chriſt the liuing ſtocke, and by a true and liuely faith doe ſucke good iuyce and nouriſhment from him, whereby they liue and bring forth fruit. And they who are thus truly ingrafted into Chriſts body, cannot refuſe to bring forth the fruits of good workes, no more than the liuing branch grafted in a fruitfull ſtocke, can refuſe to bring forth grapes: for as all other powers of body and ſoule are regenerate and renewed, ſo likewiſe their will, whereby they are made not onely willing, but alſo deſirous to bring forth the fruite of good workes.

CHAP. XVIII.

*Q. Sect.*8. Rom. 9.3. In what ſenſe Paul wiſhed to be ſeparated from Chriſt.

THe ninth place obiected is Rom. 9.3. For I would wiſh my ſelfe to bee ſeparated from Chriſt (or, deuoted to eternall perdition) for my brethren which are my kinſemen according to the fleſh. From which place they thus reaſon: Paul might be ſeparated from Chriſt and periſh: but Paul was elected to ſaluation: therefore ſome who are elected may bee ſeparated from Chriſt and periſh. I anſwere, that the propoſition is falſe, neither doth it receiue any ſtrength from this teſtimonie: for Paul doth not ſay, that hee could bee ſeparated from Chriſt, but onely profeſſeth that ſuch was his zeale of Gods glory, and loue to his brethren the Iewes, that he could find in his heart, if it were poſſible, to be ſeparated from Chriſt, rather than Gods glory ſhould be impeached by the deſtruction of the people. But it may be further vrged, that Paul wiſheth that hee might be ſeparated from Chriſt, and therefore it might be. I anſwere, that hee doth not abſolutely deſire it, but conconditionally, if it were possible. And therefore hee saith not, I doe wish; but I would wish; that is, I could find in my heart to wish this separation, if it could possibly stand with the immutabilitie of Gods election. But Paul though hee thus speaketh did not thinke that this could possibly bee, for he professeth a little before, that he was perswaded & certainely assured, that neither life nor death, nor any thing in the world could separate him from the loue of God in Christ, Rom. 8. 38. But to what purpose doth hee wish this, if it could not be? I answere, to this end that he might hereby expresse his feruent zeale for Gods glorie, and intire loue of his brethren the Iewes, which were so great, that he neglected his owne saluation in respect of them.

The tenth place obiected is Rom. 9. 20. Well, through vnbeleefe they are broken off, and thou standest by faith; be not high minded, but feare. 21. For if God spared not the naturall branches, take heed least hee also spare not thee, &c. From which place they thus reason: The naturall branches may be broken off: the naturall branches are the true members of Christ elected to saluation: therefore some members of Christ elected to saluation may fall away and perish. I answere, that this obiection is like that grounded vpon John 15. 2. and therefore needeth not much to be stood vpon. Briefly therefore we are to know, that the assumption is manifestly false; for by naturall branches is not meant the true members of Christ elected to saluation; but the whole visible Church of the Israelites, as it plainely appeareth by the whole discourse of the Apostle in this chapter. The first (namely, that hee speaketh not of the true members of Christ elected to saluation) is manifest, vers. 2. God hath not cast away his people which he knew before, that is, whom in his eternall counsell he had elected to saluation. And vers. 7. Israel hath not obtained that he sought: that is, the whole people of Israel; but the election (that is, so many as were elected) hath obtained it, and the rest haue beene hardened. The other, namely, that hee speaketh of the whole people and Church of the Iewes, and not of the faithfull, is so cleere in it selfe, that it needeth no borrowed light to illustrate it; seeing in this whole chapter he reasoneth of the reiection of the Israelites, from being the visible Church and people of God, and of the calling of the Gentiles. But some will say, that the Apostle calleth them naturall branches, and therefore before their breaking off, they were the true members of Christ. I answer, that the Apostle doth not call them naturall, to distinguish them from dead and fruitlesse branches, but from the wild branches which were the Gentiles, who of strangers and aliants were called to bee the Church and people of God: whereas the Iewes who had a long time beene planted in the visible Church were broken off and reiected. By breaking off then of the naturall branches, wee are not to vnderstand the reiection of the true members of Christ and the visible Church, who are the faithfull and elect, but of the outward members of the visible Church, who being externally called, made profession of religion, but yet in the meane time were destitute of the power thereof, and of all sauing grace. For the Apostle saith of this people who were thus reiected, that God had giuen them the spirit of slumber, eies that they should not see, and eares that they should not heare vnto this day, vers. 8. and that they were broken off through vnbeleefe, wherwith they were so wholly possessed, that they would not receiue either Christ or his Gospell, vers. 20. and that they did not all this of infirmity but through obstinacie, verse 25. professing themselues enemies to the Gospell, as it is verse 28.

The eleuenth place is Rom. 14. 15. Destroy not him with thy meate for whom Christ died. The like place is, 1. Cor. 8. 11. And through thy knowledge shall thy weake brother perish, for whom Christ died. From which places they thus reason: Those for whom Christ died may be destroyed and perish: but such are elected and indued with faith: therefore some elected and indued with faith may bee destroyed and perish. Vnto which I answer, first, by distinguishing of the assumption; for Christ is said generally and improperly to haue died for the whole visible Church; but properly and truly for the faithfull only, which are of the Church inuisible. The first phrase of speech is true in regard of the sufficiencie of his death, which in it selfe was a full and sufficient price for the ransome of all, or else if wee vnderstand it by a synecdoche of the whole for the seuerall parts and members; but not in respect of the efficacie of his death, for it is onely effectuall for the redemption and saluation of those who apply vnto themselues the vertue and merit thereof, by a true and liuely faith. All therefore for whom Christ is said to haue died, are not elect and faithfull, but onely those to whom the vertue and power of his death and merits are effectually applied. Secondly, Christ is said to haue died for euery member of the visible Church, because being outward members thereof, they are in the iudgement of charitie reputed and esteemed of the Church, and to be redeemed and iustified by Christs death, vntill by their Apostacie they make it knowne that they were but hypocrites, for whom Christ neuer died. And of such may those places be vnderstood, seeing the holy Ghost oftentimes speaketh of things according to the judgement and estimation of men; and also by such charitable speeches doth teach vs both to speake and judge charitably; and seeing likewise we find by experience, that many such Hypocrites as doe for a time professe themselues members of the Church, and redeemed by Christs death, being scandalized and offended by the example of some others, do fall away from their profession, and so vtterly perish. But if we will vnderstand it of those for whom Christ truly and effectually died, the proposition is false; for Christ died for none but his sheepe, Iohn 10.15. and Christs sheepe shall neuer perish, neither can any plucke them out of his hand. Verse 28. Yea but it is said, that thy weake brother shall perish. I answere, that is not to be vnderstood of the effect and euent, but of the cause and occasion: for howsoeuer the weak Christian may be shrewdly shaken, & be grieuously wounded in his conscience with scandals and offences offered by those who are more strong, yet hee can neuer fall and perish, seeing the Lord strengtheneth his weakenesse, vpholdeth him being ready to fall, and being falne raiseth him vp againe. Notwithstanding it might truely bee said in respect of the sufficiencie of the occasion offered by the offence giuen, that hee should thereby be destroyed and perish: for he that giueth such offences, doth as much as in him lieth, destroy his weake brother, the cause which he giueth being in it selfe of force sufficient to ouerthrow and destroy him, if hee were not supported and preserued by the omnipotent power of God. So that the sense of this place is this, destroy not, that is, doe not by giuing such offences, as much as in thee lieth, destroy thy weake brother, for whom Christ hath died. And so through thy knowledge shall thy weake brother perish, that is, by abusing thy knowledge concerning the vse of things indifferent, thou shalt by offending him, as much as thou art able, cause him to perish, because thou offerest the occasion, and vsest the meanes to bring him to destruction.

Sect. 3. Rom. 14. 15. 1. Cor. 8. 11. For whom Christ is said to haue died.

Iohn 10.15.28.

9. Sect. 4. Whether Paul might become a reprobate.

The twelfth place obiected is 1. Cor. 9.27. But I beat downe my body and bring it into subiection, lest by any meanes after I haue preached to others, I my selfe should become a reprobate. From which place they thus reason: Paul might become a reprobate, but Paul was elected and indued with Faith; and therefore some elected and endued with Faith may become reprobates. The proposition they endeuour to proue by this place; because in chastising his body to this end that he might not become a reprobate, hee shewes himselfe doubtful & fearefull lest he should become one. I answer, first, that the original word ἀδόκιμος here vsed, which they translate reprobate, may more fitly in this place be translated approued, as it is in our Geneua translation; for so it is sometimes vsed, as 2. Cor. 13.7. and Heb. 6.8. and in this sense it is opposed vnto one who is approoued; and so it best agreeth with the scope of the Apostle in this place; for he doth not speake of the reprobation of his person in Gods counsell, but of the disapprooving and rejection of his ministery by God and his Church, if hee did teach one thing and practice another. For hee is reproued, that is, rejected and disapprooued of God and the Church, as an euill and vnworthy Minister, whose life and conuersation is not agreeable to his word and doctrine. And therefore Paul being appointed an Apostle and Minister to teach others the wayes of righteousnesse and holinesse, doth carefully beate downe his flesh, and indeuoureth to mortifie the corruptions thereof, lest teaching others, and neglecting the practice of his own doctrine, he should be rejected and reprooued as an euill Teacher. Secondly, though this place should be vnderstood of eternall reprobation, yet it maketh nothing against the certaintie of Pauls perseuerance; for hee doth not say that hee could become a reprobate, but that he would vse this meanes that he might not become a reprobate. Now to vse the meanes to preserue himselfe from becomming a reprobate, doth not prooue the possibilitie of his reprobation, but the certaintie of his perseuerance, seeing the means of perseuerance are no lesse contained in Gods counsell and decree, then perseuerance it selfe. So that as the Lord hath decreed that wee should not be reprobates, and that wee should perseuere in grace, so also hee hath decreed that we should beat downe our flesh, and mortifie the corruptions thereof, that so our perseuerance may be confirmed, and we preserued from defection and reprobation; as hee hath elected vs to eternall life, so hee hath also decreed that wee should vse the meanes whereby we might make our election sure, as hee exhorteth, 2. Pet. 1.10. and therefore the carefull vse of these meanes doth not shew the doubtfulnesse, but rather the infallible certaintie of our election and perseuerance. And this appeareth in the Apostle Paul, who as hee doth in this place with all diligence vse this means of mortification, that he might not become a reprobate, so in other places hee professeth his certaine assurance of perseuering in Gods loue, & that he neither was nor could become a reprobate.

The thirteenth place obiected is, Gal. 3.3. Are ye so foolish, that after ye haue begun in the spirit, ye would now be made perfect by the flesh. From which place they thus reason: They that begin in the Spirit, may fall away and end in the flesh: but they that begin in the spirit, are truly regenerate: therefore they who are truly regenerate, may fall away and end in the flesh? I answer, that the assump-

9. Sect. 5. Gal. 3.3. What is meant by beginning in the spirit, & ending in the flesh.

assumption is false: for by spirit in this place is not understood the spirit of regeneration, but the doctrine of the spirit, or the spirituall doctrine, which is the Gospell; and thus doth our Saviour Christ call the words of the Gospell which he preached, spirit and life, Iohn 6.63. and in this respect the Apostle calleth the Ministers of the new Testament the Ministers of the spirit, and the preaching thereof, the ministration of the spirit, 2. Cor. 3. because when the Gospell is preached, the Spirit is given to those that believe. So that the Apostle in this place doth not accuse them for their falling from true regeneration, but from the profession of the Gospell which had beene taught vnto them. For whereas they had learned by the preaching of the Gospell, that a man is justified by faith alone without the workes of the Law, they fell from this truth which formerly they had received, looking to be justified by the workes of the Law. Secondly, I answere vnto the proposition, that by the flesh we are not to understand the state of man vnregenerate, but the sleshly doctrine of the false Apostles, which consisted wholly of carnall points which savoured wholly of carnall wisdome, because they taught that they should not rest wholly vpon the righteousnesse of Christ for their justification, and so ascribe vnto him the sole glorie thereof, but rather in part they should relie vpon their owne legall righteousnesse, and so share with Christ in the prayse of their justification; the which may well be called a fleshly doctrine, seeing nothing is more agreeable and pleasing to flesh and blood, then to rob God of his honour, that we may ascribe it vnto our selves. And therefore to be perfected by the flesh, cannot signifie falling away into the state of vnregeneration, but a declination from the profession of the doctrine of the Gospell, which teacheth that we are justified by faith alone in Christ, vnto the doctrine of the false Apostles, which taught them to looke for the perfection of their righteousnesse which was begunne by the Gospell, by performing the workes of the Law, and by receiving the legall Sacrament of Circumcision, which was made in the flesh, without which they affirmed that Christ could not profit them. The which their practice hath opened much of vnderstanding, because they left the doctrine of the Gospell, which brought them into the glorious liberty of the sonnes of God, and entangled themselves into the state of bondage and bondage vnder the Law and the rudiments, from which Christ hath delivered them, by which meanes they became debtors to keepe the whole Law, and so fell from Christ, and from grace. And this exposition agreeth well with the scope of the whole Epistle, and the maine drift of the Apostle in this place, although one should expound the words according to that sense which they force out of them, yet would they make nothing for their purpose: for he doth not write this vnto particular beleevers, who were truly justified and sanctified, but vnto those foolish Galathians who had left the doctrine of the Gospell, of which formerly they had made some profession, and imbraced the doctrine of the false Apostles. And therefore he saith not, that they were truly and throughly regenerated by Gods sanctifying Spirit, but only that they had begunne in the spirit, that is, had in some measure beene inlightned and tasted of the heavenly gift, and the Word of God, receiving it for the present with joy, and making an outward profession thereof, like those temporizers of whom our Saviour Christ, & the Apostle speaketh, Matth. 13.20. Heb. 6.4, 5.

Matth. 13.20. Heb. 6.4, 5. Q. Sect. 6. Gal. 5.4.

How the Galathians were said to be abolished from Christ.

The fourteenth place objected, is Gal. 5.4. Ye are abolished from Christ (or, as it is in the originall, ye are made void and empty of Christ, that is, Christ is vnto you vnprofitable) whosoever are justified by the law, ye are fallen from grace. From which place they thus reason: The Galathians looking to be justified by the Law, were abolished from Christ and did fall from grace: but they were elected and indued with Faith: and therefore some who are elected and indued with Faith, may be abolished from Christ and fall from grace. I answere first to the assumption, that those Galathians which looked to be justified by the Law, were not elected, if they did persevere in this their heresie, and therefore it maketh nothing against our question, if the proposition be vnderstood of such, for we grant that they who seeke for justification by the workes of the Law by themselves performed, being not elected may be abolished from Christ, and fall from grace. Yea but, say they, these Galathians were in Christ once, and in the state of grace, or else they could not fitly be said to be made void and empty of Christ, and to have fallen from grace: for how can they be made empty of Christ who were not first filled with Christ and in the state of grace? I answere, that these phrases are so much inforced, as that they may fitly be vsed to make confession against the truth, who so hateth sinne in Christ, that they are not by his death and resurrection, in which sense the Apostle speaketh in this place, perswaded that their sinnes are not pardoned by the new league, the Law shall have no dominion, grace is not given, Christ is not conceived with the seed and Word of grace, the Holy Ghost shall not regenerate, and so fall from grace, from the gift of sanctifying grace, from the Gospell, from the doctrine of grace, namely, the Gospell. So that that the sense is this; whosoeuer will not content themselues with the righteousnesse of Faith, but seeke for righteousnesse in the Law, they haue no communion with Christ, and are false from the doctrine of grace taught in the Gospell, to the righteousnesse which is of the Law. And whereas whilest they did imbrace the doctrine of the Gospel, they seemed to be in the state of grace, they now falling from the profession of this truth, and imbracing the righteousnesse which is of the Law, doe make it manifest, that they are not in the state of grace, and that they never from their hearts imbraced the doctrine of the Gospell, seeing they renounce the free grace therein offered and subject themselues to the bondage of the Law.

The fifteenth place obiected is, 1. Tim. 1. 19. Hauing faith and a good conscience, which some haue put away, and as concerning faith haue made shipwracke. The like places vnto this are these, 1. Tim. 4. 1. Now the spirit speaketh euidently that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith. And 5. 8. If there be any that prouideth not for his owne, &c. he denieth the faith, and is worse then an infidel. And 6. 10. The desire of money is the roote of all euill, which while some lusted after they erred from the faith. From which places they thus reason: They that may make shipwracke of faith, and deny, depart and erre from the faith; they may lose their faith, and consequently fall away and perish; but some may make shipwracke of their faith, and therefore some may lose their faith, fall away and perish. I answere, that the word faith is diuersly taken in the Scriptures; sometimes for the doctrine of faith: sometimes for the profession of faith: sometimes for the grace of faith: sometimes for the fruits of faith. Gal. 1. 23. He now preacheth the faith. Gal. 3. 12. The Law is not of faith, but the man that doth them shall liue in them. Rom. 12. 6. Let vs prophesie according to the proportion of faith. Gal. 3. 23. Before faith came we were kept vnder the Law, shut vp vnto the faith which should afterward be reuealed. Rom. 14. 23. Whatsoeuer is not of faith is sinne. Heb. 11. 6. Without faith it is impossible to please God. Now in this place faith is taken for the profession of faith, as the words following doe plainly shew, where it is said, that they had erred concerning the truth, saying, that the resurrection was past already. Whereupon he addeth that notwithstanding their back-sliding from the truth, Gods Decree of election was not hereby impeached, seeing they neuer belonged vnto it: Neuertheless (saith hee) the foundation of God standeth sure, hauing this seale, the Lord knoweth whom they are his. Secondly, whereas hee saith, 1. Tim. 4. 1. that some should depart from the faith, he expoundeth his meaning in the words following, saying, that they should giue heed to the spirits of error, and doctrine of Diuels, that is, they should leaue the sincere truth of the Gospel, and suffer themselues to bee seduced with the Heresies of Antichrist. Thirdly, whereas he saith, Chap. 5. Vers. 8. that they that prouide not for those who are vnder their charge, deny the faith: he meaneth the doctrine of faith, which teacheth vs to haue care not onely of our selues but also of those that belong vnto vs. Lastly, whereas he saith, that couetous men doe erre from the faith, hee meaneth the doctrine of the Gospell, which teacheth that wee should not lay vp our treasures vpon the earth, nor serue this vnrighteous Mammon. And secondly, though it should bee vnderstood of iustifying faith, it were nothing to their purpose, seeing a couetous worldling may erre from the faith, though he were neuer indued therewith. Hauing thus cleared these places alwo be vnderstood of the doctrine of faith, which a worldling may reprobate may know and professe as well as the elect, therefore they make nothing for proofe of the possibility of a defection from a true iustifying faith, and consequently ouerthrow not the doctrine of perseuerance.

The 16. place obiected is, Heb. 6. 4. For it is impossible for those who were once lightned, and haue tasted of the heauenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, 5. And haue tasted of the good word of God, and of the powers of the world to come, 6. If they fall away, should be renewed againe by repentance, seeing they crucifie againe to themselues the Sonne of God, and make a mocking stocke. From which place they thus reason: Those who are inlightned and haue tasted of the heauenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, may fall away; so that they cannot be renewed by repentance: but such are the elect of God and his faithfull ones; and therefore the elect and faithfull may so fall away as that they cannot be renewed by repentance. To which I answere, that there is no mention made in this scripture, for ought the obiection is to bee called to minde, neither can it be proued that the Apostle doth here vnderstand an elect and faithfull man in this description, but an hypocrite who hath only a temporarie faith, seeing he doth not haue the diuine & peculiar properties of the elect and faithfull, but such as are common vnto them with temporizing hypocrites as may appeare if we examine the particulars. First, by illightning the vnderstanding the illumination of the minde with the knowledge of the Gospell, which is common to the faithfull with hypocrites, who often-times attaine vnto an historicall knowledge of the great mysteries of Christian religion, so that they can discourse of them in ordinarie talke, yea and become Preachers and teachers thereof vnto others; as appeareth in the example of Iudas, Demas, Iulian and many others. And thus doth the Apostle expound himselfe, Heb. 10. 26. If we sinne wilfully after that we haue receiued the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sinne. So likewise by tasting of the heauenly gift of the word of God, and of the powers of the world to come, wee are to vnderstand some generall approbation of those things in the iudgement, which inclineth also the affection to like of and desire them; but yet seared from a resolute purpose to compasse and inioy them. And this is cōmon vnto hypocrites, for as did they chant being about to buy a purchase, doth taste of them, and thereupon doth approue them as good, like of and desire them; and yet when hee knoweth what it doth cost him he will giue for them, chuseth rather to leaue them vnbought and so goe his way: so the hypocrite hearing of excellent things are prepared for Gods faithfull ones, doth like and desire them, but howsoeuer hee like the taste and relish of them, yet when hee knoweth that whatsoeuer it will buy them, must deny himselfe and his worldly lusts, forsake the world and the vanities thereof, mortifie the flesh, take vp his crosse and follow Christ, he refuseth them as being too deare, and rejecteth them, then he will not haue none of them, when he will consecrate vnto him such a price. And such are those counterfeit hypocrites which our Sauiour describeth in the parable. Luk. 8. 13. They which are on the stony ground, are they which when they haue heard the word receiue it with ioy, but haue no roote, which for a while beleeue, and in the time of temptation fall away. Such as one was Ezekiel, who [illegible] great blessings were promised vnto Israel, [illegible] desired to die their death, [illegible] enioy them, but yet would not [illegible] their life, nor to obtaine assurance [illegible] Secondly, by enlightning. So the young man in the Gospell [illegible] eternall life, and [illegible] Christ, [illegible] the [illegible] whereby he might come vnto assurance thereof; but when he heard that he must sell all he had, and giue it to the poore, and take vp his crosse and follow Christ, he relinquished his former suit and went away sorrowfull.

Lastly, by being made partakers of the holy Ghost, hee vnderstandeth the gifts of the holy Ghost, which also are of two sorts: first, such as are the gifts of the sanctifying spirit, but not the gifts of sanctification, which are also common to Hypocrites, as knowledge of the Gospell, a sudden and temporary ioy in hearing the word, a desire to be conformable thereunto in some things, and such like. Secondly, such as are the gifts of the spirit as it sanctifieth, or the gifts of sanctification, as Faith, charitie, repentance and such like, which are peculiar to the elect. Now we are to vnderstand the Apostle in this place of the former common gifts, and not of these latter which are proper to the faithfull.

What is meant by being made partakers of the holy Ghost.

Mark 6. 20.

But it is further vrged, that we are here to vnderstand the elect and faithfull which fall away, because hee saith that they crucifie Christ againe vnto themselues; whereof it followeth, that hee was once crucified for them before, and consequently that they were elected, seeing Christ died onely for such. I answere, first, that the word (againe) is not to be referred to the words following (vnto themselues) but to the word crucifying going before. Secondly, by crucifying vnto themselues, wee are not to vnderstand crucifying or dying for them, or for their saluation, whereby is noted the finall end of Christs death, but his crucifying by them (as they were the spitefull and malicious instruments of his death) vnto their iust condemnation. For as the Iewes did once maliciously crucifie Christ our Sauiour vpon the crosse, so those are said to crucifie him againe who despise and contemne him, and his sufferings, and make a mock of them. And in this sense Paul saith, that the world was crucified vnto him, and he vnto the world, Gal. 6. 14. that is, as the world did contemne and basely esteeme him, so did he contemne and basely esteeme the world and the pompes thereof.

§. Sect. 3. What is meant by crucifying Christ againe.

Gal. 6. 14.

Secondly I answere, that there is no soundnesse of truth in the proposition, although the assumption should be granted, for he doth not say, that such as truly and effectually called might fall away, but by way of supposition, if they did fall away, then they could not be renewed by repentance, because they had committed the sin [illegible] and [illegible] the holy Ghost, and [illegible] is not possible [illegible] and faithfull. Now from a [illegible] the consequence [illegible] Yea rather [illegible] Ghost [illegible] would [illegible] downe carnall securitie, to preserue the faithfull from making a generall Apostasie, and to strengthen them in their perseuerance, seeing their relapse and backsliding would bring vpon them inevitable destruction. As may appeare by the words following, vers. 9. 10. 11. where hee taketh occasion vpon this admonition to exhort them to diligence, constancie, and patience, that so they might bee inheritors of Gods gracious promises.

§. Sect. 11. Heb. 10. 26. expounded. What is meant by sinning willingly.

The fourteenth place obiected is Heb. 10. 26. For if we sinne willingly, after we haue receiued the knowledge of the truth there remaineth no more sacrifice for sinnes. vers. 27. But a certaine fearefull looking for of iudgement, and violent fire which shall deuoure the aduersaries. From which place they thus reason: They who sinne willingly after they haue receiued the knowledge of the truth, doe fall away from grace and perish: For the Apostle saith that there remaineth no more sacrifice for their sinnes, but a fearefull looking for of iudgement, and violent fire which shall deuoure them. But the faithfull may sinne willingly after they haue receiued knowledge of the truth, and therefore they may fall away from grace and perish. I answere, first the proposition is false, if the argument bee vnderstood in the Apostles sense; for they who sinne willingly, as the Apostle meaneth, were neuer in the state of grace, and therefore cannot fall away from it. If we vnderstand it in their sense, namely, of some particular sinne committed willingly, yet through infirmitie, as whoredome, drunkennesse murther and such like, then is it alle false, being vnderstood of the faithfull, for as much as they, notwithstanding their sinnes, doe not fall away from grace nor perish. Secondly, the assumption being vnderstood in their sense maketh nothing for their purpose, and being taken according to the Apostles meaning is vtterly false: for the Apostle here by voluntarie sinning vnderstandeth not particular sinnes, which the faithfull may fall into willingly through infirmitie, seeing then Dauid, Peter and many other of Gods deare Saints being thus ouertaken, should haue beene in a desperate case, but a generall Apostasie from Christ and Christian religion not through feare and infirmitie, but willingly, that is, with full consent of will, liking and approuing what they doe, and vpon deliberate, malice and determined resolution, which is that vnpardonable sin against the holy Ghost.

And this appeareth by the whole drift of the Apostle, and the circumstances of the place, for hauing exhorted them to keepe the profession of their hope without wauering, and that they should not forsake the assemblies, according as they had vsed one another in the Church, as some did who made an Apostasie from the faith, he annexeth this terrible commination to preserue them from this apostasie. So in that comparison which he maketh from the lesse to the greater, he plainely sheweth his meaning, namely, that as the despisers of the whole Law of Moses, and not the transgressors of particular commandements were condemned to death without mercie; so they were worthie of farre greater punishment who despised the whole Gospell of Christ, and not euery one who willingly transgressed some Euangelicall dutie. Lastly, whereas he saith, that they did tread vnder their feete the Sonne of God, and counted the blood of the Testament an vnholy thing, and despited the spirit of grace; by all this is signified that they contemned Christ and his religion as execrable or base, and with resolued malice despited the spirit of God, which had illightned them with the knowledge of Gods truth. Into which kinde of generall Apostasie it is impossible through Gods grace that any of the elect should fall, for the seede of regeneration abideth in them, and they cannot thus sinne because they are borne of God, as the Apostle speaketh, 1. Ioh. 3. 9.

1. Ioh. 3. 9.

§. Sect. 13. Vers. 29. What the Apostle meaneth by being sanctified with the blood of Christ.

Yea, but it is heere said, that they who thus willingly sinne are sanctified with the blood of Christ, and therefore he vnderstandeth it of the faithfull, seeing those who are sanctified, they are also called and iustified. I answere, that as besides the inward and effectuall calling, there is an outward calling common to hypocrites, and as there is a true iustification before God proper to the elect, so there is an outward iustification before men, when as those who in their outward carriage and conuersation doe shew themselues iust, are in the iudgement of charitie so reputed and esteemed; there is in likemanner a twofold kind of sanctification, the one inward before God, when as the heart is purified by faith; the other outward before men, when as wee professe our selues members of the Church, and such as are sanctified with the blood of Christ; confesse the Christian Faith, and bring forth some outward fruites in our liues and conuersations: and this latter sanctification is common vnto hypocrites, who whilest they professe themselues members of the Church, which is the bodie of Christ sanctified by his blood, word, and spirit, and make outward semblance and shew thereof in their liues, are called and reputed Saints in the iudgement of charitie, which iudgeth the best where it seeth no appearance of euill.

Yea, but the spirit of God who searcheth the heart and raines here saith, that they were sanctified by the blood of Christ, and therefore fore they were not only outwardly, but also internally sanctified, not in the iudgement of men alone, but also in the iudgements of God. I answere, it followeth not; for commonly the spirit of God in the Scriptures speaketh not according to his owne knowledge, but according to the opinion and common estimation of men. So all Israel are called the peculiar people of God, because they made outward profession of his religion, though many of them did not belong to the election of grace. So the Apostles writing to whole Churches call them the Saints of God; though there were amongst them many hypocrites. The which the holy Ghost hath purposedly done, to teach vs by his example to speake and iudge charitablie of our brethren; and not to censure them as hypocrites, vntill they haue plainely discouered their hypocrisie. Lastly, I answere to this argument, that though wee should take the words according to their own sense and meaning, yet nothing inferred by them would follow necessarily, seeing the speech is not absolute but conditionall, and by way of suppositi-on, if any doe sinne wilfully, &c. which may rather bee taken as an admonition to keepe the faithfull from falling into condemnation, than as an argument of their fall.

CHAP. XIX.

Other obiections against the doctrine of perseuerance, taken from testimonies out of the Epistles of Peter and the Reuelation, answered.

The eighteenth place obiected is 2. Pet. 1. 9. For he that doth not these things is blind and cannot see farre off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sinnes. From which place they thus reason: They who were purged from their old sinnes may fall away from grace, for they may become blind, and forget that euer they were thus purged: but they who are purged from their sinnes are elect and faithfull, and therefore the elect and faithfull may fall away from the state of grace. I answere, first, that these words haue only in them the force of a supposition, namely, that if any professing Christianity, neglect all Christian vertues, they are thus blind and forgetfull; and therefore seeing nothing is positiuely affirmed, not any thing can heereupon bee necessarily concluded, but this wee must carefully take heed we do not neglect these holy vertues, seeing this negligence would bring men into this desperate condition. Secondly, I distinguish vpon the assumption: for men are said to be purged from their sinnes either really and truely, when the blood of Christ is aphlied vnto them by his spirit, and a liuely Faith, or when as they are onely purged in their owne opinion and profession, or in the iudgement of others, who charitably account those purged from their sinnes, who haue receiued the outward purging and washing in baptisme, and haue by their outward profession giuen their names to Christ. And of this latter purging common to hypocrites, wee are to vnderstand this place, and not of the true purging by Christs blood, in which whosoeuer are washed, can neuer become blind, nor forget that they were purged by him, and therfore the assumption being vnderstood according to the Apostles meaning is directly false.

The nineteenth place obiected is 2. Pet. 2. 20. For if they after they haue escaped from the filthinesse of the world through the knowledge of the Lord, and of the Sauiour Iesu Christ, are yet tangled againe therein and ouercome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning. 21. For it had beene better for them not to haue known the way of righteousnesse, than after they haue knowne it, to turne from the holy commandement giuen vnto them. 22. But it is come vnto them according to the true prouerbe, The dogge is returned to his vomit, and the sow that was washed to the wallowing in the mire. From which place they thus reason: They who haue escaped the filthinesse of the world, through the knowledge of God and Christ, and haue cast off their sinnes which oppressed their soules and consciences, and haue beene washed from their corruptions, may fall away from grace and become reprobates; for they may be tangled in the world and ouercome, they may haue their latter end worse than the beginning, they may turne from Gods commandements, they may returne to their vomit of sinne, and wallow themselues againe in the filthie mire of their corruptions: but such are elect and faithfull: and therefore the elect and faithfull may fall away from grace and become reprobates. I answere, first, that here againe is no direct assertion that such as heere described should fall into this state, but a conditionall supposition, if they doe thus behaue themselues; and therefore though wee should by this description vnderstand the faithfull, no such thing could bee necessarily inferred. Secondly, I deny the assumption. For the Apostle doth not here vnderstand the elect and true beleeuers, whom elsewhere hee affirmeth to be kept not of mortall seede, but of immortall, by the word of God which endureth for euer, and to be kept by the power of God through faith vnto saluation. But only vnsound and Hypocrites, who suffer themselues after they they haue been instructed in the knowledge of the truth, and haue made shew of some outward reformation in their liues, to be seduced by false teachers, and to be intangled againe in the world, and in the lusts of their flesh. And this appeareth first by the whole drift of the Apostle in this Chapter, which is to inueigh against such false Teachers as seduce the vnstable out of the way of Truth into the by-paths of their owne errours; and after they haue beene conuerted by the preaching of the Gospell from the grosse errours of Paganisme, vnto the knowledge and acknowledgement of Gods Truth, and haue beene purged from some outward enormous sinnes, are againe by their false doctrine corrupted, and so plunged againe into their old errours in doctrine, and enormous crimes in their liues. Secondly, the Apostle doth not here describe a true Beleeuer, by setting downe any notes proper and peculiar vnto him, seeing whatsoeuer is here spoken may belong to a temporizing Hypocrite: for such an one may hee cleane escaped from the errours of Pagans and Heretikes, and not onely know, but also acknowledge Gods Truth inwardly in his iudgement, and outwardly in his profession; and yet in the meane time remayne destitute of a liuely faith, and of the inward sanctification of the heart: euen as a man may disauow the errours of Poperie, and yet continue vnregenerate and without the power of godlinesse. He may, after hee hath attained the knowledge of God and Christ, escape the filthinesse of the World, that is, he may haue his grosse faules and the externall filthinesse of the world in part reformed (as we may see in the example of Herod, who heard Iohn gladly, and did many things according to his doctrine) and yet nourish secret corruptions in his hart, which will afterwards burst out into his works and actions. He may ease his heart and conscience for a time, by casting vp his grossest sinnes (as it were) in his vomit, but because hee is not throughly purged from the corrupt humours of sinne, nor hath his heart sound and vpright before God, the corruptions will gather againe, like bad humours in the stomache ill disposed, the sicknesse of his soule will become wel, and hee will returne to his former wicked course, like the Dogge to his vomit, or the Sow to the mire.

Mark. 6. 20.

§. Sect. 3. Apoc. 2. 4. What the Lord vnderstandeth by losing their first loue.

The twentieth place obiected is Apoc. 2. 4. Notwithstanding, I haue somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first loue. From which place they thus reason: They who lose their Charitie may lose their Faith also, and finally fall from grace; but the Angel of the Church of Ephesus lost his charitie: Ergo. I answer, the assumption is manifestly false, & contrary to the text by vs alleged: for in the former part of the Epistle, as the Lord had highly commended the Angell of his Church, for many singular graces, approued by diuers excellent fruits of his Faith, so especially he praiseth his constancy and perseuerance in these godly and religious courses, in the next verse going before. Whereas therefore hee admonisheth him that hee had left his first loue, and willeth him to remember from whence hee was falne, his meaning is, not that hee had vtterly lost his Charitie, and was falne from Faith and Grace, of which there still remained so excellent fruits and infallible signes; but that he had left that high degree of loue, and that ardent affection, which he had formerly shewed towards God and his Saints, in respect that through negligence his loue was decayed in some particular actions and operations. Neither doth hee absolutely say that hee had lost his Charitie altogether, but his first Charitie; That is, his zealous heate of loue, which he had shewed soone after his first conuersion, which was very extraordinary and singular, as appeareth in the story of the Acts of the Apostles. And this nothing impugneth that truth which we maintaine, for though wee hold that Gods sanctifying grace cannot be vtterly lost, and quite extinguished; yet they may decay, be weakned and diminished in their measure and degree: at least in our sense and feeling, and in respect of their functions and operations, though their habits, or the graces themselues do remaine in their wonted perfection.

The one and twentieth place obiected, is Apoc. 3. 5. He that ouercommeth shall be clothed in white array, and I will not put out his name out of the booke of life, but I will confesse his Name before my Father, and before his Angels. From which place they thus reason: If they who ouercome shall not be blotted out of the Booke of life; then contrariwise it followeth by like reason, that those who do not ouercome shall be blotted out; but the first is true, therefore the second likewise. This argument I haue already taken away in my answere to the first testimony obiected against perseuerance: briefly we are to answere, that if they meane by blotting out, Gods declaring that they were neuer written therein, we doe not deny it, as making nothing for them, nor against our question. But if they vnderstand a blotting out of such as are already written, then we deny their consequence, there being not the like reason betweene these two: for howsoeuer they who ouercome may fitly be said not to be blotted out of Gods Booke, because they are written in it, yet it cannot bee said that they, who doe not ouercome shall bee blotted out, seeing they were neuer written in this Booke of life.

§. Sect. 4. Apoc. 3. 5.

Lastly, they obiect the admonitions and threatnings, which are common in the Scriptures, whereby the Holy Ghost seemeth to inferre, that the faithfull are in danger to fall away from grace, and to lose their faith, and other gifts of Gods Spirit. As, let him that thinketh hee standeth, take heed lest hee fall. Take heed lest at any time there bee in any of you, an euill heart and vnfaithfull, to depart from the liuing God. But this argument I haue already answered, when as I proued the certaintie of our election, and tooke away the obiections against this assurance; vnto which place for breuitie sake, I referre the Reader for his fuller satisfaction.

Obiection against the doctrine of perseuerance grounded vpon examples, answered.

AND thus much for answere to those Obiections against perseuerance which are grounded vpon testimonies of Scriptures. Now wee are to come vnto the examples which are alleaged to the same purpose; amongst which diuers are vtterly impertinent to the question in hand; for whereas it is thus propounded, whether a man elected, iustified, and sanctified, may fall from this his state, lose his faith and all sanctifying graces, and become a reprobate, and a cast-away, they obiect the example of the euill Angels, Saul, Iudas, and such like whom we vtterly deny to haue euer had faith, iustification, or any other sauing grace; so that their apostasie from their former profession, was not a falling from faith which they neuer had, but only a detection and discouery of them, whereby was made manifest what they in truth were, namely, that what shew soeuer they had formerly made, yet they were neuer in the state of grace, nor yet indued with a true iustifying faith. But that we may descend vnto particulars; first they alleage the example of euill Angels, which, howsoeuer they were Gods most excellent creatures, and indued plentifully with many singular gifts and graces, yet they perseuered not in this estate, but lost their graces, and made a fearefull apostasie from God. But if we would see what force this, and the rest of the examples produced, haue to the present purpose; wee shall easily discerne it, if we dispose the example which is their argument, whereby they conclude their question, together with the question it selfe in a Syllogisme after this manner:

The Angels fell from grace, lost their iustification, and Faith, and became cast-aways:

But the Angels were men in the state of grace, iustified and indued with true Faith:

And therefore certain men being in the state of grace, iustified and endued with true Faith, may fall from grace, lose their iustification and Faith, and become cast-aways.

Whereby the impertinencie of this allegation to the concluding of this question plainly appeareth. For first the Angels are not men, of whom alone the question is propounded; they were not in the state of grace, as the question vnderstandeth it, that is, the grace of redemption, but of creation onely; they were not iustified by Christs imputed righteousnes, but stood just in their own inherent righteousnesse, they had no iustifying Faith, seeing there was neuer any promise made vnto them that Christ should be giuen as their Mediatour, by whose righteousnesse they should be iustified.

1. Sect. 2. The example of our first Parents.

The second example is of our first parents which is alike impertinent in euery respect, sauing that they were of humane nature; for before the fall they were only in the state of grace by creation, and not by redemption; they were just by their owne inherent righteousnesse, and not by the righteousnesse of Christ; they had no iustifying Faith, for as yet they had no promise of a Mediatour, nor needed his righteousnes to iustifie them, seeing they stood in their owne righteousnesse. Yea, but if the Angels and our first parents, who in their creation were farre more excellent, and much more strong in grace, then we, did lose their grace, and fall from God; then we who are weaker, and euery way inferiour vnto them, may much more easily lose those graces wherewith wee are indued and fall away. I answere, that this reason were of some force if we stood in our owne strength, and perseuered through our owne excellencie; for if we should be left of God vnto our selues, as they were, we should not be able to indure the least assault of our spirituall enemies, nor perseuere in the slightest tentations. But now it is farre otherwise, for our perseuerance is not grounded vpon our owne strength, but vpon the promises and power of God, who will, because hee hath said it, and can because he is omnipotent, vphold vs against all the power of Hell. And howsoeuer wee are most feeble and weake in our selues, yet wee haue a sure stay which continually vnderpropheth vs when wee are ready to yeeld and faint, euen the intercession of Iesus Christ, who continually mediateth in our behalfe for Gods promised assistance, and prayeth when Sathan desireth to winnow vs, that our Faith faile not. Neither doth our perseuerance and saluation depend vpon our owne will as Adams did, for then wee should easily be ouerthrowne and perish, but vpon the will of God. And therefore howsoeuer wee are much more weake, yet our perseuerance is incomparably more certaine, for though his will were finite and mutable, and therefore ouer-ruled by a greater power, but Gods will is immutable, and cannot be ouer-swayed in regard of his infiniteneſſe in power and wiſdome. Adam receiued grace to perſeuere if he would, but not to will that he could; whereas the Lord hath granted vnto vs both power and will to continue in his grace vnto the end.

Esay 59. 21. Iere. 32. 40. and 32. 40. Psal. 125. 1. Luke 22. 32.

Adam accepit posse si vellet, non habuit velle quod posset, &c. August. de corrept. & grat. c. 11,12. *Tom.*7.

The third example alleaged is of Saul, whom they affirme to haue beene elected and ſanctified, and yet to haue falne from grace and periſhed. From which example they reaſon thus:

§. Sect. 3. The example of Saul.

Saul fell away from grace, loſt his Faith, and became a caſt-away:

But Saul was elect and regenerate.

Therefore certaine men being elect and regenerate, fall from grace, loſe their Faith, and become caſt-aways.

I anſwer, that both theſe propoſitions are falſe; for firſt, Saul neuer was in the ſtate of grace, and therefore could not fall from it; he neuer had true iuſtifying Faith, and therefore could not loſe it. The aſſumption alſo is alike vntrue; for neither was Saul elected by God to eternall life, nor regenerate by his ſpirit. But this they labour to proue by 1. Sam. 9. 2. which they thus reade: Saul was elect and a good man, and there was not a man amongſt the children of Israel better than hee. If therefore hee was elect and good, yea ſo good, that there was none better, then ſurely, ſay they, he was regenerate, or elſe there was none in Iſrael regenerate: but the former is true, therefore the latter. To this I anſwere, that they take aduantage vpon the equiuocation of the words, which they tranſlate, elect and good. For the former word, howſoeuer it ſignifieth in ſome places an elect man, yet it is commonly vſed for a * young or choice man, ſo called becauſe hee is apt and fit for all imployments, and is therefore elected and choſen from amongſt others for theſe purpoſes. So the other word ſignifieth not onely good, but alſo * faire and beautifull, & ſo it is to be taken in this place, as the wordes following expound it; Amongſt the children of Israel there was none fairer, or goodlier than hee, from the ſhoulders vpward hee was higher than any of the people. So that the meaning of theſe wordes is, that Saul was a choice yong man, and more beautifull and of goodlier perſonage, than any of the people. Yea, but it is ſaid, 1. Sam. 10. 24. that the Lord had choſen Saul; and therefore he was elect. I anſwere, that there is a twofold choice or election, the firſt to an Office or Function, the other to eternall ſaluation. Now we are not to vnderſtand this place of this latter election, of which here is no ſpeech, but of the former, namely, that God had elected and choſen him, amongſt all the people to be the King of Iſrael, as all the circumſtances of the place plainly ſhew. But it is further ſaid, that the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul; and therefore Saul both had Gods Spirit, and alſo loſt it. I anſwere, that by the Spirit of the Lord wee are here to vnderſtand the gifts of the Spirit, as it is vſuall in the Scriptures, not his ſanctifying and ſauing graces which are proper to the Elect, but thoſe morall, ciuill and ordinary gifts, which are common to them with the vnregenerate, namely, the ſpirit of Prophecie, Wiſdome, Fortitude and Gouernment, with which Saul was formerly indued, when as he was choſen to be King of Iſrael, and not the ſpirit of adoption, and regeneration, which he neuer had. And thus the Holy Ghoſt expoundeth himſelfe: 1. Sam. 10. 6, 9. and Chap. 11. 6.

1. Sam 9. 2.

* Deut. 32. 25. 1. Sam. 6. 1. 2. Chron. 25. 5. Pſal. 148. 12.

* Gen. 6. 2. and 24. 16. Exod. 2. 2. 1. Sam. 11. 2.

1. Sam. 10. 24.

The fourth example alleaged is of Dauid, from which they thus conclude:

Dauid loſt his Faith, and ſo for a time, fell from the ſtate of grace:

Dauid was elect and regenerate:

Therefore ſome elect and regenerate, may loſe their Faith, and fall from the ſtate of grace.

I anſwere, that the Propoſition is moſt falſe; for howſoeuer Dauids Faith was ſhaken, yet it was not ouerthrowne; though it loſt its former vigour and ſtrength for a time, ſo as he had not that ſenſible aſſurance of Gods fauour, nor that comfort and ioy in the Holy Ghoſt, as hee was wont to haue in time paſt, yet the ſeed of Faith and Gods grace remayned in him; howſoeuer it was aſleepe (as it were) or brought into a deadly ſwoune for a while, yet it was not quite dead, but awakened againe by the preaching of Nathan, and reuiued when vpon his vnfained repentance, hee was re-aſſured of Gods loue and the remiſſion of his ſinne.

He that committeth any hainous ſin willingly againſt his knowledge and conſcience, deſtroyeth his Faith.

But Dauids ſinne was ſuch, Ergo.

I anſwere, that Dauid did not ſinne with full conſent of will, but in part vnwillingly, the ſpirit ſtriuing againſt the fleſh, and diſallowing and diſſwading from that, vnto which hee was violently carried through the vehement concupiſcence of the fleſh. Hee did not ſinne maliciouſly, but through infirmitie, the fleſh rebelling againſt the ſpirit, and leading him captiue vnto ſinne; and therefore his ſin was not ſo powerfull to ſeparate him from Gods loue, as Chriſt was to retaine him in his fauour. Againe, theſe ſinnes of infirmitie though neuer ſo hainous in themſelues, and fearefully aggrauated, in that they are committed againſt our knowledge and conſcience, are not exempted from Gods mercie, nor exclude vs from hauing our part in thoſe gracious promiſes of pardon and forgiuenesse, so we vnfainedly repent of them and forsake them; and consequently they cannot destroy the Faith of Gods elect, seeing they still haue the ground of their Faith, Gods mercy and gratious promises remaining, whereby it is renewed, and repaired, when as it is shaken and battered with their sinnes and the violence of tentation.

The fifth example obiected against the certaintie of perseuerance, is of Salomon; from whence they thus reason;

Salomon lost his Faith, and fell from the state of grace:

Salomon was elect and regenerate:

Therefore some elect and regenerate, may lose their Faith, and fall from grace.

To which I answere, by denying the proposition as false: for howsoeuer Salomon fell grieuously, yet he did not fall away from grace, nor lost his Faith, nor was euer rejected out of Gods fauour, but liued and died a vessell of grace, and in the loue of God, as may appeare by these reasons. First, because God loued him, & that in such speciall manner, that he caused Nathan to giue him his name Iedidiah as a signe and Sacrament of his loue, as we may see, 2. Sam. 12. 24. 25. Now Gods loue is immutable, for whom he loueth, to the end hee loueth them: Iohn 13. 1.

Secondly, he is said to haue loued God, and to haue walked in the ordinances of Dauid his Father, onely through infirmity doting vpon his wiues, hee sacrificed and offered incense in the high places: 1. King. 3. 3. So it is said, that the godly Priests and Leuites, and such as set their hearts to seeke the Lord, joyned with Roboboam in Gods worship and seruice, and strengthened his kingdome three yeeres long, in which time they walked in the way of Dauid and Salomon: 2. Chron. 11. 16. 17.

Thirdly, vnto him was made a promise from God, that his mercy should neuer bee taken from him, though hee sinned against him; but his sinne should be corrected with temporall chastisements: 2. Sam. 7. 14. I will be his Father, and hee shall be my sonne, and if he sin, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the plagues of the children of men. 15. But my mercie shall not depart away from him, as I tooke it from Saul, whom I haue put away before thee. The which promise is applied to all Gods elect to the same purpose: Psal. 89. 29. 30. 31. &c. And this promise also was accordingly accomplished, for when Salomon fell into that fearefull sin of idolatrie, God threatneth to chastise this his sinne with the diuision and renting of his kingdome, which was but a temporarie punishment. 2. King. 11. 31.

Yea, but this promise is made not concerning his spirituall estate, but concerning his worldly kingdome and gouernement. I answere, this obiection is confuted by experience; for Salomons sinne was punished in his next successour, by taking from him ten tribes of the twelue, so that the greatest part of his worldly gouernement ceased in his sonne, and that which remained was in times succeeding taken from his posteritie. And therefore Gods promise could not bee vnderstood after a worldly and carnall manner, seeing in that respect it was not accomplished, and made good vnto him.

Fourthly, hee was a type of Christ, and his kingdome of the flourishing and peaceable gouernment of the Messias.

Fiftly, he was a penman of an excellent part of holy Scripture, and therefore hee was an holy man of God, who was inspired immediately by the holy Ghost, as the Apostle Peter affirmeth 2. Pet. 1. 21. 2. Pet. 1. 21.

Lastly, he repented of his sinne in his old age, and wrote the booke of Ecclesiastes for a testimonie of his vnfained repentance, and conuersion vnto God, as the Hebrewes who write of him generally affirme.

It is true, wil some say, that Salomon was a iust and faithfull man, but yet he fell away from grace, and lost his Faith, if not finally, yet at least for a time: for he doted vpon his wiues and concubines, and liued in filthie whoredome and horrible vncleannesse, he worshipped the false gods of the Heathens, and so committed shamefull idolatrie, and his heart was not vpright before the Lord his God, as was the heart of Dauid his Father, as it is plainely affirmed: 1. King. 11. 3. 4. 5. 6. I answere, that these indeede are fearefull sinnes into which Salomon fell, which (for the time he liued in them) did no doubt stupifie his Faith, and tooke away from him that liuely sense and feeling, which hee formerly had of Gods loue and Fauour, and together with it the peace of conscience, and ioy in the holy Ghost. But yet the seeds of Faith did all this while lie vnder (as it were) the heauie clods of his sinne, doubting, and infidelitie, till God caused it to sprout out againe, being watred with the dew of his grace, and with the teares of his vnfained repentance. And howsoeuer the flame of his Faith appeared not in his workes of pietie and righteousnesse, yet the sparkes thereof remained, which againe shewed themselues when God blowed vpon him with his holy spirit. In a word, though the act of Faith, which gaue him assurance of Gods Fauour, & brought forth the Fruits of vnfained repentance, was for a time interrupted and hindred with his fearefull sins committed against his knowledge and conscience, yet the habite of Faith remained with him, for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance; and Christ prayed for him that his Faith might not vtterly 1. King. 11. 3. 4. Rom. 11. 29. Luk. 22. 32.

faile, though it were shreudly shaken. Lastly, whereas it is said that his heart was not vpright before God, as was his Father Dauids; we are not simplie and absolutely to vnderstand it, that it was neuer vpright at all, but that it was not vpright, as his Fathers, that is, in that measure and degree, as appeared by those many and grieuous sinnes into which he fell.

Sect. 6. The example of Peter.

The sixth example obiected is of Peter, from which they conclude as from the rest:

Peter lost his Faith, and fell from grace:

But Peter was elect and regenerate:

And therefore some elect and regenerate, may lose their Faith, and fall from grace.

The proposition, which is false, they indeuour to proue, because Peter contrarie to his knowledge and conscience, fell into that hainous sinne of denying his Master. But this argument is of no force, seeing Peter fell into this sinne not vpon desperate malice, or with full consent of will, liking and approuing his Apostasie; but through infirmitie and present Feare, he was violently carried captiue into this sinne, disallowing his backsliding, and striuing against his Fearefulnesse. So that as one saith, Confessio defecit in ore, sed fides non defecit in corde: The constant and open profession of his Faith was wanting in his mouth, but Faith was not wanting in his heart. And this will manifestly appeare if wee consider the former gracious promises made vnto him by Christ, namely, that the gates of Hell should not preuaile against that Faith whereof hee had made confession, and that howsoeuer Satan had desired to sift him as wheate, yet so earnestly had he praied vnto his Father, that his Faith should not faile. And therefore either Christs promise was voide, and his prayer vaine, (which without Blasphemie cannot be affirmed) or else Peters Faith failed not, howsoeuer he was shreudly sifted and shaken with Satans tentations.

Augustine.

Matth. 16. Luk. 22. 32.

But against this they obiect, that Christs meaning was, that his Faith should not finally and vtterly faile, and therefore it might for a time bee quite extinguished, and afterwards againe renewed. I answere, Christs meaning is better vnderstood by his owne words, than by their vncertaine guesses. Now Christ doth not say, Peter I haue prayed that thy Faith faile not vtterly, or that failing it may againe bee renewed, but that it might not faile at all, as the word ἐκλείπῃ also signifieth, which is not to be referred to the time, as though this should bee the meaning, it shall not faile for euer, but vnto the thing, that it should not faile at all. And thus the same word is vsed, Heb. 1. 12. and opposed, not onely to perishing and waxing old, but also to all manner of change. Againe, if Peters Faith should haue failed at all, though it had againe beene renewed, yet these absurdities must needs follow, both that hee must haue had a new Faith, differing at least, as we say in number, from his first Faith, which had failed, and was lost and perished, and also that Christs prayer was not heard, who prayed, not that his Faith might bee againe renewed after it was lost, but that that Faith which which Peter now had might not faile.

Heb. 1. 12.

The seuenth example is of Simon Magus, which is altogether impertinent to the purpose, seeing hee neuer had iustifying Faith, nor sauing grace, and therefore could not lose them. But let vs conclude their reason, and then answere it:

Sect. The example of Simon Magus.

Simon Magus lost his iustifying Faith and fell from grace:

Simon Magus was a beleeuer, elected to eternall life:

Therefore some who beleeue and are elect, lose their Faith, and fall from grace.

I answere, both the premisses are false, and therefore the conclusion cannot be true. For first Simon Magus could not lose that which hee neuer had, namely Faith and saueing grace, and therefore the proposition is vntrue: Secondly, the assumption being vnderstood according to the question, of a true iustifying Faith, is likewise false. For whereas they vrge that Simon Magus is said to haue beleeued, and to haue beene baptized, and therefore was regenerate and indued with a true iustifying Faith, it followeth not; for he only had an historicall Faith, whereby hee gaue his assent to the truth of their doctrine, wrought in him by the admirable miracles which hee saw done by the Apostles, which was seuered from the power of sanctification and true godlinesse. He was washed onely with the outward water in baptisme, and not in the lauer of regeneration by Gods spirit; as it plainely appeareth by Peters iust accusation and reproofe, whereby hee chargeth him, that his heart was not vpright in the sight of God, (though he had made a plausible shew before men) that hee was in the gall of bitternesse, and in the bond of iniquitie; and therefore when he was at the best, he was but a meere Hypocrite and no true beleeuer.

Sect. The eight example alleaged is of Iudas; from which they thus reason:

Iudas lost his Faith, fell from grace, and became a reprobate:

But Iudas was elected, and indued with iustifying Faith:

Therefore some elected and indued with iustifying Faith, may fall from grace and become reprobates.

I answer to the proposition, that Iudas could not lose that which he neuer had, nor fall from that estate in which he neuer was. Secondly, the assumption is to be denied as be-being vtterly false, and directly repugnant to the Holy Scripture; for before the diuell entred into him, mouing him to betray our Sauiour Christ, hee was an egregious Hypocrite, and a wicked person, howsoeuer then first he plainely discouered his wickednesse, and Hypocrisie; for although hee spake in the behalfe of the poore, yet it was but in Hypocrisie, not that he cared for the poore, but because he was a theefe and bare the bagge, with that which was giuen: Iob. 12.6. Hee followed Christ, not for any loue vnto him or his truth, but for his own gaine and aduancement, which comming farre short of his expectation (which was to bee some great peere of an earthly kingdome) the same greedie desire of gaine moued him to betray him for a reward. Hee is called the child of perdition, Iohn 17.12. whose destruction was foretold long before in the Scriptures, as appeareth, Psalm. 109. vers. 7. to the 20. which is applied vnto him, Act. 1.20. Yea our Sauiour Christ himselfe who best knew him, as being the searcher of the heart and reines, expressly calleth him a diuell: Iohn 6.70. Haue not I chosen you twelue, and one of you is a diuell? 71. Now he spake it of Iudas Iscariot. And that this wicked traitor had neuer any true Faith, what shew and profession soeuer he made, it may easily appeare, verse 64. But there are some of you (saith Christ) which beleeue not: for Iesus knew from the beginning which they were who beleeued not, and who should betray him.

But it is further obiected, that our Sauiour Christ saith, Iob. 17.12. that Iudas was giuen vnto him by his Father, and consequently, it followeth, that hee was elect and indued with Faith. I answer, that there is a twofold giuing vnto Christ, and a twofold election: the first is, when as men are giuen vnto Christ that they may bee vnited vnto him, and so be redeemed, iustified, and saued, and when as they are elected in Gods eternall counsell vnto eternall life; and in this sense Iudas was not giuen to Christ, nor elected by God, seeing hee was the sonne of perdition, whose destruction was foretold, and no better than a diuell by Christs own testimonie. The other giuing to Christ and election is, when they were giuen vnto him of God, and elected by Christ to beare the office of an Apostle, and to be his disciples; and thus onely Iudas was giuen by God, and elected by Christ, to this Apostolicall office and function, according to that, Haue not I elected or chosen you twelue, and one of you is a diuell? Neither can we vnderstand it of the other donation and election, vnlesse we will say, that Christ redeemed not those whom God elected, or that he wanted power or will to effect his Fathers end, seeing hee did not saue him, who was giuen vnto him by his Father that hee might bee redeemed. To conclude, wee may rather inferre from this place, that none who are giuen vnto Christ can perish or be lost, seeing our Sauiour saith plainely and without exception, that none giuen vnto him by his Father, are by him lost, but this Iudas the child of perdition, who was giuen to be his Apostle, but not to bee redeemed and saued, seeing this would haue directly crossed the prophecies of Holy Scriptures which foretold his destruction.

And these are the examples which are alleaged, and obiected against the certaintie of our perseuerance by Bellarmine, the great Goliah of the Romish Philistims.

§. Sect. 9. The example of the Israelites in the wilderneſſe.

Besides which some others are obiected to the same purpose by other men. As first the example of the Israelites in the wilderneſſe. From which they thus conclude:

All the Israelites in the wilderneſſe were indued with Faith, and were iustified and regenerate:

But some of them lost their Faith, fell from grace and perished:

Therefore some who are indued with Faith, justified and regenerate, may fall from grace and perish.

But if wee conclude their argument in right forme, it should be thus:

All the Israelites in the wilderneſſe lost their Faith, fell from grace and perished:

But some of them were indued with Faith, justified and regenerate:

Therefore some indued with Faith, iustified and regenerate, may fall from grace and perish.

But so let passe the forme I answere their argument, and deny that all the Israelites were indued with true Faith, iustified and sanctified. The which they endeuour to proue by the saying of the Apostle, 1. Cor. 10. 2. 3. 4. where it is said, that all the Israelites were baptized vnto Moses in the cloud, and in the sea, and did all eate the same spirituall meate, and drinke the same spirituall drinke, for they dranke of that rock which followed them, and that rocke was Christ. From which place they inferre: that seeing they did all feed of this spirituall meate, and drinke of this spirituall drinke, which could no otherwise bee done, but after a spirituall manner, namely, by a true Faith, that therefore they must needs haue this true Faith, whereby feeding vpon Christ, they were justified and sanctified. I answere, that by spirituall meate wee are to vnderstand the Manna, wherewith they were fed, and the water which issued out of the rocke, which were called spirituall, not onely because they were miraculously sent from heauen, and forced out of the rocke by vertue of Gods spirit; but also because they were types and sacraments of the spirituall nou-

risshment of our soules with the body and blood of Christ; euen as the bread and wine are said to be spirituall meate and drinke in the vse of the sacrament, not because they are so in their owne nature, but only as they are set apart for this spirituall vse, to nourish our soules vnto eternall life. Now howsoeuer many of the Israelites who were indued with Faith, did not onely receiue the outward signes of Manna and water, but also the things signified, namely, the body and blood of Christ, whereby they were spiritually nourished to life euerlasting: yet many of them did onely eate of this meate with their bodily mouthes, hauing no Faith to receiue Christ inwardly for the nourishment of their soules, and so receiued these outward spirituall signes to their further iudgement and condemnation. And this appeareth by Christs owne testimonie: Ioh. 6.49.50. where hee saith, that many of the Israelites did eate Manna in the wildernesse, that is, the outward elements onely with their bodily mouthes, and not the things signified thereby, namely, his body and blood; and therefore they died and perished both in body and soule; whereas contrariwise, those who eate of the spirituall bread of life, which came downe from heauen, they die not, but liue for euer. Yea, but it is said that they all did eate of the same spirituall meate, and did drinke of the same spirituall drinke, which came out of the spirituall rocke, which was Christ; I answere, that they did eate of the same spirituall meate indeed, but not after the same maner. For there is a twofold kind of eating: First, when as wee eate this spirituall meate the Sacrament, that is, the outward signes and elements in the Sacrament with our mouthes onely; and thus all the fathers were said to haue eaten the spirituall meate in the wildernesse, because they were all partakers of the outward signes: the other manner of eating this spirituall meat is, when as wee doe not onely receiue the outward signes with the bodily mouth, but also the things signified thereby, namely, the body and blood of Christ with the mouth of the soule, a true and liuely Faith, and thus many of the fathers in the wildernesse did not eate this spirituall meate, seeing they died and perished; whereas those who feede vpon the flesh of Christ, the bread of life, and drinke his blood spiritually by faith, they shall liue for euer as our Sauiour speaketh. Neither doth it helpe them at all, that it is said that this rocke whereof they dranke was Christ, | seeing wee are not hereby to vnderstand, that it was Christ himselfe, but onely a sacrament of his blood; it being vsuall in the Scriptures to call the signes by the name of the things signified.

Ioan. 6. 49. 50.

Sect. 10.

The second example obiected is of the Corinthians. From which they thus conclude:

The example of the Corinthians.

All the Corinthians were indued with true faith, iustified and sanctified:

But some of the Corinthians lost their faith, and fell from grace, for they committed sinnes which ouerthrow faith, and destroy the conscience, as namely, they liued in drunkennesse, they maintained fornication, they denied the resurrection, &c.

Therefore some hauing faith, and being iustified and sanctified, may lose their faith, and fall from grace.

To say nothing of the forme of this syllogisme, I answer vnto their argument, that as it cannot bee truely said in the generall, that all the Corinthians were indued with faith, iustified, and sanctified, so neither that all did liue in these sinnes, or maintaine that damnable heresie, that there should bee no resurrection: but some only were faithfull and iustified, and some other onely committed and maintained these sins. If therefore it bee generally said of all that they had faith, or that they fell from grace by maintaining these sinnes, it is vtterly false: if either bee affirmed but of some only, they doe not dispute ad idem, and so conclude nothing. Yea but the Apostle saith, 1. Cor. 6. that they were sanctified, iustified, and washed from their sinnes by Gods spirit. I answere, that he doth not say, all were, but some onely. Such were some of you, but you are washed, &c. But though it should bee granted that hee had said so of them all, as he calleth all at Rome Christians & Saints, and all at Galatia the sonnes of God; yet nothing would hereof follow. For to be iust and sanctified is taken two wayes; first, generally and improperly before men: secondly, spesially and properly before God. In the former respect men are said to bee just, and holy, when as they haue receiued the Sacrament of regeneration, and doe professe themselues members of the Church which is iustified and sanctified, and make shew of religion and outward sanctification; and this is before men, who call such just and holy in respect of their hope, and in the iudgement of charitie; in the other respect men are truly and properly said to be just and holy, in the sight and iudgement of God, when as they are so indeed and truth, and not in outward shew onely. The reason of this distinction is, that men cannot search the heart, and therefore according to the rule of charitie, must judge well of those who make a good shew, though they be hypocrites, if they haue not discouered their hypocrisie; but God seeth not as man seeth, but hee searcheth and trieth the very heart and reines. Now to applie this distinction, the Apostle being a man, and writing vnto men, speaketh not ac-according to the secret iudgement of God, but that professing themselues the Church and people of God, they were to be reputed in the iudgement of charitie iust and holy.

The third example obiected is of the Galathians, whom they affirme to haue had Faith and iustification, and afterwardes to haue lost this Faith, and falne from grace, because they were carried away with the doctrine of the false Apostles as though they had bene bewitched, as the Apostle affirmeth. This Obiection is all one with the former, and therefore I will not stand vpon it. Briefly I answere, that as all the Galathians were not iustified and indued with true Faith, so all did not imbrace the doctrine of the false Apostles. And therefore this accusation belonging properly to the Hypocrites and vnregenerate (although in respect of their societie and neere communion, it bee directed to the Church in generall, as being all of one bodie) doth not touch those who were indued with true Faith and regenerate, and consequently impugneth not their perseuerance.

Lastly, they obiect the example of Nicolas the Deacon, spoken of Act. 6. 5. from which they thus conclude:

Nicolas the Deacon lost his Faith, and fell from grace:

Nicolas the Deacon was iustified and regenerate:

Therefore some iustified and regenerate, lose their Faith, and fall from grace.

The Proposition they proue, because hee was the author and first founder of the wicked Heresies of those Heretikes, which after his name were called Nicolaitanes, whose doctrine, approoning spirituall and carnall whoredome, God hated, as appeareth, Apoc. 2. 15. I answer, that if this were the same Nicolas (which doth not appeare by any necessary proofe, but standeth onely vpon some probable conjecture) yet the Proposition is false, seeing he neuer had faith, nor was euer in the state of grace, and therefore could not lose that he neuer had, nor fall from that estate in which he neuer was. For had he euer bene truly iustified, then he should haue beene also glorified, as the Apostle speaketh, Rom. 8. 30. Had he been of the faithfull, hee would surely haue continued with them, and not departed from them by this single heresie, as Iohn affirmeth, 1. Ioh. 2. 19. But that hee was iustified and regenerate, they affirme and indeuour to proue by that testimony, Act. 6. 3. where the Apostles bid the Disciples chuse seuen men of honest report, and full of the Holy Ghost, and of wisdom, ouer their Deacons, who should minister vnto the poore. And accordingly they chose them, and among the rest this Nicolas. Therefore [illegible]

They who are full of the Holy Ghost, are iustified and sanctified:

Nicolas was full of the Holy Ghost: Ergo.

I answere that here by the Holy Ghost we are not to vnderstand the sanctifying Spirit of God, and the sauing graces thereof; but those common gifts of his holy Spirit, wherby he was fitted for that office and Function of a Deacon, vnto which hee was called; namely, wisdome, faithfulnesse, carefulnes, prouidence, loue to the poore, pitifulnesse, kindnesse and such like, all which are common to the vnregenerate with the regenerate. Secondly, though wee should grant that here is vnderstood Gods sanctifying graces, yet it followeth not that this Nicolas was indued with them. For the Spirit of God saith not, that these seuen Deacons elected were indued with Faith and the Holy Ghost (for he onely giueth this testimony vnto Stephen) but that the Apostles inioyned the Disciples to chuse such as in their iudgement were thus qualified. Now it is one thing to be full of the Holy Ghost, iustified, and sanctified in the iudgement of the Church, and another to bee so in the iudgement of God; for the Lord who searcheth the hearts and reines neuer erreth in his iudgement, but the Church iudging according to outward signes and effects, and according to the rule and direction, not of omniscience which they haue not, but of charitie which they ought to haue, iudgeth those indued with Gods holy Spirit iustified and sanctified, who make profession of Religion, and bring forth some outward fruits thereof; in which their iudgement they are as often mistaken and deceiued, as they haue to deale with cunning disguised Hypocrites, before they haue vnmasked themselues, and by their euill fruits discouered their Hypocrisie.

CHAP. XXI.

Reasons alleaged against the doctrine of perseuerance, answered.

AND thus haue I answered vnto such Obiections against the certaintie of perseuerance, as are grounded vpon examples. Now in the last place, I will propound their Reasons vsually alleaged to the same purpose; which I will answere briefly, because they may easily bee refuted by that which hath beene already said. First, then they reason thus: Sect. 1.

Iustifying Faith is an habite:

Therefore iustifying Faith may be lost.

I answere to the Proposition, that if it be true at all (as it is questionable) then only of naturall habits, which in processe of time are gotten by meanes industry and labour. But Faith is no naturall habit attained vnto by mans industry, but is the meere gift of God, infused into vs by his holy Spirit; in which we constantly perseuere vnto the end, not by the vertue, strength and nature of this habit of Faith in it selfe, but through the promised power of Gods assistance, and the intercession of Iesus Christ, against which the gates of Hell can neuer preuaile. Ephes. 3.8.

But they further confirme the former proposition by this reason:

Hee that doth an act of infidelitie, loseth the habit of Faith:

Hee that hath an habit of Faith may doe an act of infidelitie:

Therefore he that doth an act of infidelity loseth the habit of Faith.

§. Sect. 2. I deny the Proposition: for as we say, One Swallow maketh no Summer; one or two particular acts cannot destroy the habit, howsoeuer they interrupt it for the time. One cruell act doth not destroy the habit of clemencie and mercy, one fond act doth not ouerthrow an habite of wisdome, neither doth one act of intemperancy extinguish the habit of temperance; because the habit doth not depend vpon the act, but the act on the habit.

The second reason is thus concluded:

Many baptized in their infancie, when they come to age sinne grieuously, and so are damned:

All baptized in their infancie are predestinated vnto life, and by Baptisme receiue faith and are justified:

Therefore many predestinated vnto life, justified, and indued with faith, doe sin grieuously and are damned.

I answere that the assumption is manifestly false; for as our Sauiour saith, Many are called, but few chosen; that is, many there are who are outwardly called to bee members of the Church, entred thereinto by Baptisme, made partakers outwardly of the Word and Sacraments, but few of these belong either to Gods eternall election, or are effectually called and chosen to be members of the Church inuisible. Neither doth the outward receiuing of the Sacraments ex opere operato, by the deed done, confer grace, as the Papists falsly affirme, but onely to the true Beleeuer, who not onely receiues the outward signes, but also the things thereby signified by a liuely and justifying faith.

§. Sect. 3. The third reason is thus concluded:

If the elect cannot lose justifying faith, there could be in the world no Heretikes and Apostates: but there are in the World Heretikes and Apostates; therefore the elect may lose justifying faith. The consequence of the proposition they endeuour to proue, because this is the difference betweene Pagans and Heretikes, that Pagans neuer had faith, Heretikes haue had, but lost it. I answere, first, that the Proposition hath in it no force, vnlesse we presuppose that onely the elect become Heretikes, which is vtterly false. Neither is the proofe of the Proposition to any purpose, seeing their faith which distinguisheth Heretikes from Pagans is not a true justifying faith, but the doctrine of faith, which they hauing formerly professed afterwards denie. And in this sense they are said to haue departed from the faith, and to haue made shipwracke of faith, as before I haue shewed more at large, Chap. 18. Sect. 7.

§. Sect. 4. The fourth reason is, that if the elect may not fall away, then all admonitions and threatnings are in vaine. But vnto this Obiection I haue already answered, and therefore I will passe it ouer.

The fifth reason is thus concluded:

The opinion which brings desperation is not true:

But this opinion, that the elect cannot lose justifying faith, bringeth desperation:

Therefore this opinion that the elect cannot lose justifying faith is not true.

I answere to the assumption, that rather that opinion which teacheth vs that we may lose justifying faith, and that we can haue no certaintie of perseuerance bringeth desperation; for vncertaintie causeth doubting, and doubting desperation; and when our faith hath no firme ground to rest vpon, but flickereth and wauereth (as it were) in the aire, then at last being tired and wearied, it must needs faine and fall.

Yea but if our grace, faith, and justification cannot be true, vnlesse we be also certain, that we shall perseuere in them, then must this needs bring doubting and desperation, seeing we cannot be sure of future euents, and oftentimes doubt whether we shall perseuere in these graces or no. I answere, that if these future euents had no other ground but our owne will of power, they would certainly be vncertaine, but seeing their certaintie is grounded vpon the infallible promises, immutable loue & omnipotent power of God, we may as well be assured of them, as of any thing present. And howsoeuer we are often assaulted with doubting, and cannot assuredly determine of our perseuerance, when we looke vpon our own weakenes and frailtie, yet this followeth not, that our grace, faith, and justification are not true, if we doe not nourish this doubting, but labour and striue against it, and renew our assurance of faith by meditating vpon the infinite truth, power and goodnesse of God, and the mediation and intercession of Iesus Christ.

Lastly, it is obiected, that if they cannot fall from the grace of God, then God cannot bee angry with vs for our sinnes; for anger and loue will not stand together: but the latter is false, & therefore the former also.

I answere, that the consequent of the proposition is false; for loue is not opposed to anger, but to hatred. The Lord indeed is angry with the sinnes of his faithfull, and in his anger correcteth them; but this correction is not so much a punishment of the sinnepast, as a preuention of sinne to come. He is angry with them as a louing Father is angry with his Sonne, not in hatred but in loue, not to hurt or forsake them, but that by his just conceiued displeasure hee may restraine them from falling into the like sins, and so still retaine them as worthy to be beloued.

And thus haue I prooued the certaintie of our perseuerance, and also answered such obiections as are commonly suggested by Satan, and stiffely vrged by his wicked instruments the Popish rabble against this truth. And so by Gods gracious assistance I haue finished this Treatise containing the chiefe controuersies betweene Sathan and the true Christian. The which with all other my labours I commend to Gods blessing, who being the sole fountaine of all true comfort and consolation only is able by the assistance of his holy Spirit, to make them effectuall to the aduancing of those ends, for which I haue intended them: desiring the Christian Reader who shall finde fruit and profit by these my labours; that as I haue not beene wanting vnto him in my paines and best endeuours, so hee will not be wanting to remember mee in his prayers vnto Almightie God for the continuance, increase and holy vse of all his gifts and graces which he hath bestowed on me, so as it may be most for the aduancing of his glory, the benefit of his Church, and the furthering of mine owne saluation. To this God most wise, most gracious, and most infinite in all perfections, the Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghost, be ascribed all glory, prayse, power, and dominion, both now and euermore. Amen.

THE CHRISTIAN WARFARE.

THE SECOND PART.

OF THE CONFLICT OF THE CHRISTIAN WITH THE WORLD AND WORLDLY ENEMIES.

By J. BUNYAN.

Printed by WILLIAM STANSBY, 1693.

TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE SIR THOMAS EGERTON KNIGHT,

Baron of Elsmere, Lord High Chancellor of England, and one of his Majesties most Honorable Priuy Counsell, I. D. wisheth all grace and prosperitie in this life, and eternall happinesse in the life to come.

Hen I considered, Right Honourable, the great puissance, and preuailing strength, of these arch-enemies of our saluation, the world and worldly vanities, manifested in their daily conquests, not onely of those, who voluntarily yeeld at the first onset, & are willingly content to become their vassals and slaues, for the vncertaine tenure and base wages of earthly vanities; but also of such as hauing giuen their names to Christ, by receiuing his Sacrament, professed themselues to bee his Souldiers and seruants, and that amongst other enemies, they would valiantly fight his battailes, against the World, and worldly lusts: who notwithstanding their oath and promise, either yeeld subjection to the World vpon the offer of earthly profits, pleasures, and preferments, or stand in a cold neutralitie, desiring to doe service to the World and God too; but without all indifferencie, seeing hee hath onely the seruice of their lips, and some outward deuotions, meerely complementall, and ceremoniall; whereas the other master hath the seruice of their hearts, and all their care, labours, and painfull indeuours imployed about him. And when as I saw the glorious Trophees of the Worlds Victories erected, not onely in euery corner of the Common-wealth, but euen in the Temple and Church of God, to his great dishonour, and the disgrace of his true Religion; I thought I could not spend my strength in a better quarrell, than in opposing against this enemie of our saluation; to the end, that I might abate his preuailing forces, and weaken the very sinewes of his strength, wherein he most glorieth and triumpheth; by shewing that the wages of iniquitie whereby he inticeth men to leaue Gods Standard, and to fight vnder his colours, is but base and counterfeit coine, beeing examined by the touch-stone of Gods Truth, and therefore not to be receiued of a Christian for good pay; much

leſſe to be preferred before that Crowne of Victory, euerlaſting Glory, and thoſe al-ſufficient treaſures of our heauenly Kingdome, which God promiſeth to all thoſe who fight his battailes, and valiantly ouercome. Neither did I thinke that I could more profitably ſpend my ſtudies in any other argument, eſpecially in theſe times, wherein the loue of the World ſo greatly preuaileth, that with Demas men daily fall from the profeſsion of Gods Truth, and imbrace the World, hauing onely ſo much loue of Religion, as the loue of the World worketh in them; and either not ſeruing God at all, or only that they may ſerue their owne turnes, in worldly and carnall reſpects. For if by plaine teſtimonies of holy Scriptures, and by effectuall reaſons (as it were a Proclamation ſent from the great King of Heauen and Earth) I could cry downe the high rates and prices of theſe baſe and Copper Coynes, and bring them to their owne value; by ſhewing that there is no excellencie and true worth in them, but onely as they ſerue for the preſent neceſsitie of our earthly ſtate, and to furniſh vs in our trauaile towards our heauenly Countrie; then would there many and great benefits be hereby deriued vnto vs. For if wee could contemne the World and worldly vanities, as things of ſmall worth, then would they not be as heauy clogs to hinder vs from running the Chriſtian race, and from aſcending in our meditations into Gods Kingdome, to take poſſeſsion for the preſent of our heauenly inheritance with our minds and thoughts, till our ſoules and bodies doe come thither: then would we not ſuffer them to take vp all our cogitations, care, ſtudie, and labour, about the getting or preſeruing them, ſo as wee haue little or no time left to performe ſeruice vnto God; or if at all wee doe it, yet with much diſtraction and perturbation: then would the tentations of the Deuill haue no power to draw vs into ſinne, wanting this wages of iniquitie, and theſe alluring baits, wherewith he inticeth vs to come into his nets of perdition For who would ſerue Satan for nought, or for ſuch things as hee contemneth, or but lightly valueth, leauing the ſeruice of his Creatour and Redeemer, and thereby hazarding the eternall loſſe of thoſe heauenly excellencies which hee hath promiſed vnto his ſeruants in the life to come? Then ſhould we haue a true golden age, free from all Oppreſsion, Bribing, Extortion, Fraude, Wrongs, Diſſenſions, Treaſons, Rebellions, and innumerable other outrages, which are cauſed and occaſioned through the immoderate loue of theſe earthly things; and perfect loue and charitie being entertained amongſt men, they would ſtriue who ſhould exceed other in all good and Chriſtian duties, louing vertue and goodneſſe for their owne ſakes: then would not thoſe who abound with theſe worldly things be euer the prouder, or with ſcornfull inſolence ouerlooke their Brethren; for who is proud of that which he contemneth? Neither would thoſe that want them be much troubled, hauing for the preſent Gods better gifts, euen his ſanctifying and ſauing graces, and for the time to come farre more excellent hopes, life eternall, and the vnſpeakable joyes of Gods glorious Kingdome. For who bewaileth the want, or lamenteth the loſſe of thoſe things which he lightly eſteemeth, eſpecially hauing both in poſſeſsion and hope, ſuch things as are of farre greater worth and excellencie? Finally, if we were perſwaded to contemne the World and worldly vanities, and highly to eſteeme of the joyes of Heauen, then would we not feare the approch of death, but bid it welcome with a cheerefull countenance? ſeeing it taketh vs from the things which we doe not much regard, and entreth vs into the poſſeſsion and fruition of our better hopes; euen a Kingdome matchleſſe, and glory endleſſe. Whereas contrariwiſe, when theſe worldly things be ouer-valued, and too much loued and deſired, they wholly take vp mens meditations, and diſable them for Gods ſeruice, they lay them open to Satans tentations, and make them readie to perpetrate and commit any wickedneſſe, which may further them to the obtaining of the things which they affect; neither is there any ſtop in the way to hinder their headlong courſe in ſinne, vnleſſe it be when their worldly deſires doe croſſe one another. They puffe men vp with pride when they enjoy them, and conſume them with griefe and diſcontent when they want them: and to conclude, they make death moſt terrible, becauſe it plucketh them violently from theſe delights, vnto which their hearts are faſt glued, and forceth them to leaue the things which they dearely loue hauing no assurance or hope of a better life. For the auoiding of all which euils, and for the furthering and aduancing of the former benefits, I haue laboured in this argument, euen about my strength, God shewing his power in my weakneſſe, and casting my desire to supply that which was wanting in my health. Of which my labours I haue chosen your Lordship for Patron, partly to shew my loue and dutie vnto you, from whom I haue had, both all the meanes of my maintenance which I enjoy, wherewith I haue beene enabled to labour, and opportunitie to exercise that poore talent which I haue receiued from my great Lord and Master: and partly because I thought, I could not dedicate vnto you a Booke of a fitter argument, wherein your selfe may at your best leasure meditate; seeing on the one side the greatnesse of your place, and height of your Honours and preferments may (without your greater vigilance and circumspection) incline your affections too much to the loue of these earthly things, and on the other side your age is not likely in course of nature to allow vnto you any long possession of these momentanie things. In regard of both which, your Honour cannot bee too well armed against the immoderate loue of these worldly vanities, nor haue your heart too much inflamed with that diuine loue of Heauen, and those most glorious ioyes in Gods presence, which you shall inherit for euermore; because hereby you shall injoy Gods blessings more securely whilest you haue them, when as your heart is not so fixed on them but that you can be content to leaue them; and part with them also with joy and comfort, when as you are assured, that you shall exchange them for those heauenly ioyes and rich treasures of Gods glorious Kingdome, which infinitely exceed all earthly preferments in worth and excellencie. Which if my poore labours, added to your better helps, and holy meditations, might any way further, I should much more reioyce in being a poore instrument of your spirituall good, than in the injoying of those earthly benefits which I haue receiued from you.

The Lord more and more inrich your noble heart with all spirituall and sauing grace, and after a long and happy life on earth, vouchsafe vnto yuo the euerlasting fruition of his glorious presence, and that fulnesse of joy which is at his right hand for euermore.

Amen.

Your Honours in all humble

John Downame.

To the Christian Reader.

THe Christian mans life is a continuall warfare, wherein he is daily assaulted (I know not whether, with greater subtiltie or furie, policie or power) by three puissant Enemies, the Deuill, the World, and the Flesh; euery one of which haue many Legions vnder their conduct, which are readie to second and succour them, when they giue signe of battaile. The Deuill is the grand Captaine, and Generall of all these forces; the World and the Flesh, are chiefe Commanders vnder him, who haue many Millions of spirituall Enemies vnder their Ensignes, that continually fight against vs. Sathan ordereth the battaile, and guideth all these forces to his best aduantage, and our ruine; the World ministreth vnto him weapons and munition, whereby this fight is maintained; and the Flesh like a wicked Traitour openeth the gates of our soules when we are assaulted, and receiuing the pay of worldly vanities, ioyneth with these externall forces to worke our finall ouerthrow. The issue of this fight is either their, or our victorie; the former is accompanied with the Deuils triumph, and our perpetuall captiuitie and thraldome in the chaines of darkenesse; yea, with the most exquisite and ineffable torments of Hell fire: the other, with the crowne of victory which our great Commander, the Lord of Hosts, hath promised to those that ouercome; euen that superexcellent and eternall waight of glory reserued in the highest Heauens.

1. Cor. 4. 17.

The consideration whereof, as it should moue all Christians valiantly to fight the Lords battailes, to forget all labour, and to contemne all danger, especially seeing they haue the power of God to assist them, and his gracious promise, that if they will be his Souldiers, they shall also be Conquerours; if they will but fight, they shall assuredly ouercome: so also should it incite all Gods faithfull Ministers, who are appointed by him to be in this spirituall warfare, not onely Souldiers, to fight in their owne persons, but also the Lords Captaines to teach, guide and direct, both by word and example, those who are committed to their charge, yea as much as in them lieth the whole Armie of the Church Militant; that they also be carefull and diligent to teach the ignorant the Lords march, the discipline of his warre, the order of his battailes, and how to manage their spirituall weapons for their best aduantage: that they likewise incourage and hearten the white-liuered, and fresh-water Souldier to the fight; that they rouze vp the sluggish, by often sounding in their eares the terrible thunder of Gods threats, and the sweete tunes of his promises; that they moderate the heate, and mitigate and restraine the desperate boldnes of those, who are ouer-carried in their blind Zeale, with spirituall wisdome and discretion, which are otherwise apt in themselues to be intrapped with the subtiltie, and to fall into the ambushments of their Enemies, to their vtter ruine and destruction.

Being therefore called through Gods vndeserued grace to this function, I thought it my dutie, besides my other labours in my Ministery, to attempt this worke; the which I acknowledge might haue been much better atchieued by some of the Lords great Worthies, vnto the least degree of whose strength and excellencie I haue not attained: but being by them either omitted, or but by the way, as some speciall occasion required, briefly touched; I thought it better, notwithstanding my great weakenesse to vndertake it, than that it should be wholly neglected; and by doing in this the Lords businesse what I could doe, to put others in mind who are of greater abilitie, what they should doe; drawing them on by my example to perfect that, which I haue but rudely attempted; wherein my poore labours shall but serue as foiles, to shew the greater glory of their surpassing excellencies, and but as course wares, to make their finer stuffes more saleable and commendable. And hauing hauing through Gods assistance finished and set forth the first part of this Christian Warfare, wherein I haue laid open the subtiltie, power, politicke stratagems, and pernicious temptations of Satan our grand Enemy; and withall haue armed and furnished the weake Christian with such meanes and spirituall weapons, as may by the blessing and assistance of Gods holy Spirit strengthen him in the incounter, repell the enemy, and obtaine victory; and hauing found that the Worke, like course meat in the time of a great dearth, hath beene esteemed of many hungry soules aboue desert, their necessitie, and not any selfe excellencie, giuing worth vnto it, and making it, though in it selfe but homely fare, pleasing and acceptable to their sharpened appetites: I haue the rather beene incouraged to set vpon the second part of this Warfare, and to arme the Christian against all those assaults, which the second Enemy of our saluation, the World, assaileth him with, which as the following discourse and the experience of all times sufficiently shew, are no lesse dangerous and pernicious then the other. And because I hold a strange paradox in the conceit of worldly men, maintaining that these earthly things are base and of little worth, and therefore to be contemned or lightly valued, which they so much magnifie in their iudgements, adhere vnto in their hearts and affections, and both get and keepe with so great care and labour, and lose with such bitter griefe; I thought it fit (besides my wonted order) not onely plentifully to confirme this Truth by the holy Scriptures, but also to alleage the sayings of the godly learned, and ancient Fathers, who haue liued in former ages, to shew the conformitie of our iudgements, and our vnanimous consent in expounding those places of holy Scriptures, which serue for the cleering and proouing of those points, for which I alleage them; lest perhaps mine owne Writings and Assertions might seeme to haue proceeded out of some melancholicke or discontented humour, which might make me to contemne the World, because it hath alwayes contemned me, and so carrie no credit with them, if I were not backed with their better authoritie. And to the same purpose, I haue also more plentifully then is my vsuall custome, alleaged the sayings of the wisest Heathens, and most learned Philosophers; because hauing to deale with carnall Worldlings, who notwithstanding make shew and profession of Christian Religion, I might more and perswade them, if not in the feare of God, and for conscience sake, yet at least for shame to assent vnto that Truth, vnto which Pagans and Infidels haue yeelded and subscribed, who haue had no other knowledge to guide them, but the light of nature. The which my labours, I humbly submit to the graue censure of the iudicious, learned, and godly Reader: the which I hope to find more fauourable; because my errours may more iustly be excused, seeing I doe not trauell in a path beaten by others, who haue gone before me, but in an vncouth and vnusuall way, where I haue not had the tract of other mens steps for my direction; there being none that I know of, especially of our Countrimen, that haue purposely laboured in this argument. The Lord blesse these and all other my labours, that they may be powerfull and effectuall, for the aduancement of his glory, the good of his Church, and the comfort and edification of all the particular members thereof, who shall haue any vse of my poore Ministery; that being armed and strengthened hereby, against the politicke furie, and powerfull cunning of our spirituall Enemies, they may obtaine a full and finall victory ouer them, and also the Crowne of victorie, euerlasting glory, and happinesse in Gods Kingdome. Amen.

THE CHRISTIAN WARFARE,

The second Part.

CONTAYNING DIVERS ARGUMENTS, WHEREBY WEE MAY BE ARMED against the tentations of prosperitie, and perswaded to contemne worldly Vanities, in comparison of GODS spirituall GRACES and heauenly IOYES.

The first Booke.

Of the World, the second enemy of our saluation, and what it is.

THere is none shall bee thought fit to raigne with Iesus Christ in the kingdome of heauen, but those who haue beene conquerors here on earth; not of some small countrey or petite kingdome, for that great glory shall neuer be the crowne of so meane a victorie; nor (like Alexander) of the greatest part of the earths knowne territories; for so a man may attaine to the height of this glory, and yet remaine a slaue to his owne passions and ambitious lusts, and be a vassall after his victorie to that which hee seemeth to haue ouercome. But he who will raigne with Christ, must conquer the whole world, not with the sword and arme of flesh, but with the spirit of God, and the shield of Faith, whereby hee repelleth all the tentations thereof; both the charming allurements whereby he might be infeebled, and the fiery darts of affliction and persecution, whereby hee might bee discouraged; neither so admiring the one, nor regarding the other, as that he should suffer them to hinder him in his way to his heauenly countrie. Yea he must together with the world ouercome the prince of the world, and all the power of hell; and which is a victorie of greatest difficultie, hee must ouercome himselfe, and his owne corruptions; which conquest whosoeuer obtaineth, hee putteth to flight these forraine forces at the first onset: whereas contrariwise it is in vaine to haue warres abroad, if in stead of peace and subiection there be nothing but treason, discord, and rebellion at home; these inbred enemies being alwayes readie to betray and lose, that which is recouered and wonne with great paine and difficultie, and to yeeld yeeld into the enemies power in a day, that which hath beene got with a yeeres labour.

Q. Sect. 2. That the world is sometime taken in good part, and so to be loued as a friend.

Concerning the meanes of resisting and ouercomming our first and chiefe enemy Satan, I haue already intreated in the first part of my Christian Warefare: And now it remaineth, that being assisted with the same spirit, wee encounter also the world, which is the second enemie of our saluation, and teach the weake Christian how he may so manage his spirituall weapons, as that he may be assured of a triumphant victorie. But least whilest we fight against our enemie, wee should bend our strength against those that bee our friends, because they are intitled by the same name, let vs learne to distinguish the one from the other, and consider in what sense wee are here to take the world, which is a word of ambiguous signification, and how it is to bee imbraced as a friend, and how to bee auoided or withstood as a mortall enemie. To this purpose wee are to know, that the world in the Scriptures is sometimes taken in a good, and sometime in an euill sense. In the former it sometime signifieth the whole vniuerse and goodly frame of heauen and earth, and so it is an excellent creature of Gods making, approued as good by his owne testimonie, whereby the glory, wisedome and power of the mightie Creator is manifested and declared, according to that of the Psalmist: The heauens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth the work of his hands. Sometime it signifieth the whole earth and sea, which is appointed of God to bee the place of habitation for his creatures, in both which senses it is taken, Iohn 1. 10. He was in the world, and the world was made by him: and in this signification also the world is good, sauing, onely that it is defiled with mans sinne, as being the stage whereon hee acteth all his wickednesse. To this purpose one saith, that the world is said to lie wholly in euill, not because it selfe is euill, but because euills are committed in it by men: euen as the woods are infamed when they harbour theeues, and as wee hate the sword wherewith mans blood hath beene shed, and the cup in which poyson hath beene tempered, not because of any faultinesse that is in them, but because of their wickednesse who haue abused them vnto euill. Sometime the world is taken for all mankind that liueth in the world, both good and bad, beleeuer and infidell; and in this sense the Apostle saith, that by one man sinne entred into the world, that is, into all mankinde, who were corrupted in Adam as sinning in his loynes. Neither are we to hate and fight against the world, being vnderstood in this generall signification, least wee should be found (like that currish Timon) haters of humane societie, and enemies of our owne nature. Finally, the world sometime signifieth the faithfull onely; not because they are of the world, for being in the world, Christ hath chosen them out of the world; but because the world was created, and is continually preserued for their vse and benefit, namely, that it might serue as a place of triall, where they should be fitted for Gods kingdome, & a passage through which they might trauell into their heauenly country, the new Ierusalem. And in this sense it is said, that God so loued the world, that hee gaue his onely begotten sonne, that whosoeuer beleeued in him should not perish, but haue euerlasting life. And the Apostle saith, that God was in Christ and reconciled the world vnto himselfe, not imputing their sinnes vnto them. And Christ is said, to be a propitiation or reconciliation, not for the Apostles and Disciples onely, but for the sinnes of the whole world, that is, for all in the world that shall beleeue in him. Now in this sense wee are not to fight against the world, seeing it is reconciled and at peace with God, nor to loath that which God so dearely loueth: yea wee must loue those who are of this world, as our selues, as being subjects of Christs kingdome, and fellow members of his body.

Q. Sect. 3. In what sense the world is to be reputed our enemy.

But this word is also taken in the Scriptures in euill part, and that most vsually, and so it signifieth sometime reprobate, wicked, and vnbeleeuing men, who hauing yeelded themselues ouer, as voluntarie slaues vnto Satan, for the wages of worldly vanities, willingly yeeld obedience vnto him as their Prince and soueraigne, and submit themselues to be ruled by the Law of sin, imprinted by him in their corrupt natures, which is flatly opposed to the Law of nature, written in the hearts of our first parents, and afterwards in the tables of stone, by the finger of God, opposing with all their malice, power and policie, against God, and the kingdome of Iesus Christ, hindring as much as in them lieth the profession, increase and propagation thereof, and hating, enuying, and persecuting those, who will not bee allured by any worldly baite to renounce the seruice of Christ, and to ioyne with them in the seruice of sinne and Satan. And thus the world is taken, Iohn 15. 19. If yee were of the world, the world would loue his owne, but because yee are not of the world, but I haue chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. And 16. 20. Yee shall weepe and lament, but the world (that is, the wicked of the world) shall reioyce. And this is that world, which the Apostle Iohn saith lieth wholly in wickednesse, and is therefore excluded by our Sauiour Christ from hauing any part in his prayers, or benefit by his mediation: Ioh. 17. 9. I pray for them them, I pray not for the world. Now these are called the world, because they are the worlds citizens, which minde only worldly things, and setting their hearts and affections vpon the earth and earthly vanities, doe in comparison thereof contemne God and his kingdome.

Sometime by the world are signified worldly things, which Satan and wicked men vse as meanes to draw men from the seruice of God, to the seruice of sinne, whether they bee alluring baits whereby they intice vnto wickednesse, as pleasures, profits and preferments; or discouragements, whereby they seeke to dishearten and hinder them in the way of godlines, as troubles, afflictions, and persecutions.

And sometime both these are ioyned together, in which sense the Apostle Paul saith, that he was crucified to the world, and the world to him; where by world he vnderstandeth whatsoeuer in the world, whether men or other creatures, are opposed to the kingdome of Christ, all which were as little valued by this holy Apostle, as a crucified or dead man esteemeth of the things of the liuing. And so the Apostle Iohn ioyneth them, though not in the same word, yet in the same sentence, 1. Iob. 2. 15. Loue not the world, nor the things of the world. And thus wee will take the world in this discourse; vnderstanding thereby whatsoeuer in the world, either in its own nature, or through abuse, alloreth vs to the seruice of sin and Satan; or discourageth and hindreth vs in the seruice of God, and the meanes of our owne saluation; whether it bee wicked men, or the creatures abused by Satan and our corruption, as occasions and motiues vnto euill. Or more briefly thus: whatsoeuer in the world is the instrument of the diuell, to draw vs vnto sinne.

Whereby it appeareth that wee are not to oppose against, as our enemies, and to pursue with our hatred, wicked men in the world absolutely, or as they are men, but respectiuely as they are wicked, and hating their sinfulnesse, yea we ought to loue their persons, as being the creatures of God in respect of their essence, who haue in them (how wicked soeuer) some good naturall parts, and common gifts of the spirit which precious pearles are to bee valued euen when they are found in these filthie dunghils. And as our hatred ought not to bee generall and absolute in respect of the obiect, so in respect of the quality it should not be deadly and malicious, but it must bee mixed and sweetned with compassion and commiseration, yea with sorrow of heart, that they are no better, and with a desire of their conuersion and amendment, that so enmity ceasing they might become worthy of our loue. Our hatred must like (our Sauiour Christs anger) be ioyned with holy mourning, because their hearts are so hardned in sinne; and though wee are to esteeme them enemies, yet our eyes (like Dauids) must gush out with riuers of waters, because they haue not kept Gods Law. The like also may be said of all other creatures in the world, abused by Satan and his wicked imps, as baits to allure vs vnto sinne; which are to be contemned and loathed, not in their owne nature, but in respect of the abuse onely, as afterwards shall appeare. Psal. 119. 136.

CHAP. II.

Of the nature and quality of our enemie the world.

AND thus haue I shewed what the world is, and as it were haue singled our enemies out of the company of our friends; least our loue of these should slacken and abate our zealous courage in opposing against our mortall foes; or our hatred of those should make vs to dislike and hate our wel-deseruing friends. In the next place we wil consider of the nature and quality of our enemie; and then shew his weapons and forces which hee vseth in this fight, that so we may know the better how to auoid his furie, and to arme our selues against the encounter. And for the cleering of the former wee will briefly shew what the world is in it selfe, and then respectiuely what it is to vs. In it selfe, the Scripture saith of it, that it is euill, yea so euil, that Christ Iesus spared not to giue his owne most precious blood, to deliuer his seruants out of this spirituall Egypt: and least wee should thinke that this euill hath but a little tainted it, or that it is corrupted but in part only, the Apostle Iohn telleth vs, that the whole world lieth in wickednesse, not a little sprinkled or dipped, but sourced and sunke into a deepe and bottomlesse gulfe of sinne. The which will more manifestly appeare if wee consider that this wicked world, like a rebellious traitor, hath denied and refused to haue the Lord and great Creator of heauen and earth for his Soueraigne and King, and will not yeeld any obedience vnto his Lawes and commandements, but contemneth his promises and rewards, as also his threatnings and punishments. And contrariwise hath submitted himselfe to Satan as his prince and gouernour, yeelding obedience vnto his will, and subiecting himselfe to be ruled by the Law of sin, for the wages of worldly vanities, as pleasures, profits, and preferments. Wherof it is that in the Scriptures the diuel is called the [a] prince of the world, and the [b] gouernour thereof; not because he is indeed the the ruler and gouernour of heauen and earth, to dispose of all at his pleasure (for this is Gods royall prerogatiue, whose slaue and vassall Satan is, and forced to doe his will when hee most oppoſeth it) but because hee ruleth in the children of disobedience, hauing them alwayes [c] ready as his deuoted bondslaues to doe his will: who are called the world, because they set their hearts and affections vpon it; it being the nature of loue to transforme as much as may be the lover into the nature of the thing beloued, and so to denominate the one according to the name of the other. Yea he not only as a king ruleth their outward actions, but also in their hearts and consciences, causing them to yeeld vnto him free, willing and absolute obedience: and therefore he is also called the god of the world, who with his mists of falsehood blindeth the eyes of infidels and worldings, so as they cannot see his vgly filthinesse and palpablelies, nor the diuine purity and excellencie of their Creator, and the glorious light of his truth.

¶. Sect. 2. That the world fighteth vnder Satan against God.

And as the world yeeldeth this subiection vnto Satan as his king and soueraigne, so also it maketh choice of him for his captaine and chiefe commender, receiuing his colours and cognizance, marching vnder his conduct, and fighting vnder his standerd with like inueterate malice, both against God himselfe, and all his Church and children. Against God the world oppoſeth with such deadly and implacable hatred, that it is impossible for any to a adhere vnto the world, but hee must necessarily bee diuided from God; nor [b] serue it, but he must neglect and disobey the Lord; nor [c] loue it, but God and he must bee at enmitie. Neither doth it onely, oppose against the diuine nature, but also against euery person of the Deitie; it rebelleth against God the Father and Creator, by refusing to serue him as his creature, but contrariwise disobeyeth his will, and desperately reiecteth all his commandements, yeelding voluntary obedience to his archenemie the diuell; it [d] receiueth not the Son Jesus Christ as its Sauiour and Redeemer, but treadeth vnder foote his precious blood, and maketh but a mocke of all his sufferings; neither doth it [e] receiue the holy Ghost the sanctifier, but checketh all his motions, and scorneth all his sanctifying and sauing graces, preferring before them worldly toyes and base vanities of no value. Needs therefore must the world be exceeding wicked, which submitteth it selfe to bee ruled and guided by that wicked one Satan; needs must it bee outragiously euill, which purposely and malitiously oppoſeth it selfe against God the author and fountaine of all goodnesse.

¶. Sect. 3. That the world

And thus we see what our enemie is in himselfe: now to vs he is exceeding dangerous; for hee is so malitiously subtile, so treacherously cruell, and armed with such forces and power, that vnlesse the Christian man bee well fitted with the spirituall armour, and mightily strengthened and defended with the spirit of God, hee is sure either to bee vanquished and ouercome, or else to receiue shamefull foyles. This danger is by one thus described: There (saith hee) is the world, whereas there is much malice, little wisedome, where all things are slimie and catching, all things slimie and slipperie, all things couered with darknesse, and beset with snares; where soules are endangered and bodies afflicted, where all is vanitie and affliction of spirit. Another saith, that the world is pitch, which defileth those who come neere it with the least touch. It is birdlime, which intangleth his admirers with sin and eternall death; it is a snare, which with his pleasures and riches, as it were offered baits, alloreth and catcheth vnwarie men, and draweth them with it into the net of destruction. And therefore impossible it seemeth to bee that hee can liue according to the Lawes of the world, should passe away hence pure and vndefiled from the filth of the world. In respect of which danger the world is fitly compared to a perillous sea, in which howsoeuer some escape shipwrack, yet none escapeth danger. For with vaine hopes as with a prosperous gale of winde, men are allured to hoyse vp the sailes of their desires, and to enter into this perillous passage and course of worldlings, but before they can arriue at the wished hauen, they encounter a thousand desperate dangers; one while they are tossed with tempestuous stormes of troubles, crosses, and vexations; sometime lifted vp with their hopes, as though they should touch the Heauens; sometime deiected and cast down with feare, as though they should bee swallowed in the gulfe and (as it were) Hell of despaire; now they are in danger to dash against the rockes of violence and oppression, and soone after to split their ship vpon the sands of treacherie and falsehood: sometimes they are carried into an vncouth vastnes in hazard to lose themselues in the bywaies of error, vnlesse following the aduice of their skilfull Pilots, Gods messengers and Ministers, they suffer themselues to be guided and directed with the Card of Gods word: sometime they are driuen into the straits, where they are beset with perils, heere Scylla, there Charybdis, being ready to fall into the one, whilest with improuident care they auoid the other. Which being passed, their danger is not past; for though the storme, rocks, and sands spare them, yet are they beset with ten thousand wicked fiends, which like cruell pirats are ready to rob them of all those rich wares of Gods spirituall graces, and to enchaine them in

in their galleys of endlesse bondage. But say they are not encountred with these rough dangers of troubles and crosses, say that they haue a faire calme of prosperitie, and a comfortable sun-shine of worldly fauours; surely howsoeuer their securitie may be much more, yet their danger is not abated, yea rather it is much increased. For being thus encalmed, they haue neither power nor will to go forward to the blessed hauen of eternall happinesse, but contrariwise being bewitched with those Syrens songs of carnall-alluring pleasures, they cast themselues headlong into the gulfe of perdition, they now deuouring them which before allured them. This danger by another is thus expressed: This world (saith he) is to Christians a dangerous sea: for as the sea being stirred with aduerse stormes doth mount aloft, and vanisheth a tempest to the passengers: so the world being moued with the conspiracie of wicked men, doth trouble the mindes of the faithfull; and with such diuersitie is this effected by the enemie, that a man can hardly know what is first to bee auoided: for if higher powers cease to oppose, it exasperateth the mindes of priuate men against vs; if their rage be also appeased, it setteth all on fire by those who are of a mans owne familie; and if this also be quieted, by his ure bee setteth discord betweene brethren and neere kindred, that so tempestuously beating vpon the house on euery of the foure corners, he may on one side or other cause a ruine. For which cause it is with one consent to be fled from of all Christians, &c. And this he inforceth elsewhere: Flee (saith hee) the sea of the world, and thou shalt not need to feare shipwracke, &c. In the sea when as the windes rage, though all bee not cast away, yet all are subiect to great danger.

But how dangerous this enemie is, it will better appeare, if wee doe consider the will and abilitie, the malice and power thereof; which if they bee in an high nature and degree ioyned together, the perill must needs bee out of measure perillous.

Concerning the malice of this enemie, it is exceeding great and vnreconcilable, inueterate and perpetuall. For as taking part with our arch-enemie Satan, it malitiously opposeth against God, so also against all those who professe themselues his children and seruants. And as the Libbard so hateth man, that with furious malice it will flie vpon his picture or image, so this Serpents brood the world, as it maligneth God himselfe, so also with like hate it pursueth those in whom the image of God is repaired. And as with outragious malice and deadly outrage it persecuted our head Iesus Christ, so with equall furie it rageth against all the true members of his body. Of this our Sauiour gaue vs warning, Iohn 15. 18. If the world hate you, you know that it hated mee before you. 19. If ye were of the world, the world would loue his owne; but because ye are not of the world, but I haue chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. 20. Remember the word that I said vnto you, the seruant is not greater than his Master. If they haue persecuted me, they will persecute you also. And this appeareth by continuall experience euen from the beginning of the world. Caine a wicked worldling persecuteth and murthereth his religious brother Abel, as soone as hee saw that God respected him. The sonnes of men with giant-like furie oppresse the sonnes of God, the Sodomities maligne holy Lot, Ismael persecuteth Isaac, Esau Iacob, the idolatrous Egyptians cruelly oppresse Israel, the people and Church of God, with more than barbarous furie, Saul pursueth Dauid, Iesabel the true Prophets, the Heathenish Gentiles the Church of the Iewes; the Scribes and Pharisees, Christ and his Apostles, and the vnbeleeuing Pagans, the beleeuing Christians. In a word, there was neuer any escaped, but assoone as they haue beene friends with God, they were presently accounted the worlds enemies; and no sooner doth God receiue them into fauour, but the world pursueth them with malice and hatred.

Q. Sect. 4. That the world is a subtill enemie. Luke 16. 8.

But as the world is exceeding malitious, and therefore willing; so also it is very powerfull, and therefore able to hurt vs, seeing neither policie nor strength is wanting vnto it; for the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of the light, as the wisest of men, and wisedome of God, giueth testimonie; and a thousand cunning sleights they haue to deceiue vs, and tenne thousand subtill policies to betray and circumuent vs. So that Christian wisedome which dares not exceed the bounds of simplicitie and truth, seemeth vnto them doltish sottishnes, and silly foolishnesse; and in regard of their aduantages of dissimulation, lying and base treachcrie, it were most easie for them to ouermatch and goe beyond them, did not the Lord by his infinite wisdome and power defeate their policies, and conuert the wisedome of these Ahitophels into meere foolishnes.

Q. Sect. 6. That the world is a powerfull enemie in regard of its own strength.

So also it is exceeding strong both in its owne strength, and in respect of the great forces which our owne corrupt flesh doth minister vnto it. In it selfe it is so puissant, that Satan maketh choice of it as his chiefe champion to fight against vs; it is his right hand wherewith he striketh vs; it is the armorie which affoordeth vnto him all those mortall weapons wherewith hee woundeth vs; it is the treasurie which yeeldeth vnto him all that wages whereby hee hireth vs to offend God, and all those alluring baites wherewherewith hee inticeth vs vnto sin: neither could Satan hurt vs with his sharpe hookes of Hellish tentations, vnlesse they were couered with the sweete baites of wordly vanities; hee could not get vs stoope, and intangle our selues in his nets and limetwigs of sinne and wickednesse, vnlesse he vsed stales in our owne likenes, and betraied vs by the example and perswasions of men like vnto our selues. Thus he inticed Eue with a faire apple, the sonnes of God with the beautie of the daughters of men, Lot with the pleasures of Sodom, Achan with the wedge of gold, the chiefe of the Iewes with the glory of the world: yea in these haires of worldly vanities his strength so mainly lieth, that when he was to vse all his policie, and imploy all his forces, to get the victorie of the Sonne of God himselfe, hee maketh choice of these worldly weapons, and inticeth him to sinne by offering vnto him the baites of worldly necessaries, honours and preferments; with which when hee could not ouercome, hee fleeth from him as despairing of victorie. So that wee may here learne, that Satans chiefe strength consisteth in the worlds aides, and that in the conflict of tentations hee will flee when the world cannot ouercome, as despairing of the conquest when his chiefe forces faile him.

Matth.4.11.

Neither doth Satan with his owne foule hands offer vnto vs these baits and bribes to allure vs vnto sinne, but hee chuseth as his messengers and deputies those who are in our owne likenesse, and couered with the same flesh. He inticeth chast Ioseph to commit vncleannes, by the perswasions of his wanton Mistresse; the Israelites to filthinesse, by the wicked Moabites; the people of God to Idolatrie, by the example of the cursed nations, and Salomon by his outlandish wiues. Whereby it commeth to passe that his counsailes haue more free audience, his perswasions greater authority, and his gifts wherewith hee allureth vs to commit sinne, are lesse suspected and mistrusted. By all which it plainely appeareth that the worlds forces are not weake, seeing in them consisteth Satans chiefe strength, and that his power and policies are not securely to bee contemned, seeing our arch-enemie the diuell placeth in them his chiefe confidence for the obtaining of victory.

But no little are these forces strengthened for our ouerthrow, through the aide and helpe which our owne corrupt flesh ministreth vnto them. For as the world is Satans wildfire, wherewith he inflameth vs; so our flesh is the tinder which receiueth and nourisheth this fire, as soone as it is cast into it; and such a neere league of friendship there is betweene our flesh and worldly vanities, that Satan can bee no more ready to offer, than it to receiue this wages of sinne: whereof to commeth to passe, that when by the word of God, or the motion of his holy spirit, we thinke vpon these earthly vanities, that wee may learne the better to flee and contemne them, they sticke to our fingers when wee would throw them away, they catch vs when wee would flee from them; and being insnared with these worldly lime-twigs (like the silly bird) the more we struggle to get out, the more we are intangled and disabled. So that it fareth with vs as with the foolish louer, who fondly louing, but yet worthily disliking his ill-deseruing mistresse, groweth to a seeming resolution to forsake her companie, & armeth himselfe with many forcible arguments to strengthen him in his purpose; but at the next meeting he is so allured with her lookes, and so bewitched with the least apparance of a proffered fauour, that he doteth on her againe with more than wonted fondnes. The reason hereof is, because it is as naturall for our corrupt flesh to loue the world, as for the loose youth to loue the cunning harlot, for the water to run downe the hill, the fire to ascend vpward, or for the tender hearted mother to loue her deare bought and only babe. So that it needeth no arguments to perswade vs to imbrace his sinfull vanities, for onely the sight of them is sufficient to allure vs, our owne affections more violently drawing vs, than the inticing eloquence and well framed reasons of the best perswading Oratour.

§. Sect.8. The power of the world shewed by the experience of former times.

But if wee would haue yet a more plaine and euen palpable demonstration of the great power and puissance of this our enemy, let vs propound the experience of former times, and of our owne dayes, and take a view of those trophies of victorie, which the world hath erected in all ages for the eternizing of his owne glorie; and you shall finde that the greatest Potentates of the earth, the great Commanders of conquering armies, they who haue most excelled in wisedome and policie, in power and fortitude, in temperance and in all other ciuill and morall vertues, haue after all their victories, beene vanquished by the world, fettered in the chaines of his vanities, tied to his triumphant chariot; offering themselues euen after they haue subdued the greatest part of the earth, to become the worlds slaues and sworne vassals, for the base and contemptible wages, either of windy honors, vncertaine riches, or carnall pleasures. Neither hath this beene the case of the worlds deuoted seruants onely, but of the stoicall contemners of the world, who hauing cast downe the gauntlet of defiance, and (as it were) challenged to fight with it in single combat; haue as vnawares receiued foyles, in the very time of challenge, with their owne weapons, affecting the praise of the

the world by their dispraises of it, and being tickled with vaine pleasures, whilest they haue declaimed against the vanitie of pleasures; and when as by the waight of their arguments they haue ouercome their epicurish aduersaries, themselues haue beene ouercome with pleasure no lesse vaine and carnall, although more subtile and refined. Yea this puissant enemie hath not onely conquered the heathen multitude, and ruled amongst them as an vniuersall Monarch, (for if this were all, his power were not so terrible, seeing they wanted a Captaine to guide them, spirituall eyes to direct them, and the shield of faith which might beate backe the force of the worlds furies) but not contented with his owne territories and dominions, he hath made fearefull inrodes euen into the holy land, and hath fought many fierce battels in the middest of Gods visible monarchie, vanquishing some of Gods professed seruants through their own treacherie or cowardize, and leading them captiue to doe his will; foiling many euen of his great Worthies, through their secure negligence; and finally murthering and killing (though not ouercomming) others who resisted his furie and would not yeeld. In the formost ranke was Saul, whom of Gods elected and anointed king, he made his owne deuoted vassall; Absalon, whom of the sonne of a holy and religious king, he made with the baite of honour a bloodthirstie rebell, and (it is to be feared) the sonne of perdition; Demas, who of a disciple became an Apostate; and Iudas, who being hired with the wages of iniquitie, of an Apostle became a diuell. In the second was iust Noah foiled with intemperance, righteous Lot defiled with filthie incest; the tenne Patriarkes, some of which were ouercome with lust, some stained with blood, and all ouerborne with pride and bitter enuie; holy Dauid, first defiled with lust, and then embrued with innocent blood, the feare of God for a time being beaten backe with the feare of losing his credit in the world; religious Ezechias swolne with a cruell blow of vainglory which the world gaue him, through his great conceit of his riches and treasures; a disease much more dangerous then that swelling sore, of which through the mercy of God hee had recouered. And to these wee might adde the strong Samson, and the wise Salomon, whom the world ouercame by his female forces; and the Disciples themselues, enuying one another their greatnes, & contending for superiority there where the meanest inferiour is much more glorious than the earths greatest Monarch. In the last march that armie of glorious Martyrs, against whom the world raged with barbarous crueltie, and so farre preuailed in the fight, that foiled, yea murthered their bodies, though hee could not hurt their soules, they being inuisible and immortall.

But leauing former ages, let vs come vnto our owne, where we may obserue a world of victories; which the world hath through his force and cunning obtained, euen in these latter times, which are still fresh in our memories and daily subject to our view. And to say nothing of the barbarous Heathen and wild Indians, who scarce acknowledge any other master (vnlesse it be the prince of the world) nor expect any other wages but what is paid vnto them out of the worlds exchequer; to passe by the Turkes and Saracens, the worlds deuoted vassals and sworne souldiers, waged by him to fight continually against the kingdome of Iesus Christ; and not to speake of the whole kingdome of the Romish Antichrist, whose whole religion is nothing else but a mixture of superstition, hypocrisie, and worldly policies, of purpose inuented and contriued, that they may attaine their worldly ends, and maintaine their glory and authoritie, inrich their chests, and wallow themselues in the filthy sinke of voluptuous pleasures; euen amongst our selues who haue giuen our names to Iesus Christ, and do make profession of his holy Gospell how many are there, who hauing in their baptisme taken vpon them the badge of Christian profession, doe make apostasie from their faith, and in the whole course of their liues shew, that they are professed worldlings, seruing this wicked master with all their thoughts, words and workes, for the wages of worldly vanities; minding onely earthly things, and being in their cogitations and hearts fast glued vnto the ground, so as they haue neuer any leisure to lift them vp in any holy and heauenly meditation; talking of nothing but of their worldly businesses and delights, and how they may compasse & atchieue their worldly delights; and all their actions aiming at this marke how they may increase or continue their riches, pleasures or preferments? How many are there (who not daring for feare of that hellish condemnation, which they heare is so terrible, to giue themselues ouer wholly to the seruice of the world) doe notwithstanding vnequally share themselues betweene God and Mammon, giuing the world their hearts, yea and their bodies too, hauing that they doe an houre or in two in a weeke, make (as it were) a tender of them to the grand Lord, offering vnto him the small peppercorne of their outward deuotion, for feare of forfeiting the tenure of their saluation? How many disguized hypocrites vncharge, whose eie vnto God more seruile, but with as small deuotion, and professing religion, oftentimes with shew of zeale more than ordinarie, doe notwithstanding secretly reconcile themselues vnto the world, swearing vnto him their alleageance for the hire of earthly trifles? who offer vnto the Lord onely the sacrifice of their lips, and take vpon them the vizard of religion, that their shew of godlinesse may increase their gaine, and set forward their worldly ends; but when God and the world, religion and their pleasure, profit and preferment, are so diuided, that they cannot together be imbraced, then they vnmaske themselues, cast aside the Lords liuerie, and openly professe that if they must haue but one, then the world alone shall bee their Lord and Master.

b. Sect. 10 That the world often preuaileth with Gods seruants.

And all these proclaime the worlds force and power by their vtter ouerthrow and base slauerie. But how many are there besides who in the sinceritie of their hearts serue the Lord, and fight vnder his standerd, who feele often the force of the worlds blowes, and receiue deepe and griesly, though not mortall wounds, in this conflict? How many are there who hauing escaped out of the diuels slaucrie, and had the vpper hand in many combats of tentation, after they haue put him to flight, and obtained a glorious victorie, are pursued and ouertaken by the world, which encountring and closing fast with them, either casteth them downe, or grieuously foileth them, by wounding their consciences with some knowne sin, or maketh them to stand still, or at least exceedingly hindreth their race in the course of Christianitie? How many are there who haue lost their first loue, and are much abated in their zeale, becomming cold and negligent in the duties of Gods seruice, and in the workes of mercie and charitie towards their brethren, after that the world hath combated with them? And yet alas so secure we are, that though this enemie bee much more dangerous and pernicious than Satan himselfe, ouercomming more through his treacherous flatteries, than his grand captaine by his open violence, yet the most thinke not of it, as of a mortall foe, but as though it were a kinde friend, they impart vnto it a great share in their loue and affection, esteeming it aboue Gods spirituall graces whilest they haue it, and mourning with sorrow and bitter griefe when they are forced to part from it. And howsoeuer they professe enmitie against the world, as being commonly reckoned for one of the enemies of our saluation, yet their quarrell is but against an idle name: for as for the nature of the world, what it is, and the dangerous effects which it worketh, they know it not, much lesse doe they wish any care furnish themselues with such spirituall weapons as might enable them to fight against it. Whereof it commeth to passe that they are vanquished by the world at vnawares, and liue in subiection to this dangerous enemie, and neuer feele the burthen of their bondage, because it is sweete and pleasing to the flesh.

CHAP. III.

Reasons to moue vs to resist and fight against our enemie the world.

AND thus haue I shewed the dangerousnes of this enemie, both in respect of his malice and power, by the first whereof is inferred the necessitie of the fight; for such is his malice that hee will hearken vnto no peace, but if we will not ouercome him, he will surely ouercome vs; by the other carnall securitie is taken away, and we stirred vp with all diligence to prepare our selues against the encounter; seeing we are not to fight against a weak and contemptible enemie, but against a politike and powerfull champion, with whom few haue combated, but either they haue beene shamefully foyled, or vtterly ouerthrowne. But that we may the rather be incouraged to proclaime warre against the world, with which wee are too too prone in our owne corrupt nature to be in league and amitie, let the reasons following induce vs. First, the Lord hath by speciall commandement inioyned vs to haue no amitie or correspondencie with the world and worldly vanities, but to renounce and contemne it, both in our actions, and also in our hearts and affections, as being vnworthy both our labour and our loue. The former, Rom. 12. 2. Fashion not your selues like vnto this world but bee yee changed by the renewing of your minde. And elsewhere hee willeth vs, to vse this world as though wee vsed it not, as being a false and treacherous friend, who will deceiue and betray vs when we most trust it, because (saith he) the fashion of this world goeth away, or as the words may more fitly signifie, because the beautie and glorie of this world doth seduce vs, and like a false guide misleadeth in directing. The other, 1. Iohn 2. 15. Loue not the world, nor the things that are in the world, &c.

b. Sect. The second reason taken from the passion of Christ.

The second argument may be taken from the passion of Christ; for he shed his precious blood to cleanse vs from these worldly and wicked lusts, and victoriously triumphed ouer the world vpon his crosse on our behalfe, not that wee should yeeld our selues to the subiection thereof againe, being thus deerely redeemed from it, not that we should still haue our hearts and affections fast nailed to the earth, and glued (as it were)

vnto worldly vanities, but that wee should contemne and tread them vnder our feete, as being partners in his victorie, and that being risen with Christ, in glorious triumph ouer them, we should seeke those things that are aboue, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, and set our affections on things that are aboue, and not on things which are in earth. And though our abode bee vpon earth, yet our conuersation should be in heauen, from whence we looke for a Sauiour euen the Lord Iesus Christ; in comparison of whose infinite worth wee are with the Apostle Paul to esteeme all earthly things drosse and dung, yea euen losse that we may gaine him. And this argument the Apostle Peter vseth to encourage vs to fight against and forsake worldly lusts: 1. Pet. 4. 1. For as much as Christ hath suffered for vs in the flesh, arme your selues likewise with the same minde, which is, that hee which hath suffered in the flesh, hath ceased from sinne. 2. That hee henceforward should liue (as much time as remaineth in the flesh) not after the lusts of men, but after the will of God. 3. For it is sufficient for vs that we haue spent the time past of our life after the lust of the Gentiles, walking in wantonnes, lusts, drunkennes, in gluttonie, drinkings, and in abhominable idolatries, &c. amongst which one of the most hainous and commonest is, to set vp the world as an idoll in our hearts, which should bee the temple of the holy Ghost.

The third argument is taken from vnauoidable necessitie: for first it is necessarie that wee fight against the world, or else we shall fight against God, there being opposition betweene them without meane, & therfore no neutralitie admitted, but whosoeuer ioyneth not with God, is on the worlds part, whosoeuer loueth the world hateth God, & who so loueth God hateth the world. This is plaine, Iam. 4. 4. Know you not that the amitie of the world is enmitie with God? Whosoeuer therefore will bee a friend of the world, maketh himselfe the enemie of God. And the Apostle Iohn vseth it as an argument to dissuade vs from the loue of the world, because we cannot loue the world and God too: If any man (saith hee) loue the world, the loue of the father is not in him. For as soone as the loue of God is shed abroad in our hearts, it moueth vs to loue him againe, who hath thus dearely loued vs, and louing him to loue his friends also, and to hate his enemies. As soone as we are reconciled vnto God and become his seruants, we presently oppose against all those who make opposition against our Lord and master, and as wee are made his sonnes by adoption and grace, wee cannot chuse in our filiall affection, but take our part herein, breaking off all friendship with those which are his enemies, and making warre against those who fight against him. To this purpose the Apostle saith, that as soone as the grace of God, that is, the doctrine of grace and reconciliation, doth appeare, it teacheth vs to denie vngodlines, and worldly lusts, and to liue soberly, and righteously and godly in this present world. So that the loue of the world and the loue of God, peace with the world, and peace with God, will not stand together. And therefore the Apostle Paul saith, that Demas forsooke him, and together with him the seruice of God, when he began to imbrace the world. And our Sauiour telleth vs plainly, that no man can serue these two masters, being so opposed one against the other, for either he shall hate the one, and loue the other, or else he shall leane to the one, and despise the other: yee cannot (saith he) serue God and mammon. As well then may wee reconcile fire and water, light and darknesse, righteousnesse and vnrighteousnesse, Christ and Belial, as God and the world: and therefore when Iehosaphat, though otherwise a godly King, would haue beene friends to both, the Lord sendeth Iehu the Prophet vnto him with an ambassage of sharpe reproofe. Wouldest thou (said he) helpe the wicked, and loue them that hate the Lord? therefore for this thing, the wrath of the Lord is vpon thee, 2. Chro. 19. 2.

Secondly, of necessitie we must renounce the world; and flying out of this spirituall Babylon adioyne our selues vnto the kingdome of Iesus Christ, or else we cannot bee reckoned in the number of the faithfull, nor haue any part in their priuiledges. We must bee sheepe of Christs flocke seuered from the goates, or else wee shall haue no share in the benefit of his death and intercession. For Christ hath chosen his faithfull ones out of the world, and hath disfranchised them of all the carnall liberties thereof, as soone as he made them partakers of that glorious libertie of being the sonnes of God. So hee saith, that because the faithfull are not of the world, but hee had chosen them out of the world, therefore the world hateth them. And more plainly elsewhere: They (saith he) are not of the world, as I am not of the world. And as those who adhere to the world cannot be reckoned in the number of the faithfull, so can they haue no interest in the death and mediation of Christ, or in any other benefits which are appropriated vnto them, as their peculiar priuiledges. For Christ laid downe his life for his owne sheepe, and not for goates and wolues, he bestowed his life for his friends alone, and therefore not for worldlings, who are strangers, or rather professed enemies; he gaue himselfe for his Church, and consequently those who are seuered from the communion of Saints, and adhere to the world, which is the synaſynagogue of Satan, haue no intereſt in this gift. Take then which you will, for both you cannot haue; and thrice bleſſed is hee that chuſeth the better part, for that ſhall neuer be taken from him.

§. Sect. 5. Chriſtian religion requireth that we ſhould renounce the world.

Thirdly, of neceſſitie wee muſt vndertake this combat againſt the world and worldly vanities, becauſe our religion in a great part doth conſiſt in abandoning of them, whereof it is that at our firſt entrance into the courſe of Chriſtianitie, when as in our baptiſme wee take vpon vs the name of Chriſt, wee renounce the world with all the vaine pompe and glorious vanities therof, and profeſſe that wee will couragiouſly fight againſt them vnder the ſtanderd of Ieſus Chriſt. As ſoone therefore as we ceaſe this fight, and become friends with the world, ſetting our hearts and affections more vpon worldly vanities than vpon ſpirituall things, wee ſteale out of Chriſts campe like runnagate ſouldiers, we caſt aſide Chriſts liuerie, wee ſlide backe from our religion in truth, whatſoeuer wee profeſſe in words, and ioyning in league with Chriſts enemie wee traiterouſly make warre againſt him. To this purpoſe the Apoſtle Iames ſaith, that pure religion and vndefiled before God, euen the Father, is this, to viſit the fatherleſſe and widowes in their aduerſitie, and to keepe a mans ſelfe vnſpotted of the world. The which we cannot doe vnleſſe we abandon and renounce it; for this peſtiferous aire infecteth all that liue in it, and as impoſſible it is to haue familiar conuerſation with this wanton harlot, and not to bee inueigled in her bands, and defiled with her vncleannes, as to liue in a Mill and to keepe our ſelues cleane from meale and duſt.

Iames. 1. 27.

Fourthly, the neceſſitie of leauing the world and renouncing carnall vanities hereby appeareth, in that whileſt wee continue in the way of the world, we are in the way of ſinne, and the way of ſinne is the way of death and deſtruction. So the Apoſtle ſaith, that Chriſt hath quickned vs that were dead in treſpaſſes and ſinnes, wherein in time paſt we walked according to the courſe of the world, and after the prince that ruleth in the aire, euen the ſpirit that now worketh in the children of diſobedience, &c. And the Apoſtle Iohn ſaith, that the whole world lieth in wickednes. If therefore wee will not breake off companie with the world, wee walke with it in the way of ſinne and death; If wee make the world our bedfellow, well may our corrupt fleſh thinke our bed ſoft as downe, and ſweete as roſes, and ſo cauſe vs to ſleepe a dead ſleepe in carnall ſecuritie, yet in truth like filthie ſwine wee wallow in the ſinke and puddle of ſinne and wickednes; and if euer wee awake out of this ſpirituall lethargie, wee ſhall ſee our eſtate moſt deſperate and damnable, till wee bee ſeuered from this companion, and cleanſed from that filthineſſe, wherewith hee hath defiled vs. So that we may conclude where the holy Pſalmiſt began, Pſal. 1. 1. Bleſſed is the man that doth not walke in the counſell of the wicked, nor ſtand in the way of ſinners, nor ſit in the ſeate of ſcorners.

1. Ioh. 5. 19.

Fiftly, if wee will bee the ſeruants and Diſciples of Ieſus Chriſt, wee muſt of neceſſitie make warre againſt the world, for it will haue no peace with vs, but as ſoone as it diſcerneth that we are choſen by him, it will purſue vs with mortall hatred; ſo that vvee muſt fight againſt it, or it will fight againſt vs, and ſo deſtroy vs for vvant of reſiſtance; vnleſſe vvecan bee content to renounce the ſeruice of our Sauiour, and yeeld our ſelues as ſlaues to the world, ſinne and Satan, who will reward vs for the preſent with the wages of vanity, and afterwards vvith the wages of death. And this argument the Apoſtle Peter vſeth, 1. Pet. 2. 11. Dearely beloued, I beſeech you as ſtrangers and pilgrimes, abſtaine from fleſhly luſts, which fight againſt the ſoule.

§. Sect. 5. We muſt fight againſt the world if we be Chriſts diſciples.

1. Pet. 2. 11.

Sixtly, if wee doe not fight against the vvorld, but ſuffer our ſelues to bee againe defiled with vvorldly luſts, after that Chriſt hath ſhed his blood to waſh and cleanſe vs, vvee ſhall fall into a fearefull relapſe, and make our latter end much worſe than our beginning; vve ſhall like filthy dogges returne to our vomit, & with the ſow that was waſhed, to our wallowing in the mire. And this the Apoſtle Peter plainly affirmeth, 2. Pet. 2. 20. For if they (ſaith hee) after they haue eſcaped from the filthineſſe of the world, through the knowledge of the Lord, and of the Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt, are yet tangled therein againe, and ouercome, the latter end is worſe with them than the beginning. 22. For it had beene better for them, not to haue knowne the way of righteouſneſſe, than after they haue knowne it, to turne from the Holy commandement giuen vnto them, &c.

§. Sect. We muſt fight againſt the world if we be Chriſts diſciples.

2. Pet. 2. 20.

The fourth argument to incourage vs to this fight againſt the world and worldly vanities, is our aſſured hope of obtaining victorie: for howſoeuer (as hath beene ſhewed) shewed) the world is a malitious, politike, and puissant enemie, and wee (being considered in our selues) are altogether vnable to make resistance, seeing our nature is weake, and our forces fraile, and which is worst of all, that weake strength we haue being diuided, and ciuill warres at home, our selues contending against our selues, and the flesh which is our greater and stronger part, rebelling and lusting against the spirit, and traiterously ioyning with the world to worke our ouerthrow: yet being by a liuely faith knit vnto Christ, assisted with his spirit, and armed at all points with the spirituall armour of his sanctifying and sauing graces, there is no doubt of getting victorie. For we doe fight against but a conquered enemie, whom Christ already hath subdued, not onely for himselfe, but also for all vs that are true members of his body. And this argument of incouragement our Sauiour vseth, Ioh. 16. 33. In the world (saith he) yee shall haue affliction, but be of good comfort I haue ouercome the world. Yea this conquest Christ obtained at an high rate, for he gaue his life to free vs from the worlds thraldom, as the Apostle witnesseth, Gal. 1. 4. which gaue himselfe for our sinnes, that he might deliuer vs from this present euill world. And therefore hauing so dearely bought this victorie, and our freedome, hee will not suffer his paines to be spent in vaine, but hauing all power in heauen and earth committed vnto him, he will giue vs also strength to ouercome, if we will lay hold on Christ by faith, professe our selues his souldiers and seruants, and valiantly fight vnder his standerd, against these spirituall enemies of our saluation. And this comfort and incouragement the Apostle Iohn giueth vs: All (saith he) that is borne of God ouercommeth the world, and this is the victorie that ouercommeth the world, euen our faith. Who is it that ouercommeth the world, but he that beleeueth that Iesus is the sonne of God? 1. Iohn 5. verse. 4. 5.

The last argument to moue vs, is the great reward which accompanieth this victorie, for hauing fought this good fight wee may assuredly expect, with the blessed Apostle, a crowne of righteousnesse; and to raigne with Christ in glory, as himselfe hath promised: Reuel. 3. 21. To him (saith hee) that ouercommeth, will I grant to sit with me in my throne, euen as I ouercame, and sit with my father in his throne. Yea we shall enjoy all blessednesse and happinesse, for wee shall haue the fruition of God himselfe, and together with him enioy all good things. For to he promiseth, Reuel. 21. 7. He that ouercommeth shall inherit all things, and I will be his God, and he shall be my sonne. What therefore though in this conflict we lose, or be driuen to forsake houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children or lands, for Christs names sake, seeing wee shall haue the worth of these benefits redoubled vnto vs a hundred fold, euen in this life in Gods spirituall graces, and in the world to come shall inherit euerlasting life? What if wee be driuen for a moment of time, to beare the easie burthen of some light affliction, if wee shall afterwards bee rewarded with a farre most excellent and an eternall waight of glory? Yea what though in this fight wee lose a temporarie life, if we may bee rewarded with life eternall, and that glory and happinesse which doth accompanie it?

2. Cor. 4. 17.

Luke 9. 24.

And these are the reasons which may incourage all Christians to encounter this spirituall enemie of our saluation: now if we would know how wee may thus fight against the world, and bee assured also that wee haue obtained victorie; wee are said thus to combat with it, when wee resist and ouercome all worldly tentations, which moue or draw vs vnto sinne; and more especially, when being allured to commit sinne, or to neglect any duty which God requireth, by the worldly baites of riches, pleasures, and preferments, wee doe renounce these worldly lusts, and contemne these base offers, preferring farre before them our obedience towards God, and thereward thereof, his loue and fauour in this life, with all other his spirituall gifts and graces, and the eternall ioyes of his kingdome, reserued for vs in the life to come. And contrariwise when being discouraged in our course of Christianitie, or vrged and enforced to commit any sinne, with crosses, troubles, afflictions and persecutions which the world and wicked worldlings raise against vs, wee arme our selues with patience to beare the brunt of the worlds furie, accounting sinne the greatest euill, and the burthen of Gods wrath due vnto it the greatest torment; and therefore chuse rather to endure any extremitie, yea to haue our liues taken away, with most exquisite tortures, than we will be forced to make shipwracke of a good conscience, or incurre the displeasure of our most gracious God by committing any sinne.

Q. Sect. 11. How we are said to fight against the world, and to obtaine victorie.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the manner of the worlds fight, and how he assaulteth vs, on the one side with prosperitie, and on the other side with aduersitie.

Q. Sect. 1. With what weapons the world assaulteth vs.

THus hauing discouered the worlds forces, and incouraged euerie Christian souldier to the fight: let vs in the next place consider of the chiefe and most preuailing weapons which hee vseth to ouerthrow vs, and obtaine the victorie, and the manner of his warring vvith vs in the day of battell. His weapons and munition are of two sorts, either his allurements and baits, wherewith he inticeth vs vnto sinne, reserued against the day of battell in the storehouse of prosperitie; or his weapons of affliction and persecution, whereby hee seeketh to daunt and discourage vs in our Christian march, and cause vs to make a stand, or retire backe, and shamefully flee away, which he storeth vp in the armorie of aduersitie. The former may bee called his bullets and gunshot, which kill at vnawares, we not seeing or knowing who hurt vs: the other his swords and speares, more terrible in sight, but lesse dangerous in their vse, because being plainly subiect to our view, wee may the better defend our selues against them, and repell their force, either by warding or declining.

Sect. 2. The manner how the world fighteth with vs.

The manner of his warring with vs, is either by perswading in a cunning and deceitfull parley, or by encountring vs with all his forces: in the one playing the dangerous traitor, in the other an open enemie. In the former like a subtile Rabshakeh, in his master Satans name, hee offereth vnto vs peace, and maketh many faire promises of great plenty and securitie vnder his protection, if wee will be content to lay aside our armes, and subject our selues as slaues and vassals vnto his gouernment. And least these allurements might not preuaile, hee mixeth threatnings, and boasteth of his great strength, whereby hee is able to ouercome by force, if fairer meanes will not perswade a yeelding; blasphemously disabling the power of our mightie God, the Lord of hosts, as though he were not able so well to prouide for vs, or to shield and defend vs against his furie. But if his bewitching eloquence will not moue vs, then he marcheth against vs with all his forces, and imployeth all his strength and policie to work our ouerthrow; sometimes hiding the troupes of his temptations in the ambushments of worldly vanities, that is, either behind the high hils of ambitious honours, or in the low delightfull medowes of voluptuous pleasures, or else in the pricking thickets of thornie riches, that so he may assault vs in our greatest securitie; and obtaine an easie victorie: and sometimes hee draweth out his forces in open view, and marcheth against vs with a terrible armie of afflictions and persecutions, presuming to ouercome vs through force and violence. And this is the manner of the worlds fight, wherin as you see he leaueth no meanes vnassaied to worke his own will, and our ouerthrow: for being resolued to catch and make a pray of vs, like a cunning fisher-man, hee either allures vs to swallow the hookes of sin with the baits of vvorldly vanities; or if he cannot so preuaile, hee assaieth to driue vs by force into his nets of perdition, beating vs forward vvith the staues of trouble and affliction; or like a dangerous theefe intending to spoile vs of the rich treasures of Gods graces, either he cheateth and deceiueth vs, by perswading vs to exchange with him these precious iewels, for some counterfeite trifles and base vvorldly vanities; or if his cosening cunning preuaile not, like a strong theefe by the high vvay side, hee will cruelly assault vs, and endeuour to robbe vs by force and violence. So that it behoueth the Christian man alwayes carefully to watch and to stand vpon his guard, both in the time of prosperitie and aduersitie that hee be not either allured vvith the one, or oppressed with the other; either inticed vvith worldly baits to fall into the nets of destruction, or discouraged in his course of Christianitie, vvith troubles and afflictions.

And thus haue I shewed how the vvorld on euery side assaulteth vs; on the right hand vvith prosperity, on the left hand vvith aduersitie; before vs he setteth the bewitching baits of worldly vanities, to intice vs forward in the broad way of destruction: behinde, hee pursueth vs with terrors and feares, that so wee may not dare to looke backe; and if wee seeme but to make a stand, he whippeth vs forward with many sharp & many stringed whips of crosses and afflictions. Now let vs more specially descend to speake of the vvorlds tentations, and of the meanes to arme our selues against them, beginning vvith the tentations of prosperitie, and then afterwards descending to the tentations of aduersitie. And lest wee should vndiscreetly cast away the sound with the rotten and declaime against Gods blessings, because of the worlds abuse; let vs consider what this prosperitie is, and hovv wee are to esteeme of it in its owne nature, and how it becommeth the worlds assistant, through his abuse and our corruption, to work our ouerthrow. Prosperitie therfore is nothing else but a confluence or concurrence of all earthly & temporal benefits; as the fauour and friendship of men, health, wealth, peace, libertie, honour, pleasure, and the like. Now if we would know how to esteeme of it, we must consider what it is in its owne nature, & what in our vse. In its owne nature it is good, because it is the gift & blessing of God, vvhich he bestovveth vpon his ovvne seruants, as a reward of their loue and obedience. So the Psalmist saith, that [a] they who loue Gods Law shall haue great prosperitie, and they shall haue no hurt. And the Lord exhorteth the people of Israel [b] to keepe the words of his couenant, that they might prosper in all that they should do: to the

the same purpose are diuers other places. The giuer therefore doth sufficiently commend the gift, and comming from him as a reward it must needes be good. Secondly, the Lord loueth and taketh delight in the prosperity of his seruants, as the Psalmist plainly affirmeth; and it is the good of his Saints, and not their hurt, wherewith he is so well pleased. Thirdly, prosperitie in it selfe is a motiue cause to make vs render to the Lord praises and thanksgiuing, and is the subiect matter of our Hymnes and religious songs, as may plentifully appeare in the booke of Dauids Psalmes: now as it is good to praise God, so that is good for which wee praise him. Fourthly, the seruants of God haue prayed vnto him for this prosperitie, and that both for themselues, and also for the whole Church. Of the former wee haue an example: Psal. 118. 25. O Lord I pray thee saue now: O Lord I pray thee giue now prosperitie. Of the other: Psal. 122. 7. Peace be within thy walles, and prosperitie within thy palaces. Lastly, it is made a signe of Gods fauourable presence with his seruants, and thus the Lord is said to haue beene with Ioseph, for whatsoeuer he did he made it to prosper. So it is said of Dauid, that he prospered and grew, for the Lord God of hosts was with him. And of Ezechias, that the Lord was with him, and he prospered in all things which he tooke in hand.

And thus it appeareth that prosperitie in it selfe is good: but being considered in our vse, it is not absolutely good, but indifferent, both in respect of the subiect and the vse; for it is good to the good, euill to the euill; good to those who vvell vse it, and euill in those vvho abuse it vnto sinne. In the former respect prosperitie is good when it is enioyed by a faithfull man, who being in Christ, hath recouered that right in all Gods blessings vvhich vvee lost in Adam. In the other, when it commeth vnto him by lawfull meanes, as the gift and blessing of God; and being enioyed, is sanctified vnto him by the vvord of God and prayer: as also when as it is moderatly loued and desired, with a willingnes to hold it, as long as God will, and wee may by lawfull meanes; and vvith contentednesse to leaue it, when it pleaseth God to take it from vs. Finally, it is good vvhen as it is vsed and imployed for the aduancement of Gods glorie, who is the fountaine and giuer of it, the benefit of the faithfull, and the furthering of our owne saluation. And if any such enioy prosperitie and thus vse it, in this manner, and to these ends, it is to be accounted vnto them Gods singular blessing, and as a temporall pledge of eternall happinesse. But contrariwise, prosperitie is euill to the wicked and vnregenerate, who haue no right vnto Gods creatures, as also when it is vnlawfully compassed, and naughtily vsed, as when it is immoderately loued and desired, namely, aboue God, his heauenly blessings, and spirituall graces: for as one saith, it is the concupiscence of the world, and not the world it selfe that hurteth vs. So also when as we so dote vpon it, that wee cannot with patience thinke of leauing it, and immoderately mourne when it is taken from vs; vvhich carefull possession and not simply the vse is condemned. To this purpose the Heathen man speaketh diuinely: A wise man (saith he) would haue these things contemned, not that they should not be had, but that they should not bee possessed with care; he will not driue them away from him, but if they bee going he will follow them securely, &c. He loueth not riches, but hee had rather haue them than be without them; hee receiueth them not into his heart, but into his house; neither doth he refuse them being possessed, but keepeth them, and desireth to haue more large matter or fuell ministred to exercise his vertue. Finally, prosperity is euill to those who are thereby made more forgetfull of God, and negligent in performing the duties of his seruice, more iniurious to men, and more slacke in vsing the meanes of their saluation. But of these points I shall haue occasion to speake more hereafter when I intreate of the chiefe parts of this prosperitie.

And thus wee are to distinguish betweene prosperity it selfe which is good, and the abuse thereof which is euill; in which respect alone wee are to esteeme it the worlds friend and assistant, whereby he tempteth vs, and our enemie, which wee must labour to ouercome: and therefore for distinction sake, let vs, if you please, in this discourse call it worldly and carnall prosperitie; because it is abused as a tentation of the world, to inflame our corrupt flesh with concupiscence and sinne. Vnto which abuse wee are naturally, exceeding prone: for as fruite is vnto a childe, libertie to the licentious, cockring loue to an vndutifull son, a sword to a mad man, beauty to the lasciuious, and good drinke to a filthy drunkard, such is worldly prosperity vnto vs. And hence it is that the Lord like a wise Physition (feeling our pulse, and finding that our nature inclineth vs to this plurisie of prosperity, whereby our braines are so intoxicated, as wee forget God and all goodnesse) doth purposely labour to preuent it, and maketh wholesome preseruatiues of admonitions to keepe vs from it, in many places of holy Scriptures, as hereafter wee shall see. In the meane while we may obserue the exceeding corruption of our vile nature, which so poysoneth and infecteth Gods good gifts and blessings, that they become causes and occasions of euill: and whereas the Lord

through the infinite goodnesse of his nature, bringeth good out of euill, and by afflictions, which are ill in their owne nature, worketh our good euen our conuersion, sanctification and saluation, wee contrariwise through the diuelliſh tainture of our ſinne turne good into euill, and out of Gods benefits, and rich bleſſings, worke our owne woe, and haſten and ſet forward (vnleſſe God preuent vs with his grace) our owne deſtruction and damnation.

CHAP. V.

Of the dangerouſneſſe of worldly proſperitie.

Q. Sect. 1. That the worlds tentations on the right hand are very dangerous.

NOw hauing ſeene what this worldly proſperitie is, and in what reſpect it is our enemy, namely, when it is a tentation of the world to allure vs vnto ſinne, (as it is vnto all thoſe who immoderatly loue and ſet their hearts vpon it, more than vpon heauenly and ſpirituall things) let vs in the next place conſider of the dangerouſneſſe of theſe worldly tentations which are on the right hand, that accordingly wee may prepare our ſelues to make reſiſtance. The danger of worldly proſperitie is exceeding great; for as by Hippocrates rule the height of health, is the firſt degree to ſome dangerous ſickneſſe; ſo when our worldly eſtate ſeemeth moſt healthy, ſtrong, and vigorous, then is our corrupt nature prone to fall into the perillous diſeaſes of ſinne, which are attended vpon with eternall death and deſtruction. And therefore the wiſe man ſaith, that eaſe ſlaieth the fooliſh, and the proſperitie of fooles deſtroyeth them. Where by fooles hee vnderſtandeth ſinners and wicked men, who abuſe their proſperity, by ſetting their hearts vpon it, louing and truſting in it more than in God, and ſtrengthening themſelues thereby to commit all manner of ſinne and wickedneſſe. So that worldly men enioying proſperitie, and taking all their delight and felicitie in it, are not vnfitly compared to little infants, who ſit at the hole of the Aſpe, and plaie with the Cockatrice, whoſe paſtime is their ruine, and their pleaſure death. Or like the child playing with the fire; who no ſooner toucheth it with his finger but is burnt, and changeth his ſport into teares and crying; ſauing that herein they are much more fooliſh than little children, for they feeling the ſmart doe euer after dread the fire; but theſe being often burned with the bright ſhining flames of worldly proſperitie, are not warned, nor made more warie by their owne harmes, but as being beſotted in their loue, they ſtill imbrace their ruine, and hunt after that which moſt hurteth them; like vnto the fooliſh flye, which is ſo delighted with the light of the candle, that it regardeth not the heate of the flame, but burning one legge after another, taketh no warning till he be wholly deſtroyed and conſumed. And ſo doth the doting loue of theſe fond worldlings bereaue them not onely of all religion, but alſo of the vſe of reaſon; yea it ſo ſtupifieth the ſenſes that they are deafe to all admonition; inſenſible of their owne ſmart, and in no poſſibility of being ruled, and gouerned, ordered, or contained by any Law: in which reſpect Chryſoſtome compareth them to ſuch a man, as dwelling with a faire maide whom he fondly affecteth, is by ſtrict order inioyned, that hee preſume not to looke vpon her with laſciuious and wanton glances; a thing to him no leſſe vnpleaſant than impoſſible.

Q. Sect. 2. That the [illegible] of proſperitie is much more dangerous than the [illegible] of aduerſitie.

But the great danger of worldly proſperitie will more plainly appeare, if wee doe but conſider, how farre it exceedeth the danger of the ſtate oppoſed thereunto, aduerſitie and affliction. For whereas affliction being an open enemie, terrible in appearance, and making ſhew at the firſt ſight of all his forces, and ſometimes of more than hee hath, ſetting before vs ſhadowes, in ſtead of ſubſtantiall enemies, doth make vs more carefull and watchfull to prepare and arme our ſelues; that we may make reſiſtance: Proſperitie is a ſecret traitor, which hideth hatred and hoſtility, vnder the vizard of loue and friendſhip, and thereby maketh vs ſo reckleſſe and ſecure, that in ſtead of oppoſition, we are ready to receiue this ſerpent into our boſome, and when hee incountreth vs with all his forces, ſo bewitched we are with the pleaſing ſight of this glorious enemy, that wee cleere all the paſſages, and ſet wide open the gates of our ſoules, to giue him entertainment, voluntarily offering our ſelues to digge in his mines, and in moſt ſlauiſh manner to row in his galleys, ſo as we may be aſſured to enioy his company. And the reaſon hereof is, becauſe hee deceiueth vs with his treacherie: for at his firſt comming he diſplaieth not his bloody enſigne, but ſetteth vp a flagge of friendſhip, hee aſſaulteth vs not with open force and violence, nor marcheth againſt vs in a terrible and hoſtile manner, but like a ſubtile ſerpent he cunningly glideth and inſinuateth himſelfe into our companie; neither doth he as a martiall enemie ſtrike at vs with downe right blowes, but rather, like a craftie witch, hee beſoteth vs with his pleaſing charmes, and with cunning inchauntments, before hee conquereth vs, hee maketh vs willing to be ouercome. Hee doth incline, and not conſtraine, perſwade, and not conquere, or rather conquereth by perſwading; and moſt forcibly constraineth by mouing and inclining. Hee doth not vse against vs any outward terrible forces when he doth besiege vs, but (Simon like) with bewitching eloquence, and counterfeit gifts, hee allureth vs to breake downe the walls of our strength, and with our owne hands to make a cleere passage for our owne ouerthrow. He doth not when he commeth to execution, vse the dreadfull Sword, but rather sweet & wel-tasting poysons, which hurt with delight, and whilest they seeme to nourish, cast vs into a Lethargie or dead sleep of deep security. Finally, he inflicteth on vs no grieslly wounds, nor bringeth vs to our end by a foule death; but as it were tickleth vs to death with inueigling pleasures, making vs most to laugh when we are most tormented, and in a Chariot of Gold, strawed with Roses, he swiftly carrieth vs into Hell.

Let vs therefore learne to contemne and hate the World our wicked enemy, as well when hee fawneth as when hee frowneth, when he allureth by flattery and deceit, as when he constraineth by force and violence: for though he be then more amiable in view, yet is he no lesse malicious in truth; and because hee is then lesse suspected, hee is much more dangerous, as hauing better opportunitie to vse all his forces and to effect all his malicious designes. Why then, alasse, should we giue eare to the Worlds flatteries? Why should we beleeue this dissembling Ioab who will mortally stab vs, whileſt hee professeth friendship, and offereth in kindnesse to embrace and kisse vs? why should we listen to this sweet singing Syren, seeing hee bewitcheth in delighting, and maketh vs leape into the Sea of destruction? why should his flattering perswasions joyned with Crocodile teares, moue vs, seeing hee either weepeth for joy to thinke on his pray, or for spite because his hopes are so long deferred? why should the glorious beautie of his golden Cup allure vs, seeing we know that the potion within it is full of deadly poyson, which whosoeuer drinke shall eternally perish? why should we be moued with his inueigling gifts to admire his kindnesse, seeing by these baits hee allureth vs to swallow the hookes of sinne, and offereth these earthly toyes and earthly trifles, no lesse vaine in themselues, than momentany in their continuance, that hee may cousen vs in the exchange, mouing vs to giue for them the precious jewels of Gods grace, and our heauenly patrimony in his Kingdome. To this purpose one fitly speaketh: How great things (saith hee) doth the world promise vnto thee? How great things doth it esteeme behind thee or before thee to seeke backe? that is to say, that thou mayst place thy hope vpon things present (if any such they may be called to be present, which are alwayes vanishing away and vnstable) and mayst depart thy mind from that which Christ hath promised, and not yet giuen (but will giue because he is faithfull) and rest thy hopes vpon this neuer resting and perishing world? Whereof it is that God mixeth bitternesse with the sweetnesse of earthly felicitie, that we may seeke after another felicitie, whose sweetnesse will not deceiue vs. And in another place: O world (saith hee) filthy, fraudulent and treacherous; art thou not much more dangerous when thou art kind, than when thou art troublesome? art thou not much more to be feared whileſt thou allurest, than whileſt thou despisest? art thou not much more odious whileſt thou dissemblest loue, than when thou professest mortall hatred? To the same purpose speaketh that learned Idiote; Although (saith hee) euery estate is to bee feared, yet rather the prosperous estate than the afflicted, because this, whileſt it rageth, informeth and teacheth vs, the other whileſt it flattereth, seduceth vs; this sharpeneth a mans sight, but the other maketh him starke blind. O my God, exceedingly art thou incensed against that sinner, vnto whom thou permitteſt all things to succeed according to his wish, and afterwards makeſt him to beare deserued punishment. Let vs therefore be alwayes watchfull ouer our selues, but especially when the World fawneth vpon vs in the time of prosperitie, for it is more dangerous being our friend, than being our enemy, and more to bee taken heed of when it inticeth vs to loue it, than when it forceth vs to contemne it; for as smileth that it may rage, it flattereth that it may betray vs, it inticeth that it may kill vs, and exalteth that it may ouerthrow vs. Although therefore this dangerous Sea looketh smooth, and as it were smiling vpon thee, like a standing water, and hath scarce a wrinkle raised on it by the winde; yet this large plaine hath great hils, the danger is within included, within the enemy lurketh. Weigh therefore your anchors, hoise vp your sailes, let the crosse be fastned to the sailyard, for this calme will proue a tempest.

Arridet mundus vt seuiat, blanditur vt fallat, illicit vt occidat, extollit vt deprimat, Cyprian. Hieronym. ad Heliodorum, tom. 1. pag. 30.

But how farre the state of prosperitie is more dangerous & pernicious than the state of aduersitie, it may hereby more cleerly appeare; in that whereas affliction commonly maketh vs carefull of our wayes, increaseth Gods spirituall graces, causeth vs to bee more respective of our dutie, and eicheth preuenteth or mortifieth our sinnes: Prosperitie most vsually worketh in vs the contrary effects; for it makes vs proud, insolent, forgetfull of God, and of all duties which wee owe vnto him, it choketh and extinguisheth, or at least cooleth and abateth the heate and vigour of all grace and vertue in vs; and as the Iuy, whileſt it embraceth the Oake, sucketh the sap from the roote, and in time maketh it to rot and perish, so worldly prosperitie killeth vs with kindnesse, whileſt it sucketh from vs the sap of Gods graces, and so maketh maketh our spirituall growth and strength to decay and languish; neither doe men euer almost suffer an eclypse of their vertues and good parts, but when they are in the full of worldly prosperitie. And as it stayeth our course in godlinesse, and quencheth our vertues, so also it increaseth our corruptions, corrupteth our manners, and maketh vs prone to fall into all sin, if we be but a little touched with the least tentation. And as the fertile soile being more fat and slippery, is apter to giue a fall to those that walke vpon it, than that which is grauelly and barren; so this rich and fruitfull ground of prosperitie is much more slippery, than the barren heaths of aduersitie and affliction, and not one of a thousand doth goe long vpon it, but he catcheth many down-fals, not only into sinne, but also into danger and punishment which border fast vpon it. To this purpose one of the Ancients speaketh fitly, that abundance of prosperitie is a notable baite to draw vs vnto sinne, for it puffeth vs vp with pride, and maketh vs to forget the authour of our welfare. And in this respect another saith, that felicitie is more to be feared than misery, seeing misery for the most part bringeth good fruit, from the bitter roote of tribulation; whereas felicitie corrupteth the soule with peruerse securitie, and maketh way for Satan the tempter. By which it appeareth that our danger is farre more when the World alloreth vs with the baits of prosperitie, than when it threatneth and afflicteth vs with trouble and aduersitie: from whence an ancient Father obserueth, that Christ comming into the World that hee might shew vs the way to Heauen, both by his doctrine and example, made choice rather of the afflicted way, than of the faire passage of worldly prosperitie, that we might follow his steps, as being farre the safest way to bring vs to our heauenly Countrie. Our Sauiour Christ (saith hee) might by best right haue raigned ouer them as King, whom himselfe had created: but because he therefore appeared in the flesh, that he might not only redeeme vs with his Passion, but also might teach vs by his conuersation, shewing himselfe an example for vs to follow, he refused to be made a King, and contrariwise voluntarily offered himselfe to suffer on the Crosse, there auoided the glory of regiment, and embraced the punishment of a shamefull death; to this end, that his members might hereby learne, to flee the Worlds fauours, and little to feare his threates and terrors, to loue aduersitie for the Truths sake, and fearing prosperitie to auoid it; because this oftentimes desileth the heart with swelling pride, and that helpeth to purge it by repentance. In that the mind doth exalt it selfe, by this after it is it selfe exalted, it is againe humbled. In that a man forgetteth himself, in this whether he will or no, he is forced to remember that which he had forgotte; in that good things before done perish, in this faults committed long agoe are cleansed and purged. For oftentimes, with the tutillage of aduersitie, the heart is kept downe vnder discipline, whereas if it rush vp to the sterne of contentment, forthwith it is changed in pride through vse of vaine glory.

Aug enarrat. in Psal. 67.

Gregor. pastoral. curæ, 1. par. cap. 3.

But this may yet more plainly appeare if we consider the effects of both, in the examples as well of former ages, as of our owne times. For how difficult, and almost impossible it is to walke in this Sun-shine of prosperitie and not to bee tanned, to breathe this infected aire and not to be corrupted with noysome and carnall lusts, it is euident both on the one side, by the huge multitudes of those who in abusing it, haue beene abused by it; and on the other side, by the exceeding raritie and paucitie of those, who by the good vse thereof, haue beene made more vertuous, and better fitted for the seruice of God. For if you take a computation of both, you shall find a greater disparitie betweene them in their number, than betweene the seruants of God and the seruants of Baal, according to Elias account; the one exceeding the Starres in the multitude, the other being as rare as blacke Swans, vnlesse we will reckon of some few, who had their prosperitie tempered with a great measure of affliction, which as an Antidote expelled the poyson of the other, and like a cold frost nipping their rankenesse, made them to become more fruitfull. How many haue wee read and heard of, that haue valiantly resisted the assaults of aduersitie, and haue patiently endured pouertie, and that which is worse, losse of wealth, sicknesse and diseases, banishment, and imprisonment, yea, death it selfe, and horrible tortures, much worse than death? But shew mee enow to intitle a number, of those who haue by worldly prosperitie, riches, honours, and pleasures, beene made more religious and zealous in Gods seruice, more vertuous, wise, humble, temperate, and more carefull and watchfull ouer their wayes, that they might not offend God the Authour of their wel-fare. Yea shew mee almost the man, that hath not by worldly prosperitie beene made worse, more forgetfull of God, more negligent in Christian duties, and vicious in his whole course and conuersation. Whereas contrariwise a whole age were too little to reckon vp those who haue come out of the fire of affliction more purified, profited vnder this Schoolemaster, and by these fatherly chastisements haue increased in their loue towards God, & in their care to please him by their holy obedience.

Yea, leaue if you will obserue the same men, and you shall see them not the same, but exceedingly differing from themselues in these different estates: looke vpon Saul in his his meane condition, and you shall see him modestly hiding himselfe, as vnworthy to be King: but being once seated in the throne, & swelled with drinking this royal poison, how proud he is and insolent, disobedient and rebellious, loving his Kingdome better than his God, and against his knowledge and conscience, making warre with Heauen, rather than he would not haue it continued to him and his posteritie, though he were justly deposed for his sinne. See also how in the entrance into his raigne he spareth his enemies, and deliuereth offenders from deserued punishments, but afterwards with deadly & implacable malice persecuteth his friends, and tyrannically murthereth the guiltlesse and innocent. But if worldly prosperitie were only powerfull with wicked worldlings, it were no great wonder: see therefore how it hath also preuailed against Gods Saints. Behold holy Dauid, who in his afflicted estate exceeded all in Pietie, and was esteemed by God worthy that prayse, to be pronounced a man according to Gods owne heart; how fouly hee was foiled with ease and prosperitie, and after many famous victories, now enjoying secure peace, was assaulted and vanquished with his owne lusts. See here his great humilitie, comparing himselfe to a dead Dogge and a Flea; and there (not content with the Royalties of a Kingdome, vnlesse hee knew ouer how many hee commanded) enjoyning, yea, forcing in pride of heart, his seruant Ioab to number the people. In this consider his tendernesse and pious mercie, sauing his enemy when hee had him in his power, his conscience checking him for cutting the lap of his garment, when he spared his throate, but in that, murthering his faithfull and well deseruing Souldier, for no other fault but because his Wife was too beautifull for a Subject, yea rather than hee would not haue him dispatched, adioyning others of his innocent seruants in the cruell Massacre. Which bloudy sinne he was now able to digest without remorse for a long space, and dully to stand vnder this intolerable weight, who before was very crooked with the farre lighter burthen of his infirmities. So looke vpon Ezechiah in his bed of sickne, and there you shal see him humbling himselfe before God, and praying; and then behold him being recouered to his health, & you shall find him glorying in his wealth, & in pride of heart boasting of his treasures.

And if these single victories ouer these great Worthies doe not sufficiently shew the strength of this enemy; see what conquests this worldly prosperitie hath made of whole Nations: I will to say nothing of heathenish people, nor of the foure great Monarchies, who hauing conquered all others, were themselues ouercome by their prosperitie, which first made them licentious in all manner of sinne, and afterwards slaues to their conquered enemies; looke vpon the Israel of God, in the whole time of the Iudges and Kings, and you shall see them in the time of aduersitie, religious and deuout, forsaking their sinnes and seeking the Lord; but being restored and repossessed of Gods blessings, and flourishing in prosperitie, you shall find them polluting Gods House, erecting Idolatry, forsaking God, and worshipping Deuils. And this good Ezra obserued and confessed, namely, that the people hauing obtained but a little breathing time from their afflictions, did take occasion thereby to forsake Gods Commandements. And Nehemiah acknowledgeth that the people abounding with all plentie did eate, fill themselues, and became fat, and then grew rebellious and disobedient, committing all manner of sinne and outrage; for which being deliuered into the hands of their enemies and afflicted, they humbled themselues and cried vnto the Lord for mercy and deliuerance, but hauing againe obtained rest, they returned to doe euill before him.

Ezra.9.8,10.

Nehem.9,25, 26,27,28.

But vnto the experience of ancient ages, we may adde our owne times: for who seeth not that commonly where there is most affliction, there is also most deuotion, Religion, and obedience? and contrariwise where there is prosperitie and plentie of all things, there is most want of the feare of God, and greatest penurie of grace and vertue. For the cleering of this, compare the Prison with the Court, and the house of mourning with the house of feasting and rejoycing; & whereas in the one you shall heare religious discourses, Prayers to God, and inuectiues against the Worlds vanities; in the other you shall find nothing but riot and ribauldry, vaine iesting and blasphemous swearing, surfetting and drunkennesse, chambring and wantonnesse, audacious boldnesse in euill, and shamefastnesse in nothing, vnlesse at vnawares, being among their wicked Consorts, they haue said or done something that sauoureth of Religion; as though there were neither God, nor Deuill, Heauen nor Hell, and as though they had sold themselues vnto sinne, and had exchanged the eternall ioyes of Gods Kingdome, with the temporarie vanities of the World. But lest this dissimilitude of behauiour should seeme to arise from the differences of the persons, and not of their estates, let vs consider the diuers effects of these two estates in the same men. And leauing Worldlings to the World, who seeth not that those who make profession of Religion, are exceedingly cooled in their zeale, and corrupted in their liues and conuersation, through the prosperitie of the World: and that not only counterfeit Christians, but euen such as in their meane and more poore estate, would rather haue suffe-

ted any persecution, euen to the taking away of their liues, than they would disgrace their profession by offering any scandall, or bee drawne to slacken their pace in the way of godlinesse, are by degrees so carried away with the inticing baites of prosperitie, that first they abate of their heate, and afterwards become luke-warme, or key-cold in their religious profession and practice? And howsoeuer they retaine still the name of Christians, lest they should be branded with that dreadfull badge of Apostasie, yet come to the touch-stone of their liues, and to their carriage and demeanour in their particular places and callings, and you shall find many of them, as worldly, couetous, and niggardly in contributing to religious and charitable vses, yea, as proud and vaine in apparell, as deceitfull in their dealings, and riotous in needlesse and idle expences, as professed Worldlings. So that whereas aduersitie could not foile them with his sharpest encounters, when he purposely bent all his forces against them; prosperitie hath subdued them, and made them captiues to the world, as it were in play, taking no great paines to obtaine the conquest.

§. Sect. 9. The reasons why prosperitie is so dangerous.

Now the reasons why wee are so easily foiled and ouercome by worldly prosperitie, are, because it doth soften and effeminate our minds, so as they can indure no labour, nor sustaine the least force and violence: for as the Lute string being softned in water swelleth much in bignesse, but loseth all its strength; so our heartes being moistned and mollified with these waters of prosperitie, exceedingly swell in pride, but in the meane time lose all their strength and Christian fortitude, so as they cannot indure the least incounter of an enemy. Or else it is because it maketh vs reckelesse and secure; so as wee fearing no assault neuer muster vp our forces, that we may haue them in a readinesse, and so being taken at vnawares, and vnprouided, we are not able to stand or make resistance: for as the cold of aduersitie gathers and vnites all the powers of the soule, and by vertue of this vnion inables them to make resistance, when they are incountred; so the heat of prosperity dissipating & scattering them, maketh them much more easie to bee ouercome. Or which is most probable, because prosperitie puffeth men vp with pride, and making them leaue their dependency on God, causeth them to trust in themselues and their owne strength: and so God resisteth them in their pride and forsaketh them, who had first forsaken him and therefore no marvell it is if being left of God, they be easily ouercome of the weakest enemy. Whereas contrariwise affliction maketh vs flee vnto God for helpe, and distrusting all outward helpes to relie on his power and promises; and so though we haue to deale with a mighty ene-

And thus haue I manifested the great power of this Monarch, by the greatnesse of his victories, and haue shewed how much more dangerous he is than affliction and persecution. Whereby it appeareth, that a far greater measure of grace and Christian resolution is required, to beate and resist the encounters of worldly prosperitie, than of the other which seemeth to flesh and bloud so terrible and vnresistable. For as it is much more intollerable to indure a tickling itch than a smarting paine; so it is much more impossible to retaine a Christian constancy in the course of godlinesse, when the World tickleth vs with this itch of prosperitie, than when we feele the smart and paine of troubles and afflictions: For where there is greatest liberty of estate, there vertue hath the greatest employment. To this purpose one saith fitly, that it is a note of singular vertue, to stirre and contend with worldly felicitie, that is may neither allure, corrupt, nor ouerthrow vs, and great vnhappinesse to bee ouercome of this earthly happinesse.

The consideration whereof should make vs to keepe a narrow watch ouer our selues, so at all other times, so especially in our flourishing prosperitie, because (as hath beene shewed) this enemy is much more dangerous, and wee, through our reckelesse securitie, and carnall loue of earthly things, much more vnable to make resistance. To this purpose one saith, that when the perswasion of enemies ceaseth, our heart is much more vigilantly to be obserued: for in the time of peace, whilst we haue liberty to loue, we take liberty also to enuie, & compasse our ambitious ends. The which was practised by another, as himselfe professeth: I feare no drosse (saith he) prosperitie than aduersitie; for prosperitie maketh me mirth in a sweetnesse reckelesse, and so deceiueth me: but aduersitie, because it hath some mixture of bitternesse, like vnpleasant potions, maketh me fearefull and suspicious. Whose practice let vs also follow, casting aside carnall securitie, and carefully arming our selues against the tentations of prosperitie, which are pleasantly pernicious, and most hurt vs, when they most delight vs, and seeme to threaten least danger. Now if we would know how to fight against this enemy, where our chiefe strength lyeth, and what are the best weapons to bee vsed for the obtayning of victory, wee must consider that the Christian Champion must not vndertake this Combate, nor enter the Lists in his own name, but (as Dauid against Goliah) we must come out against him in the Name of the Lord; wee must not relye vpon our owne strength, but vpon the Lords assistance, and vpon the power of his might, through which alone we are inabled to ouercome, neither must our comfort and confidence be grounded vpon any abilitie, that we can make in our selues to subdue this enemy, but in this, that our Captaine Iesus Christ hath ouercome him for vs. And this must make vs resolue vpon him by earnest and continuall prayer, desiring his helpe and assistance of his holy Spirit, whereby we may be deliuered in the day of temptation, and they euen all our worldly lusts killed and crucified in vs.

With which our prayers we must ioyne a Christian courage in the fight, not with faint and cowardly fainting, for this being vaine and vnmanly, will rather betray vs to the enemy, then defend vs from his force; but with the holy resolution of a Christian, vsing the gifts and graces of Gods sanctifying spirit. And being armed, we must obserue the best manner of fight for obtaining the victory: to which purpose let vs know, that we proclaime warre against prosperitie and worldly vanities, and manfully resist in the combate of temptations, when we thrust them out from hauing a chiefe place in our hearts, making them as slaues to follow and obey vs, and not as Lords to rule and raigne ouer vs. When as wanting them, we doe not greatly desire their company, much lesse vse wicked and vnlawfull meanes, for the obtaining of this vnprofitable societie. When as hauing them we doe not set our hearts vpon them, but esteeme them base and contemptible, in comparison of the rich iewels of Gods graces, and the eternall ioyes of his Kingdome, being contented to lose them, rather than in the least degree to hazard the other. And when we immoderately grieue not, but rest well contented, if it bee the pleasure of God to take them from vs, yea when we our selues can willingly cast them away for Christs sake, and renounce and forsake them, when as they will not stand with our profession and practise of Religion, being content to leaue all the Worlds glory, and to take vp our crosse and follow Christ. In a word, we fight against worldly prosperitie, when we dote in, we kill it, when we contemne it, we obtaine the victory when we flee from it, and renounce it, as often as it is the Deuils Solicitour to perswade vs vnto sinne, or a Corriuall with God or his graces vseeing vs for our hearts, or an alluring bait which inticeth vs to swallow the hooke of temptations, and so giue entertainment to the wicked suggestions of the Deuill.

CHAP. VI.

Reasons which may moue vs to contemne worldly prosperitie.

NOw that wee may not thus set our hearts and affections immoderately vpon worldly prosperity, but may despise and contemne it when it commeth into comparison with Gods fauour and grace, or the glory of his Kingdome, or allureth vs vnto sinne, there are many arguments which may perswade vs. At first, because prosperity doth very seldome better our spirituall estate, and further our saluation, but almost alwayes maketh vs worse, more prone vnto sinne, and further off from God and godlinesse. For as the Moone being in the full, is furthest distant from the Sunne, from whom shee receiueth her light and brightnesse, so when wee are in the full of prosperity, wee are furthest off from God the Author and fountaine of all our good. But of this I haue alreadie spoken.

Sect. 1. Prosperitie seldome betereth our spirituall estate.

Secondly, let vs know that the meane estate is much to bee preferred before the greatest prosperity and abundant plenty of these earthly things, not only for the reasons aboue alleaged, but also because it is most safe and free from danger, as not being so low to bee trod vpon, nor so high as to bee alwayes feared in the eye of enuy; not so weake as to lie open to all oppression, nor so mighty as to be made the marke of conspiracies and secret treasons. For as the low shrubs are made the prey of the beasts to browze vpon, and the ordinary fuell of the fire, and the highest trees are most subiect to Lightning and Thunder, and exposed aboue all others to the violence of euery tempest; whereas the trees of middle growth are free from both these dangers: so those who are in the lowest estate of pouerty, are often oppressed with wrong and injury, those who are placed in the high top of worldly prosperity, are made more obnoxious to the rage of superiour powers, being either had in iealousie for their greatnesse, or aspiring too fast, as though they would ouer-top them, or thought in respect of their abundance a fit bootie to seize vpon. And only the meane estate is most free from these extreame perils, being below enuy, and aboue contempt. And this the very Heathen man could discerne by the light of nature: It is (saith hee) the property of a great minde, to contemne great things, and to desire sufficiencie and mediocrity, rather than abundance and superfluity; for these are profitable, and euen vitall, but those as much as they abound and ouer-flow, hurt. So too much raine spoyles the Corne as doth drought, the Seas are troubled with too much blowing, and too much from fulnesse commeth not so repentance, and the same happeneth to mens minds, which immoderate felicity burſteth, ſo as they are not only injurious to others, but alſo to themſelues. Vnto this we may adde the wiſe Huſhai's authority, as it is ſtrongly backed with his powerfull reaſons: Giue me (ſaith he) neither pouerty nor riches, but feed me with food conuenient for me: leſt I be full and denie thee, and ſay, who is the Lord? or leſt I be poore and ſteale, and take the Name of my God in vaine. The meane eſtate is therefore moſt to bee deſired, ſeeing it preſerueth vs from forgetfulneſſe of God, irreligion, and prophaneneſſe, which accompanieth proſperity; from the vſe of vnlawfull meanes to maintaine our ſtate; and from impatiency, murmuring and repining againſt God; to which we are expoſed in pouerty & aduerſitie.

Prou. 30. 8.

§. Sect. 3. That proſperitie is but one of Gods ordinary gifts, which hee alſo beſtoweth on the wicked.

Thirdly, let vs conſider that this worldly proſperity is but one of Gods ordinary gifts, which is of no great excellency and worth, being compared with his rich iewels, his ſpirituall graces, and eternall ioyes; as it may hereby plainly appeare, in that he ſcatereth them as common and ſtriuiall trifles, amongſt his enemies, as well as his friends, and beſtoweth them as well on thoſe, who contemne and rebell againſt him, as vpon thoſe that loue and ſerue him: yea moſt commonly hee giueth to his children theſe earthly bleſſings with a ſtraic and ſparing hand, and affordeth them to ſtrangers and enemies in great plentie and abundance, both becauſe they are things of ſmall value, and therefore more fit to bee the wages of ſeruants and ſlaues, then the patrimony and portion of children: and alſo becauſe through our corruption, they are (as I haue ſhewed) baits to catch vs, and ſnares to entangle vs. And that God thus diſpenſeth of theſe earthly things, it may appeare plainly by euident places of holy Scripture: the holy man Iob ſaith, that the tabernacles of robbers doe proſper, and they are in ſafety which prouoke God, whom God hath enriched with his hand: and in another place he doth at large deſcribe the great proſperity of wicked men, in that they attained to old age, abundance of wealth, and enioyed peace with immunitie from affliction: in that all which they tooke in hand ſucceeded, and all about them proſpered; in that to their profits were ioyned pleaſures, and both continued not only to themſelues euen to their death, but alſo to their children and poſterity. So the Pſalmiſt teſtifieth vs that the wicked boaſteth that he hath his owne hearts deſire, and that his wayes alwayes proſper and ſtandeth ſo ſtraic in his owne conceit, that he cannot bee moued, nor be in danger. Seeing therefore theſe worldly things are ſo common, baſe and contemptible in vs who are heires of all Gods promiſes, ſhould not them worthy our loue, wherein Gods deepeſt ſtraine, and tranſcendent mercies haue them in ſuch great abundance: but let vs fixe our hearts and affections vpon that heauenly inheritance which is prepared for vs, which being of infinite value, is worthy of our loue, as being that moſt precious treaſure, which the Lord hath peculiarly reſerued as a patrimony for his owne children. And as we are exhorted, Loue not the world nor the things that are in the world, to wit, ſimply and abſolutely in it ſelfe, as Gods good creature, which we may vſe well and holily, and therefore vnto holy, becauſe in their owne nature they are good; whether are they ſtained or defiled by any other thing by him, who hath all power in heauenly and earthly things, the which he hath giuen to good men, leſt they ſhould ſeeme to loue this, and to euill men, leſt they ſhould haue bought excellent and gifts of great price, and are taken from good men, that they may be tried, and from euill men, that they may be tormented. And in another place he ſaith, that it ſeemed good to the diuine prouidence, to prepare for the iuſt euils inſtead of goods: for the iuſt, which the vniuſt poſſeſſe not vnioy; and euils for the wicked, which the wicked ſhould not be tormented with: for the good ſhall not be tormented with the euils which haue theſe temporall things, good and euill, common to both, that neither the good things ſhould be vnder greedily deſired, which the wicked alſo enioy, nor the euill things ſhould be diſhoneſtly and vnlawfully auoyded, the which are commonly incident to the good.

Fourthly, let vs remember that very rarely the ſame man is richly rewarded, both in earth and heauen, or enioyeth the glory of the World, & the glory of Gods Kingdome, the treaſures of earth, and the treaſures of heauen; temporall pleaſures, and eternall ioyes: I ſay rarely, leſt any ſhould deſpaire, and but rarely, and not often, leſt any ſhould preſume, and thinke that hee may ſecurely, and with eaſe enioy both. So our Sauiour pronounceth them bleſſed that hunger now, for they ſhall be ſatisfied, and that weep now, for they ſhall laugh, and that are perſecuted now, for they ſhall richly be rewarded in heauen: But contrariwiſe he denounceth a woe againſt thoſe that be rich, becauſe they haue receiued their conſolation, and to thoſe that are full, for they ſhall hunger; and to thoſe that laugh, for they ſhall waile & weep: & elſewhere he teacheth his Diſciples, that they ſhall weep and lament, and the world ſhall reioyce, that they ſhould ſorrow, but their ſorrow ſhould be turned into ſuch ioy, as ſhould neuer be taken from them. And the Apoſtle teacheth vs, that it is a righteous thing with God to recompence tribulation to ſuch wicked worldlings as trouble his ſeruants; but to them that are troubled, reſt with the Saints, when the Lord Ieſus ſhall ſhew himſelfe from Heauen with his mighty Angels. And, who can doubt but that the Iudge of Heauen and Earth will iudge righteous iudgement? ther a man might in joy rest here; and rest in Heauen; and maketh this answere: This is impossible, O man, and in the number of those things which thou vainly hopest. It cannot be, it cannot be, I say, that he who hath liued in flesh and security, and hath continually spent, euen all his dayes in worldly delights, and hath improuidently and negligently passed his time, that such an one should attaine that honour and glory which is reserued in Heauen. To this purpose it is that the Scripture alloteth to euery one their portion, both the wicked and the godly; the wicked doe receiue theirs in this life, euen the pleasures and prosperity of the World, but the godly theirs in the life to come, when hauing finished their race, they shall receiue the crowne of glory. So the Psalmist saith, that the men of the world haue their portion in this life, whose bellies God filleth with his hid treasures: their children haue enough, and leaue the rest of their substance for their children. But I (saith hee) will beholde thy face in righteousnesse, and when I awake, I shall be satisfied with thy Image. And our Sauiour describing the state of men both heere and in the life to come, in the persons of Dines and Lazarus, diuideth to either his owne portion; to Dines, and with him to all pompous worldlings, costly apparell, delicious fare, and plenty of all things in this World, but eternall torments in the World to come: to Lazarus, and with him, to almost all the faithfull, pouertie heere, and a great measure of misery and affliction; but after this life a large portion of eternall ioy and blessednesse in Gods Kingdome. And least I might seeme inforce the parable, you shall see that our Sauiour Christ himselfe doth purposely thus apply it, where hee bringeth in Abraham speaking thus to the rich man; Sonne remember that thou in thy life time receiuedst thy pleasures (so hath the worde in the originall more emphasically signifie thy good things, or thy portion of good) and likewise Lazarus paines (or his portion of euils) now therefore (saith he) is he comforted, and thou art tormented. Which reason of Abrahams being syllogistically framed, infetcheth worldlings a fearefull conclusion: Those who in their life time liue in plenty and voluptuous pleasures, shall bee tormented in Hell fire; and those who patiently endure misery and afflictions, shall be in ioy and blessednesse; but thou rich man liuest in all plenty and voluptuous pleasures, and Gods poore seruants patiently endure misery and afflictions; and therefore thou must bee tormented in Hell, wherein they shall inherit the ioyes of Heauen. And in truth what shame of heart haue these secure worldlings, that they should be pitied and beloued of the deare seruants of God, or vpon what reason haue they to imagine, that they shall haue a double portion in Gods gifts, both in this life, and in the life to come, when his owne children must be contented with a single, though a most excellent part, and may seldome bee suffered to enjoy both heauenly glory, and worldly prosperity, vnlesse it bee tempered and seasoned vnto them with manifold crosses and afflictions? Yea let them know, and knowing tremble, that the righteous Iudge of Heauen and Earth doth administer righteous iudgement; and because there is none so bad, but haue in them some good naturall parts, some restraining graces, and haue beene the instruments of doing some thing which at least hath had the appearance of good; therefore God being infinite in bountie, will not let any thing, that hath but a shew of goodnesse goe vnrewarded, but giueth to worldlings for these good things in them, or done by them, temporall blessings and benefits, wherewith being rewarded to the full, and farre aboue their deserts, they can expect no more, seeing they haue no part in Christs merits. Againe, because there is none so good and holy, but they are blotted and stained with infirmities and imperfections: therefore the Lord being infinite in iustice, doth not only punish these sinnes in his owne deare Sonne, but doth also chastise and correct his faithfull seruants themselues, that they may bee examples of his righteous iudgements, and teach wicked Worldlings what they are to expect for their trayterous rebellion, and outragious sinnes, when as Gods faithfull Seruants and deare Children, are so sharply afflicted for their slips and smaller faults, which haue beene already fully punished in their Sauiour. O that this were but well considered, and then would Worldlings haue little cause to be puffed vp with pride, because they exceed others in worldly pompe and prosperity: then would all (who are not extreamely secure) when they are greatly aduanced in their worldly estate, carefully take heed that their spirituall estate bee not as much impaired, and feare least this temporall prosperity bee all the portion that euer they shall receiue; then would not those who want these earthly benefits immoderately desire them, and seeke vnlawfull meanes to attaine vnto them, but would best contented with their sufficiencie and short allowance, hopefully expecting to receiue their portion in the life to come; then would not those that haue them, set their hearts vpon them, but would willingly part with them to good vses, that in exchange they might haue the assurance of Gods loue, and their owne saluation more certainly confirmed vnto them. And hauing this base and brazen money of worldly abundance come to their hand, they would not hoord and still remaine in their possession, but part with it vpon the next good occasion, easion, lest death comming the value thereof should bee cryed downe, and so become to be of no worth.

9. Sect. 5. Prosperity abused increaseth their condemnation who abuse it.

Lastly, let vs consider that worldly prosperitie immoderately loued, or otherwise abused, not only depriueth vs of our portion in our heauenly inheritance, but also procureth a portion for such as thus abuse it with Hypocrites in Hell, where there is weeping, wailing and gnashing of teeth: for woe vnto them that now laugh, for they shall not only cease their mirth, but contrariwise shall waile and weepe: so that worldly mens plenty is their snare, and their prosperity their ruine, as the Psalmist speaketh. Now if wee would also remember how prone wee are to this abuse (as before I haue shewed) there would bee little reason, why wee should greatly desire this worldly prosperitie, if wee haue it not, or not feare it when wee haue it, and much lesse that wee should take more paines for the obtayning of it, than the rich treasures of Gods Kingdome; or set our hearts vpon it with more feruent loue, being both base, momentany and dangerous, than vpon those heauenly and eternall joyes which are prepared for vs in the World to come. And thus much shall suffice for those arguments which may generally perswade vs to contemne worldly prosperity, comming in comparion with spirituall and heauenly things, and to flie and renounce it, when it is vsed as the Deuils, or the Worlds baite to allure vs vnto sinne: vnto which many more might bee added; but that I reserue them, and the more full and effectuall ranging of this point, till I come to speake of the contempt of the chiefe parts of this prosperitie, namely the honour, riches and pleasures of the World.

Psal. 69.22.

CHAP. VII.

Of morall and ciuill vertues, which are to be contemned, and that they are to be reckoned among those things, which hinder vs from sanctifying Grace.

9. Sect. 1. That ciuill vertues doe not benefit, but hurt those that rest in them.

HAue spoken in generall concerning the temptations of prosperity, and of the meanes whereby wee may resist them: now wee will descend to more particulars, and intreate of the seuerall kindes of them: To which purpose wee are to know that the temptations of prosperity may arise either from the goodnesse, or from the corruptions of those things wherewith they are accompanied: for they are either inward, and in our selues, or else outward in some externall worldly obiects. The inward arise from some thing in vs that is good: in the bodie, the vse of the fiue outward senses, vnderstanding, memorie, wit, iudgement, reason, and other vertues, or some other gifts and ornaments of the soule. By vertues I vnderstand not those which are truely Religious Graces and holy Duties ioyned with the knowledge, loue, and feare of God; but those Morall, Ethicall, and Ciuill Vertues, which are in a man varegenerate before his Conuersion, which may well bee reckoned as parts of Worldly prosperity, seeing there is no earthly comfort, nor Worldly happinesse without them. The which in this Discourse I purpose not to take strictly, but to comprehend vnder this name the faculrie with the function, the internall habit with the externall act and operation; all which in themselues are good, as being the gifts of God, either which wee haue naturally and ordinarily bestowed vpon vs in our Creation, or more extraordinarily wrought in vs by Gods Spirit, which may bee called peculiar gifts, if wee respect the former, because they are not bestowed vpon all that are varegenerate; but are vsually by diuers called the common gifts of the Spirit, being opposed to sanctifying and saiuing Graces, because they are common to the Elect with the Reprobate. But howsoeuer they are good, as Gods gifts, and in their owne nature, yet they are not good vnto vs, because they are imperfect and mingled with corruption; not good to vs, because Sathan, the World, and our owne sinfull Flesh abusing them, doe easily out of them a most dangerous occasion, namely that because they excell all other Worldly things, and wee excell in them the ordinary sort of men, therefore wee must so dote on them, and ouer-weene their worth, as though our chiefe happinesse consisted in them, neglecting in the meane time all sanctifying Graces as needlesse, because these Morall and Ciuill Vertues are sufficient for our Saluation. And thus the whole Sect of Stoickes were abused and deluded in ancient times, and herewith the Papists in our owne times are (though not quite blinded yet) shrewdly blinded, and amongst our selues many Worldlings, and varegenerate men, are pitifully misled, euen to their vtter ruine and destruction, imagining that because they excell the ouer-commings of the World, desperate Atheists, and prophane Russtins, in Morall and Ciuill Vertues, and be louers of Iustice, Fidelity, Honesty, Temperance, and the like, that they may hereby be approued of God in this life, and thus after they may ascend into Heauen: in the meane time contenting themselues to be without all sanctifying graces, as the true knowledge of God, faith, repentance and the like.

But

But that all flesh may ceasse to bee proud of these good workes, to set their hearts vpon them, to esteeme them aboue Gods sauing grace, and to place in them their chiefe righteousnesse, as though they were sufficient for their iustification; and contrariwise, that they may learne to contemne and basely to esteeme of them, in comparison of Christ and his righteousnes applied by faith: let them know that though their vertues, duties, and actions bee glorious in the sight of men, yet they are not acceptable vnto God, nor sufficient for the saluing of their soules. Yea and that they are so farre from that high degree of excellencie which they dreame of, that they deserue not the name of good. For that a vertue, duty, or action may be truely good, it is required, that it be good not onely for the matter and substance of it, but also that it bee well done: for, as Austine saith, a man may doe a good thing, and not doe well in doing it, because he faileth in his end and manner of doing. Now that it may bee thus well done there are diuers conditions required. And these either respect the persons indued with these vertues, and doing these duties, or the ground and foundation whereon they are built, and the fountaine whence they flow, or else the ends which are chiefly and mainly propounded to them: First for the person it is required, that he who is to doe a good action be ingrafted into Christ Iesus, and be a true and liuely member of his body; for vnlesse wee be in him, wee cannot bring forth any fruites of vertue or Christian duties; as himselfe plainly telleth vs: Abide (saith he) in me and I in you: as the branch cannot beare fruite of it selfe, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye except ye abide in me. I am the vine, yee are the branches: he that abideth in me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me ye can doe nothing. So the Apostle saith, that we are Gods workemanship created in Christ Iesus vnto good workes. It is therefore the roote Iesus Christ from which we fetche the sap of vertue and goodnesse whereby wee liue, and bring forth the fruits of godlinesse. It is this Sunne of righteousnes, from which we borrow all our light of grace and vertue: for whatsoeuer goodnesse there is in vs, it is either his inherent righteousnesse and holines imputed and belonging vnto vs, as being members of his body; or else wrought in vs by his Spirit of sanctification dwelling in vs, which also wee haue by vertue of that vnion which is betweene vs and him. To this purpose Bernard speaketh fitly: what (saith he) haue you to do with vertues, which are ignorant of Christ the vertue of God? Where, I pray you, is true wisedome, but in the doctrine of Christ? where is true righteousnes, but in the iustice of Christ? where is true temperance, but in the life of Christ? where is true fortitude, but in the passion of Christ? Therefore those alone are to be accounted wise who are instructed in his doctrine; those alone iust, which through his mercie haue obtained the pardon of their sins; those alone temperate, who study to imitate his life; and those only indued with true fortitude, who in aduersitie doe courageously embrace his lessons of patience. So that a man laboureth in vaine to attaine vnto vertues, if he thinke they may be hoped for elsewhere, than from the Lord of vertue, &c. Againe, the person being in Christ, must through faith in him bee reconciled vnto God; for the person must be accepted before the vertue or duty can be acceptable; it being otherwise impossible that the actions of an enemie should bee well esteemed by him to whom hee is an enemy, especially when many iust exceptions may be taken against them. Now wee are all naturally before we are ingrafted into Christ by faith the children of wrath, and enemies vnto God, as the Apostle speaketh, and therefore nothing in vs can be pleasing to God whilest wee remaine in the state of vnbeliefe. Finally, before wee can bring forth any good fruites of vertue, and holy duties, it is necessarie that wee be first regenerate and sanctified with his spirit, and our hearts must bee purified by faith, before they can worke by loue; for seeing all vertues and graces are the fruites of Gods sanctifying spirit, therefore all those who are not indued with this spirit, are destitute also of all true grace and vertue. So our Sauiour telleth vs that wee must first be good trees of Gods owne planting, before we can bring forth any good fruites. A good tree (saith he) cannot bring forth euill fruit, neither a corrupt tree bring forth good fruite. And in another place: Esther make (saith he) the tree good, and his fruite good, or else make the tree euill, and his fruit euill; for the tree is knowne by his fruite. To the same purpose the Apostle saith, that to the pure all things are pure, but to them that are defiled and vnbeleeuing, is nothing pure, but euen their mindes and consciences are defiled. Neither in truth is it possible that wee should doe any thing truly good, and acceptable vnto God, before we are regenerate and borne againe of water and of the spirit, seeing wee are so corrupted and disabled through originall sinne, that all our a imaginations are only euill, and that continually, that we cannot so much as b thinke a good thought, nor c will that which is good, but as we are inabled thereunto by Gods spirit. For we are not only sicke, but (as the Apostle saith) d starke dead in our sinnes, vntill by his quickning grace wee are reuiued; and therefore as vnable naturally to doe any spirituall and holy dutie, as the dead man is to doe the workes of the liuing. Seeing then these ciuill worldlings wanting faith, and the spirit of God, are not in Christ, and consequently are not reconciled to God, nor regenerate by his spirit, therefore in vaine doe they flatter themselues with an opinion of their morall vertues, and ciuill honestie, in vaine doe they dote vpon, and proudly boast of their naturall good parts: in vaine doe they rest vpon these meanes for their saluation, seeing their vertues are but false and counterfeite, and their workes hauing no true goodnesse in them, are not accepted in the sight of God.

Q. Sect. 3. Our vertues must arise from the true worship of the true God.

The second condition, is that these vertues and duties haue a good foundation and fountaine, from which they arise and spring: as first generally, that they arise from the true worship of the only true God, performed in vprightnesse of heart, with a good conscience, without which euen those actions of Gods seruice which himselfe hath commanded, are odious and lothsome vnto him: so when the Israelites offered outward duties and failed in these, the Lord saith vnto them by his Prophet, Who required this at your hands to treade in my courts? bring mee no more oblations in vaine; incense is an abomination vnto me: I cannot suffer your new moones, nor Sabbaths, nor solemne dayes (it is iniquitie) nor solemne assemblies: my soule hateth your new moones, and your appointed feasts, they are a burthen vnto me, I am wearie to beare them. Esa 1.12.13.14 Esay 66.3. And in another place hee saith, that he that killed a bullocke was as he that slew a man, hee that sacrificed a sheepe, as if he cut off a dogges necke; hee that offered an oblation, as if he offered swines blood, he that burned incense, as if he blessed an idoll, &c. Not because these things were not good in themselues, for God had enioyned them, but because they were not ioyned with Gods true worship, but done with wicked and hypocriticall hearts, and in a customable and formall manner, without any loue, faith or feare of God. To this purpose Ambrose saith, that without the worship of the true God, that is sinne which seemeth to be vertue; neither can any man please God, without God: and he that pleaseth not God, whom pleaseth he but himselfe and the deuell? So that there is no true vertue out of the Church, where the onely true God is worshipped after a true manner.

Q. Sect. 4. Our vertues must be grounded on true godlinesse. Pietas est fundamentum omnis virtutis. Ambros. de offic. li. 1. cap. 27.

More especially there is required that these vertues and good duties, doe proceed from some chiefe fundamentall vertues; as first from true godlinesse, for pietie and honestie must be ioyned together, and where the one is wanting, there the other is hypocriticall and counterfeit: neither is it possible that there should bee any sound iustice, honestie or loue shewed towards men, vnlesse it proceed from religious duty first performed vnto God. Hereof it is that pietie is called the foundation of vertue, because whatsoeuer vertue is not built vpon it, like a house without a foundation, it is subject to ruine, when those weake props of worldly respects are pulled away. As, for example, he that is vertuous because hee is vnder gouernment, will cease to be vertuous when he is set at libertie; hee that imbraceth vertue that thereby hee may be had in honour, is ready to abandon it and become vitious, when it will stand with his credit: he that is faithfull for hire, will for hire become treacherous; but he that entertaineth vertue in pietie and dutie towards God, will constantly persuere in it, when all worldly respects discourage him, because the foundation is immoueable, and cannot be ouerthrowne. And hereof it is that the least graines of vertue ioyned with godlines, are iustly preferred before the greatest measure, and highest degree which is seuered from it; because it is both constant and vnchangeable, and also is continually in growth, whereas the other is subject to decline and vanish, when the fuell thereof faileth. To which purpose one saith, that although that vertue be neuer so much praised, which being seuered from true godlinesse, doth tend to the aduancement of men vnto the glory of the world; yet it is not to be compared to the smallest beginnings of vertue in the Saints, all whose hope is firmely seated in the grace and mercie of the true God.

Secondly, they must arise from true charitie and vnfained loue of God, and our neighbours for Gods sake: neither is there any good fruit which springeth not from the roote of charitie, as Augustine speaketh. And this the Apostle maketh the groundworke of all obedience, where hee saith, that the end of the Commandement is loue out of a pure heart, and a good conscience, and faith vnfained. In the same respect hee saith, that loue is the fulfilling of the Law, because it is the fountaine of all dutie towards God and man; which who so hath springing in him, from him issue and flow the streames of all obedience; but if the fountaine faile, then the streames are quickly dried vp: neither is there any other vertue or dutie acceptable to God, or of any worth and excellencie, valesse it be ioyned with this charitie, as the Apostle doth shew at large. With this agreeth the saying of Bernard, Charity (saith he) is the root of all vertues, without which, whatsoeuer we do it doth not profit vs, &c. And a little after; there carnall concupiscence raigneth, where there is no place to diuine charitie, &c. And againe, so great is the vertue of charity, that where it is wanting, all other vertues are had in vaine.

Thirdly

Thirdly, all our vertues and duties must be grounded on the true knowledge of God, and his will reuealed in his word; for wee must not take vertues vpon the worlds commendation, nor performe duties which haue no other ground than our owne wils, inuentions, and good meanings, for so may we intermatch vice for vertue, and offer to God for duty, that which he hath expressly condemned as wicked, idolatrous and superstitious; but wee must search into his word and reuealed will, declining therefrom, neither on the right hand nor on the left: for as one saith, Perfect vertue is not without the knowledge of the truth, nor the truth without the loue of vertue. Blind deuotion therefore will not profit vs, neither will it auaile vs, that we runne on headlong in an ignorant zeale: for as Augustine saith, he that runneth, must swiftly, being out of the way, is so much the more miserable, because the swifter he runneth, the further he is from his iourneyes end. And therefore it is better to halt in the way of truth, than to runne apace in the way of error, yea it is possible that in the feruencie of our deuotion, being ignorant of the truth, wee may be persecuters of it, and those who professe it; as we may see in the example of Paul, who in his blind zeale persecuted the members of Christ, and afterwards was himselfe persecuted out of the ignorant deuotion of certaine honorable women. So that if wee haue not the light of the knowledge of God and his truth to guide vs, in our good meanings and best deuotions, wee may be no better than cruell persecuters, and consequently subject to Gods wrath, to which all the ignorant are liable; for so the Apostle saith, that Christ Iesus shall shew himselfe from heauen with his mighty Angels, in flaming fire, rendring vengeance vnto them that do not know God, and which obey not the Gospell of our Lord Iesus Christ.

Fourthly, all our vertues and good duties must bee ioyned with faith, as the Apostle requireth, for without faith it is impossible to please God, because whatsoeuer is not done of faith is sinne. To this purpose one saith, that if faith be not first begot in our hearts, other vertues cannot be good, although they seeme good, &c. because it is written, that without faith it is impossible to please God. Where we are not to vnderstand an historicall faith, whereby we know and beleeue, that vertue which we embrace, or that duetie which we performe, is warranted and commanded in the word of God, but a true liuely and iustifying faith, whereby we lay hold vpon Christ and all his benefits for our iustification. For without this neither our persons, nor workes are accepted of God: not our persons, because we are enemies, vntill by Christ we be reconciled; nor our vertues, duties, and workes, because they are imperfect and stained with our corruptions, and therefore they cannot indure the sight of Gods iustice, till their imperfections bee couered with Christs perfect righteousnesse, and their pollution cleansed and washed away with his most precious blood. So that whosoeuer are not endued with this faith haue no true vertues, but counterfeit shadowes, their best actions are but glorious sinnes; which howsoeuer they are magnified among men, yet are they odious and abhominable in the sight of God. And to conclude, when they are most iustified in the world, they are in the state of death and condemnation; for the Apostle saith, that all, without exception, shall be damned which beleeue not the truth; which doome is so certaine, that our Sauiour Christ saith, that hee who beleeueth not is condemned already; because he beleeueth not in the name of the only Sonne of God.

2. Thess. 1. 12.

Ioh. 3. 18.

Fifthly, all our vertues must be imbraced, and all duties must be performed in obedience to God, & because he hath commanded & cõmended thẽ vnto vs in his word: for if they arise frõ self-loue, or loue of the world, either for feare of punishment, or because we would haue the praise of men, or otherwise aduance our worldly ends, they cannot be pleasing vnto God, because we doe not respect his will, but our owne, nor serue him, but our owne turnes.

§. Sect. 8. All our vertues must be imbraced, and good workes done in obedience toward God.

Sixthly, with our other vertues we must ioyne humilitie, which is that precious ornament that beautifieth all other vertues and good parts in the sight of God and men: without which humility (as one saith) he laboureth in vaine which gathereth other vertues: for in another place he saith, He that gathereth other vertues without humility, doth as it were carrie dust into the wind. True humility therefore doth open the eyes, whilest it doth keepe downe and extenuate other vertues, which might be blinded with the wind of pride, and by it a man commeth to know that himselfe is nothing of himselfe. And looke how much a man decreaseth by despising of himselfe, and so much he profiteth in the knowledge of God. And againe, Humility is so necessary to other vertues, that without it they haue not so much as the shew of vertues, &c. for God giueth his grace only to the humble, and vpon the humble alone the spirit of the Lord resteth. And elsewhere he saith, that the building of vertue is erected vpon humility, as vpon his proper foundation. With him agreeth Chrysostome, affirming, that that is not vertue which hath not humility ioyned with it. In all our vertues therefore and good parts let vs carefully keepe humilitie, and flee pride, which is the enemie of vertue, and the poyson, which being mixed with these pleasant and wholsome potions, doth doth make them to become deadly. To which purpose one saith, that because selfe-loue may so impudent as to boast of his vices, and if he doe, he is easily despised, that gloriseth in his shame; therefore the euill of pride is most carefully to be auoided of the vertuous, because none is more easily betrayed, then those who haue deserued praise and commendation, & so for that cause by vaine glory creepe into the heart not of the sluggish and slothfull, but of the industrious and diligent, that hee might cast downe by pride, those whom he could not moue by perswasion. For how much more famous they were for their deserts, so much the faster he found them to be intangled with his snares.

And these are the fundamentall vertues vpon which all other must be built. Now the last condition is, that all our vertues, duties, and good parts, must haue as their chiefe and maine end the glory of God propounded vnto them: for as our Sauiour saith, therefore our lights must shine before men, that they seeing our good workes, may glorifie our father which is in heauen. And the Prophet Esay saith, that therefore the Lord hath made vs trees of righteousnesse of his owne planting, that him selfe might be glorified, by our fruites of obedience. Whereof it is that the Apostle chargeth vs to propound this as the maine end to all our actions, and whether we eate or drinke, or whatsoeuer we doe, to doe all to the glory of God. Which end if we aime not at, our vertues are of no value: for (as Austine saith) our vertues are discerned from vices, not by their offices and functions, but by their scope and intent, and are esteemed not by their actions, but by their ends. For if a man doth any thing, wherein he seemeth not to sinne, if he doth it not for that end which he ought, he is conuinced of sin; for true vertues in men serue God, from whom they haue receiued them. And whatsoeuer good is done of man, and is not done for that for which true wisedome teacheth vs it ought to be done, although in the deed it selfe it may seeme good, yet the end being not right, it is a sinne. And therefore some good things may be done, and they not done well of whom they are done, &c. For it is vniust and sacrilegious to make vice the end of vertue, and to enforce it basely to serue our voluptuous, couetous, and ambitious lusts. And elsewhere he saith, that vertues ought not to waite vpon glorie, honour, and soueraignetie, which good men did desire, & indeuoured to compasse by good meanes, but they ought to waite vpon vertue: for that is no true vertue, which doth not tend to that end, which is the chiefe good of man, before which nothing is to be preferred. The which end if wee leaue, and aime at our owne glorie and praise, though our vertues and actions in themselues be neuer so excellent, yet they are but hypocriticall, and shall (as our Sauiour saith) haue no other reward from God but the reward of hypocrits, the glory of the world and praise of men.

§. Sect. 11. That worldlings in their ciuill vertues and workes of seruice most of the former conditions.

And these are the conditions which giue vnto all vertue and duties the title of goodnesse: Now if we take a view of those meere morall vertues and ciuill duties which haue heretofore beene in Heathen men, and are at this day in our ciuill honest worldlings; wee shall finde none of these conditions obserued: for in them they were ioyned with the worship of Idols and false gods, and in these with the false worship of the true God, whereby they draw neere vnto God with their lips, when as their hearts are farre from him; and contenting themselues with an outward seruice for fashion and customes sake, and resting in the deed done, they neuer worship God aright, in spirit and in truth. To say nothing of those who cast God out of their hearts, and set vp the idoll of the world, honours, pleasures and riches, which they serue in the place of God. So also their morall vertues and ciuill honestie, are not ioyned with pietie, and the true feare of God; for howsoeuer these worldlings seeme to make some conscience of their dealings with men, and to carrie themselues iustly in the world, keeping their fidelitie in their words and promises, yet they haue no care of performing their dutie towards God, but contemne his seruice, neglect the vertues of the first table, which respect God, make no account of blasphemie and cursed swearing, nor of neglecting and prophaning his holy Sabbaths. Neither doe they embrace these vertues, nor performe these duties in loue towards God, (for true charitie is a fruite of the spirit, and they are fleshly and carnall) but for selfeloue, that they may the better atchieue their worldly desires. Neither are they ioyned with the true knowledge of God and his will, seeing they remaine vtterly ignorant, euen of the very principles of religion, hauing onely the small glimse of the light of nature to guide them, and their owne good meaning and blind deuotion to pricke them forward. And therefore wanting sauing knowledge, of necessitie they be also destitute of a liuely and iustifying faith; for before we can come vnto God by faith, we must first know that God is, and consequently their vertues & duties wanting faith to apply vnto them Christs righteousnesse to couer them, and his blood to purge them, doe lie open to the eye of Gods iustice, in their naturall filthinesse and pollution. Neither can they obserue the Apostles conditions of doing these duties with a pure heart and a good conscience; for it is faith that purifieth the heart, and it is the blood of Christ, appli-applied by faith, that purgeth our consciences from dead works, and enableth to serue the liuing God. So also they doe not embrace these vertues, and doe these duties, in obedience to God, because he hath commanded them, but either for feare of men, or to gaine credit, or auoide shame, or else the better to attaine vnto their worldly ends. They are not ioyned with humilitie; for as pride first is the Vsher that bringeth them in, and giueth them intertainment; so being intertained they increase their pride, making them to haue an high conceit of their owne worth, and in comparison of themselues, to contemne all others, as wee may see in the example of the proud Pharisie. Finally, these ciuill worldlings doe not propound to themselues Gods glory, as the end of all their vertues and duties, but their owne profit and vaine glorie; as appeareth in the practise of the Romans, who placed the temple of vertue, & the temple of honour together, because they propounded to themselues honour for the end of their vertue, as Liuie obserued; and may also euidently appeare in the course of ciuill worldlings, amongst our selues, which embrace ciuill and morall vertues for their credit, and because they would be well esteemed amongst their neighbours; or for their profit, hauing hereby better opportunity to increase their estates, in their trades and intercourse of dealings; which worldly ends failing, their honestie, fidelitie, friendlinesse, and all other their morall vertues doe faile also.

God. iii.

Act. 15.

Seeing therefore there is no worth or excellencie in these morall ciuill vertues, and duties of worldlings, and seeing they doe not tend to the aduancement of Gods glory, nor further the saluation of our owne soules; yea seeing they are no better in Gods esteeme, but filthy sinnes which are guilded ouer with a glosse of vertue, and are so far from setting vs forward in the true way to heauen, that they are the matter and ground of a dangerous and pernicious sentation of Satan and the world, whereby they destroy the soules of innumerable multitudes, by perswading them to rest in this morall vertue, and ciuill honestie, as sufficient for their saluation: and so to sleepe securely in their sinnes, vtterly neglecting true repentance, and sound conuersion vnto God, and all the meanes of obtaining a liuely faith in Iesus Christ, whereby they might be iustified before God, sanctified, and saued: therefore seeing it is not onely base in value, but also pernicious in its effects; let no worldling hereafter set his heart on it, and be puffed vp in pride because herein hee excelleth others: but as the Apostle Paul contemned his legall righteousnes, though he had attained to such perfection therein, that he was vnblameable, counting it for Christs sake, and for the excellent knowledge of him, losse, and iudging it dung, so he might winne Christ; and desired that he might be found in him, not hauing his owne righteousnesse which is of the Law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, euen the righteousnes which is of God through faith: So much more let vs all learne to contemne our morall vertue, and ciuill honestie, which is farre more imperfect, base and contemptible, than Pauls legal righteousnes; & turning vnto God with all our hearts, by vnfained repentance for all our sinnes, let vs hunger and thirst after the righteousnesse of Iesus Christ, and desire aboue all worldly things to be made partakers thereof, by a true and liuely faith, and to be indued with his spirituall sanctifying and sauing graces, that so we may performe all duties both of holinesse and righteousnesse, and not onely doe that which is good, but also doe it well, laying a good foundation for all our vertues and duties, and exercising our selues in them in a good manner, with a pure heart, a good conscience and faith vnfained: and finally propounding vnto our selues as our chiefe end, the aduancement of Gods glory, and so glorifying God in our holy conuersations, he will glorifie himselfe in the eternall saluation of our soules, and make vs partakers of euerlasting happinesse.

CHAP. VIII.

Of spirituall wisdome.

NOw thus haue I shewed that worldly, carnall and ciuill vertues are to be contemned, in comparison of Gods spirituall graces, as being the ground of a most dangerous tentation, whereby our eternall good and saluation are exceedingly hindered; the truth whereof might further be shewed and exemplified, by taking a view of all the spirituall vertues comprehended vnder the generall. But because this would bee ouer long; and besides, it is very easie for any to fit that which hath beene generally spoken, to the specials, I will only insist in one particular, namely, worldly and carnall wisedome, wherewith many are bewitched with ouer much cunning, cozening themselues both of Gods grace and of their owne saluation. And least for want of distinct knowledge, we should contemne the good with the bad: I will first shew what kinds of wisdome are warrantable and commendable, that so we may the better vnderstand what that is which is worldly, wicked, and to bee condemned; and afterwards I will set downe some reasons to perswade all Christians to contemne and hate it. For the former, wee are to vnderstand, that wisedome is either diuine and spirituall, or else morall and ciuill. Diuine and spirituall wisdome is a gift and grace of Gods Spirit, bestowed only vpon the elect and faithfull, whereby wee know God and his will reuealed in his word, and carefully and conscionably make a holy vse of this knowledge in our liues and conuersations: where I call it Diuine, because God only is truly wise, and the fountaine of wisdome, from whom those little streames, and small drops which are in vs, doe flow and distill: where also I distinguish it from that which is diabolicall, euen the deceitfull wisdome of the subtill serpent. And I say that it is spirituall, not only because it proceedeth from the Spirit of God; but because it is also chiefly exercised in spirituall and heauenly things. This wisedome is the gift of God: for as Iob saith, With him is wisedome and strength, and he hath counsell and vnderstanding; and howsoeuer there is a spirit in man, yet the inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding. And Salomon saith, that the Lord giueth wisdome, and out of his mouth commeth knowledge and vnderstanding: whom another imitating, saith, that all wisdome commeth of the Lord, and hath beene euer with him, and is with him for euer. Now this wisdome the Lord giueth by his Spirit, and therefore the Spirit of God is called the Spirit of wisdome and vnderstanding, the Spirit of counsell and strength, the Spirit of knowledge and of the feare of the Lord: and he giueth it not vnto all, but vnto his elect and faithfull seruants alone, who are good in his sight, as the Wise man speaketh. To which purpose the sonne of Syrach, speaking in the person of Wisdome, saith thus: The Creator of all things gaue me a commandement, and he that made me, appointed me a tabernacle, and said, let thy dwelling be in Iacob, and take thine inheritance in Israel, and root thy selfe among my chosen. And lastly by the Author this spirituall wisedome is distinguished from that worldly and carnall wisdome, which is inspired by the wicked spirit, the subtile world and our owne corrupt flesh.

Q. Sect. 2. Wherein spirituall wisdome consisteth.

Now this diuine & spirituall wisdome doth consist in our knowledge of God, and of his will, and in a holy obedience thereunto, in the whole course of our liues; for it is partly speculatiue and in contemplation, and partly practicall and in operation: the former is vsually called spirituall wisdome, whereby out of Gods word we know generally what is truth, and what is falsehood, what is good, and what is euill; and answerably in our iudgements approue and chuse the one, and condemne and refuse the other. The latter is called spirituall prudence, whereby wee are able to bring the former into vse vpon euery speciall occasion, putting difference betweene truth and falsehood, good and euill, chusing the one and refusing the other, according to those diuers circumstances, of persons, times, places, meanes and ends. So that the former is exercised in things generall and necessary, shewing what is lawfull, and what vnlawfull in it selfe; the other in things speciall and contingent, shewing what is fit and conuenient, and what vnfit and inconuenient in respect of circumstances: which difference the Apostle maketh, where speaking of things indifferent, he saith, that all things were lawfull vnto him, but not all things profitable or expedient.

1. Cor. 6.12.

Q. Sect. 3. Spirituall wisdome consisteth in practise.

Spirituall wisdome therefore consisteth in the knowledge of God, and his will ioyned with a practicall and holy vse thereof in our liues and conuersations; for without this the other is but an idle speculation, which deserueth not the name of wisdome or Christian prudence, the which is operatiue, causing a man to make vse of that he knoweth, according to that, Iam. 3.13. Who is a wise man and indued with knowledge among you? let him shew by good conuersation his workes, in meekenes and wisdome. To which purpose one saith, that the chiefe wisdome is a commendable life, and a pure mind before God, by which the pure are ioyned with the pure, and the holy associated with the holy. And another saith, that that is wisedome worth esteeme, which doth not flie in the wind of words, but consist in the operations of vertue. But when this wisdome and obedience are ioyned together, then are we truly said to haue attained vnto spirituall wisdom, whereby as our iudgements are informed, so also are our affections sanctified, and our liues reformed and amended. And hereof it is that true wisdome is said in the Scriptures to consist in the feare of God; The feare of the Lord is wisdome, and to depart from euill is vnderstanding. And the beginning of wisdome is the feare of the Lord, all they that obserue them haue good vnderstanding, his praise endureth for euer. Because, where the true feare of God is, it will make those who are indued therewith, to labour after the knowledge of Gods will, that knowing what is pleasing vnto him, they may imbrace it, and what displeasing, that they may auoid it. And for as much as they are alwayes in his sight, it will cause them awfully to demeane themselues as in his presence, obseruing his will, and yeelding obedience to all his Commandements. And thus the Prophet ioyneth these together, saying, that the Spirit of the Lord should rest vpon Christ, the Spirit of knowledge, and of the feare of the Lord, and should make him prudent in the feare of the Lord.

Now this spirituall wisdome consisting in knowledge, obedience, and feare of the Lord, is to bee learned no where else, but but out of Gods Word, in which hee hath set downe his will, and vsed many effectuall perswasions to stirre vp our minds vnto the loue of it. To this purpose Dauid calleth the Testimonies of God his delights, counsellors, and more precious vnto him then thousands of gold and siluer. Secondly, to the same purpose, another faithfull seruant of God must labour in the true vnderstanding of it, and the euerlasting comfortable promises therein reuealed vnto vs in Christ Iesus. To which purpose Dauid prayeth, that God would open his eyes, that he might behold wonderous things out of his Law. Thirdly, to the same purpose, we must vse all holy conference and meditation of it. For as the Bee gathereth her honey out of all sweet flowers, and the Spider her poyson out of the best hearbs: so the wicked vse to wrest the Scriptures vnto their owne destruction, but the godly vse all holy conference and meditation of them vnto their edification. Fourthly, to the same purpose, we must hunger after the sincere milke of the Word, that we may grow thereby. Fifthly, to the same purpose, we must pray vnto God for the assistance of his holy Spirit, that he would open our eyes to behold the wonders of his Law, and powerfully worke in vs a liuely vnderstanding, obedience, and loue of the same. Sixthly, we must vse the helpes of sanctified learning, wherein (though they excell not in worldly wisedome, yet) they are very fruitfull, as before we concluded. Surely (saith he) they are fooles, they are fooles, for they know not the way of the Lord, nor the iudgement of their God. And againe, Is there not a diuine gouernment of the Lord, and wisedome and vnderstanding in him? And thus it appeareth what the true wisedome consisteth in, the properties whereof the Apostle Iames thus describeth. The wisedome which is from aboue is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easie to be intreated, full of mercie and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisie. Which properties (more might be added) we see, that it is spirituall, and consisteth chiefly in spirituall things, namely, in the getting and right ordering of Gods spirituall graces, and setting and furthering the spirituall kingdome of God. Secondly, it is humble and seasoned with meekenesse of spirit, for the Apostle exhorteth him that should be called wise and indued with knowledge, to shew by good conuersation the workes of meekenesse of wisedome. To this same purpose we must take speciall care, least hauing receiued wisedome, there it dwell in vs in the darknesse of ignorance, it driue out and vanish away the light of humility. And so it comes to the wisedome; for although it haue with the vnwise, yet it doth not dwell in the heart of the foolish with the child of pride. Thirdly, it is sincere and simple, and void of all fraud and dissimulation. For as our Sauiour Christ requireth, that his Disciples should be wise as Serpents, so also as simple and innocent as Doues. And the Prophet Dauid saith, that in soothe as by Gods precepts he had gotten vnderstanding, so he precisely hated all the wayes of falsehood. To which purpose Bernard speaketh to the Church after this manner: O Spouse of Christ (saith he) there ought not to be in thee the wisedome of the Serpent without the simplicity of the Doue, nor the simplicity of the Doue without the wisedome of the Serpent; for as much as the wisedome of the Serpent warneth the Doues simplicity to beware of guile, and the simplicity of the Doue tempereth the wisedome of the Serpent, thus it may doe good. And a little after hee saith, thus we ought to be so simple in innocency of life, as that also with this simplicity of life, we should ioyne wisedome; for he that doth not mixe prudence with simplicity, is (according to that of the Prophet) as a Doue deceiued without an heart. And another affirmeth, that well-sighted simplicity is good, when as it is excluded from dissimulation, as that is by no meanes blind in the truth.

9. Sect. 6. That spirituall wisdome is to be highly esteemed, Prou. 1.7.

And this is that diuine and spirituall wisdome which is opposed vnto that which is deuillish, worldly, and carnall; the which is not to be contemned, seeing the wise man telleth vs that none but fooles do despise this wisedome. Yea, rather it is to be highly to be prized, as being a Pearle of more worth than all the World, and much to be preferred before the richest iewels and most precious stones. To which purpose he speaketh excellently, Chap. 8. v. 11. Man (saith hee) knoweth not the price thereof; for it is not found in the Land of the liuing. 15. Gold shall not be giuen for it, neither shall siluer be weighed for the price thereof. 16. It shall not be valued with the wedge of Gold of Ophir, with the precious Onyx, nor the Sapphire. 17. The gold nor the Crystall shall be equall vnto it, nor the change of it shall be for the vessels of fine gold. 18. No mention shall be made of Coral, nor of the Gabish; for wisedome is aboue precious pearles. 19. The Topaze of Ethiopia shall not be equall vnto it, neither shall it be valued with the wedge of pure Gold. And thus also Solomon esteemed it, pronouncing the man blessed that findeth wisedome, and getteth vnderstanding, because the merchandise thereof is better than siluer, and the gaine thereof is better than gold. It is more precious than Pearles; and all things that thou canst desire are not to be compared vnto her, &c. And therefore according to this surpassing excellency ought euery mans heart to be towards it, and his care in vsing all good meanes to diuine vnto it, ought as much to exceed the care of worldly men in compassing earthly vanities, as this rich iewell excelleth all worldly trifles.

CHAP. IX.

Of ciuill and worldly wisdome, and how farre forth to be imbraced, and in what respects to be contemned.

Quest. 1. Of ciuill wisedome and of the cautions thereunto required, that it may bee good and lawfull.

HAuing so much concerning diuine and spirituall wisedome: Ciuill and Morall wisedome is a common gift of Gods Spirit bestowed on man, whereby the vnderstanding being inlightened, hee is able to iudge and discerne what is truth, and what falshood, what good, and what euill in humane and worldly affaires, that being thereby guided and directed, hee may wisely and discreetly manage all his words and actions, especially in those businesses which more properly respect his place and calling. And this wisdome is in its owne nature good, as being the gift of God, bestowed vpon mankind, to a good end, namely, that hee may the better be inabled to performe all duties of his place and calling. And howsoeuer it is not to be esteemed in comparison of diuine and spirituall wisdome, yet if wee compare it with any worldly and temporall gifts of God, the highest place of excellencie is due vnto it, whereof it is that Salomon being put to his choice what hee would haue of God, asketh this wisedome, that thereby he might be fitted for his Kingly calling, and enabled to performe the things of gouernment; the which his wish was approued of God, and according to his desire this wisdome was granted vnto him. But being considered as it is in vs, it is neither absolutely good or bad, but according vnto the vse, good to those that vse it well, and euill vnto those who abuse it vnto euill. Now in respect of the vse, Ciuill policy and wisdome is good, lawfull and laudable, when this is vsed with these cautions: first, when it is ioyned with meeknesse and humilitie. Secondly, when it is tempered and moderated with Christian simplicity and sincerity, so as wee may say with the Apostle, Our reioycing is this, the testimony of our consciences, that in simplicity and godly pureness, and not in fleshly wisdome, we haue had our conuersation in the world. Thirdly, when it is ioyned with truth and fidelity, iust and vpright dealing. Fourthly, when onely lawfull and good meanes be vsed for the effecting and accomplishing of our desires, for thus only deserueth the name of wisdome, when by the vse of honest and lawfull meanes a man can bring to passe things of difficultie. Fiftly, when herein wee aime at good ends, as the aduancement of Gods glory, the furtherance of his religion, the good of the Church and Common-wealth, and the benefit and welfare either of our selues, or our neighbours. And lastly, when being indued with this wisdome wee doe not glory in it nor let our hearts vpon it, preferring it in our loue before that wisdome which is diuine and spirituall, nor resting and relying vpon it more then vpon Gods promise, prouidence and assistance. Whereby it appeareth, that if we will entertaine ciuill and worldly wisdome, we must deliuer it from many corruptions to which vsually it is inthralled: and as our Sauiour Christ commanded vnto his Disciples, that they should not only be wise as Serpents, but also harmelesse as Doues, so must we ioyne the Serpentine wisdome with the Doue-like simplicitie. As for example, we may in Christian policie make question of mens faire pretences, when wee haue no sound reason whereupon wee may ground our belefe, and may make triall before we trust them, especially in matters of great importance, hauing for our president therein the example of our Saviour Christ, who though many professed that they beleeued in him, when they saw his Miracles, yet knowing their inconstancie, hee would not commit himselfe vnto them. So likewise we may vse all good and lawfull policie, to preserue the peace of the Church, and to further the Gospell: and thus Paul by the aduise of the other Apostles associates himselfe with the foure Nazarites in their purifications and offerings, as though himselfe had been one also, that hereby he might giue satisfaction to the Iewes, who were zealous in the Ceremoniall Law, by conforming himselfe to the rites thereof. And thus it is lawfull to vse the like policy for the ouruling of preiudice, as the Apostle Paul did, who in that diuided assembly hee professed himselfe a Pharisie. And Iacob, when as being in danger of his Brother, he vsed all good policy to shift, or at least auoid his fury. Finally, these cautions obserued, we may lawfully vse all good policies and stratagems in the time of warre, as we may see in the practice of Iabus, of the Israelites against the Beniamites, and of Dauid, guided & instructed herein by Gods own word. And thus much concerning that ciuill wisdome which is lawfull and good: whereby it may also appeare, when it is to be esteemed vnlawfull and wicked, namely, when these cautions are not obserued; as first of all, when it is ioyned with pride, arrogancy and vain-glory: for this the Lord condemneth by his Prophet, forbidding the wise man to glory in his wisdome, but if he will glory, to glory in this, that he vnderstandeth and knoweth knoweth God: So the Wise man forbiddeth vs to be wise in our owne eyes; telling vs elsewhere, that there is more hope of a foole, than of him who is thus wise in his owne conceit. And the Apostle willeth vs, that wee should not be high minded nor wise in our selues. Yea so great is this sin, that a grieuous woe is denounced against it; woe vnto them that are wise in their owne eyes, and prudent in their owne sights. Into which sin and wo many fall: who haue no true ground for their conceit, but are so vtterly destitute of wisdome, that they haue not knowledge enough to see their ignorance, nor sufficient wit to discerne their folly. Neither is it a signe of true wisdome, to make a shew thereof, seeing there are not so many wise, as professors of wisdome: and (as one saith) If we were truly wise, we would not think so; much lesse boast of it: for to conceit a mans own wisdom is the first degree to folly; & the next step is, to professe and vaunt of it: whereas he who is truly wise glorieth not in that he hath, but seeing his defects, groaneth for that he wanteth. To which purpose another demandeth; Doest thou (saith hee) waxe proud in respect of thy wisdome? but it is not the property of wisdome to be proud: for by being proud, like a selfe-robber thou spoylest thy selfe of that whereof thou glorieth.

1. King. 3. 9, 10.

Secondly, worldly policie is vnlawfull and wicked, when as it is seuered from Christian simplicitie & sincerities, for these our Sauiour hath conjoyned, willing vs to bee as wise as Serpents, & simple as Doues; & therefore no man ought to seuer them which he hath coupled: & this the Apostle expounded; I would (saith he) haue you wise, to that which is good, & simple concerning euill. For which simplicity Nathaniel is commended by Christ; Behold (saith he) a true Israelite, in whom there is no guile. So also it is euill when as it is not ioyned with truth & righteousnesse. For true wisdom promiseth, that her mouth shall speak the truth, & her lips abhor wickednes, that all the words of her mouth shalbe found righteous; that there shalbe no lewdnes nor frowardnes in them; and that she will cause her followers to walk in the way of righteousnes, & in the midst of the paths of iudgement. So the sonne of Syrach saith, that true wisdome is farre from pride and deceit, and men that lie cannot remember her, but men of truth shall haue her, and shall prosper euen to the beholding of God. Againe, it is euill and vnlawfull; when as men vse wicked and vnjust meanes for the accomplishing of their desires, as lying, facing, swearing, forswearing, treachery and double-dealing: or when as they propound vnto themselues, in their policies, vngodly and sinfull ends, whereby either God is dishonoured, their brethren endamaged, or their owne consciences wounded, and saluation hindered: for (as one saith) to be wise ouer much, is not to play the wise man, but the foole. Finally, this ciuill wisedome is euill to them who haue an ouer-weening conceit of it, extolling and magnifying it aboue its worth, and placing in it (with Aristotle) their chiefe happinesse: as also to those who in their loue so dote on it, that they preferre it before that wisdome which is diuine and spirituall, whereas it should be but an handmaid vnto it, giuing it precedence and place when both cannot stand together. To conclude, it is euill to those who put their trust in their owne wisdome and policies, eyther for prouision of those things they desire, or for their preseruation from dangers, more than in God himselfe, who is our onely preseruer and protector; contrarie to the perswasion of the wise man, who exhorteth vs to trust in the Lord with all our hearts, and not leane vnto our owne wisdome.

Prou. 3. 6.

And thus haue I shewed, how and in what respects this ciuill wisedome and policie is to be accounted warrantable and good, and how it is to be esteemed euil and vnlawfull: in which respect wee are not to set our hearts on it, but to contemne and hate, shun and auoid it. Which that wee may doe, let these reasons moue vs: first, because this worldly and carnall wisedome is not good, nor of any worth and excellencie, but euill, base and contemptible: and secondly, because it bringeth vnto vs no true good or profit, but hurt and disaduantage. That there is in it no worth or excellency, it appeareth, because God esteemeth it not: for whereas he reserueth his chiefe jewels, and gifts of value, onely for his owne seruants and children, he bestoweth this ciuill and morall wisdome, as a common gift both vpon the godly and the reprobate, as appeareth in the example of Achitophel, who though he were desperately wicked, as wee may plainly see in that cursed counsell which hee gaue to Absolon, yet had receiued from God such a large measure of this gift of ciuill wisdome, that hee was not only thought meete to be a chiefe Counseller to Dauid, but the counsell which he gaue in those dayes, was esteemed as if one had asked counsaile at the oracle of God: so was all the counsell of Achitophel both with Dauid and with Absolon. And the like might be said of many others, which for breuitie I ouerpasse. Againe, that the Lord esteemeth and regardeth not these great Politicians who are wise in their owne conceits, Elihu plainly saith it, and Gods dealing with them as plainly proueth it; for being to gather vnto himselfe a select multitude, whereof to make his Church, and seruants of his owne Family, whom hee will sanctifie in this life, and saue, glorifie and crowne with eternall happinesse in the life to come; he passeth by these great Politicians, and vouchsafeth not to call many of these wise men after the flesh, as the Apostle affirmeth, but leauing them to enjoy their glory, of being Counsellers to Princes and Potentates of the World, which they most desire and value, he maketh them none of his counsailers, but keeping all his secrets close from them, hee reuealeth them to such as they esteeme babes and fooles. And therefore seeing the Lord so basely esteemeth of worldly policie, let vs (making his infinite wisdome the rule according to which we are to conforme & square our judgement) learne also to scorne and contemne it; and labour after that spirituall and diuine wisedome, which will make vs wise vnto God, and further our glory and euerlasting happinesse.

9. Sect. 1. That the Deuill is the Author of worldly wisdome.

But this may further our contempt of this worldly wisedome, if we consider that it is not onely not good, or of any worth, but also corrupt and exceeding euil. For first, if we will deriue the pedigree of it, we shal find that it is more ancient than noble, the Deuill himselfe being the father and first founder of it, for the Apostle Iames plainly telleth vs, that this worldly wisdome which descendeth not from aboue, is earthly, sensual and deuillish. Earthly, because it mindeth only earthly things, and maketh vs neuer to forecast how after wee depart from the earth wee may come to Heauen: sensuall, not only because it beleeueth nothing, but that which is subject to the senses, or may bee demonstrated by carnall reason, but because it also mooueth men to pamper themselues in sensuall delights, and voluptuous pleasures; as thinking that there is no other Paradise but the earthly Eden; and deuillish, because it came from the Deuill as the first Authour, and is continually taught by the same Schoolemaster; and will also bring them to the Deuill who vse and practice it, vnlesse they preuent their damnation by vnfained repentance.

Iames 3.15.

9. Sect. 6. Worldly wisdome resembleth Satan in malicious opposing against God.

But that we may more plainly perceiue that this cursed childe doth not degenerate from this wicked parent, if we further consider of it, wee shall finde that it exceedingly resembleth him in the very countenance. For first, as the Deuill with despitefull malice opposeth himselfe against the Majestie of God: so this worldly wisdome being his offspring, taketh the fathers part, and opposeth it selfe with like malice against the wisedome of God. For so the Apostle saith, that the wisedome of the flesh is enmitie against God. And contrariwise the wisedome of God opposeth against the wisedome of the World, and so detesteth it, that he cannot abide that there should bee any mixture thereof with his spirituall wisdome, in the worke of his Ministery, which hee hath ordained for the gathering of his Church, and for their edification in the holy faith. So the Apostle saith, that Christ sent him to preach the Gospell, not with wisdome of words; lest the Crosse of Christ should be made of none effect. That his preaching stood not in the enticing speech of mans wisdome, but in the plaine euidence of the spirit and power, and that hee did not speake the wisedome of this World, neither of the Princes of this World which come to naught, but the wisdome of God, which none of the Princes of this World hath knowne, &c. And by reason of this opposition, the one doth not allow and approue of the other, but interchangeably censure and condemne one the other of meere folly. So the wisdome of the World judgeth of the wisedome of God; for the Apostle saith, that the preaching of the Gospell is to them that perish, and to the wise Grecians, esteemed foolishnesse: and therefore when Christs worldly kindred heard him in his Sermons deliuer this spirituall wisdome from his Father, they went to lay hold on him, because they thought him out of his wits. The reason hereof is, because worldly wisdom can relish nothing, but that which is subject to the senses, or may be demonstrated by carnall reason; to which rules Gods wisdome submitteth not itselfe, but oftentimes soareth an higher pitch, speaking and doing things which are besides, aboue, and contrary to naturall reason, that the infinite depth and power thereof may better appeare. To this purpose one saith, that there is another wisdome of the flesh, which being puffed vp with worldly reasons, doth deny that any thing can be done, of which a naturall reason may not be giuen, and therefore it scorneth and derideth the mysteries of Religion.

1. Cor. 1.17.

So contrariwise the wisdome of God condemneth the wisdome of the World of meere foolishnesse: for so the Apostle saith, that the wisdome of the World is foolishnesse with God. And the reason is, because it is alwayes mixt with sinne, which God esteemeth the greatest folly; whereof it is that vsually in the Scriptures sinne is called by the name of folly, and Sinners are termed fooles. Thus the Prophet concludeth that they are a foolish that doe not know the way of the Lord, and that there is no possibilitie that there should bee any wisdome in them that reject the Word of God: b they haue (saith hee) reiected the Word of the Lord; and what wisdome is in them? And the Wise man saith that they are c fooles, who despise wisdome and instruction, that is, the feare of the Lord and true godlines, as hee there expoundeth it. To this purpose one saith, that to be wise vnto euill is to play the foole. And another affirmeth, that this false wisdome is true folly. And in truth what is more foolish than to gaine the World, yea, some small trifles in the World, and to lose a mans soule? than to embrace carnall things, and contemne spirituall; to exchange for earthly and momentanie vanities, our heauenly inheritance, and that eternall waight of glory? What more absurd than by wilfull sinning to cast a mans soule into Hell, for the gaining of that which he is euery day in danger to lose? the which folly who so will not acknowledge here, that he may forsake it, shall be sure to confesse it, in Hel fire, with bitter griefe and horrible anguish, as it is notably set downe in the Booke of Wisdome. Let vs therefore in time embrace this spirituall and heauenly wisdome, and reiect and hate that which is worldly and carnall, for such contrarietie there is betweene them, that they cannot be reconciled nor ioyned together. To this point one speaketh fitly: If (saith hee) thou wouldest be accounted the Spouse of Christ, what hast thou to doe with the wisdome of the flesh, which is enmitie with God? Wouldest thou reconcile this enmitie, and haue in thee both the wisdome of the flesh and of the spirit? A little leauen fowreth the whole lumpe, and how much more when the leauen is much, and the lumpe little? What fellowship is there betweene the Law of concupiscence, and the Law of Charitie? that ought not to be ioyned with this, because it will not be subiect to it: for the wisdome of the flesh either resisteth the Law of God, and so is an enemy, or vtterly perisheth and commeth to nothing; either it resisteth, or else wholly desisteth; it may be destroyed, that it may cease to bee, but it cannot be kept vnder that it should obey, &c.

Secondly, whereas Sathan is the father of lies, and the chiefe author of dissimulation, treachery and treason; this worldly wisedome is a compounded monster of all this hellish brood. For who seeth not that worldly Politicians doe so accustome their tongues to speake vntruths, that lying may seeme to be their naturall language, seeing they speake it with such facilitie? that they place a great part of their policie, in making their tongues and hearts so to differ the one from the other, that a man by their speeches shall least of all guesse at their meanings? and were it not that like the Deuill their schoolemaster, they did in policy sometimes speake truth, that they may the better gaine credit when they lie, you might as wel know the meaning of their words by a Dictionary of contrarietie, as by that which naturally they seeme to signifie. Finally, that they account him but an heavy headed fellow, and little better then a foole, who is open hearted, and speaketh as he thinketh. Where in what doe they else but peruert the course of nature, and ioyne with the Deuill against God? for whereas hee hath purposely made them a guide to be the interpreter of the mind and heart, they make it to deliuer their meanings as it were in an vnknowne Language which cannot bee vnderstood, and to giue darke Riddles in stead of plaine resolutions? and what do they else hereby but proclaime, that their wisedome is not the wisedome of God, seeing her mouth speaketh the truth, and her lips abhorre wickednesse, but the wisdome of the old Serpent, who being opposed vnto God, taketh delight in lies and falsehood?

So also they ground their policies vpon dissimulation, deceit and fraud, which haue great affinitie with the former, and are able to do litle without her help. And hereby they make faire weather, when they intend a storme shall follow, they carry two faces vnder one hood, making shew of loue where they mortally hate, and smile vpon those whom they desire to kill, like their predecessor Ioab, who stabbed whilest he embraced, and Iudas who by kissing, betrayed. The cloud of their malice is alwayes smoothest where it is deepest, and where for some wrong, either receiued or imagined, they intend greatest mischiefe, there they vse most complements, of cap and knee, faire words and kind embracings; because according to the rule of their politickes, professed hatred loseth opportunitie of reuenge. Yea so farre are they in loue with this deepe dissimulation, and out of liking with Christian simplicitie, innocencie and sinceritie, which is opposed thereunto, that in their language, simplicitie and folly are all one, and fooles are vsually called by the name of innocents. Yea so contrary are simplicitie and puritie to worldly wisdome, that the Apostle also opposeth the one to the other, saying, that he had his conuersation in the world in simplicity and godly pureness, and not in fleshly wisedome; implying thereby, that these two are so opposed, that they can by no meanes stand together.

Vnto this wee may adde their treacherie and treasons, as chiefe pillars of worldly policie, whereby they are readie to betray all those that trust them, and to cut their throats who haue put their liues into their hands, and chosen them as Sanctuaries of refuge; to falsifie their word & promises, confirmed by many vehement protestations, bitter imprecations, and deepe oathes; when as either at the first they intended nothing lesse, or afterwards find that the performance of their promise will not stand with their profit and aduantage. In which treacheries they are so fleshed, that they acknowledge no friendship, nor regard the neerest kindred, but without respect of persons, tread all vnder foot, which stand in their way, and seeme to hinder their wicked designes. The which their treason and villany being discouered, doth not at all daunt them in their cursed course, but one injury occasioneth another, and when they haue no other reason of doing wrong, they will still doe it, because they haue done it; and according to their Prouerbe, whom they haue once injured, they will neuer forgiue, but adde one wrong vnto another, like cruell cowards, still keeping downe him whom they haue vnjustly ouerthrowne, lest rising againe and recouering strength hee might reuenge himselfe for these wrongs receiued.

1. Sect. 11. Worldly wisdome propoundeth wicked ends.

Finally, to make vp a perfect wickednesse, vnto these euill meanes they adjoyne as euill ends; neuer respecting in any of their proceedings the glory of God, the good of his Church, or the saluation of their owne soules; but rather, joyning with Sathan in all their courses, they seeke how they may most dishonour God, vexe and afflict his children and seruants, and ingage their own soules to eternall destruction, by adding one wickednesse to another; or to take them at the best, the chiefe workes which they aime at, are either honours and preferments, which they aspire vnto by treading others vnder foot, or riches, the Mammon of iniquitie, which they seeke to compasse and obtaine by fraud and deceit, injustice and violence, oppression and cruelties: or voluptuous pleasures which are wicked and vnlawfull, the which they often procure and raise out of the griefe of their poorer Neighbours, delighting themselues with their hurts; and making way to their superfluous pleasures, by wringing from them those necessaries which should maintaine their liues; like that wicked Achab, who must haue Naboths inheritance to make him a Garden.

2. Sect. 12. That worldly wisedome hath beene alwayes embraced and much esteemed in the World. Gen.4.8. Exod.1.10. 1.Sam.18.21.

And this is that wicked worldly wisdom, which hath beene so much in vse among carnall men from the beginning of the World; thus Cain spoke peaceably to his brother, when his meaning was to murther him: Pharaoh dealeth politikely in suppressing Gods Church: Saul offereth to David his daughter in marriage, when his purpose was to make it the occasion of his death, and maketh alliance to serue as a snare to catch him: Ioab embraceth and killeth, and Iudas kisseth and betrayeth: and if we looke to Ieremies times, you shall heare him complaining, that the Politicians of that age did bend their tongues like their bowes for lies: that they had no courage for the truth vpon the earth, but proceeded from euill to worse, not knowing the Lord: and therefore hee counselleth euery one to take heed of his Neighbour and not to trust any brother: because euery brother vsed deceit, and euery friend dealt deceitfully. So one of the Ancients describing the worldly policy which was vsed in his dayes, saith that it consisted in gathering treasure, and in scraping together worldly goods, in lying, swearing, cousning, peruerting of iustice, and such like carriages in all their courses: all which (saith he) is but meere foolishnesse in the sight of God. So another speaking according to the experience of his times, saith, that this is the wisdome of the world, to shut the heart from louing brethren, to disguise a mans meaning with vaine words, to make those things which are false to seeme true, and those things which are true to appeare false. This forsooth is that wisdome which is knowne of young men by vse, and learned of children at deare rates: who so know this, they shew their pride in despising others, and those who are ignorant hereof, as vnderlings and timorous persons admire it in those that haue it; because this same doublenesse, being cloaked with iniquity, is loued of them, whilest peruersitie of mind is called courtlinesse. This wisdome commandeth those that obey it, to clime into the highest seate of honour, and to reioyce in the vanitie of temporall glory, when they haue obtained it; to take manifold reuenge for single injuries: to giue place to none that oppose against them, as long as their strength lasteth, but when all possibilitie of power faileth them, that which they are not able to atchieue by professed malice, they must effect by dissembling peaceable kindnesse. But contrariwise, thus is the wisdome of the iust, to faine nothing in outward shew, to declare their meaning by their words, to loue truth, and auoid falshood, to doe good freely, and to suffer euill more willingly than to doe it, not to seeke reuenge of injuries, but to thinke it gaine to bee reproched for the truth. But this simplicitie of the just is scorned, because the vertue of innocencie is by worldlings esteemed folly. For whatsoeuer is done innocently is questionlesse with them thought foolish, and whatsoeuer in any worke the truth approueth, that soundeth as folly to carnall wisdome. For what can seeme more foolish to the World, than to shew a mans meaning by his words, not to faine any thing with cunning fetches, to offer no contumelies for injuries receiued, to pray for them that curse, to seeke poverty, to leaue present possessions, not to resist him that taketh by violence, to turne the other cheeke to him that smiteth? &c. But what is thought an abomination to the Egyptians, that the Israelites offer to God, and this simplicitie of conscience which all vniust worldlings despise as weake and abiect, is made the sacrifice of the iust. And another of latter times coplaineth, that well-ordered simplicity, which is so void of dissimulation, as that it is not blind in the truth, is in these dayes a rare bird to bee found on earth, or if her haunt be any where, it is vnto secrets, and hid in the clefts of the rockes, and in hollow walls, or about the riuer bankes. For how is the Doues eye of simplicity obserued and hid? who now followeth not the worlds deceits? who loueth not to vse them? who loueth not to haue them, or to be said that he hath them in him? who is not ashamed of the Doues eyes, and glorieth not in the eyes of Kites? &c. And if this complaint were justly taken vp by these men in those times, how much more would they haue inueighed against this wicked policie of the world, if they had liued to haue read Machiauels

Lecturs

Lectures of diuelliſh impiety, and ſeene the practiſe of many of his ſchollers, who farre excell their maſter in the deepe ſkill of worldly ſubtilties and helliſh myſteries?

And thus haue I ſhewed how wicked this worldly wiſedome is in it ſelfe, and hurtfull to others. In the next place let vs conſider what it is to thoſe that vſe it, where vpon due examination we ſhall find, firſt, that it doth not bring vnto them any true profit: ſecondly, that it is exceeding hurtfull. It profiteth not: for firſt, whereas the chiefe vſe of wiſdome and vnderſtanding is to know the ſpirituall things of God, and the meanes and myſteries of our ſaluation, the eye of worldly wiſdome is not onely dimme ſighted, but euen ſtarke blind in diſcerning this light: and as he that hath no eyes cannot poſſibly ſee, becauſe he wanteth the organ and inſtrument of ſeeing: ſo is it impoſſible that the carnall worldling (how wiſe ſoeuer he be) ſhould perceiue the things of God, becauſe he wanteth the inſtrument of this ſpirituall diſcerning, euen the Spirit of God, whereby alone the darke minde of man is illuminated with the knowledge of the truth. And this reaſon the Apoſtle reſolueth of the ignorance of carnall worldlings, where he ſaith; That the naturall man perceiueth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are fooliſhneſſe vnto him, neither can he know them, becauſe they are ſpiritually diſcerned. But he that is ſpirituall diſcerneth all things. And therefore our Sauiour Chriſt ſpeaking generally of the world, ſaith, that it did not know God his Father, and his holy Apoſtle teſtifieth, that when Chriſt the Sonne of God came into the world, the world knew him not. So that it is impoſſible for a meere worldling to attaine to the knowledge of God, and of his Son Chriſt, or of the worke of redemption and ſaluation wrought by him: whereof it is, that when Peter acknowledged Chriſt to be the Sonne of God, our Sauiour telleth him, that fleſh and blood had not reuealed it vnto him, but his Father which is in heauen. To which purpoſe the Apoſtle alſo ſaith, that ſeeing the world by wiſedome knew not God, in the wiſedome of God, it pleaſed God by the fooliſhneſſe of preaching to ſaue them that beleeue. Whereby it appeareth, that worldly wiſedome helpeth not the to knowledge of ſpirituall things, nor at all furthereth the ſaluation of our ſoules: but ſerueth onely worldlings (like the Oſtrich wings) to this vſe, to hinder their ſpeed, and make them to ouerpaſſe others vpon the earth, and in earthly things: but it cannot helpe them to flie ouer heauen, by the ſpirituall knowledge of God and our Sauiour Chriſt.

The reaſon why worldlings by their worldly wiſedome cannot vnderſtand the things of God, is, becauſe this ſpirituall knowledge is hid from them, as appeareth by that thankſgiuing of our Sauiour Chriſt: I giue thee thanks O father, Lord of heauen and earth, becauſe thou haſt hid theſe things from the wiſe, and haſt reuealed them vnto babes. And this reaſon our Sauiour rendreth why he ſpake to worldlings in parables, and to his Diſciples plainely, Becauſe to them it was giuen to know the ſecrets of the kingdome of heauen, but to them it was not giuen. And this happeneth vnto them by the iuſt iudgement of God, that they ſhould thus be giuen ouer to their owne blindneſſe: firſt in regard of their pride, which cauſeth them to withdraw themſelues from God, and to ſhut their eyes againſt the light of his reuealed will, preferring farre before it, their owne wiſedome and deepe policie, vpon which can nothing follow but palpable darkneſſe: for as when the face of the Moone looketh directly vpon the Sun, from whom ſhee borroweth her brightneſſe, ſhee is full of light, but being auerted and turned from it, doth loſe all, ſauing only a ſhadow of light which is her owne: ſo when we ſet our face vpon the Sunne of righteouſnes Ieſus Chriſt, and depend vpon his inſtruction for our illumination, we are full of the light of ſauing knowledge; but when we turne our backs vpon him, we loſe all our brightnes ſauing that light of nature and of carnall wiſedome, which in compariſon of this ſpirituall light of ſauing knowledge, is no better than a ſhadow. Beſides, when they are proud of this earthly trafh, the Lord will not giue them the true treaſure, but becauſe they glory ſo much in a glittering counter, that they forget the giuer, the Lord will not vouchſafe to beſtow vpon them his pure gold and lilbell iewels. Neither doe they, being conceited of their owne wiſedome, make any account of the wiſedome of God, and knowledge of his will, nor the meanes appointed by God to attaine vnto it: yea their owne carnall wiſedome ſo puffeth them vp with pride, that in compariſon thereof, they ſcorne the wiſedome of God, and of his Goſpell, and eſteeme it no better than meere fooliſhnes, and therefore no maruell if the Lord doe withhold his gifts from thoſe that doe contemne them, and deny to giue this precious pearle of heauenly wiſdome, and ſauing knowledge, to theſe ſwine, who would but tread it vnder their feete. To this purpoſe one ſaith, that thoſe cannot behold the wiſdome of God, who put out their owne eyes, for as much as they do ſo diſtaſte it, as they are ſo much the more blinde in the knowledge of it, by how much the ſwelling of pride doth blind them in their owne eies; for doth diminiſh the light of contemplation, and when they begin to imagine that they ſhine more than others, then they deprive themselues of the light of truth. Finally, worldly men make an idoll of their wisedome, by trusting in it for their provision and protection more than vpon God himselfe; and therefore Gods spirit, which is the fountaine of true wisdome, will not lodge in that heart, where this idoll is erected, neither will God and this earthly Dagon dwell together, so the same author saith, that they cannot attaine vnto true wisedome, which are deceived with the confidence of their owne wisedome, which is false and counterfeit, &c. And hence it is that the Apostle Paul perswadeth those, who are carnally wise to become fooles, that so they might attaine vnto true wisedome. Let no man (saith he) deceive himselfe. If any man among you seeme to be wise in this world, let him be a foole that he may be wise. And the former author exhorteth vs to forsake the harsh sentence, and to learne their foolishnesse, because it is written, that God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise.

Worldly wisedome doth not certainly assure men of the vaine things of this life.

Secondly, this carnall and worldly wisdome doth not certainely assure vs of the vaine things of this life, for the compassing whereof it imployeth all its strength: for seeing it oppoſeth it selfe against God, and trusteth and dependeth wholly vpon its owne abilities, thinking to thriue in still defence by the vse of wicked meanes, therefore the wisedome of God oppoſeth against it, bringing it to nothing, and making all these deepe policies and cunning deuices vaine and frustrate, as appeareth both by testimonies of Scripture & examples. Dauid saith that the worldlings deceit is vaine, and notwithstanding their policies God stayeth them in their owne wiles, when they depart from his statutes. And the Apostle telleth vs, that God hath turned the wisedome of the wise, and brought to nought the vnderstanding of the prudent, that is the wisedome of the world, and the Princes of this world commeth to nought: and that their wisedom is foolishnesse, because the earth knoweth not wise in their owne craftinesse. And howsoeuer their policies may seeme deepe in themselues, and their counsels inuincible by humane power, yet seeing they plot them against God himselfe they cannot stand: for as the Wiseman teacheth vs, there is no wisedome, neither vnderstanding nor counsel against the Lord. Examples hereof we haue in the builders of Babel, whose policies and power the Lord soone defeated, by confounding their languages. In Pharaoh, who when he thought to deal most wisely, was frustrate of his end, and indeede of all his policy. Gods people were deliuered, and he destroyed. In Achitophel, whose faithfull counsell to Absalom had effect, because, as the text saith, God had purposed to destroy it. In Haman, who with his cunning policies brought himselfe to the gallowes, and aduanced him whom he intended to ruine.

Prov 21.30. Psal.119.118. 1.Cor.1.19. Isa.29.14. 1.Cor.2.6. 1.Chap.3.19. Prov 21.30. 2.Sam.15.31. 2.Sam.17.14.

Yea the Lord doth not only defeate their carnall wisedome, but also doth turne it to ridiculous folly, and when they thinke to be admired for their deepe policies, he causeth them so bee skorned for their shallow foolishnes. Thus Eliphaz affirmeth, that God taketh the wise in their craftinesse, and the counsell of the wicked is made foolish. And the Apostle saith that the Gentiles, when they professed themselues to bee wise, they became fooles. And elsewhere he demandeth where is the wise? where is the Scribe? where is the disputer of this world? hath not God (saith he) made the wisedome of this world foolishnesse? Not vainly therefore are fooles in our accustomed speech called naturals, seeing that wisest man who is but meerely naturall is a very foole, both because hee is vtterly destitute of spirituall and sauing wisedome, and also because the Lord turneth this carnall wisedome he hath into sottish foolishnes. So when Saul, leauing the Lord, began to be directed by his owne wisedome, the Prophet Samuel telleth him, that he had done foolishly, in not keeping the commandement of God. And into what extreame folly did the wise counsell of Achitophel bring him, causing him to hang himselfe, for feare of a worse turne, and to auoide the Kings deserued displeasure, by leaping into hell? The reason hereof is apparant, for though mans wisedome be neuer so great, yet it is not infinite, he cannot foresee future contingents, much lesse dispose them, and therefore whilest he auoideth one däger which he foreseeth he is ouer taken by another which was without the compasse of his prouidence; and hauing fetled his counsels vpon the ground of many probabilities or certainties, one whereof faileth to cohere with another, some thing which either was not, or could not bee foreseene, happening, disordreth and confounds all the rest, and so bringeth all his policies to nothing; like a chaine which falleth asunder when but one linke thereof is broken. Who therefore would esteeme of this worldly wisedome, seeing it doth not with any certainty procure that good, for which it is only good, nor attaineth vnto attentions these worldly vanities, whereof when it faileth it selfe is vaine and to no vse?

1.Sect.16. God curseth worldly wisedome by distracting the counsels of the wicked. Iob 5.13. Isa 44.25. Rom 1.22. 1.Cor.1.20. 1.Sam.15.

But much lesse doth it helpe vs to the fruition of spirituall benefits; for as I haue shewed, it is a great enemie to sauing knowledge, and to the growth of all sanctifying grace, making the seed of the word vnfruitful, & the meanes of saluation vnpowerfol & vneffectual, while it is ioyned with them, yea it so puffeth men vp with pride, that they neuer desire to vse the meanes of their spirituall

all welfare, and though they be diseased to the death, yet feeling not their paine, they haue no care of being cured and recouered. And therefore one preferreth the knowledge which is ioyned with paine and griefe, before this which puffeth vp; because (saith he) it affords that health which this forthwith extinguisheth; and hee is worse vnto himself that desireth it, because hee thereby vtterly loseth recouery. And as it hindreth grace in this life, so also glory in the life to come; for so wholly is it taken vp with earthly things, that it hath no leisure to thinke on heauenly; and trauelleth so much in atchieuing worldly desires, that it hath no time to take paines in trauelling that way which leadeth to life eternall; and hee that busieth himselfe about other businesse, and setteth not one foote forward in the way, shall neuer come to his iourneys end. So one saith, that this worldly wisedome helpeth vs forward to the vttermost of eternall losse; for it is wholly vnwise about honour, trifling profit in heaping vp of wealth, and vse in transacting vp good workes. Finally, it is wholly vnwise about worldly endowments, being a wisedome rather in pompous show than in deed and truth. And such is all Philosophy which seeketh after strange things, and is ignorant of it selfe; searcheth the elements of heauen, and the regions of the world which profit not, and knoweth not God and our Sauiour Christ. And who seeth not this verified by daily experience? for who are more ignorant euen in the principles of religion, who more prophanely contemne the seruice of God, and all meanes of their saluation, who more neglect prayer and preaching & all exercises of Christian religion, than the great Politicians of the world, being so wholy taken vp with the affaires of earthly kingdomes, that they quite forget the way to the kingdome of heauen?

Finally, this worldly wisedome doth not priuiledge men from Gods fearefull iudgements, neither will this subtill fence ward off the downe right blowes of his punishing hand: it cannot exempt men so much as from a temporary death, for as the Psalmist saith, the wise men die, as well as the foolish, and leaue their riches vnto others. Much lesse can it free them from eternall vengeance, which shall be inflicted on all that doe not know God, nor obey the Gospel of our Lord Iesus Christ. For if Satan himselfe, who farre excelleth all men in wisdome and politike practise, cannot with all his wisedome and experience, find out any tricke or shift to escape damnation, how much lesse shall they who come farre behind him in this skill and cunning? And if Achitophel the arch-politician, whose words were oracles, could not with all his wisdome, when he was pursued with Gods iust vengeance, procure a pardon of himselfe, for himselfe; nor so much as intreate a repriue from his owne furie, but rather than iustice should not bee executed became his owne hangman, and not waiting for our ward force, did with his owne hands wilfully cast his soule into hell fire: how much lesse shall they obtaine a pardon of the righteous Iudge of heauen and earth, when at the great assises they shall be called to an account for all their Machiauellian trickes, and diuelish policies, wherwith they haue dishonoured God, circumuented and iniured their neighbours, and made deepe wounds in their owne consciences?

But as this worldly wisdome helpeth not, so contrariwise it exceedingly hurteth, for as it maketh men foolish vnto good, so exceeding politike and prone to act the workes of darkenes: according to Gods complaint by his Prophet; My people is foolish and haue not knowne me, they are foolish children, and haue no vnderstanding; they are wise to do euill, but to doe well they haue no knowledge. And though in repine, greedy scraping, and cunning circumuenting all that deale with them, they haue as many eyes as Argus, and are as sharpe sighted as the Eagle: yet in the workes of God, and in the duties of loue, they are as blind as beetles or moales. It hindreth men from profession of religion, because it is ioyned with worldly contempt, especially when it is accompanied with the crosse; thinking it great madnesse to contend much for religion; to leaue their Prince, to follow the truth; and to hazard their preferments in the world, which they haue already in possession, for some bare promises (as they account them) of better things in the world to come. It bringeth not with it so much as worldly ioy and pleasure, but rather vexation of spirit, and much heauinesse: And as the Wise man saith, who had most experience of it; In the multitude of wisdome is much griefe, and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow; for hee is still iealous of his state, and alwayes ready to cast doubts: he hath more skill in foreseeing euills, than in preuenting them; and long before they come he doth anticipate them with his feare and care; grieuing long before the cause of griefe approcheth, and making himselfe presently miserable, because hee expecteth misery in time to come; yea and oftentimes he thus tormenteth himselfe with a shadow, and through false feare indureth true sorrow, the euill which he feared and expected neuer happening vnto him. But if the euill which he feareth commeth, then to what end serueth this worldly wisdome, but to make it giue a deeper wound with ouer vehement apprehension? to gather arguments to amplifie his griefe, and with the waighe of opinion, to make his burthen more intolerable? wher-as those whose wit hath a shorter reach; lay not hold of miseries before they touch them, nor complaine of more than they sensibly feele; and oftentimes shadowes of ill grounded hopes, bring vnto them for the present, substantiall comfort.

§. Sect. 20. Other euils into which worldly wisedome plungeth men.

Valde difficile est vt is qui se sapientem æstimat, mentem ad humilitatem reducat, &c. Gregor. moral. lib. 16. cap. 27.

Againe, this worldly wisdome puffeth men vp with pride, and maketh them to haue an ouerweening conceit of their owne excellencie; so that it is a thing as rare as a blacke Swan, to find a man both worldly wise and truly humble. To which purpose one saith, that it is hard to find one who conceiting himselfe wise, reduceth his mind to humilitie, and either beleeueth those who informe him in the truth, or layeth aside his own peruerse meaning and opinion. And this pride is ioyned with rebellion against God, for when they thinke themselues too wise to depend vpon him, they become so foolish as to oppose against him. So the Apostle saith, that the wisdome of the flesh is enmity against God; Rom. 8. 7. and the Lord complaineth of Babylon, that her wisdome and knowledge caused her to rebell; Esay 47. 10. and to say in her heart I am and there is none else. And consequently, this carnall and worldly wisedome bringeth destruction: for when in pride of heart they oppose against God, then hee also opposeth against them, and their rebellion turneth to their owne ruine: yea he turneth their owne wisdome to their destruction, and intangleth them in their owne wilie snares, which they haue laid for others. So it is said, that God catcheth the wise in their owne craftinesse, 1. Cor. 3. 19. Psal. 7. 15. 16. and after he hath digged a pit, he causeth him to fall into it himselfe, and maketh his mischiefe to returne vpon his owne head. And thus was Ieroboam insnared in those nets of subtilty which himselfe made; for fearing least the people by going to the Temple at Ierusalem, and conuersing with their brethren, the men of Iuda, might be perswaded to leaue him, and to reunite themselues to the kingdome of Dauid; he politikely deuised to stay them from this reuolt, by erecting golden calues in his owne countrey, that in them the people might worship God, and saue a labour in going further; but as the the Spirit of God obserueth, This thing turned to sinne vnto the house of Ieroboam, euen to roote it out, and destroy it from the face of the earth. 1. Kings 12. 26. 27. 28. And the like might bee said of Saul, Achitophel, Haman and many others. And though these wise worldlings could with their subtile policies escape this destruction in this life, yet it will surely ouertake them in the life to come, and cast them headlong into the pit of perdition: for as the Apostle saith, the wisdome of the flesh causeth death; Rom. 8. 6. that is, not onely the first death, whereby they die vnto righteousnesse & all goodnesse, but also the second death, whereby dying they shall neuer die, but liue to die that dying life, or liuing death, in those intolerable and euerlasting torments of hell fire.

Seeing therefore this worldly and carnall wisedome is so euill and wicked in itselfe; and the cause of so many euils vnto vs; let vs not enuie worldlings this their happines wherein they so much boast and glory; but learne to contemne and hate it, as being an enemy to God and our owne saluation. For what will it aduantage vs to be admired for it in the world, and to be despised in the sight of God? to haue it commend vs, and God and our owne consciences to condemne vs? to bee aduanced by it to the counsel of Princes, and to haue Gods counsailes and the mysteries of our saluation hid and concealed from vs? Finally, what will it auaile vs, if by it wee should bee exalted to the greatest offices of state, and highest places in the kingdome, if wee be excluded thereby from hauing so much as the lowest place in the kingdome of heauen? What will it profit vs to gaine with our policies worldly vanities, and those temporarie trifles of honours, riches and earthly pleasures, of which wee haue not one dayes assurance, and to lose thereby those eternall ioyes and vnspeakable pleasures, which are at Gods right hand for euermore? Leauing therefore this carnall wisedome, to carnall worldlings; let vs labour to be wise vnto God, and seeke those things in the first place which tend to his glory, and the saluation of our owne soules. And let vs vse all good meanes to furnish our hearts and minds with all sanctifying and sauing graces, and especially with that spirituall wisedome, whereby wee vnderstand his will reuealed in his word, and endeauour to conforme our selues vnto it in all holy obedience, both in our hearts and affections, and in our liues and conuersations; and so will the Lord approue, loue and fauour vs in this life, and crowne vs with euerlasting ioy and happinesse in the life to come.

CHAP. X.

That worldly learning seuered from true godlinesse, is to be contemned.

AND thus haue I shewed that meere ciuill vertues, and particularly the wisdome of worldlings, may and ought to be contemned and despised of Christians, as being not onely voyd of any worth and excellencie, which might inflame their loue; but also so full of sinne and corruption, and so hurtfull and pernicious to those who set their hearts on them, that they iustly deserue to be hated and reiected. Now it followeth loweth, that according to my order propounded, I adde some thing of the gifts and ornaments of the mind, namely, the gifts of humane learning, and of science and knowledge which the world abuseth as occasions and grounds of dangerous tentations. And first I will speake briefly of humane learning; consisting principally in the knowledge, memory and skilfull vse of arts and languages; the which is in its owne nature good, as being an excellent gift of God, whereby the mind of man is adorned, and his naturall gifts and faculties much improued, polished and perfected; so as it is a question disputable, whether nature, or this art & learning are of greater vse & efficacie, for the directing & perfecting of such humane affaires, as are of greatest excellencie. By it the harshnes and roughnesse of nature is mollified and mitigated, barbarisme banished, ciuilitie preserued and increased, all things which tend to the well-being and bettering of humane societie perfected; and in a word, hereby the rough fallow grounds of our hearts are (as it were) ploughed vp, & fitted and prepared to receiue the seeds of diuine knowledge. In its owne nature therefore, humane learning is not onely good but very excellent, and is not contemned and hated by any, but those who are rude and ignorant, yea it ought in this sense to bee esteemed and sought after as a pearle of price, which is much to be preferred before all the treasures and honors of the world; as being a singular ornament of the minde, which euen in the judgement of Gods Spirit maketh his faithfull seruants more praiseworthy; for thus the holy Ghost commendeth Moses for his excellent learning, saying, that he was learned in all the wisdome of the Aegyptians, among whom learning in those daies chiefely flourished; and Apollos, whom he also praiseth for his eloquence and knowledge.

But if we consider of this learning as it is in vs, then is it to be esteemed among things indifferent, the which according as they are vsed by the parties that haue them, are either good when they are well vsed, or euill when they are abused, and the nature of them infected and poysoned through the contagion of our corrupt nature. And thus learning is good, when it is well vsed for those good purposes aboue mentioned, vnto which in its owne nature it is inclined, and furthereth those good ends for which God hath ordained it, and euill, when as it is abused through our corruption; as namely, when we waxe so proud of this gift of God that we forget the giuer, or insult ouer our brethren who are not qualified with it, for as learning is the ornament of the minde, so humility is the ornament of learning. Secondly, when as being idle and fruitlesse it helpeth not forward those ends for which it was giuen vs, neither bettering the minde, nor ordering the affections, nor reforming the life and manners, nor increasing ciuilitie, nor yet fitting and preparing vs for true religion; but contenting our selues with an idle theorie and speculation, wee vse our knowledge onely to know, as the Athenians were said to vse their mony, only to tell it; vnlesse it be now and then, when wee affect the praise of learning in discourfing with others. Thirdly, when as we set our hearts wholly vpon it, and spend all our time in attaining vnto it, and hauing obtained it, doe finally rest in it; as though it were the cause of our comming into the world, and the very end of our liues, to get humane learning; whereas it ought to bee the way, and not our marke and chiefe scope, and as an handmaide to trimme and adorne vs, and so to vsher vs into the presence of vertue and true godlinesse, and not to bee esteemed and adored as our chiefe Lady and soueraigne Princesse. For this were to content our selues to liue in the poreh, and neglect the beautifull lodging which it leadeth vnto; and like Penelope her suiters, to leaue the Mistrisse, and make loue to the handmaid. Fourthly, when as wee haue an insatiable desire in hoarding vp these rich treasures, being neuer satisfied, but euer curiously prying into the very hidden bowels of natures secrets: for the Apostle telleth vs, there is a measure of our vnderstanding, as well as of our stature, aboue which when it is racked, it bringeth as much torment to the mind, as the other to the body; and that there is a sobriety in our soules, which contenteth it selfe with a competent portion of this spiritual food of learning and knowledge, the which being exceeded, causeth a surfet, and casteth the minde into diuers and dangerous diseases which are hardly cured. And another demaundeth, if he be to be reproued, which gathereth needles superfluities, and in his house setteth roses to the shew as outward pompe of precious things; and he to be excused which is too much occupied in gathering superfluous abundance of learning and humane knowledge? Yea (saith he) to desire to know more than enough, is to be reprehended, as being a kind of intemperance. Lastly, this learning is abused when we ouer-value and esteeme it, as whē we place therein our chiefe happines, or prefer it before the knowledge of God and his true religion, or the rest of his sanctifying and saning graces; aduancing the handmaides aboue their mistrisse, and esteeming the confused language of Babel, aboue that excellent language of the spirituall Canaan.

In which respects when learning is abused, it degenerateth from its owne nature, & becommeth

Rom. 12. 3.

Plus sit vtile quam sit satis, intemperantia genus est. Seneca, ep. 88.

1. Sect. 3. That worldly learning is to

commeth vnto vs euill, worldly and wicked, and is therefore of all Gods seruants to be contemned and despised, loathed and abhorred. Now that wee may contemne this worldly and wicked learning, which is so much admired among carnall men who haue attained vnto it, let vs consider, first, that it bringeth with it no true profit; and then, that it is the cause of much hurt. That this learning of carnall worldlings profiteth them not, it may appeare by induction of particulars. For what doth it auaile them to be good Logicians, when as they are neither skilfull in finding out what the good and perfect will of God is, nor able to iudge betweene that which is good and euill, nor to confute the subtill sophistrie and dangerous paralogismes of our spirituall enemie the diuell, whereby out of false premises he frameth against their soules most damnable conclusions? What doth it profit them to bee good Rhetoricians in perswading of others vnto what they list, by setting a faire glosse vpon a false cause, if they haue not found eloquence enough, to perswade and assure themselues of their owne saluation? What doth it helpe them to be good Grammarians, and to haue the knowledge of all tongues and languages, if there be no congruitie betweene Gods Law, and their life and manners, and hauing their heads full fraught with this learned skill, their hearts bee emptie of loue and charitie? What benefit haue they by their exquisite skillin Arithmetike, whereby they are able to number numbers numberlesse, if they want skill to number their daies, that they may apply their hearts to true wisedome? What though like good Geometricians they could measure all the parts of the earth, and take the height, & demonstrate the bignes of all the stars of heauen; if they haue no measure in their passions, appetites, and earthly desires? What though like cunning Astronomers and Astrologians, they knew the number of the starres, with all their motions, the constellations, aspects, and influences of these celestiall bodies, and could neerely guesse at future contingents, and things to come; if their hearts and affections remaine fastned to the earth, when their eyes are lift vp to heauen, so as they can neuer raise them on high with any spirituall and holy meditation? What though like cunning Musicians, they be skilfull in all the moods, choords, & proportions, if they cannot accord the iarring discords of their owne passions, nor make that sweete harmonie in Gods hearing, by causing their heart, tongue and hand to accord and agree together, in a holy & vpright profession and practise of godlines & righteousnes? What will it helpe skilfull Philosophers, though they were able to vnbowell the secrets of nature, to know the causes and yeeld the reason of all things, which curiositie her selfe could inquire; if they bee ignorant of the great Creator, and of themselues, neither knowing the corruption of their nature, nor the meanes how to be freed fro it? What will it profit them if like skilfull Historians, they can relate what hath bin don in all countries in all ages, if they be not well acquainted with the historie of the Bible, & the Gospell of Iesus Christ, nor know what he hath done for their saluation? What though like cunning Lawyers they bee learned in the Lawes of men, if they be ignorant in the Law of God, and lawlesse and licencious in their liues and conuersations? What will it auaile them if being skilfull Physitians, they can guesse at other mens diseases by feeling of their pulses and seeing their vrines, and can applie fit remedies for the curing of their bodies; if they cannot iudge of the distempered passions of their owne hearts, nor know by what meanes their soules sick in sin, may be cured and recouered? And to conclude, what benefit should wee reape, though being learned Diuines, wee are able to dispute of the deepe mysteries of religion; if wee doe not make a holy vse of this knowledge, for the sanctifying of our hearts, and the reforming of our liues and conuersations?

1. Cor. 13. 2.

Secondly, the vnprofitablenes of worldly learning hereby is manifest, in that it is vaine and of no excellency; for first it is so farre from conferring of true wisdome, consisting in the knowledge and feare of God, that it is oftentimes disioined from that wisdome which is morall and ciuill, and according to the prouerbe which is grounded vpon common experience, The learnedest Clerkes are not alwayes the wisest men; they being so wedded to their book-learning and the theorie of knowledge in speculation only, that they neglect that practicall knowledge which is chiefly perfected by obseruation and experience. Now, as one saith, A man learned and vnwise, is like an asse decked with costly ornaments, which make him to bee more looked on, but not more esteemed. Secondly, the vanity of worldly learning may appeare, in that it hath in it no selfe excellencie to giue contentment to him that hath it by its owne worth, vnlesse that ostentation thereof be made vnto others, that so they may admire and praise it. To which purpose the Satyrist saith, that it nought auailes to know, vnlesse another knoweth that thou hast this knowledge; but this is that which is thought worth esteeme, to be pointed at with the finger, and to bee noted for excellencie aboue others. Lastly, worldly learning without true godlinesse is vaine, because it doth not fill and satisfie him that hath it; for hee that hath spent most paines in study, and hath at-attained to the greatest measure of Learning and Knowledge, is no more contented or satisfied, than he was when he had learned but the first rudiments: because the more hee knoweth, the more hee seeth his want of knowledge, and the highest degree of Learning in this state of imperfection, consisteth in the knowledge of a mans own ignorance. And therefore the Wise man saith, that hee that increaseth knowledge increaseth griefe, because hee doth not receiue so much pleasure by that which he hath found out, as sorrow for that vnto which hee is not able to attaine; like vnto those who being yet athirst are pulled from the riuers, or that cannot hold in their hands that which they thinke they haue, or like vnto those who are inlightned with the brightnesse of the lightning; which light presently leauing them, they remayne in more grosse darknesse than before. And this vanity of humane Learning is the cause why the Saints of God haue so contemned it; for hauing attained to the knowledge of God and his will, of our Sauiour Christ, and the work of saluation wrought by him, they haue in comparison of this excellent knowledge, accounted the other base and of no worth. An example wherof we haue in Paul, who being indued with a great measure of this humane Learning, contemneth it, professing that he cared not to know any thing, saue Iesus Christ and him crucified. As also in the Ephesians, who being conuerted to the faith, and indued with some measure of sauing knowledge, brought their Bookes, out of which they had learned their curious Arts, and burned them before all men, the price whereof amounted to fifty thousand pieces of siluer.

Lastly, the vnprofitablenesse of worldly Learning hereby appeareth, in that it furthereth not our saluation, nor bringeth vs neerer vnto God, neither in this life by grace, nor by glory in the life to come: for it helpeth not at all to inrich vs with any of Gods sanctifying and sauing graces, but excelling all others in this kind of Learning, we may bee as miserably poore in those inestimable treasures as the most simple Idiots. And this the examples of former times and of our owne dayes doe plainly manifest: for who more learned than the Egyptians, and who more grosse Idolaters? Who more learned than Pharaohs Inchanters, and Astrologians, and who more Deuillish Sorcerers? who more learned than the Scribes and Pharisies, and who more graceless and wicked? Finally, who more learned than those great Clerkes, and profound Doctours, which vphold (vpon the strength of their shoulders) the declining Monarchy of the Babylonish Antichrist, and yet who more licentious in their liues? who more malicious opposers against the Kingdome and Truth of Iesus Christ? who more cruell persecuters of the Saints of God. But let vs descend to more particulars, this worldly learning doth not at all inlighten our minds with sauing knowledge, nor inricheth our vnderstanding with spirituall wisdome; as may also appeare by the former examples; for there was neuer any in their times excelled those before named in this learning, and neuer any more blindly ignorant, euen in the rudiments and first principles of true Religion. In which respect, they may fitly bee compared to Battes and Owles, which see very acutely in the darke, but are dim-sighted and pur-blind when the Sunne shineth: so these remayning in naturall darknesse, see very cleerly the vnprofitable and nice quiddities of vaine Philosophy, but when the light of the Gospell cleerly shineth, they are not thereby inlightned, for their Owle-like eyes cannot endure this brightnesse, neither doth it helpe their sight, but makes them more pur-blind than before. So also it doth not profit vs for the attaining of faith, yea, rather it confirmeth and encreaseth naturall infidelitie; for whereas faith is of things not seene, and not grounded on sense, but resteth vpon Gods Word and promises, as being truth it selfe which cannot deceiue, these learned Worldlings credit no more than they see, nor beleeue any thing which may not bee demonstrated by the rules of their Learning. And for this we haue the Pharisies testimonie against themselues, where speaking to their seruants, who were astonished with Christs doctrine, they demand, If any of the Rulers and Pharisies beleeue in Christ? But (say they) this people that know not the Law are cursed. And so we shall find that the doctrine of faith taught by the Apostle Paul, was neuer more vnprofitable and vnfruitfull than among the Athenians, neuer more opposed, nor more derided; nor euer fewer in any place by so much preaching conuerted to the faith, than among those learned Philosophers. The like might bee said of all other sanctifying graces; for who are more doatingly fond of worldly vanities, of riches, pleasures and preferments, and shew lesse loue to God in their holy obedience, than the learned Worldlings? who trust more in the arme of flesh and inferiour meanes when they haue them, or are more desperately discouraged and discomfited when these meanes faile them? Who shew lesse hope than they, when they are in any affliction, or vpon their sicke beds? who lesse feare of God in all their proceedings? or lesse humilitie in their carriage and conuersation? In a word, who are more barren and fruitlesse in good works, in the workes of Iustice, Charity and Compassion towards their brethren?

obtayning glory in the life to come; for these inseparably goe together, neither doth any euer come into this Citie of glory, but hee hath his entrance by the Suburbs of grace. And hence it is that the Lord passing by in all ages these learned Worldlings, maketh choice of simple and vnlettered men to conuert and saue them. Thus he left the learned Egyptians, and made the simple Israelites his Church and people; hee passed by Amaziah chiefe Priest to Ieroboam, and chuseth ignorant Amos for his ambassage: hee neglected the famously-learned Scribes and Pharisies, and maketh choice of silly fisher men to be his Apostles and Disciples: and so in latter times hee hath not called and conuerted the great Rabbines of the earth, the subtile-learned Schoolemen, and profound Doctors of the Romish Babylon; but such silly and simple men, whom in comparison of themselues, they esteeme ignorant and very Idiots.

Amos 7.14.

Q. Sect. 7. That worldly learning much hurteth those which set their hearts vpon it.

And thus it appeareth that worldly learning doth not profit. But if we consider thereof aright, wee shall finde that it also much hurteth them who most esteeme it, and think themselues best furnished with it: wherof it is that the Apostle Paul doth not only dissuade vs from imbracing it as a friend, but also warneth vs to take heed of it, as of a mortall enemy: Beware (saith hee) lest there be any man that spoyle you, through Philosophie and vaine deceit. For it maketh those who are indued with it, to rest in it, and so bewitcheth them with pleasure and delight, that they thinke their whole life too little to satisfie their curiositie, and to furnish them with these learned treasures: in the meane time vtterly neglecting the study of the Scriptures, which alone are sufficient to make them wise to their saluation. It puffeth them vp with pride, and maketh them in the ouer-weening conceit of their owne excellencies to contemne all others, and that which is worst of all, to despise the simplicitie of the Scriptures, and to esteeme the preaching of the Gospell meere foolishnesse. Yea and because they disdaine to be learned after the vulgar fashion, they coine new conceits, and after much paines and long trauaile they are deliuered of the vnnaturall births, and mishapen monsters of errour and falshood, which they so curiously adorne with their pleasing ornaments of wit, eloquence and subtile learning, that their deformities are not discerned by an ordinary vnderstanding, not seeme vnhandsome to an vnjudicious beholder. In so much as it may truly be said, that as pride is the Father, so this worldly learning is the Mother of all dangerous Errours and damnable Heresies: and seldome (as one saith) haue there beene any great Errours, which haue not beene the off-spring of great wits. And as they are readie to broach Errours and Heresies, so also are they most stiffe in maynteining and defending them, their learning making them able to contend, and their pride impatient of receiuing any foile.

And therefore seeing this wordly learning, being seuered from sauing wisdome and true godlinesse, doth not profit vs, as being vaine and of no excellency; seeing it doth not inrich vs with Gods spirituall graces, nor at all furthereth the saluation of our soules; yea seeing it doth much hurt vs, by making vs more proud and erroneous, schismaticall and hereticall; let vs not suffer our selues to be bewitched with the alluring notes of this Syren. Let vs not ouer-value this well decked worldly vanitie, preferring it to the true knowledge of God and his sauing grace; but esteeming a dram of spirituall wisdom & true pietie, before many pounds of this worldly learning, let vs neglect it, or rather purge it from this worldly filth of sin & corruption, & setting our hearts chiefly on that heauenly and diuine learning, which is taught in the Scriptures, by that neuer erring Schoolemaster, Gods holy Spirit, let vs pull downe this humane learning out of the seat of soueraignty, and make it attend as an humble handmaid, on that heauenly and diuine Princesse spirituall wisedome and sauing knowledge, which alone maketh vs wise vnto God, and giueth vs assurance of the saluation of our soules.

CHAP. XI.

That worldly Sciences are of no worth, in comparison of spirituall knowledge and sauing grace.

IN the next place we are to speak of the tentations which arise from worldly science and knowledge; the which are either the skill and knowledge of Ciuill and Mechanicall Arts and Sciences, or of the holy Scriptures, and of the poines of Christian Religion; both which are in themselues good, as being the common gifts of Gods Spirit, and his profitable talents which being well vsed, doe much redound to the glory of God, the author of them, and to the good of the Church and Common-wealth, for whose sake principally these gifts of God were conferred and bestowed. And this appeareth in the example of Aholiab and Bezaliel, of whom it is said, that the Lord called them by name, and filled them with his spirit, in wisdome and vnderstanding, and in knowledge and in all workmanship, to finde out curious workes, to worke in gold, and in siluer, and in brasse, also in the art to set stones, and to carue in timber, and to worke all manner of workmanship for the seruice of the Sanctuarie. And therefore sore these Arts and Sciences are not simply to bee contemned, yea rather they are to bee highly valued and esteemed; as being Gods good gifts, which hee hath bestowed vpon some speciall men, for his owne glory, and the common good of humane Societies; but only as they are abused by carnall worldlings excelling in them.

And thus they abuse them, first, when in regard of their owne excellencie they are puffed vp in pride, and contemne others, especially of their owne facultie, who haue not attained vnto their skill. Secondly, when they set their hearts vpon them, preferring and esteeming them before Gods spirituall graces and sanctifying gifts; and neglecting them together with the meanes whereby they may attaine vnto them, whilest they set and imploy all their desires and endeauours about these earthly Sciences. And lastly, when as they seuer these common gifts of the Spirit, from Gods sanctifying and sauing graces, being content to remayne vtterly destitute of the true feare of God, Knowledge, Faith, Repentance, and the rest, as though they needed them not, being qualified aboue others with this worldly skill.

But in these respects, these Sciences and earthly skill, though good in themselues, are to be contemned and despised: for it is beene great sinne to be proud of Learning and the knowledge of ingenuous and Liberall Arts, yea, of morall vertues and ciuill wisdome; and if they are to be all contemned and despised, when they come in comparison of Gods holy and heauenly graces; then how much more is it a grieuous sin to waxe proud of these inferiour Sciences, or in respect of such contemptible qualities, to set light by, and contemne those vnualuable excellencies and heauenly treasures? Which sinne that wee may auoide, and may learne to despise these common and base trifles, when they come in competition with the sauing knowledge of Gods Truth, and our assurance of his spirituall and eternall happinesse; let vs consider that these Sciences are but common gifts bestowed both vpon the Elect and Reprobate, and vpon Pagans as well as Christians, and therefore notwithstanding they want Gods spirituall and sanctifying graces, they are still in the state of death and condemnation; let them know that God hath giuen them these talents not that they should bee puffed vp in pride, or neglecting his more excellent gifts, they should set their hearts on them, but that they should referre them to the glory of him who bestowed them, and the good of the Church and Common-wealth; and therefore if they abuse them to contrary ends, the Lord will take away from them his gifts, or if he suffer them to haue the vse of them, it shall bee to bring vpon them a more heauy iudgement, and to increase their condemnation at the day of his generall Assises, for their great abuse of his rich talents. Finally, let them remember that these worldly Sciences serue but to procure vnto them some temporary profit or aduancement, which is but of small worth, and of momentany continuance; and therefore they shall shew extreame folly if they more highly esteeme, and take more care, and spend more labour, in compassing these transitory trifles, than in attayning vnto the vnualuable riches of Gods grace, and that eternall waight of glory, and vnspeakable happinesse in his Kingdome.

CHAP. XII.

That vnfruitfull knowledge of God and his true Religion is vaine and vnprofitable.

Q. Sect. 1. Knowledge of God and his truth in it selfe an excellent gift of God; but yet liable to the abuse of worldlings.

THe other kind of Science, which I propounded to speake of, is the knowledge of God, and of the doctrine of his true Religion, which in his Word he hath reuealed vnto vs. The which in it selfe is an excellent gift and grace of Gods Spirit, and farre to be preferred before Worldly Sciences, humane Learning, yea, aboue all meerely morall and ciuill vertues; as being that spirituall Light which guideth vs in the paths of righteousnesse, that lead vs to Gods Kingdome, and the very ground and foundation of all sanctifying and sauing graces; for wee cannot loue God, nor beleeue, hope and trust in him, vnlesse wee know him; nor yeeld any obedience vnto him, vnlesse we be acquainted with his Word, wherein he hath reuealed his will vnto vs. But yet this excellent gift of God is liable to the abuse of worldlings; (or if not that speciall grace of sauing knowledge which is alwayes accompanied with all other spirituall gifts, yet at least the counterfeit of this pure gold, which is so cunningly stamped and coyned, that it cannot possibly be discerned from the other, vnlesse it be brought to the touchstone of true obedience) and so is made the ground of diuers dangerous corruptions: as namely, when men can no longer liue licentiously in the grosse sinnes of the hand, may then leaden to destruction, but plainly disceme that the knowledge of God and his will is most necessary to their saluation; then the Deuill and the World giue them liberty to take what paines they will in attayning vnto the knowledge of Gods true Religion, yea, and oftentimes egge them on, when as they haue found out some necessary knowledge, curiously search into that knowledge which is superfluous and vnnecessary, as the matter in the meantime they may neglect the knowledge of things which are of better vse. And when they haue proceeded thus farre, then they labour to make them proud of this knowledge, and to take all their delight in this speculatiue study and contemplation, and in setting it forth to the praysе of men, in all their discourses; but withall they moоue them to rest in this bare knowledge, as being sufficient to gaine for them the glory of the World, and of Heauen too; seuering it in the meanetime, from all sanctifying and saуing graces, and from the fruitfull practice of that they know, in holy obedience to Gods will.

Q. Sect. 2. That our knowledge is maymed and imperfect.

Which-soeuer of these that we may ouercome, let vs consider, that this idle knowledge (which swimmeth in the braine, and sanctifieth not the heart; but being wholly taken vp, and exercised in speculation & discourse, is seuered from the true loue of God and our Neighbour, and from all sanctifying and saуing graces, as also from the practicall and holy vse of that we know in true obedience) is not at all to bee esteemed of vs, but to be vtterly despised and contemned; first, because it is in it selfe of no worth or excellency: Secondly, because to vs it is vnprofitable: Thirdly, because it is hurtfull and pernicious. For the first, this idle knowledge which is in Worldlings, is of no worth or excellency, because it is imperfect and but a dimme shadow, in comparison of the cleere Light, for that we know is nothing in comparison of that we know not; neither doe we see these few things with the cleere eye of a distinct vnderstanding, but (as the Apostle speaketh) as it were in a glasse dimmely and darkly; and when we thinke that we soare an high pitch aboue others, we doe in truth but creepe vpon the earth; or if at all we are carried aloft, it is in opinion only, and that with the wings of pride and selfe-loue, and not of knowledge and vnderstanding. For if euen the Apostle himselfe, who had an exceeding measure of knowledge in comparison of vs, being from his childhood brought vp in the study of the Scriptures, and of other Learning, and after his calling, not onely extraordinarily inlightened with the illumination of Gods Spirit, but also had reuelation from God (as himselfe saith) abundance of reuelations; did neuerthelesse confesse in his owne and others behalfe, that they did know but in part; and that they knew nothing as they ought to know, who knew any thing at all; then what shall we thinke of our selues, who are but pur-blind in comparison of his cleere sight; and sensually ignorant in respect of his great knowledge and vnderstanding? If the wise man for example sake (that he had not the vnderstanding of a man) to him, and that he had not learned wisdome, nor attained to the knowledge of holy things: then surely we who come so farre short of him, may iustly acknowledge that wee are in the number of those, who are bestiall by their owne knowledge, as the Prophet Ieremy speaketh. And if wee would know vnto what beast wee may fitly compare and liken our selues in respect of our naturall ignorance of spirituall things; it is not the subtile Dogge, the wily Fox, or the vnderstanding Ape, but as Zophar telleth vs, wee are herein like the wilde Asse Colt, which of all other beasts is most fottish by nature, & being wilde hath not any tincture of wit by humane society and instruction, and being not the Asse her selfe, but her yong Colt, hath no increase of naturall wit by age and brutish experience. Vaine man (saith he) would be wise, though man borne is like a wilde Asse Colt.

Againe, there is little cause that we should be proud of this small knowledge which we haue, or that wee should thinke it of any worth or excellency, being seuered from pietу and true obedience, because it is vaine and to no purpose; for if that be vaine which attaineth not to its end, and if the end of all Science and knowledge be vse and practise; then must it needs follow, that seeing the end of our knowledge is not to know; but that we should make vs holy vse of it, and cause it to serue as a spirituall eye to guide vs in obedience, through the whole course of our life and conuersation; then that knowledge which is idle and fruitlesse, swimming in the braine, and onely exercised in speculation, and not in action hath not attained to his end, and is therefore vaine; and consequently, no man hath cause to bee proud of this knowledge; seeing that doth excell therein, doth but excell in worthlesse vanitie. To this purpose one saith, that some desire knowledge to this end, that they may only know, and this is filthy curiositie; and there are some that desire to know, that they may for their knowledge giue to be sold, offering to sell it for money or preferment, and this is dishonestie also, to sell as a slaue that which was free-borne: and there are some who desire to know, that they may be knowne; and this is foolish vanity. Idle knowledge therefore is to bee contemned as a thing vaine and of no value; yea, so worthlesse in it selfe, that the least will to good, and weakest desire to please God, is much to be preferred before it. And though it were supposed, that there were in this knowledge some worth and excellencie; yet the smallest sparke of true Charity and Piety were much to bee preferred before it: seeing long after this light of worldly knowledge is vanished, the heate of true loue shineth euen for euer: for so the Apostle saith, that loue neuer faileth: whether there be prophecies, they shall be abolished, or whether there be tongues, they shall cease, or knowledge vanish away.

But

Prou. 30. 2, 3.

But as it is in it selfe vaine, so it is vnto vs vnprofitable, when it is seuered from true Charitie and the feare of God: and this the Apostle plainly affirmeth, that if he had the gift of prophecie, and knew all secrets and all knowledge; and had not loue, it were all nothing worth, yea, he himselfe were nothing. And another saith, that we do not truly know that which is good, vnlesse we attaine vnto it in this end, that we may practise it; and that he doth vnprofitably meditate in the Law of God, who is labourous to retaine that in his memory, which he hath no purpose to practise in his actions. For this idle knowledge doth not beget or nourish in vs the sauing graces of Gods Spirit, nor make vs any whit more strong and vigorous in our spirituall estate, yea, rather it impaireth our soules health, and weakeneth our strength in grace. In which respect knowledge idlely swimming in the braine, is fitly compared to meat floting on the stomacke, which is vndigested; for as such meate for want of fit concoction doth not nourish vs, but begetteth ill humours and corrupteth the body: so much knowledge negligently cast into the stomack of the soule, which is the memory, if it bee not concocted with the heat of Charity, and so transfused and digested into the seuerall parts, and (as it were) the outward limmes of the soule, namely, our manners and actions, that so it selfe may be made good by the things it knoweth, the life and manners according with it, shall not that knowledge for want of digestion passe into the corrupt humours of sinne, and in stead of nourishing vs impaire our spirituall health, swelling vs with the winde of pride, and gnawing and griping vs with that torturing Collicke of an euill conscience? neither will it helpe forward our journey towards our heauenly Country, but when we mount vp highest in our owne proud conceit, those waxen wings of knowledge and speculation not enduring the heat of Gods iustice, will most fitly vs when we most trust in them, and let vs fall without hope or helpe into that bottomlesse Gulfe of Hell and condemnation. And as it little profiteth a man for the running of a race and gaining of the Garland, though he plainly see the way, and discerne the Goale, if he either idlely lie still and refuse to run, or is fast lame in all his limmes, and not able so to set one foote forward in the way: so it will stand vs in small stead for the obtayning of this Crowne of eternall happinesse, that we clearly see the way of righteousnesse, if we wilfully refuse to goe in it, or wanting all other vertues, which are the sinewes and strength of the soule, we, through this spirituall lamenesse, be vnable to set forward in them.

And thus it appeareth that this idle and vnfruitfull knowledge doth not profit vs, and therefore is not to bee valued or esteemed: but much more are wee to despise and contemne it, seeing it doth not onely not bring vs any good, but also much hurt and disaduantage, and that both in this life and in the life to come: in this life it hurteth both our bodies and our soules; our bodies by weakning them, our soules by vexing and corrupting them. For though this knowledge bee idle, light and vaine, yet it is not idlely procured, or bought with the light Coyne of some small labour, but it is purchased at deare rates, and attained vnto with much study and excessiue paines, which abateth the strength, impaireth the health, and oftentimes bringeth the body into deepe consumptions, and deadly diseases. Yet, the more vaine the knowledge is, the more labour commonly it requireth, as being much more mysticall and subtilly curious, than that which is solid and substantiall. To which purpose, one sayth, that only vnprofitable truth lyeth hidden in the deepe; and that wee haue no cause to complaine of hard measure; because there is nothing difficult in finding out, but that whose finding is accompanied with this only fruit, that wee haue found it; and whatsoeuer may serue to make vs better & more blessed, that lyeth in the open plain, & neere at hand. In which respect these curious pryers and searchers into hidden Mysteries and abstruse knowledge, are not vnfitly compared to Spiders, who spend their owne bowels to make their curiously wrought webs, which a blast of winde, or a small brush of a besome, doe take away and bring to nothing: for so these doe spend their strength, impayre their health, and shorten their liues, in attayning such a slight and vaine knowledge, as will not vphold them, when the least blast of tentation bloweth vpon them; and toyle themselues in taking farre greater paines to attaine vnto this frothy, idle, and vnprofitable knowledge, which cannot priuiledge them from death and destruction, than they should need to take for the obtayning of that sound, substantiall, and sauing Knowledge, which bringeth with it euerlasting blessednesse. And in the same respect their curious knowledge may fitly be resembled to curious imagery, grauen or carued in sumptuous buildings; which seruing only for ornament and shew, doth neuertheless require more cost and labour, than the mayne posts and pillars which vphold the building, & make it profitable for the vse of the inhabitants; for so these idle speculations, seruing only for ornament and discourse, and to gaine the applause and wonder of men to those that haue them, for their subtile wits, and deepe searches, doe require more study and labour, and spend more time in attayning vnto them, than the chiefe pillars, and fundamentall

principles of Christian Religion, which are necessarily required to our building vp in our holy faith, and to the euerlasting saluation of our bodies and soules.

Q. Sect. 6. Vnfruitfull knowledge much hurteth vs in respect of our soules, first, as it puffeth vs vp with pride.

And as this vaine and vnfruitfull Knowledge doth hurt our bodies; so also our soules by corrupting and defiling them with sinne. For when worldly minded men finde that they doe herein excell others, in stead of being thankfull vnto God for his gifts, or humbled in consideration of that account which they are to make of the Lords talent, they are presently puffed vp with pride, and both forget God, and disdaine their brethren. And thus the Apostle saith, that knowledge puffeth vp, but loue edifieth. 1. Cor. 8. 1. Yea, and not only they who haue attayned vnto this knowledge in greatest measure, are subject to this swelling disease of pride (for as I said, oftentimes those who haue most knowledge, doe the more cleerely see how many things they know not, and therefore are no more exalted with the conceit of that they know, than dejected and humbled in the sight of their ignorance) but also (yea and especially) those who haue but a smattering of knowledge, and are but a little warmed in this Sun-shine, are so puffed vp in conceite thereof, that they forget God, and themselues too. And this reason the Apostle rendreth, why hee would not haue a Bishop to bee a young Schollar, lest (measuring his worth according to his aduancement) hee should be puffed vp, and so fall into the condemnation of the Deuill. 1. Tim. 3. 6. And hereof it is that one saith, the swelling Hill of Pride raised vpon the opinion of a mans owne knowledge, is the worst and most dangerous; vpon which notwithstanding we may see euen at this day, many of the sonnes of Adam, creeping along with great desire; as if they did not know how much their Father in climing of that Hill, descended, yea, how grieuously he fell, and how fearefully by his fall, his whole Posterity was destroyed and bruised in pieces. The wounds which were inflicted on thee in ascending this Hill, although thou wast yet in thy Father's loynes, are not yet cured; and doest thou now in thine owne person striue to clime vpon it, and so to make the last errour worse than the first? O that this damnable desire should yet possesse wretched men! O yet sonnes of men, how long being slow in heart, will you loue vanity, and seeke lies! Bernard. de Ascens. domini serm. 4. Psal. 4. 2.

Q. Sect. 7. Vnfruitfull knowledge aggrauates our other sinnes.

But as this idle and vnfruitfull knowledge doth make men swell in pride and self-conceit, so doth it make all our other sins to swel also in Gods sight, increasing their guilt, and making their faultinesse great and monstrous. For whereas ignorance, if it be not wilfull (though it doth not take sinne away, yet) it much lesseneth it; knowledge contrariwise doth much aggraunte it, making it to be contemptuous, and rebellious, against the conscience, and presumptuous, as being committed wittingly & willingly, and with a high hand against God, neglecting and despising his will and Commandements reuealed vnto vs. And this appeareth by our Sauiours censure of the Scribes and Pharisies; If (saith hee) you were blinde, you should not haue sinne; but now you say, we see, therefore your sinne remayneth. And the Apostle implyeth, that if his sinnes of blasphemy and persecution, had beene joyned with knowledge of Gods will, he should neuer haue receiued mercy. So also it increaseth the greatnesse of our sins, by adding vnto them the sinnes of others, into which they led and plunged them, by giuing scandall & offence; for it is a strong inducement to moue an ignorant man to commit any sinne, when hee seeth those, who are indued with knowledge make no conscience of it; because he thinketh with himselfe, that none is so desperate to leape into the gulph of perdition wittingly and willingly; and that if there were any danger in that he doth, hee would not vpon knowledge, and, as it were, on set purpose runne into it. Finally, hee sinneth against himselfe, in making his condemnation more just, and his fault more vnexcusable; for if the sins of the Gentiles became vnexcusable, because they were committed against the Light of Nature; then how much more are their sinnes without excuse, who haue much more perfect knowledge of Gods will, as it is reuealed in the holy Scriptures? John 9. 41. Rom. 2. 1. Luke 12. 47.

Q. Sect. 8. Vnfruitfull knowledge aggrauates our reckoning at the day of iudgement.

And thus doth this vaine and idle knowledge hurt those that haue it in this life: in the life to come, they shall finde it much more pernicious. First, because it shall increase their bils of account, when at Gods great Audit they shall giue a reckoning, how they haue vsed and imployed that rich talent of knowledge, which God vouchsafed to lend vnto them; how much they haue excelled those, who wanted of their great measure, in true obedience, how much by it they haue glorified God, edified their brethren, and reformed their own liues and conuersations: for according to the measure of Gods gifts must our accounts be, and he that hath receiued the greatest portion, and hath either vnprofitably buried it, or abused it vnto sinne, the greater and more fearefull shall his condemnation be. And this is the last and greatest euill which our vnfruitfull knowledge will bring vnto vs, namely, that as it aggrauateth our sinne, so also it will increase our punishment; for as our Sauiour saith, the seruant that knoweth his Masters will, and doth it not, shall bee beaten with many stripes. And hence it is, that he threatneth more heauy condemnation against Tyre and Sidon, than against Sodome and Gomorrah, because the light of the Gospel, encreased and confirmed by admirable miracles, Luke 12. 47.

shelue, did much more, chastly shine vnto them, that vnto the Iewes and the Apostle Peter afterwards, that of God were borne for them against whom he bringeth in no man to know the way of righteousnesse, when after the Iewes had crucified the Lord, many of them were pricked in their hearts, and gaue eare vnto the holy Ghost speaking vnto them.

Seeing therefore this ill, and vnfruitfull knowledge is not onely vaine and vnprofitable, but also exceeding hurtfull, both in this life, and the life to come; let vs not allow and rest in it, but condemne and despise it, labouring after that fruitfull knowledge, which alone will make vs wise to our saluation. And as the Apostle Peter exhorteth, let our knowledge be linched in the chaine of all other vertues, seasoned with zeale and feare of God, and fruitfull in all holy obedience; and then, though it make vs not to grow a flourish in worldly discourse, nor winne the applause and praise of men; yet shall it make vs approued vnto God, and will certainely guide vs in the way, which in the end will bring vs to endlesse ioy, and heauenly happinesse.

CHAP. XIII.

That beautie is to be esteemed in respect of spirituall graces, or heauenly endowments.

HAue I said thus much concerning the corruptions of worldly prosperity, arising from the faculties and properties of the mind. In the next place we are to intreate of such, as haue their beginning and growth from the properties and qualities of the body; as for example, from beautie, strength, and health. For howsoeuer these are all good in themselues, as I shall particularly shew, yet they are abused through the malice of the diuell, and our owne corruption, as bellowes to allure and draw vs vnto sin. Concerning the first, Beautie (as Aristotle defineth it) is a proportionable congruity, and fit agreement of all the parts of the body, ioyned with a certaine sweetnesse of colour and countenance. The which in its own nature is good, as being a gift of God, she which hee bestowed in greatest measure vpon our first parents in their creation, and sparingly vpon their posterity, whom sinne defaced and defamed, as well in their body as in their soule, and restreineth a sparre part or some degree and portion thereof for the glorious Saints of heauen. And this is acknowledged by Heathens and Christians; yea, euen the Iewish Poet could say that Beautie is the gift of God. And with him agree the Ancients of the Church. One saith, that beautie is a grace of the body from God, a bountifull aduantage, or accession of the diuine creation, and a cunning deuotion garnishing and ornament of the soule. And another: Those gifts of God are thine, which are good, because thou the chiefe goodnesse hast created them; and there is nothing to them ours, but our sinne in ouerlooking them, for neglecting all order, we are ready to preferre the creature, aboue their who hath created it. And Ambrose saith, that there is no fault in beautie, if it be free from counterfeiting art; and if allurements lasciuiousnesse, fraudulent and the grace of beauty, arme be not ouercome with vnchastnesse and fauntinesse. Yea, it is a fit habitation for vertue, modestie and shamefastnes to dwell in; and as a good workman vsually worketh best when he hath fit matter to worke on, so modestie doth most excell, when it is seated in a beautifull body, if this beautie bee not affected, but naturall and simple. Yea, the spirit of God himselfe doth take notice of it, in those vpon whom it was bestowed, and affordeth vnto it due and fit commendations. Thus Sarah, Rebecah, Rahel, Ioseph, and many others are said to haue beene very faire and beautifull; and when God restored and augmented the prosperitie of Iob, it is specially noted as an extraordinary blessing, that hee had not only many children, but that in all the land were no women found so faire as the daughters of Iob. But we shall not needs to say much of this point, seeing by instinct of nature, all men owe a kind of homage to beautie where they find it, and being much delighted therewith doe extraordinarily fauour and respect it. And therefore one being asked, why beautifull things were so much loued, answered, that none but a blind man need to aske such a question. But to say nothing of Heathens, euen the Saints and seruants of God haue beene moued thereby to loue and liking. This made Iacob to preferre Rachel before Lea: this made Moses mother to fauour and respect him, and in sauing him aliue because he was faire, to hazard her owne life. And holy Samuel being affected with Eliabs beautie, concluded hereupon that the Lords anointed was before him; yea the Lord himselfe is said to take pleasure in the beautie of his Church; vnto whom nothing agreeth that is euill, nor so much as by an allegorie or similitude.

Beauty therefore being good may be moderately loued and esteemed, when it is in a good and vertuous subiect, the outward beauty of the body, with the inward beauty of the minde being ioyned together: seeing it helpeth to adorne vertue to the outward sense, and causeth it to bee accepted with more applause and liking, when it is found in a beautifull body, than in one ill fauoured and deformed; euen as a precious iewell is more graced when it is set in a rich enbiner, than in an vnseemely boy. As also when it is well vsed by those that haue it, that is to say, when first it is not too much affected and vnnaturally forced, to which purpose one saith, that as an artificer worketh better when he hath fit matter to worke vpon, so also modesty doth shine more clearely, where it is in a comely body: not so, that the beauty of the body is too much affected, but neither simple and neglected, rather that euery part be decently decked, and ouerspred and beset with faire precious and glorious garments, beautified with such as are ordinary, that so neither any thing bee wanting to necessity and honest comlinesse, nor any thing added as ouermuch neatnesse. Secondly, when it is ioyned with modesty and shamefastnesse, for nothing is more opposed to vertuous beautie, than immodestie and bold impudencie. Thirdly, if the beautie of the body be an effectuall reason to moue them that haue it, to a more diligent care of adorning their minds with vertue and true piety, and to keepe a vigilant watch ouer all their actions, that they doe not commit any thing foule and faulty, vnbecoming such a beauty. And thus the wise Socrates is said to haue perswaded his scholers, that they should often looke themselues in their glasses, that he who was pleased and delighted with his beauty, might earnestly indeauour not to disgrace the dignity and comlinesse of his body with euill conditions; and that he who found himselfe ill-fauoured should striue to couer his deformities with his vertues and good manners. To which purpose also an ancient Father demandeth, Why then (saith he) of so excellent beautie? why then let it moue thee to this care, that the beauty of thy minde may be of answerable brightnesse to the beauty of thy body. Finally, this beauty is vsed aright, when as we doe not rest in it as being fraile and momentany, but vse it as a little streame to conduct and bring vs to God the fountaine of all beautie and goodnesse, and bee mooued thereby to this meditation, that if a sparke of this beauty imparted to the creature, worke such loue and admiration; then how much more is that infinite flame of beauty in our Creator, from which this is derined, to bee admired and loued! If this heauenly Sunne reflect a shadow so full of brightnesse vpon earth and clay, then how infinitly glorious is he in his owne nature and perfections! Finally, if we esteeme it a part of our earthly happinesse to haue our selues and necessitudes adorned with this beauty; then how much more happy shall we be, when being in those heauenly ioyes, we shall see, not only our selues exceed the Sun in the firmament in beauty and brightnesse, but also shall haue the vision and fruition of our gracious and glorious God, in comparison of whose purity the heauens are filthy and vncleane, and in regard of whose infinite beauty and glory the Sunne it selfe is grosse darknesse; and the most excelling beautie in heauen or earth but meere deformity?

And thus haue I shewed that beauty in its owne nature is good, and a gift and blessing of God to those who haue also a right vse of it: but as contrariwise deformity is in its owne nature euill, as being a fruit of sinne; and therefore such as were reuoked, lame, or blemished, are by God forbidden to offer his sacrifices. But if we consider it aright, it is in our nature corrupted with sinne, it is not absolutely good, but as beholden to other things indifferent, the which (as all other the benefits of prosperity) is more often abused, than well vsed, and so becometh vnto vs through the malice of our spirituall enemies an occasion of sinne, and the ground of many dangerous temptations. And thus this gift of God is abused, whereas we rest in it alone, and content our selues with this shadow neglecting the substance, vertue and true godlinesse, and thinking it enough to haue beautifull bodyes, though in the meane time our minds and soules be vgly and deformed. For the inward beauty of the mind ought not to bee severed from the outward beauty of the body; for (as we say) beauty is the flower which springeth from the root of vertue, and therefore being parted from it, it must needs wither and come to nought. To which purpose one hath said, that the mind is more to be regarded than the body, for the outward beauty perisheth not, when a good winde is not ioyned with it: neither is that to bee esteemed a perfect beautie, but lame and most imperfect, which consisteth in the outward colour of the skin, when the minde and soule is vgly and deformed. For what is this beauty then a faire sabine full of filth and rubbish, and a goodly sepulchre full of stench and rottennesse; which is not indeed truly beautifull, but onely seemeth so, through the imperfection of our sight; for if (as we saith) our eyes like the Linnets could pierce into the inward parts, or rather if we could see as God seeth, the secrets of the heart and reines, then should wee more loathe and abhorre them for their inward vglinesse and filthinesse, than admire or like them for their outward feature. So that it is not their owne naturall excellency, which intitleth them to the name of beauty, but the weaknesse of our sight which can pierce no deeper than the outside of the skin. And therefore of such it is said, not absolutely that they were beautifull, but only that they were faire to looke vpon, 2. Sam. 14. 27. Let none then content themselues with this painted scabard, which which hath in it but a wouldon or bodgy dagger, not take delight in this flower which hath a faire colour, because (we must confesse) being vsed as the flowers of the field, doe withdraw us become colde in Gods seruice, hindring the beauty of colour in vs, and the sweetnesse of vertue, that for when the outward complexion is faded, the sweet and perfume of a godly life may still remaine.

Against this beauty is abused, when for the excesse thereof those that haue it are puffed vp with pride, and so forget God who gaue it, and all duty which they owe vnto him, and despise their neighbours, accounting them more of base condition. For howsoeuer this beauty be vaine and of small worth, and necessary, and oftentimes but a deceit vnto him that hath it, yet there are many so desirous of all goodnesse, that for want of true worth in them, they are proud of the vaine shadow; and being void of vertue, by their beauty alone doe frame vnto themselues glorious opinions, in louing themselues, when as we doe too much pleased for our owne parts, and spend our much time and labour about it, preferring it before other things of more necessitie and greater value. Into which abuse, vaine worldlings (especially of the weaker sex) are much addicted, who superstitiously abstaine from those things which they most loue, and are content to vse those things which they loathe, to get or reserue this vanity; thinking no paines too much, no punishment which they take on themselues too great, nor their precious health too deare, to giue for the purchase of this fading trifle, and spending more time in the combing and curling of their haire, in washing, sweating and barbing, dressing and trimming, and in many other their hidden mysteries, (of which wilfull ignorance I am more, and thereof I am not ashamed herein of my simplicity) than in all their diligent deuotions towards God, or their duties of Christianity towards their neighbours, so that no body that is wise would chuse vnto them their supposed happinesse, consisting in this vaine beauty, if he did but consider at what deare rates it is bought, and how many more excellent things they doe in the meane time lose, whilest they are procuring or preserving this trifling vanity. Finally, those abuse it vnto sinne who esteeme it in themselues or others, preferring it before the gifts of the minde, vertue, Gods sanctifying grace, and the meanes of their saluation, yea more esteeming of this perishing flower, than of the eternall fruition and loue of God: for howsoeuer this gift of beauty be good as proceeding from God, yet it is in comparison of the former of the excellencie, being a gobd to impose it, carnall, and of the meanest and lowest degree; and therefore it is implyed by the (as one saith) when in respect thereof, the eternall God, our internall and simplie good, is neglected; and righteousnesse is forsaken, and gold found of vnrighteousnesse, not through the fault of gold, but of the man, for it is in this.

Now least any should thinke that but few fall into this folly, let them know, that as many are guilty of it, as vse greater care and labour, and spend more time in procuring, preferring this fading beauty, than in attaining Gods fauour, the graces of his spirit, or in vsing the meanes of their owne saluation; for as we preferre our ends, so also the meanes accordingly which leade vnto them.

And thus haue I shewed how this gift of God is abused vnto euill, and becommeth the ground of diuers temptations, whereby Satan and the world, though the corruption of our flesh, allureth vs to sinne. Against which, that we may be armed, let vs not (if we want it) immoderately desire it, and if we haue it, let vs take heed that we bee not ouertaken with pride, nor set our hearts and affections vpon it, preferring it before spirituall and saving graces, and the meanes of our diuine saluation. Yea, when it commeth in comparison with these, let vs learne to despise and contemne, loathe and abhorre it, as becoming through abuse, a snare of the diuell, whereby he hindereth vs from going forward in the way of saluation. But because the most that haue it, doe thus abuse it, and in stead of being the better, and more thankfull vnto God, become more vaine and proud, wanton and wicked, let such know, that whatsoeuer beauty is in its owne nature, to them it is of no worth or excellencie, altogether vnprofitable, yea, very hurtfull and pernicious, both to themselues and others. And first that it is of no value, or excellencie, being severed from vertue and true godlinesse; it may appeare, in that it is common to man with the brutish creatures, and what excellencie is in that, in which the horse and greyhound, the peacocke and swan, doe also excell as well as he? yea, of what worth is it, seeing euen the flowers of the field, as the rose and lilie, doe in the beauty of colours goe farre beyond him? and therefore mans excellencie is not in this, wherein he is exceeded by such meane creatures, but in the right vse of sanctified reason, and in the hidden vertues of the minde. For as there is no thing more vseless in beasts, than those which is outwardly seene and discerned; so in man, there is nothing inferiour to that which lieth open to the view, and is subiect to the senses; for wherein lies the profit of soule and body, the body which is seene doth serue and

and they, and therefore high in best sensible dutie deserueth our gladnesse; and the outward man is not to be so detained for his bewtie and outward parts, as for his secrete vertues; and hidden operations of his minde. Neither in truth doth the excellencie of the outward parts, which doe chiefly inuite to beautie, consist herein, that they are beautifull, which is onely their ornament, but in their seuerall offices and sufficities, for which they were ordained. As for example, this is not the excellencie of the eye, that alley are gray, or blue, but in glancing or rolling, in that they excell in the exactest quicknesse of seeing; so is not the excellencie of the nose to stand this, or that colour or fashion, but in the perfection of hearing and smelling; nor of the hand that it hath a fine proportion, or white colour, but in that it is ready and expert in all manner of all our actions; nor of the teeth to be white and euen, but that they be fit to prepare conuenient nourishment for the stomacke; in all which excellencies, the deformed and beautifull exceed not one another, but are both equall.

But the worthlesnes of this beauty, which is seuered from vertue and true wisedome, may more plainly appeare both by testimonies and reasons. The wisest among the sons of men said, that fauour is deceitfull, and beautie is vanitie, but a woman that feareth the Lord, shee shall be praised. And such ill harmonie he thinketh to be betwixt beautity and folly, that hee iudgeth it vnbefitting and ridiculous, to see a faire woman lacking discretion, as a iewell of gold in a swines snout.
Another compareth a beautifull body with euill conditions to a faire house, and a bad inhabitant; and another, to a good ship that hath a bad pilot. To which purpose also Chrysostome saith, that he doth not so much regard the beautie of the body, as the beauty of the minde. For what (saith he) is a beautifull woman? a painted sepulchre, vnlesse she be sober, chast and modest; and beautie without these vertues, is an open gulphe, and a poison compounded for soules to drinke, &c.
And therefore if these fond manner women beautifull, doe not admire them, for the lofty and strong okes, although they be thicke with faire greene leaues, and full in shewe, yet they beare no fruit fit for men, but only meate to feed hogges; whereas the vine creeping on the earth, bringeth forth pleasant grapes.

The reasons why men should esteeme it base, and of no worth, without vertue, are in comparison of spirituall graces, one, for because God doth so esteeme it, for he looketh not to the outward shape and countenance, but principally regardeth the heart, and the inward beautie of the mind. And this the Lord shewed to Samuel, when he was so much in loue with Eliabs beautie, and goodly personage, willing him not to looke on his countenance, nor on the brightnes of his stature, seeing he had refused him: because God seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord beholdeth the heart. But hereby like the Lord valueth his gifts of bodie and outward shape, when opposed to his measure of bestowing the same; for he esteemeth them not, as speciall and chiefe iewels for his owne children and seruants, but as trifles of small value, he maketh them common to the wicked & reprobate, who are but slaues & enemies. And thus he inriched Saul with a large portion thereof, of whom it is said, that he was a goodly young man, and there was not among the children of Israel a fairer then he:

from his shoulder vpward he was higher then any of the people. So Absalom had this gift in great measure, who is said to haue been a very goodly man. And so Iehu, though he had not the birthright, nor the blessing, yet in this had a double portion, for in all Israel there was none to be so much praised for beau-tie as he; from the sole of his foote to the top of his head, there was no blemish in him.
Vnto whose is appeareth, of how small worth in comparison this beautie is, seeing it hath been so plentifully bestowed on such worthlesse men: to which purpose one saith, that the bestowing of the best ornaments and gifts of God, doth therefore behoue vs to vse the euill also, lest it might seeme to the good, to be of any great value. Yea, hee hath bestowed it on the brute creatures, as well as men; and therefore, howsoeuer it be good, yet it exceedeth not a brutish excellencie.
To this purpose one saith: are thou (saith he) faire and beautifull? why this is the glory of horses, and not of men. How are we fairer then the peacocks or the swan; and oftentimes base boies and girles, harlots and effeminate men, haue had a great share in this glory. And is this therefore as such worth, that for it thou shouldst be exalted and exolled? Seeing therefore Gods estimate, which being grounded on infinite wisedome and iustice, trieth downe the value of this vaine beauty, which is raised vp by carnall men to such high rates; let vs learne to conforme our iudgements vnto his, lightly accounting of this outward forme and colour, to which mans vaine opinion hath giuen it chiefe excellencie, and highly valuing the inward beauties of the minde, the vertues and sanctifying graces of Gods spirit, which how vnhandsome soeuer we seeme before men in our outward feature, will make vs to appeare beautifull in the sight of God, and of our husband Iesus Christ, whom if we please, it little skilleth, though we bee vn-pleasing in the eyes of men.

Against, the worthlesnesse of beauty may hereby appeare, in that if it bring any delight, it is rather to those who see it, than to those

those that haue it; or if at all it be pleasing to the owners, it is in regard of the liking and admiration of the lookers on, hauing nothing in themselues to rest vpon for their contentment, but depending vpon the iudgment and censures of others, either to bee exalted by their commendations, or to bee abased by their dispraises; and what worth is in that, which riseth and falleth at euery ones deuotion? or how cannot that bee esteemed vaine, which hath its being and subsistence in the vaine breath of the vulgar multitude? Neither in truth would they at all admire it, or though they should, yet would not their idle breath puffe vs vp with the wind of pride, if either they or we did but consider, what loathsome matter lieth hid vnder this faire skinne. For if our eyes cannot pearce any deeper than the outside only, yet looke what filthy excrements issue out of the nose, eares, pores and other passages, and iudge what the fountaine it selfe it, from which proceed such loathsome streames: consider what wee were before our birth, and what afterwards, then placed in the middest of excrements, and now made the receptacles of dirt and filth. And therefore when the beautie of the skinne doth most exalt vs, wee should bee sufficiently humbled, if we would but consider the vgly loathsomnes of that which it containeth.

But though this beautie were of some excellencie whilest it continueth, yet is it to bee esteemed of little worth, in regard that it is so momentanie and so mutable. In respect whereof the Wise man saith, that it is not onely vaine, but deceitfull also, giuing men the slip when they thinke that they hold it fastest, like a shadow that vanisheth whilest one thinketh to embrace it: for if man himselfe be so momentanie, what shall we thinke of beautie which is but an accident of this subiect, and commonly vanisheth, the substance still remaining? If he be but a flower of the field, which is but of a day or weekes continuance; then how fraile and fading is the colour of this flower which often fadeth a great while, of this small time, before the flower dieth? If man be but a cloude then surely beautie, may be fitly resembled to the bright lightning which issueth out of it, and vanisheth in the twinkling of an eye. Whereof it is that the kingdome of beautie is said to be a tyrannie, which is violent for the time, but of short continuance. To this purpose one saith that as the branch springing with his beautifull flowers, doth delight the eie, & by little & little finding in fault his beautie, & is turned into hay; so all the beautie of man budding in the spring of childhood, flowreth and flourisheth in the summer of youth, and perfect age, and suddenly when the winter of age commeth, the head vnwittingly groweth gray, the face wrinkled, the skinne writhled, and so farre is he now from beautie, that hee hath scarce the vse of his limmes for the slowest and weakest motion. But as it is momentany, so also is it mutable, and vncertaine to continue this short time, for this flower of beautie is subiect to bee blasted with innumerable accidents, a little scratch impaireth it, and a greater wound doth quite deforme it; a dayes sicknes much abateth it, and if it bee but of a weekes continuance, doth quite defate it; yea so fading it is that a little sun-shine robbeth vs of it, this earthly beautie being not able to endure that heauenly brightnesse. Or though it be preserued from the violence of extraordinarie accidents, yet time, which by little and little brought it vnto vs, till we attained to the height of its perfection, doth then as stealingly take it away; neither is it more possible to prevent this decay of beautie, than to stop the course of time; for euen whilest it is admired and praised, it secretly fadeth and declineth. And though (through the strength of art and nature conspiring together) it were possible to preserue this beautie vnto old age; yet then behold the vtter ruine of this faire building; for when age commeth it ploweth deepe furrowes in the most beautifull visage, it changeth the colour, rotteth the teeth, tainteth the breath, wrinkleth the brow, bleereth and dimmeth the eyes, crookneth the backe, writhleth the hands, stiffneth and lameth the ioynts, deafeneth the eares, and maketh the voyce hoarse and vnpleasant, which before was sweete and tunable. In a word, it worketh such a change and alteration, that if after some long distance of time, a man should behold his visage in a glasse, he would seeme a stranger to himselfe, and scarce acknowledge that he is still the owner of the same body wherwith formerly he was delighted. Or let it bee imagined that through the extraordinary vigour of nature, there doth a kinde of comely beauty remaine euen in the elder age; yet remember what will become of it in the next houre that death hath seazed vpon it, and hath thrust the soule out of her possession, till his lease also be expired. Call to mind that the most amiable face and countenance after two or three dayes buriall, will bee so vgly and deformed, that none would now more loath it, than those who before did most admire it; and were it not priuiledged with that only benefit of senselesnesse, and want of vnderstanding, itselfe-horrour would make it breake out of the prison of the graue, and enable it to striue by flight to escape and auoide its owne company.

and contemne it, as being of no value, when as it is severed from true godlinesse. And because naturally wee are affected with beautie, let vs turne the edge of our loue from this earthly trash, to spirituall and heauenly treasure, setting our hearts on that inward beautie of the mind which consisteth in vertue, and the sanctifying gifts of Gods Spirit, and on that glorious beautie, which shall adorne our bodies and soules in the kingdome of God; for as this beautie is in it selfe ten thousand times more excellent than the other, so shall it be of euerlasting continuance; for old age can neuer make any wrinckles in the face of vertue, sicknesse cannot hurt it, violence cannot deface it, griefe and sorrow cannot impaire it, yea death it selfe cannot blemish or disgrace it; yea rather it shall bee a meanes to crowne this beauty of grace with the beautie of glory, which as it shall bee full of vnspeakable excellencie, so shall it be free from all outward iniurie, and from all inward causes of decay, and consequently vnchangeable and euerlasting.

But if this will not weane our hearts from the loue of worldly beauty, because it doth not profit vs: let vs further consider that it doth also bring much hurt both vnto our selues and also vnto our neighbours. It hurteth our selues both in our bodies, soules and names; our bodies thereby are made more tender, soft and effeminate, yea also more weake and sickly, and that not onely through the vse of vnwholesome medicines, and the neglect of wholesome food, both which are ordinarie with those who ouermuch affect the praise of beautie, but also because they neglect that conuenient labour and exercise which preserueth health and increaseth strength, and giue themselues ouer to sloth and daintines, the ordinarie enemies and impairers of them both. And this needeth no other proofe but common experience, and by comparing the ordinarie sort, who feed wholesomely, and diligently imploy themselues in the duties of their calling, with the gentilitie of the land, who no more exceed the common people in forme and beautie than these surpasse them, in health and strength.

§. Sect. II. Beauty hindereth vertue, and furthereth vice.

But howsoeuer this worldly beautie doth much hurt the body, yet nothing in comparison of that hurt which it bringeth vnto the soule, which it much hindreth in the course of vertue, and also plungeth into many vices. In both which respects this affection of worldly beauty hath ouercome the most that haue had it, whom it hath first effeminated and made vtterly delicate, so as they could not endure the paines of climming the high hill of vertue, nor of trauelling in the strait and afflicted way of true godlinesse, but rather desire to goe downe the ease-declining hill of vice, and to walke in the plaine and faire way that leadeth to destruction: and those whom it hath not ouercome, it hath thoroughly exercised all their strength in making resistance; and very valiantly haue they behaued themselues in this conflict, if they haue not had in the way of vertue many rubs, & receiued many foiles. To this purpose one fitly saith, that they who haue beautie, haue a couer for their eyes, a snare for their feet, and birdlime for their wings; so as they cannot easily discerne the truth, nor follow vertue, nor flie aloft in heauenly meditations. And many hath it made barren in the duties of pietie, stopped in the course of vertue, and turned aside into the by-paths of vice: in respect of which vnfruitfulnes in goodnes the beautifull person is compared to the tall faire oake, which bringeth only acornes for hogs; and they who want it, and are indued with the beautie of the minde, are likened to the vine, which being deformed in shape, bringeth grapes and wine fit for kings.

The truth whereof will more clearely appeare in some particulars: for if wee take a view of former times and of our own dayes, wee shall find that beauty and chastitie are often at odds, and doe seldome dwell together; not because those who are beautifull may bee in their owne nature and inclination as chast as others, if (as I said before) they doe not mollifie and effeminate their minds with sloth and daintines, and so grow light and wanton in their desires; but because they are more exposed to the tentations and assaults of worldly wicked men, who are set on fire with their brightnes, and allured to lust with the bait of their beauty. Now that is most hardly preserued, which is of so many loued and desired, especially when it cannot bee hidden, but is subject to open view, like vnto a rich treasure which is carried vncouered by the high way side, which offereth a kinde of violence to their desires that see it, and causeth them to offer violence to the owners, and to seaze vpon by force, that which had first seazed on their concupiscence. And thus the beautie of Bethsabe betrayed her chastitie vnto David, and Thamers vnto Iudah, and thus also did it endanger Saraes vnto Pharaoh and Abimelech, and Iosephs vnto his mistresse. And therefore one saith, that although beautie be not to be accused, as being the felicitie of the body, &c. yet it is to be feared in respect of the censures and violence of the beholders; as it also caused Abraham, that father of the faithfull, to feare, because of the beautie of his wife, and saining that Sarah was his sister, redeemed his safetie with a reproch. Whereas contrariwise we shall finde them who want this beautie, easily freed from many impediments; for these faultes

for beautie are not very carefull to bewaile them vp their lose of loue; but like the simple Lambe they feed vp quietly and in silence in the presence of their slaughterer, there being no voyce to disturbe their peace. And thus it appeareth true which one saith, That beautie hath made many adulterers, but never any chaste: and hath beene often the Bawd and baite which hath betrayed chastity, but never patronne to defend it. And though there be some that haue been innocent of this fault, and haue beene rich in beauty and in chastity too, yet few of them haue with all their skill and innocency kept their names vnblemished, and free from the spots of suspition and jealousie. For wherein (as one saith) those who are not adorned with this beauty, are not only free from faults, but also from suspition; the beautifull woman, vnlesse shee vse great care, and much modesty and honesty, though shee be innocent in fact, yet will easily make way to an ill opinion. Let vs therefore not so much affect this earthly beauty, which oftentimes is an occasion of sinne, and seldome freed from the suspition thereof; but rather set our hearts and affections on vertue & spirituall graces which adorne the mind with inward beauty, which is not only free from danger of sinne, but also preserueth vs from the least suspition and jealousie of euill; and place all our loue on that heauenly beauty and diuine glory, of which wee shall haue the sight and fruition after our dissolution; which (as one saith) is not burthensome to the others, nor pernicious to them that loue and affect it; nor dangerous to those who are with vs, nor exposed to tentations, nor compassed with scandals: but bringeth much joy to them that behold it, and endlesse happines to them that haue it.

Finally, this worldly beauty much hurteth those that haue it, by making them proud and insolent, and consequently forgetfull of God and of all good duties which they owe vnto him; neither is there any thing so vaine that maketh so proud, of so small worth, that doth cause the heart to swel more in loftinesse of conceit, or doth more fill it with selfe-loue and admiration of their owne excellency. Nothing of such slight importance that causeth greater negligence in the duties of Gods seruice, seeing it visually hindereth those that haue it, or that desire to haue it, from comming to the exercises of Religion, their time being wholly taken vp in decking and adorning of their bodies, that so their beauties may be set out to the shew; and also much distracteth them when they come, carrying away their thoughts from the exercises of Religion, and fixing them vpon that which they haue made their Idoll. For when they looke vpon others, they either view their forme and beautie, disdayning those who are inferiour, vying with those who are equall, and enuying those who being superiour, seeme to rob them of the title of excellency; or elsethey obserue their habits and attires, that out of this glasse of vanity they may learne to decke themselues more curiously against their next comming. And as it maketh them proudly to neglect all duty to God, so also insolent towards men, as appeareth in the example of Vashti, who being puffed vp with pride, because the King was so rauished with her beauty, that he desired to make shew of it to his Princes, refused to yeeld obedience vnto his Commandement, making no question but that her beauty would haue made peace betweene them at the next parley. Whereby it appeareth, that as nothing more than it adorneth the body in the eyes of men, so nothing more deformeth the soule in the sight of God, seeing it spotteth and polluteth it with this filthy leprosie of pride, which of all other vices hee most loatheth and abhorreth. Whereof it is that the Lord denieth vnto them his sanctifying graces, which he vouchsafeth only vnto the humble, and opposeth himselfe against them, punishing them oftentimes in that wherein they glory, and catching them in their owne inueigling nets, which they spred out for others, like Absalon who was hanged with his owne haire, that wherein hee chiefly gloried, being made by God the instrument of his ruine.

Hest. 1. 11, 12.

But as this worldly beauty is hurtfull to them that haue it, so also to others that behold it: for first, it serueth for nothing being severed from vertue and true godlinesse, but for a curious vaile to hide vnder it all sin, and to make wickednesse it selfe, when it is disguised with it, to passe vnsuspected. And this was that Vizard wherewith that notable Hypocrite Saul was so adorned, that he deceiued both good Samuel, and all the people, causing him to extoll him, as not being to be matched among all the rest, and moouing them to shoute for joy, and to cry aloude, God saue the King. But much more doth it hurt, as it is vsed by the Deuill and the World for a baite to allure men vnto sin; and a shining flame to set their hearts on fire with vnlawfull lusts. In which respect a beautifull woman without vertue, is compared to a sweet poyson which killeth with delights, and their glancing looks to the stroke of Scorpions, or the sting of Vipers, which bringeth death in a sweet slumber; or else to a burning coale, which being it selfe first kindled, inflameth those also that approach vnto it; or as Salomon compareth it, to a Sword, which, whilest it glittereth, woundeth, yea, a two edged Sword, the one hurting those that haue it, with pride, the other those which behold it, with lust and wantonnesse. And thus were the Saints of God wounded, whilest they beheld the beautie of the the daughters of men; thus was Putiphars Wife inflamed with the sight of Ioseph; thus was Amnon sicke of lust, hauing suffered his eyes to drinke their fill of this sweet poyson; yea, and with this snare was holy Dauid caught, whilest his eyes wantonly wandred and beheld the beauty of his seruants Wife. And hence it is that Salomon seeking to preserue his youthfull Scholler from the sinne of vncleannes, thinketh it not enough to haue him so farre off from the beautifull Harlot, that he cannot heare the bewitching eloquence of her flattering tongue; but also that he stand aloofe, and keepe himselfe (as it were) out of the Gun-shot of her deadly wounding eyes. The consideration whereof made the beautifull Thuscan (as Augustine recordeth) to deforme his ouer-louely face with griesly wounds, lest it should become a snare to intangle the beholders with vnlawfull lusts; being herein, as I take it, as blind in their rash & inconsiderate zeale, as he was bright in beauty. Seeing it might haue sufficed to haue couered it with the chast vaile of a sober and graue countenance, which by taking away all hope of obtayning, would also haue quenched the heate of wanton desires; neither ought he to haue kept others from abuse, by abusing it himselfe, nor to haue rejected Gods gift which to him was good, for feare lest others should abuse it vnto euill. But as wee are not to joyne with him in this extreame, so let vs as carefully auoid the other: and hauing beautie, let vs not wantonly discouer it as though wee brought it to the market; or being in others, let vs either with Iob turne away our eyes, that wee doe not behold it, or at least let vs looke vpon it through the glasse of modesty, chastity and sobriety, and so this Cockatrice shall neuer hurt vs. And this counsell the Sonne of Syrach giueth vs: Turne away (saith he) thine eye from a beautifull woman, and looke not on others beauty, seeing many haue perished by the beautie of women, for through it loue is kindled as a fire. To which accordeth the admonition of another: Let vs shun (saith hee) these pernicious beauties, least they enjoyne vs to commit all maner of euill, &c. Take heed my Sonne of viewing these formes, by which thou seest many haue perished; doe not drinke, I pray thee, of that cup wherewith so many haue beene poysoned, feed not of that meate whereon such multitudes haue surfetted, rush not vpon those rocks, whereupon so many haue suffered shipwracks, and carefully auoide those hidden snares wherein thou hast seene so many taken.

Basil. Admonit. ad filium spirit.

But as this worldly beauty is hurtfull to strangers, so oftentimes to neerest friends, for it is a common occasion, and the vsuall fuell, wherewith the consuming fire of jealousie is kindled, whilest the Husband beholding his Wiues beauty with the eye of Loue, groweth in feare of Riuals, and considereth the great difficulty of appropriating that to his owne vse, which is of so many affected and desired; the which feare making him fit to entertaine all suspitions, and many suspitions seruing to his jealous minde for an euident demonstration, doe make way for rage against his Wife, the ouer-flowing of loue turning into the gaule of fury, for enuy and hatred against his supposed Riuall, and for torment and vexation to his owne soule. Againe, this worldly beauty seuered from vertue doth often expose neerest friends to many dangers, as sometimes to secret poysons, and sometimes to open violence, because they stand in the way, and hinder those who are intangled with it, from satisfying their lusts, and enjoying their wanton and lasciuious desires. For if this beautie had these dangerous and deadly effects in Sara, who thereby vnwillingly exposed Abraham to the hazard of his life; and in Bethsabe, whose beauty was the cause of her Husbands ruine, both which notwithstanding were vertuous women, & feared God: how much more pernicious is it in those who are destitute of vertue, modesty and sobriety, who are not only occasions, but also accessaries and helpers forward of these mischiefes, being allured hereunto by their wicked Louers?

Q. Sect. 16. Beauty oftentimes hurtfull to the friends of those who excell in it.

Seeing then this worldly beauty hath in it no worth or excellency, but is altogether vnprofitable, yea, hurtfull and pernicious, both to them that excell in it, and to those that are neere vnto them: let vs weane our hearts from the loue of this vanity, & learne to contemne and despise it both in our selues and others; and if we will needs be enamored with beautifull obiects, let vs fixe our hearts vpon God, who is not only beautifull, but beauty it selfe, and so infinite in this and all other perfections, that all the beauty of all the creatures in Heauen and Earth is but as a small sparke in comparison of the glorious brightnesse of this Sunne. And therefore let the beauty of the creatures serue but as a Scale, whereby our meditations may ascend to contemplate the infinite beauty of the Creatour: for neglect of which vse of the creatures excellencies, the Authour of the Booke of Wisdome condemneth them: Surely (saith he) all men are vaine by nature, and are ignorant of God, and could not know him that is, by the good things that are seene, neither consider by the workes the worke-master, &c. though they had such pleasure in their beautie, &c. yet should they haue knowne, how much more excellent hee is that made them; for the first author of beautie hath created these things.

And if we will needs be in loue with any thing in our selues, let vs place our chiefe affection faction next vnto God vpon our soule, as being in it selfe much more excellent in beauty than our bodies, and the cause also of all bodily beauty; for according as the soule is affected, so is the beauty of the body increased or abated. If the minde be merry, the face is beautified with a cheerefull countenance; if touched with griefe and sorrow, presently all outward beauty vanisheth: if the minde be terrified and affrighted, presently this astonishment appeareth in the gastly paleneſſe of the visage; if it bee in peace and quietneſſe, then the face also is pleasant and amiable; if the minde be affected with envy, it maketh the body and face leane and wanne; if with love which is honest and moderate, it maketh the face also to looke with a lovely sweetneſſe; if the minde bee inraged, the looke also is furious, if well pleased, contentment appeareth in the very countenance; if the soule bee adorned with modeſtie, it will shew it selfe in the bashfulneſſe of the looke, but if it bee impudent, the face also is bold and shameleſſe. So that the chiefe beauty of the body is derived from the soule, and hereof it is that many haue no gracefulneſſe in their countenance, who haue no blemish in their face, nor imperfection in their favour; and contrariwise, that many who haue little excellency either in their favour or complexion, doe nevertheleſſe exceed in a lovely gracefulneſſe, which they haue not from the body, but from some secret operation of the soule. But most cleerely this appeareth in the vnion and separation of the soule and bodie; for whileſt they are joyned together their beauty also flourisheth and continueth; but no sooner are they diuided, and the body parted from the soule, than the beauty also departed from the body, so that that face which not an houre agoe was admired and loued for beauty and excellency, is now abhorred and loathed for vglineſſe and deformity. And therefore seeing the body hath nothing but what it borroweth, and only yeeldeth a place or roome wherein the soule may shew forth its excellencies: let vs not dote vpon this bodily beauty, but set our hearts and affections on the inward beauty of the soule, labouring more and more to adorne it with vertue and Gods sanctifying grace, which will not fade and perish, that so also we may attaine vnto the fruition of that eternall beauty and goodneſſe, which will bring with it fulneſſe of joy and happineſſe, that shall endure for euermore.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the vanitie and wickednesse of painting the face.

AND thus haue I shewed that worldly beauty is to be contemned of Christians, and the reasons which may induce them to despise it: I will adde something of the counterfeit thereof, painting and colouring of the face, commonly vsed by vaine women, that hereby they may get the prayse of beauty by their art, which nature hath denied vnto them. The which is not like the other, euill onely in regard of abuse, but vtterly vnlawfull, wicked and abominable in its owne nature, and in the generall practice thereof; as offending not only against the Law of God, but also the light of Nature; seeing they who haue not a dram of grace, nor a sparke of true knowledge, doe brand it with the note of ignominy and reproach whereſoeuer it is discouered; yea euen those who practise it doe condemne it in their own consciences, and would bee much ashamed (if long custome hath not made them impudent) to bee taken with the fact. But that all Christians may be moued to detest and abhorre this wicked practice; let them consider that God is not the author of this beauty, but the Deuill himselfe, who bringeth the workes of God into disgrace, not only by counterfeiting them, but by labouring to excell them. With this accordeth the judgement of that godly Father, and blessed Martyr Cyprian, who thinketh that when the wicked Angels (professing loue to lewde women that they might destroy them) abused their bodies to filthineſſe, for the hire and wages of their wickednesse, they taught and instructed them in this art of painting, and thereof inferreth, that these painted parts are not of Gods making, but of the Deuils staining and corrupting. Now what impiety is this in those who professe Christianity, that being formed by God, they should seeke to be reformed and perfected by the Deuill? To the same purpose Tertullian sayth, that the Deuill hath certainly deuised these arts, that hee might in vs oppose himselfe against God. And afterwards that to set Gods worke which is borne, and that the Deuill which is counterfeited: and what is this wickednesse is this, to adde vnto Gods workes the Deuils arts and ornaments? our seruants borrow not from our foes, the souldier desireth nothing from the enemies of his chiefe Commander, and shall a Christian desire helps of that which God and his professed enemie?

Againe, let them consider, that as it hath an euill author, so it is in it selfe euill, as springing from the roote of sinne, and bringing forth abundance of theft cursed fruites.

Q. Sect. 1. That the Deuill was the inuenter of this art of painting.

Hæc non facti membra quæ Deus fecit, sed quæ Diabolus infecit. Cyprian. de Velan. Virgin. lib.

Ille inducitat hoc mundi ingenio contumaciæ, vt id nobis quodam modo opera Dei inferret. De cult. fœmin. pag. 514.

Q. Sect. 2. Painting both the effect and fruits of sinne.

The roote from which it springeth, is sometimes pride, which moueth them, when they cannot match others in naturall beauty, to vse these artificiall helpes, that thereby they may excell them in that which is counterfeit. And sometime it springeth from lust, and the inward vncleannesse of the heart, which mooueth them to vse these inueigling arts, that by seeming more beautifull than they are, they may ensnare the affections of those who looke vpon them. And as it is bred of these cursed Parents, so it selfe is exceeding fruitfull in bringing forth the impious offspring of manifold sinnes committed both against God, their Neighbour and themselues. Against God they offend; by presuming to adulterate his worke, and by taking vpon them to amend that, which, (as they suppose) he hath made amisse; for they secretly reprehend the workman, when they are displeased with his worke, and seeme to taske him for want of wisdome and cunning, when they take vpon them to correct and make better that which he hath left vnperfected. To this purpose is that of Cyprian: God saith, Let vs make man according to our image and similitude, and dare any presume to change & alter that which God hath made? In so doing, they offer violence to God, when as they striue to reforme, & transforme that which hee hath formed; for that which is borne, is the worke of God, and that which is changed, the worke of the Deuill. If a skilfull Painter, hauing cunningly limb'd the portraiture of a mans body, and seeing another take vpon him to mend his workmanship, would bee moued to anger, and thinke himselfe much injured; dost thou thinke to goe vnpunished for thy rash boldnesse, in presuming to amend the worke of God?

Cyprian. tract. 2. de habit. virg. pag. 109.

They offend also against men, by deceiuing and abusing them, making them to admire a painted picture, in stead of the worke of God: and so notable is this cousenage, that in the Latine phrase, they are said to colour or paint, who by their words or actions deceiue another, and to vse no painting or colouring, who deale ingenuously, truly, and in simplicitie. But much more doe they sin, against them, whilest by these deuillish arts counterfeiting beauty, they inflame the hearts of those, who behold them, with filthy and vnlawfull lusts; the which was (as I take it) the chiefe cause why Satan inuented it, and wicked women practice it. And hence it is, that one calleth this painting, and counterfeit beauty, the fire of youth, the snare of lust, and the signe which shewes an vncleane heart dwelleth.

Hieronym.

But most of all doe they, who vse this art, wrong themselues, and sinne against their owne bodies and soules; for it they offer great injury to their friends, who when they come into company, are ashamed of them, then much more doe they thus offend, who are ashamed of themselues? And therefore being displeased with their owne colour and countenance, like Players, they come disguised in the similitude of other persons, and for want of a better, they act their part in the habit of an Harlot. Now what is this but vnnaturally to deny themselues, and to thrust (as it were) another into their owne place? What is it but to make themselues counterfeit Idols, that vnto them lust may offer the sacrifices of vncleanesse? What is it, but to expose themselues to the scorne and laughter of those, who hauing seene their glorious Beauty which they counterfeited, shall afterwards happen to see them in their owne complexion and naturall foulenesse, like a Player, who hauing acted a Kingly part, and put off all his gorgeous ornaments, doth now appeare in his owne person and attire; sauing that herein it is much more absurd, in that they professe this disguising, and these dissemble it, desiring that it should be taken in good earnest, which the other doe in jest to make sport.

§. Sect. 4. That they most of all offend against themselues: In Againe, whilest they labour to attaine vnto this counterfeit complexion, they lose that true beauty which they haue by nature; for with their medicines and minerals which they vse to this purpose, they make their colour pale and wan, they wrinckle the face, yea, oftentimes poyson the skin, and dimme the eyesight, and so ouer-greedily seeking false Beauty, they get true deformity, and make themselues loathsome indeed, that they may appeare beautifull in shew. And yet this is but the least part of their losse: for as they blemish their skin, so they blot and disgrace their Names, whilest following the practice of Harlots, they deseruedly gaine for all their labour, their reputation, and to bee ranged and esteemed in their fellowship, whose manners they imitate. For this outward painting of these earthly houses, maketh men thinke that they are to bee let; and by hanging out this signe of Lust, they seeme to inuite Customers, and to offer their honestie to the sale at euile rates. Of which sort, though some may bee free, (as falling into this folly by the example of others, and through the corruption of the times) yet few or none escape iust iealousie and suspition; (and Christians should auoid not onely euill, but the appearance thereof) for who would buy this vaine Beauty with the hazard of their soules, but they, who mind to sell that which they haue thus dearely bought, when they haue fit occasion? Neither in truth is it likely that they will long stand firmely vpon this slippery ground; but vsing the meanes, will come to the end, and (as one saith) hauing adulterated their face, they will soone after thinke of adulterating their chastitie, and defiling their bodies.

Fi-

Finally, as they disgrace their names, so also their profession of Religion, whilest professing themselues the members of Christ, they behaue themselues like the limmes of Satan. For what a shame is this, that there should be no difference betweene a Christian, and a Pagan, a Matrone and a Strumpet, the Spouse of Christ, and a filthy Harlot, betweene one that professeth her selfe, bought with the precious bloud of Christ, and another, that is sold ouer to worke wickednes, and is branded with the marke of impietie to acknowledge the same? but that both alike should vse the same light habit and attire, and the same deuilish arts to commend themselues by a false Beauty? The best Beauty of a Christian Woman is modesty and shamefastnesse, and their best ornament is simplicity, and humility; but how farre are they from simplicitie and truth, who lie and dissemble, euen when they say nothing, speaking in a reall language falsehood and dissimulation, euen with their very countenance, to as many as looke vpon them? vnlesse they thinke that onely verball vntruth is forbidden, and actuall falshood permitted; or that it is a greater fault to dissemble in speeches, than to deceiue in deeds and actions. And how farre are they from this Christian humility, who rather than they will not shew their pride, vaunt themselues of a counterfeit Beauty, and for want of better matter, grow high in their owne conceit, because they haue this false shadow of true Beauty, which indeed is it self but a shadow, in respect of any substantiall good? How far are they from that graue decency, which the Apostle requireth in Christian Matrons, seeing they cannot content themselues with Gold, precious Iewels, and Broydred Haire, vnlesse they also adorne their heads with the spoyles of the dead, and grace themselues with a grasselesse and whorish Beauty? But let such know, that they deceiue themselues with a title of Christianity, seeing they deny the truth thereof in their liues; and that howsoeuer they adorne themselues with the profession of Christians, yet (as one saith) they can neuer put on the true garment Christ Iesus: neither will the oyle of his sanctifying graces, and these beautifying waters, and mineralls dust euer mix together.

But here some will say, that for themselues they take no great delight in these practices, but that they vse them to please their Husbands, that by giuing them contentment, they may retaine their loue and affection; and appropriating it wholly to themselues, may preserue them from the loue of strange women. For answering whereof, let such know, that they ought not to please men by displeasing God, and therefore though it could be imagined that any man is so silly and destitute of vnderstanding, that he would haue his Wife, whom hee desires to keepe honest, to vse the qualities and conditions of an Harlot, yet she should not giue him contentment, by burthening her soule with a knowne sinne. Neither can it be imagined that hereby they can wind themselues into their Husbands loue, or preserue him from vnlawfull lusts; for it neither the feare of God, nor the terrour of his iudgements, death, hell, and condemnation, nor yet the punishment inflicted by humane Lawes, and the danger of falling hereby into innumerable euils, will deliuer him from following these courses; nor finally the loue of God and his sweet promises will allure him to the performance of his dutie; then how can it be imagined, that hee should be inticed with a painted Vizard to imbrace this Coniugall loue, or be preserued from strange lusts with a false and counterfeit Beauty? Yea contrariwise, let them rest assured that they make themselues hereby loathsome to their Husbands, when as these artificiall supplies put them in minde of their naturall defects, and this counterfeit Beauty, of that reall deformitie which it hideth, like a rotten post which is painted, and gilded ouer to make a shew. And therefore (as one saith) they take a foolish course in seeking to approoue themselues to their Husbands iudgement, by disapproouing them in their own; & to thinke to please others, when as being helped with self-loue they cannot please themselues. For if they thought nothing wanting, they would not seeke by such means to make a supply; if they did not thinke themselues deformed, they would neuer seeke grace from a false beauty. If then thou wouldest haue thy Husband esteeme thee, obserue rather sober gratitie, than affect a counterfeit Beauty, and decke thy minde with the ornaments of vertue, humilitie, meeknesse, coniugall loue, fidelitie, chastitie, modestie and the rest, which being permanent and vnchangeable, will make his loue also constant and perpetuall; and teach him not with these deceitfull arts to tie his loue to the Beauty of the face, lest being accustomed for this cause to affect and loue, hee be taken with beauty of an Harlot, when he findeth it more excellent. Whereas if thou inurest him to loue in thee vertue, good qualities, modesty, & sobrietie, hee will not easily bee insnared by the adulteresse, seeing she hath no such baits to allure his loue. Finally, doe not teach him to bee willingly deceiued, with wanton laughter, and with a nice and affected gate, for so shalt thou but minister vnto him weapons, the point whereof may bee turned against thy selfe; but rather seeke that hee may take delight in chastity, modesty, and sobriety, and so shall hee haue armour of proofe to defend and preserue him from the incounters of an Harlot.

HAuing spoken of those worldly tentations; which are grounded vpon Beauty: Wee are now to speake of those which arise from strength and health, both which are in themselues the good blessings of God, whereby wee are the better inabled to serue him in all good duties; for in them our first parents excelled in the state of innocencie, & we also shal much excel them in the state of glory; for our bodies are sowne in corruption, but they shall rise in incorruption, they are sowne in weaknesse, but they shall bee raised in power, as the Apostle telleth vs. And therfore being the gifts of God, wherewith hee most inriched vs in the state of innocencie, and will crowne vs in the state of glory, they must needs be good in their owne nature, and to those who haue a right vse of them. But yet through the malice of our spirituall enemies these gifts of God (like all other benefits of prosperitie) are vnto vs the grounds of their tentations, wherewith they draw vs vnto sinne, and their nature being infected with our corruption, they are oftentimes abused vnto euill. As when hauing them we glory in them, or preferre them before spirituall graces, and the meanes of eternall glory; or finally, when by them we are hindred in the course of godlinesse, or furthered and strengthened in the way of wickednesse. And therefore in the next place wee are to arme the Christian, that he may not be ouercome of his own strength, & that his health be not vnto him the meanes of bringing him to sicknesse of soule and death eternall. But I shall not need to speake much of this, seeing that armour which was brought out to defend vs against the assaults of worldly beauty, may by the wise Reader bee easily fitted against these incounters also; and seeing also this decrepit age of the World (which now seemeth almost quite abandoned of that strength and vigorous health wherein the former ages haue excelled; and to bee fully replenished with all manner of infirmities, sicknesse, and weaknesse, needeth not so much to be confirmed and preserued against the tentations which are grounded on this Lion-like strength, as against those which arise from Serpentine subtilty, and Fox-like wilinesse.

§. Sect. 2. That it is a great vanity to glorie in strength, seeing God esteemeth it not, and the beasts excel in it.

And yet because strength is no more abated, than pride increased, and men are apt to glory in these things, though nothing in themselues, yea when being compared they exceed others of our owne times; it shall not be amisse to vse briefly some reasons whereby wee may be preserued against these tentations. And first concerning strength (vnder which I also comprehend, actiuitie, nimblenesse, swiftnesse, and such like esteemable properties of the bodie) we are not, as the Lord exhorteth vs, to glory in it, nor ouer-weening the worth of it, to preferre it before things of much better value; because being thus compared, it is of no great excellency, and vnto vs oftentimes vnprofitable, and sometimes also hurtfull and inconuenient. It is of no great worth, seeing the Lord himselfe doth little esteeme it: for as Elihu saith, he regardeth not them that excell in strength: and as the Psalmist speaketh, he hath no pleasure in the strength of an horse, neither delighteth he in the legs of man. And therefore he maketh this also one of his common gifts, which he giueth to the Reprobate, as well as to the Elect, and vnto beasts (and that in farre greater measure) as well as vnto men. How vaine therfore are those who are proud of such base vanities, wherein many wicked men match them, and many beasts doe farre excell? them, how little good haue they in them, when they are faine to glorie in that, in which when they haue attained vnto the greatest measure which possibilitie incourageth them to desire, yet they come farre short of Giants among men, and of the Horse, Bull, Lion, and many other among the brutish creatures? To this purpose Chrysostome demandeth; Art thou strong (saith hee) and art thou therefore proud? Why the thing wherein thou glorieſt is base, for the Lion is hardier than thou, and the Bore stronger; yea, Robbers, Theeues, and Ruffians, and thine owne seruants herein excell thee, and dost thou thinke this a thing esteemable or praise worthy? The like also may be said, of nimblenesse, actiuitie, and swiftnesse. For when in nimblenesse and actiuitie thou exceedest all men, yet an Ape doth farre surpasse thee; and though thou couldest runne as swiftly as Asahel, yet the silly Hare would far outstrip thee. Seeing therefore God hath vouchsafed thee the honour of a man, glory not in that wherein the beasts excell thee, and seeing he hath made thee a Christian, abuse not so much the worth of thine owne excellencies, as (setting aside all thy better parts) to bee proud of that wherein Pagans and Heathens haue ouer-matched thee. But (as one saith) when thou hast this strength, vse it whilest it is present; and when it is absent, neuer much desire it.

Iob 39. 19. Psal. 147. 10.

Ier. 9. 23.

Forbes, &c. translate it rei vilissimæ nam & in malam rem quo sensu Horatius pro Iano.

Againe, let vs consider that if it were of any worth and excellencie, yet it is not much to bee esteemed, because it is momentanie, and of such short continuance. For oftentimes it is by a weeks sicknes weakned and impaired, euen in the prime of youth, & so forsaketh vs, as soone as it hath but saluted vs, as though it had only come to take leaue:

leaue: our youthfull yeeres and perfect age remaining as weake and decrepit, as if wee had continued the time of the longest liuer. But say that sicknesse spareth vs, yet as old age approcheth, strength decreaseth, after which death hasteneth which doth wholly abolish it, making the strongest giant and the weakest wretch both alike. Consider further, that this huge strength of the body is commonly ioyned with great weaknes of the mind; and where there is the greatest bone, there vsually is the least wisedome and vnderstanding. In which respect Theophrastus compared the Eretrienses, a people more strong than wise, to the Swordfish, which hath a weapon but wants a heart. Neither doth it helpe to furnish the minde with any vertues, or maketh it more ready to any vertuous actions; but as those trees which are most great and strong, are commonly most vnfruitfull; so oftentimes those who excell in strength, are most barren in bearing the fruits of vertue, and least forward in such actions as sauour of goodnesse. Nay doth this bodily strength assist the soule in moderating of our affections, and in ouerruling of our passions; it doth not helpe to asswage anger, to bridle lust, or to stoppe our course, when wee runne to take reuenge yea contrariwise being abused by our corruptions, it pricketh forward our rage with the spurres of armed furie, it maketh men more able slaues to their owne filthinesse, and in stead of stopping vs in reuengefull courses, it rather hasteth vs forward with headlong swiftnesse, and putteth a sword of violence into our hands, whereby wee may not onely requite old injuries, but also reuenge appearances of wrongs with extreame cruelty. Yea it not only encourageth those that haue confidence in their owne strength, without reason or conscience, to oppresse and tyrannically to tread vnder foote those whom they find themselues able to ouermaster; but it puffeth them vp in pride in regard of their owne abilities, that they are ready with desperate furie to make warre against heauen, and hauing gotten the victorie ouer men, to set vpon and encounter God himselfe. As appeareth in the example of that mightie Nimrod and his associates, and in Goliah, who not onely insulted ouer the liuely armie in confidence of his owne strength, but also was at defiance with God himselfe, and railed on the holy one of Israel.

Finally, let vs consider that this vaine strength wherein men trust, cannot deliuer them from those innumerable dangers and euils vnto which our fraile life is daily subiect: for as the Psalmist saith, The Kings of the earth, and the rulers of the earth, neither by their multitudes, nor by their great strength, are able to defend them from the iudgements of God in the day of his visitation, nor from the furious assaults of their spirituall enemies when they encounter them. It cannot keepe away sicknesses and diseases, much lesse deliuer them from the power of death; yea rather it exposes men to danger, their strength ministring vnto them more incouragement and boldnesse to runne into perils, than power and ability to escape or ouercome them. For seldome is there any so strong, but that at one time or other he meetes with one as able as himselfe; and though there be none to match him, yet (like Milo) he may be catched in his owne trap, and his owne strength may bee the cause of his ruine, whilest his pride maketh him to vndergoe a greater burthen than he is able to beare, and to attempt matters which are aboue humane power to accomplish and performe. And therefore seeing this bodily strength is vaine and momentanie, vnprofitable, and oftentimes hurtfully and dangerous: let vs not glory in it, nor too much value and esteeme it, but rather let vs desire to be powerfull in the inner man, and to wax stronger in all vertues and spirituall graces; but especially let vs carefully desire to bee strengthened with the power of Gods might, whereby (as the Apostle speaketh) we shall bee inabled to doe all things, and to stand manfully in the day of battaile against all the cruell assaults of our spirituall enemies, with assured hope of victory: which will easily ouercome vs notwithstanding our bodily strength, if this spirituall power and secret vertue of Gods spirit do faile and forsake vs in the time of triall.

CHAP. XVI.

That bodily health is but of small worth and excellencie.

§. Sect. 1.
Health in it selfe is a great blessing, but much abused through our corruption.
Eccles. 30. 15. 16

THe like also may bee said of health, which in it owne nature is the good blessing of God, and a notable helpe to those that vse it well, for the better performance of all good duties: in which respect the Sonne of Syrach saith, That health and strength are aboue gold, and a whole body aboue infinit treasure, there is no riches aboue a sound body, and no ioy aboue the ioy of the heart. Yet in truth there is scarce any earthly blessing to be compared with it, seeing it much lessens all our sorrowes and afflictions, and sweeteth all other comforts and worldly benefits, which being seuered from it, become tedious and loathsome. Howbeit this blessing of God through our corruption is continually subiect to great abuse; as when we esteeme it aboue Gods spirituall graces, and the health of our soules, and doe let our hearts so vpon it, as that wee will not sticke to vse wicked and vnlawfull meanes, to preserue it whilest wee haue it, or recouer it when wee want it: or finally, when thereby we are not furthered in the seruice of God, and in all good and Christian duties. For howsoeuer whilest wee haue it, wee are with all thankfulnesse to esteeme it, as being a great blessing of God; and when we want it, to desire it moderately, and to vse all good meanes for recouery of it: yet when it commeth in comparison of Gods sanctifying gifts, or the spirituall health of the soule, which is accompanied with eternall life, it is to bee contemned and despised, as being light, vaine, and of no value.

§. Sect. 2. That health is but a common gift, which is imparted also to the wicked. Sanitatem corporis nè putes magnum bonum esse, quod habet & malus Augnst. Serm. 12. tom 10 col 57. Psal. 73. 4. 5. 7.

To which purpose let vs consider, that howsoeuer health bee good, yet it is but a common good, which the Lord imparteth to the wicked, as well as to the godly: and therefore (as one saith) we are not to esteeme bodily health a great good, which euen wicked men also enioy: and oftentimes in a farre greater measure than Gods deerest seruants: for as the Psalmist obserued, The wicked are lustie and strong, they are not in trouble as other men, neither are plagued with other men, their eyes stand out with fatnes, and they haue more than heart can wish. Yea it is communicated vnto the bruit beasts, many of which enioy it longer, & in a much more perfect and excellent manner than man doth. To which purpose one saith, why doe you wonder because these men inioy health, when as ye heare the Psalmist saying, O Lord thou makest whole, or conseruest men and beasts? that men might not waxe proud because they haue temporall health, the beasts are ioyned with them: why therfore doest thou reioyce O man because of health, seeing this benefit is common to thee with the asse, &c. and therefore rest not in this, but rather seeke to obtaine the spirituall benefits which are promised to the sonnes of men: for to what purpose serue reason and the excellent wit of man, if hee attaine vnto nothing better than that which is common to him with the beasts?

§. Sect. 3. That bodily health is momentanie and vncertaine.

Againe, how worthlesse and void of excellencie this bodily health is, it may appeare, first, in that it is momentanie and vncertaine. For euen when it is at the height, euery trifling accident doth ouerthrow it; too much heat, or too much cold, want of nourishment or a little excesse, ouermuch labour or too much ease, besides a thousand secret and inward causes, ouerturne health and make way for sicknesse and diseases. In which respect one saith, that that which we vsually call health of the body, is in truth sicknesse: seruile ease it selfe is sufficient to bring it into a consumption, and labour also doth cause it to fall: being spent with fasting, it is refreshed with meate, that it may continue, and being tired and wasted with ouermuch eating, it is relieued with abstinence, that it may grow stronger: the body is washed with water, that it may not be ouer drie, and then wiped with clothes, that it may not be too much moistned and softned: it is refreshed with labour, that it may not grow sluggish with ease: and cherished with rest, that it may not sinke vnder the burthen of labour: it is wearied with watching, and repaired with sleepe, and being oppressed with too much sleepe, this sluggishnesse is shaken off with watchfulnesse, least it should be spent and wearied more with rest, than with its labour. It is couered with clothes, that it may not feele the iniuries of the weather, and fainting with ouermuch heate, it is refreshed with the fanning of the coole aire. And hauing found troubles and griefes in that wherein it thought to haue amended them, being sore wounded (as I may say) it languisheth, and waxeth weaker with the very medicine, that should haue cured it. Though therefore seuerers be absent, and griefes of body cease, euen our very health is no better than a sickenes, vnto which necessity of cure is neuer wanting: for looke how many helpes and comforts we seeke out for the vse of life, euen so many medicines doe we find to free vs from diseases; and oftentimes the salue it selfe turneth to a wound: because vsing an excellent remedy a little too long, we are much impaired by that, which was prouided for our cure. To the same purpose another saith, that that which is called the health of this life, to them that vnderstand it aright, and doe compare it with that which we shall enioy in our eternall rest, it is not esteemed worthy the name of health. For if we doe not eate, hunger vexeth vs, and what is this hunger, but a naturall disease? because nature is sicke by Gods iust vengeance is made vnto vs a punishment; and that which to the first man was punishment, is vnto vs turned into nature. &c.

Gregor. Moral. lib. 8. cap. 20.

Secondly, it is most imperfect, our whole life being like a continuall ague, which, euery second or third day, interchangeth health with sicknesse; neither is there any so strong and healthie, that hath not some griefes and infirmities which often vex him; although the pleasures and businesses of the world giue him not leasure to take any great notice of them; and the youth and strength of his body doth enable him to beare his burden with more ease and cheerefulnesse. Or though it should bee granted, that a man were quite free from all these bodily infirmities; yet if he hath many diseases in his soule, hee cannot bee said to haue any perfection of health, when as his best part is thus affected. For as it were ridiculous, if a man should glory in his health, because he is sound in his outward limmes, when in the meane time he hath the megrim in his head,

§. Sect. 4. That bodily health is imperfect, and full of infirmities.

the consumption in his lungs, and incurable diseases about his heart, and other chiefe and vitall parts; so is it no lesse absurd to be proud of our bodily health, when as our soules which are the chiefe part of man, and the life of all the rest, are desperatly sicke in the disease of sinne. For what is this, but to haue a faire skinne, and sicke heart, a beautifull outside, full and faire, and within, a desperate dropsie, or vnrecouerable pleurisie? like vnto an apple, which is faire to the eye, and rotten at the core. But so long as wee carie about with vs the old man, and dwell in these houses of clay, we are continually subiect to these diseases of the soule, and will we nill we, we shall often wound our consciences, and make our selues sicke with sinne; the which our bodily health is so farre off from helping and curing, that oftentimes it occasioneth, and most commonly increaseth these spirituall diseases, in regard whereof one saith, a sicke minde dwelleth no where worse than in a sound body. And therefore little cause haue wee to brag of this bodily health, being in it selfe vaine, fraile and imperfect, and besides alwaies accompanied with the soules sicknesse, which is so dangerous and grieuous, that nothing can cure it but the bloud of Christ.

But as this bodily health is not much to be esteemed, in respect that it bringeth vnto vs little good; so much lesse in regard, that through our corruption, it is often the cause of much hurt. For who knoweth not, that where there is the most healthfull body, there commonly is the sickest soule? who seeth not great difference betweene them, who lie in their sicke beds, and those whose health is neuer impaired with any dangerous sicknesse? Yea, who findeth not great dissimilitude betweene himselfe being sicke, and himselfe inioying perfect health? how deuout he is then, how fearefull to offend God, how watchfull ouer his wayes, how ready he is to call himselfe to a reckoning, that he may set things straight betweene God & himselfe. And contrariwise, how negligent he is now, how hard harted and carnally secure, putting away from him the euill day, and together with it the day of repentance; presuming vpon his health and strength, and thinking that he may haue time enough hereafter to repent, and make euen his reckonings with God. Whereby it appeareth, that the health of the body is oftentimes a cause of the soules sicknesse, euen as contrariwise, the bodies sicknesse is often a meanes of the soules recouerie, and seldome shall we find it to be in any great measure in the same time, vnlesse the corruptions which vsually reigne vpon health, be purged away with some bitter potion of affliction. To which purpose one saith, that God foreseeing that some would fall through the abuse of their health into sinne, doth correct them for their profit with weakenesse of body, that they may not offend; and maketh it more profitable vnto them to be broken with griefes to their saluation, than to remaine in health to their condemnation. For that health is pernicious which leadeth to disobedience, euen as that sickenes is wholesome, which by Gods correction, doth breake and humble the hardnesse of the heart. Finally, nothing more than this bodily health doth naile mens hearts to the earth, or make them more in loue with the world, and worldly vanities, nothing more causeth men to giue themselues ouer to voluptuous pleasures; from which weakenesse and infirmity weaneth them; which being intertained, like vnthankfull guests, thrust out of the doores their host that gaue them their best welcome. For as nothing more easily moueth vs to admit and imbrace these voluptuous pleasures of the flesh, than bodily health, so nothing more impaires, and banisheth health than they, when they are intertained. And therefore seeing this bodily health through our abuse, doth more often hurt, than helpe vs in our spirituall estate; and doth much more weaken the soule, than strengthen the body; let vs not too much dote on it whilest wee haue it, nor much bewaile our losse, when it is taken from vs. But seeing it is so subiect to abuse, let vs keepe a speciall watch ouer our selues whilest wee inioy it, that we may so vse it, that God who gaue it, may bee more glorified and better serued, and we who haue it, may bee helped forward in all good duties, and grow more and more in grace, and in the assurance of our saluation. For otherwise it will rather be a curse vnto vs than a blessing, which wee were much better profitably to want, then so hurtfully to inioy. And (as one saith) let vs bring to health her admonished, that we so vse this bodily health, as that it may further the spirituall health of our soules; least peruerting the benefit of our health to the practise of wickednesse, wee be made worse by Gods gift, and so receiue more grieuous punishments hereafter, the lesse we haue feared to abuse so bountifull blessings of God vnto sinne.

CHAP. XVII.

That society and neere familiarity with wicked worldlings is to be shunned and auoided.

HAue don with such worldly temptations, as haue their ground and foundation on some thing which is in our selues. Now it followeth that

Q. Sect. 1. That the world allureth vs by wicked company, to se-

that I intreate of such, as are caused and occasioned by somwhat that is without vs. For as the world, and the prince thereof seeke to ouercome vs, by causing our selues to betray our selues, and to become the instruments of our owne ruine; so if they faile of this, then they busilie muster against vs forren forces, and with them besiege the fort of our soules, that so they may sacke and spoile vs of all spirituall graces, and may lead vs captiue to destruction. Now these forces consist either in the person of worldlings themselues, or in worldy things, which they vse as their baites and allurements, wherewith they intice vs vnto sinne. In the former respect the world tempteth vs, when it drawes vs into the fellowship and societie, or neere familiaritie, and inward friendship of wicked men, that being corrupted with their company and friendship, we may either be hindred in our course of godlinesse, or allured to goe with them in the broad way of sinne, that bringeth to destruction: Which tentation that wee may ouercome, let vs arme our selues against it; and least wee should reiect the good with the euill, in the first place let vs consider in what respects societie with worldlings is permitted as lawfull, and how it is condemned as vnlawfull, and euill; that so neither going aside on the right hand, nor on the left, wee may hold on in that straight way which the word of God prescribeth vnto vs. For the former, wee are to know, that not all manner of societie with wicked men is forbidden, nor yet to all men: For (as one saith) he must goe into the solitary deserts, who will liue onely with these who are innocent. And the Apostle telleth vs, that if we will goe at all come out of the company of fornicators of this world, or with the couetous, or with extortioners, or with idolaters, we must then leaue the world also. And therefore we must not follow the foolish dotage of Popish Hermits and Anchorists, who make it a high degree of their perfection to liue alone, and to sequester themselues from all societie of men; for as the Heathen man could say, he that will content himselfe with himselfe, and leaue the companie of all others, had need to bee either a God, whom none can mend, or a sauage beast, who hateth humane fellowship, and will not come neere them, vnlesse it bee to destroy or hurt them.

§. Sect. 2. That all societie with wicked men is not vnlawfull.

Quærat solitudinem qui vult cum innocentibus viuere.

1. Cor. 5. 10.

Aristide rep. lib. 1. cap. 2.

It is lawfull then in some cases to keepe companie with wicked worldlings. As for example, when humane societie, and common ciuilitie doth require it; neither is it possible to liue in a common wealth, vnlesse wee obserue the rules of ciuilitie, and performe mutuall duties of citizens, and neighbours one to another, whether they be professours of religion, or but meere worldlings. For without this, not only all trading, buying, selling, and such other commerce, wherewith the Common-wealth is maintained and preserued, decaieth, and quite ceaseth; but euen duties required necessarily to the preseruing of life, and of our being in the world, should also be neglected. As then euery man ought in the time of a common plague, to preserue his health, by keeping himselfe from comming amongst infected persons; and yet in some cases, his comming neere them is not onely lawfull, but also necessarie, as to quench a fire, to helpe a woman in her labour and childbirth, and to minister vnto them such necessaries as may preserue their liues; so is it lawfull in these, and such like cases to come into the company of those who are spiritually infected with the plague of sinne. But the company of wicked men is to be auoided, in respect of neere friendship and familiar conuersation, when as wee take delight to frequent their company, as it were, of our owne choice, neither ciuill conuersation, nor humane necessitie vrging vs thereunto. To this purpose one saith, that we ought to flee the company of wicked men, in respect of priuate fellowship, and not in respect of publike communion; and that rather with our hearts and affections, than with our bodies and outward actions. And this is that familiar acquaintance which good Iehoshaphat had with Ahab, Iehoram Ahaziah, and the rest of that family, for which hee is so often taxed and censured in the bookes of God.

But as it is lawfull for all men in some cases, to come into the companie of wicked worldlings, so for some men especially more frequently, namely such as hauing a calling of God hereunto, are furnished also with such a measure of grace, knowledge, and sanctification, that they may iustly conceiue more hope of conuerting them vnto God, than there is feare that the other should peruert and corrupt them with sin; if withall in sinceritie and vprightnes of heart they propound vnto themselues this as their chiefe and maine end, and not worldly and sinister respects. For as it is lawfull, yea laudable, for the Physitians of the body, to frequent the companie of them who are sicke of infectious and contagious diseases, that they may cure and recouer them, especially when as they do not goe armed only with their desperate boldnesse, but vse good preseruatiues and wholesome meanes to preuent and repell the infection; so also it is lawfull for the spirituall Physitians of the soule, to come into the companie of those who are sicke of the leprosie of sinne, and the plague of a scandalous life, if they vse the good meanes of meditation, prayer, and such other wholesome preseruatiues, whereby they may be kept sound from the taynture of

of this spirituall infection. And for this wee haue our Sauiour Christ himselfe for our precedent, who being the Physitian of our soules, frequented the companie of publicans and sinners, who had most neede of his helpe. For howsoeuer it is not so fit for vs, as it was for him, to come into such companie, because hee was free from sinne, and from the rancours of all corruption, and therefore needed no preseruatiues, but what he had in himselfe; and also because through the puritie of his nature he was able purely, and without any worldlinesse and wickednesse, to propound those ends of doing others good, and of saiuing them from their sinne; whereas we being full of the corrupt humours of sinne, and of the seedes of all wickednesse, are apt to receiue the outward infection; neither can we purely without the mixture of our corruption, propound such good ends to our workes and actions; yet seeing it was done by our Sauiour Christ it is not absolutly vnlawfull in vs; so that we endeuour to doe it in his manner, and to the same ends, vsing all good meanes to preserue our selues from hurt, whilest we labour after others good. For seeing by the rule of charitie wee are bound to loue our neighbours as our selues, it followeth that wee may lawfully hazard a slippe or foyle (in the meane time vsing all good meanes whereby wee may be enabled to stand vpright) if we haue any hope that by our helpe our brother may bee pulled backe from the gulfe of destruction whereinto he is falling. Howbeit in this case circumspection is to bee vsed, least whilest wee labour to raise others vp, wee our selues doe catch a downfall, and whilest wee endeuour to cure their diseases, wee our selues bee tainted and infected with their contagion. For such is our peruersenesse to fall into this sicknesse of the soule, that vnlesse wee vse all good preseruatiues, they will not bee bettered, and wee shall become much worse, and being our selues into grieuous, but yet vnpitied diseases. For as the sonne of Syrach saith, who will haue pitie of the charmer that is stung of the serpent? or of such as come neere wilde beasts (to saiue their wildenesse?) so is it with him that keepeth company with a wicked man, and wrappeth himselfe in his sinnes.

And thus haue I shewed in what cases the companie of worldly and wicked men is lawfull and warrantable; whereby also it is easie to gather in what respect it is vnlawfull and condemned; namely, when it is lawfull and familiar, voluntarie and not of any necessitie, or vrgent occasion, rash and desperate, without vsing any meanes whereby wee might bee preserued from being corrupted by their societie. And finally, when as we doe not in vprightnesse of conscience, propound as our maine end their spirituall good, and conuersion vnto God, but our owne worldly ends. As for example, when we aime by our familiar acquaintance with them, at our owne priuate profit and aduantage, or at the satisfying of our owne voluptuous pleasure, as when we delight in their sharpnes of wit, merrie conceits, and in their pleasing conuersation; which oftentimes are baites to allure vs to enter into, and insnare our selues in the nets of perdition. For with this sweetnesse is mixed the poyson of worldly prophanenesse, ribauldrie, blasphemie, and such like wicked discourses; all which being in their companie, we must needs heare, (vnlesse wee will stop our eares) and hearing must of necessitie either be corrupted or offended. In which regard one admonisheth vs to take carefull heede, least whilest by such companie we desire to recreate our minds, we doe not lose all harmonie and concord of good workes, because custome oftentimes doth incline nature.

Cauendum ne dum relaxare animum volumus, solutum in omnem harmoniam, quæ concentus quorundam bonorum operum. Ambros. Offic. lib. 1. cap. 20.

In all which cases and respects, the companie of worldlings is a notable tentation to draw vs vnto sinne, and to hinder vs in the course of vertue and godlinesse, and therefore is most carefully of all Christians to bee shunned and auoided. To which purpose let vs consider, first, that this societie with the wicked is often forbidden, and condemned in the word of God. So the Wise man especially chargeth vs not to keepe companie with drunkards, or with gluttons; and generally; neither to be enuious against euill men, nor to desire to be in their companie, because their hearts imagine destruction, and their lips speake mischiefe. And thus the Lord commandeth the Israelites to haue no manner of societie or friendship with the wicked nations, least by their example and prouocation they should be moued vnto idolatrie and sin. And the Apostle Paul willeth vs in the name of the Lord, to come out from among wicked men, to separate our selues from them, and to touch no vncleane thing; for if the touching of a thing vncleane ceremonially defiled a man, how much more the familiar aquaintance of those, who are defiled with sinne? But with greater care and circumspection are wee charged to auoid the companie of those who making profession of Christian religion, doe disgrace the same with their wicked and vngodly liues and conuersations, because of all other their societie is most dangerous; their sinnes being more scandalous, and their example more forcible to allure vs vnto sinne. If any (saith he) that is called a brother, be a fornicator or couetous, or an idolater, or railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such no not to eate. And thus he commandeth the Thessalonians, in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ, that they should withdraw themselues from euery brother that walketh inordinately, and

9. Sect. 7. That Gods Saints haue carefully shunned the companie of the wicked. Psal. 26. 4. 5.

And as the Lord hath forbidden this society with the wicked; so also haue the Saints carefully auoided it. Thus Dauid professeth, that hee had not haunted with vaine persons, neither kept company with the dissemblers; yea that hee hated the assembly of the euill, and had not companied with the wicked. And when through his grieuous persecutions he was forced, whether hee would or no, to haue this wicked fellowship, hee grieuously complaineth hereof, crying out; Woe is me that I remaine in Meshech, and dwell in the tents of Kedar. Whose example let vs learne to imitate, approuing our selues to be true Israelites by our abhorring all fellowship with these filthy swine, who take delight to wallow themselues in the loathsome puddle of sinne and wickednesse. And to this end let vs further consider, that there ought to be no communion or fellowship betweene the faithfull and these worldly infidels: for as the Apostle saith, what fellowship hath righteousnesse with vnrighteousnesse? and what communion hath light with darknesse? and what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath the beleeuer with the infidell? With which accordeth the saying of the Sonne of Syrach, All flesh (saith hee) will resort to their like, and euery man will keepe company with such as he is himselfe: how can the Wolfe agree with the Lambe? no more can the vngodly with the righteous. And to the same purpose another demandeth, What (saith he) hast thou to do with worldly men, or what commerce canst thou haue with them? to what purpose dost thou desire to know with them the way of perdition, which they follow? If thou seekest for chastitie, they haue it not; if for faith, who is faithfull among them, whom thou shouldest imitate? If thou seekest for Christ, he remaineth not in them, &c.

9. Sect. 8. That wicked companie is a notable inducement to draw vs vnto sinne.

Secondly, let vs call to minde that this society with wicked worldlings doth bring vnto vs much hurt, as being the cause both of the euill of sinne, and the euill of punishment. For it is a speciall meanes of the transgression of all Gods Lawes: and therefore the Prophet Dauid being resolued to yeeld his obedience thereunto, saith, Away from me you wicked, for I will keepe the commandements of my God. Implying that there was no hope of yeelding such obedience as hee desired, vnlesse hee had freed himselfe from wicked mens company. For this wicked society doth exceedingly corrupt and defile those that frequent it, like vnto a gangrene, which hauing tainted one member, neuer resteth till it haue runne ouer the whole body; or like vnto the spreading leprosie or plague, which beginning in one house proceedeth to another, vntill it haue infected the greatest part of a towne or citie. In which respect the sonne of Syrach compareth wicked company to pitch, which by touching defileth vs; and the Apostle, to leauen, a little whereof soureth the whole lumpe of dough. And by others, wicked men in this regard are compared to scabbed sheepe, one of which is enough to infect the whole flocke, and to rotten apples, which taint and corrupe all the sound ones that lie about them. Whet by it appeareth that it is a thing of great difficultie to conuerse with wicked men, and not to be tainted with their corruptions: for besides that they are apt to infect, wee also are most apt to receiue the infection, hauing the seeds of sinne remaining in vs, which are ready to spring and sprout vp, when they are (as it were) watred with the breath of euill company. We are in our owne nature prone to goe downe the hill of vice, how then shall we keepe our selues from running headlong, when we are thrust forward with these wicked associates? If our selues wee are sluggish in trauelling the way of righteousnesse which leadeth to life eternall: and therefore what will become of vs when these briars and thornes catch hold of vs and hinder vs? Surely they will either cause vs to make a stand, and to proceed no further in our Christian race, or will scratch and rent vs when wee seeke to breake from them. So that it is a thing of great difficulty to continue doing well, amongst those who are euill; or not to be hindred in our course of godlinesse, when as wicked companions doe (as it were) hang on our necks, and with all their power and policie labour to stay vs. And this that wise Heathen obserued in his owne experience: I confesse (saith he) mine owne weakenesse: I neuer bring home those manners which I carried abroad; but something which I had well composed is disturbed and put out of order; some of those vices which I had put to flight, againe returne: and as it befalleth them that haue beene vexed with a long sicknesse, who remaine still so weake, that they cannot without some danger come abroad into the open aire; the same happeneth vnto vs, whose minds are somewhat recouered out of the tedious sicknesse of vice and sin: the conuersation of the wicked multitude is a great enemie vnto vs; euery one being ready to commend vnto vs, or to thrust vpon vs some vice, or at least to raise and inflame vs therewith, at vnawares, &c. So that I alwayes returne home either more couetous, ambitious or voluptuous, yea more cruell and inhumane, because I haue liued amongst men. As therefore it is hard hard to dwell with a Collier and not to be smutted; to haue our conuersation amongst theeues, and not, one time or other, to bee robbed of our rich treasures: so and much more difficult it is to keepe familiar company with wicked Worldlings, and not to be followed with their corruptions; to liue amongst these spirituall theeues, and not to be spoiled of the riches of Gods grace: in which respect they are so much more hurtfull and pernicious vnto vs, than theeues and robbers; as much as the soule exceedeth the bodie, and Gods spirituall graces and heauenly ioyes which they steale from vs, exceed in worth, earthly gold and momentany treasures, of which time will rob vs, though theeues spare.

1. Cor. 15. 33.

And therefore seeing it is a thing of so great danger, to haue our conuersation amoog wicked worldlings, least wee should be tainted with their corruptions, let vs be exceeding warie and carefull in making choice of our company: and as one saith, let vs be no more ruperstitious what wee eate and drinke, then amongst whom wee eate and drinke: for as vnwholesome meates and drinkes may poyson the body, so vngodly company poyson the soule, vnlesse wee be preserued with some soueraigne Antidotes ministred vnto vs by Gods Word and holy Spirit: and seeing this is a strong temptation to draw vs vnto euill, let not vs who daily pray that we may not be led into tentations, wittingly and willingly run into them. Neither let vs, vnlesse we haue a calling hereunto, and be furnished and prepared with a great measure of grace and strength, presume vpon our owne abilities, and flatter our selues with a conceit, that we can by keeping them company draw them to vertue and goodnesse, and in the meane time receiue no hurt, seeing it is much more likely, vnlesse we be very skilfull Physicians, that they should infect vs, than that we should cure them. For (as one saith) this is the ordinary course of humane affaires, that when the good and euill are ioyned together, the euill man is not made better by the good, but the good rather is corrupted by the euill. And this was signified by the Ceremoniall Law, in which the holy flesh carried in the skirt of the garment did not make it holy, but the polluted person touching any holy thing, with his filthinesse did make it vncleane, as the Prophet Haggai sheweth: so note vnto vs, that it is a matter of farre greater difficulty to cleanse and purifie, than to defile and make vncleane. The reason whereof is cleere and manifest; for they are wholly flesh, and wee liue in part spirituall and regenerate, so that they pull vs with full swinge of will, and with all their power and might: whereas both our will and power being diuided, cannot haue such force and vertue. Againe, they run swiftly downe the hill and streame of vice, but wee with great labour and difficultie creepe softly forward in the way of vertue, and (as it were) vp the hill, and against the streame of our corruptions, which naturally carry vs another way; and therefore if by familiar company, we catch hold to stay them, and grapple with them, it is a thousand to one, if wee be not assisted with a power farre superiour to our owne, they will rather carry vs away with their violence, or at least naturall motion; than that we shall make them stay, or force them backe by true repentance.

q. Sect. 10. That it is hard to keepe company with the wicked, and not to be accessary to their sinnes.

Neither are wee alone corrupted and infected with the tainture of their sinnes, and become cuill by imitating their wicked examples; but also we are made either accessary to their sinnes, which they commit in our company, or else wee acquit our selues with much griefe and trouble. For hearing their blasphemies, ribauldry and prophanenesse, we either beare with them, and passe all ouer with silence, or else wee admonish and reproue them for their sinnes. By the former we become accessaries, for whilest wee beare with, and winke at our friends faults, wee make them to become our owne, by our silence giuing a secret consent to their wickednesse. And so whilest we labour to haue our societie pleasing vnto men; we doe much dishonour and displease God; whilest wee shew a false loue to our companions, wee make it manifest, that there is but little true loue of God remayning in vs. For if no louing sonne can indure to heare his father disgraced; if no good seruant can abide to heare his Lord and Master dishonoured and abused; and therefore will shew their dislike, either by rebuking the offenders, or by forsaking their company: then those that can with delight frequent the company of wicked men, who in all their words & actions, doe nothing else but dishonour God, doe plainly shew that they neither loue the Lord as their Father, nor reuerence him as their Lord and Master. But if hearing and seeing these abuses, they doe reproue them, then doe they become to their companions irkesome and tedious, moouing them, when they feele themselues galled with reproofes, to bitternesse and anger, yea, sometime to rage and furious reuenge; and so whilest by their absence they might haue had them friendly strangers, by this neerer acquaintance, they become knowne enemies. And both these should be carefully auoided, either to displease God by pleasing of men, or willingly to displease, if so be a committie with men, when as we may auoid it without Gods displeasure.

But as wicked company defile vs with their sinnes; so also they subiect vs to their punishments: for they brand our names with the blacke marke of infamy and reproch, whilst keeping them company; wee are re-

q. Sect. 11. That keeping wicked company brandeth our names with infamy.

puted and censured to be of the same disposition and conuersation. For seeing euery like is delighted with his like, and seeing similitude in manners and affections, and delight in the same pleasures and recreations, is the vsuall bond that linketh men together in the same societie, they receiue no wrong (although they may haue some goodnesse in them) who frequent the company of wicked men, when as they are thus censured; seeing they are either presently euill, or will bee euill within a while; it being the nature of company, either to find men alike, or to make them alike. To which purpose one saith; that the good and bad are so ioyned together: that either they become like one another, or else they are quickly seuered and disioyned, for friendship findeth or maketh this similitude. Iustly therefore is hee reputed euill, who taketh delight in frequenting euil company; for though he bē not yet come to the height of sinne, yet hee fast climeth thereunto, and is euen at the very next degree of being himselfe wicked, when with a quiet and contented mind, he can be a daily beholder of other mens wickednesse; for as the Wiseman saith, A wicked man is an abomination to the just, and hee that is vpright in his way, is abomination to the wicked.

Prou.29.27.

9. Sect. 12. Wicked company maketh vs lyable to Gods iudgements.

Finally, wicked company is carefully to be shunned and auoided, because they make euen the deare seruants and children of God, liable and subject to common iudgements. For as the Wise man saith, hee that walketh with the wise, shall be wise; but a companion of fooles shall be afflicted. Affliction followeth sinners, but to the righteous, God will recompense good. And thus was righteous Lot led away in that common captiuitie with the Sodomites: and dearely bought the pleasures of the Countrie, by partaking in the punishments of the people. Thus whosoeuer adhered to Dathan and Abiram, were also with them swallowed of the earth aliue, and as they consorted with them in their rebellion, so they bore them company into the gulph of destruction. And thus was Iehoshaphat discomfited, and hardly escaped with his life being in the company of wicked Ahab, and afterwards had his ships broken, and his works and enterprizes frustrated and destroyed, because he ioyned himselfe with Ahaziah. From which iudgements and punishments, when God would haue his seruants priuiledged and preserued, he calleth vnto them with a voice from Heauen, saying, Goe out of her my people, that yee be not partakers of her sinnes, and that yee receiue not of her plagues. Implying the danger of being tainted with the sinnes of the Whore of Babylon, and the impossibilitie of escaping her punishments, if they did not forsake her wicked fellowship.

But as all societie with wicked worldlings, is a very dangerous tentation to draw vs vnto sinne, and to subiect vs vnto punishment, so especially when we enter into the neerest bonds of affinitie and marriage with them; for they who are thus vnequally yoked with vnbeleeuing worldlings, are sure either to go quietly with them in the way of sinne, or to be shrewdly gauled, whilest they make resistance, and draw another way. And for this fault, good Iehoshaphat had his reputation blemished, of whom it is said, that hee had riches and honour in abundance, but hee was ioyned in affinitie with Ahab. The which bond of alliance made him professe to the enemie of God, desiring his assistance, I am as thou art, and my people as thy people, and we will ioyne with thee in the warre. And this is the reason which the Holy Ghost rendreth of Ieboram Idolatry, because the Daughter of Ahab was his wife; and also why Ahaziah did euill in the sight of the Lord, like the house of Ahab, because hee was the sonne in law of the house of Ahab. Yea, with this snare was wise Salomon catched, being drawne by his Idolatrous wiues to leaue the Lord (who had in extraordinary manner blessed him aboue all the Kings of Israel) and to serue the Idols of the Heathens.

CHAP. XVIII.

That the company of the wicked is very dangerous, by reason of euill examples, and corrupt communication.

AND thus haue I shewed the manifold euils, which come of frequenting wicked company. In the next place let vs consider of some speciall meanes, whereby principally this societie becommeth vnto vs thus hurtfull and pernicious; and these are either by their examples, or by their allurements and perswasions. For the first, the societie of wicked worldlings is exceeding hurtfull vnto vs, because thereby there are daily set before vs examples of euill, whereby we are either allured to imitate & follow their wicked and vngodly practise, or at least, are much vexed and grieued, to see God so dishonoured by their sinnes. In the former respect, looke how many euill examples are before our eyes, and so many stumbling blockes are laid before our feet, to hinder vs in our spirituall race, and to stop vs in our way, as we are trauelling to our heauenly Country; and such is the corruption of our nature, that wee need neither perswasions to draw vs vnto sinne, for euen the sight thereof is a bayte sufficient to allure vs to imitation. Whereof it is, that euen the Heathen man reckoneth this as a chiefe cause of all our euils, because we liue after the example of the multitude, and are not not composed and ruled by reason, but are carried away with custome; and whereas if few would doe it, wee would not imitate them, when as many begin to doe it, wee follow for company, as though it were more honest, because it is more common: and so errour, when as it is made publicke and customable, is esteemed of vs in the place of truth. Whereby it appeareth, that seeing examples are admitted of vs in place of rules and precepts, therefore the examples of wicked Worldlings must needs be very powerfull, both in weaning vs from that which is good, and in alluring vs vnto euill. In the former respect one saith, that men oftentimes desire to heare Gods word, but whilest they behold others contemptuously turning away their eares, they also neglect the saning hearing of the truth. And many also desire to rest contented, and to cease turmoyling in worldly businesse, and resolue not to subiect themselues to earthly desires; but whilest they behold others by vnquiet labouring to come forward in the world, and to be aduanced vnto riches and honours; being not as yet firme and well settled in the way of truth, by the euil examples of others, they slide back into the way of wickednesse. And as they enfeeble and weaken our good resolutions, so also they corrupt vs with sinne; in regard wherof one saith, that the tender mind which is vnsetled in that which is right, is to be withdrawne from beholding the multitude: because we are prone to go with company; and euen Socrates, Cato & Lælius, might change their mind, and be brought to alter their good resolution by the dissenting multitude; so vnable is any of vs, when as our disposition is best composed, to beare the assault of vices, when as they come against vs strengthened with so great a troope. And if one example of luxurious nesse or comessation doth much hurt; if one delicate, nice and wanton companion doth by little and little weaken and effeminate vs; if our rich Neighbour doth kindle our concupiscence; and if a malicious companion doth rub off his rust, euen vpon him that is innocent and ingenuous, what thinke you will befall them, against whom combined wickednes doth make a common assault? As therefore those who haue sound eyes, doe carefully refrain looking vpon theirs which are sore and bleared, because euen by seeing them, a secret poyson and infection is transmitted, whereby they also are tainted; and as men in time of the plague, do carefully make choice of their aire and company, and auoid them who are infected, and haue running sores vpon them: so with no lesse care are wee to auoid the sight of wicked examples, and the fellowship of such as are infected with the plague of wilfull and presumptuous sinne, because a poyson and infection secretly commeth from them (as from the Cramp-fish to the hand of the Angler) by the contagion whereof we also are tainted and infected. For sin like the Plague or Leprosie, is of a spreading nature, going from one to another, vntill it haue infected a whole Country. And as a stone cast into a great water, troubleth not only that part into which it fell, but stirreth vp certaine circled wrinkles in the face or superficies of the water neere about it, and these being moued, doe also after the same manner moue those parts which are contiguous the one to the other, till it extend to the very bankes: so wicked suggestions being cast into the minds of Worldlings, are thence produced into act, and so being made examplary to those that are about them, doe not rest there, but by contagion spread themselues ouer all the Country. To which purpose one saith, that no man erreth to himselfe alone, but doth disperse and communicate his folly to his Neighbours, and interchangeably receiueth the like from them. And the vices of the people are in euery particular man, because the people communicates them, and is made worse it selfe whilest it maketh others worse, It learneth ill things, and then teacheth them, and so wickednesse groweth to a monstrous greatnesse, that being all cast into one heape, which euery one knoweth to be worst.

Nemo errat vni sibi, sed demens partem spargit in proximos, accipitque insanem. circ. Senec. Epist 94.

Now as these euill examples are in all very hurtfull; so they are most pernicious when they are obserued in superiours: for seldome doe these tall Cedars fall, but they beat down also all the low shrubs that stand about them. And thus doe Masters by their euill examples corrupt and poyson their seruants, Parents Children, Magistrates the People, Ministers their flockes; and most of all Princes their Subiects, seeing all the Country is ready, either for feare, or flattery, to conforme it selfe to the example of their King, in regard whereof (one saith) that Princes actions stand for precepts, and their examples haue the power of a Law to draw their Subiects to imitation.

9. Sect. 3. Euill examples of Superiours are most pernicious.

In conditis ab principis vt quicquid facidt pro lege videtur Quintz

But as these euill examples are very hurtfull, as they corrupt vs with sinne; so also in nourishing pride and securitie, and in hindring of repentance; whilest comparing our selues with others, which haue burst out into greater wickednesse, we are ready through selfe-loue to conceit our owne excellencies; and so whilest wee are wholly taken vp in thinking how farre wee exceed them in vertue and goodnesse, wee neuer thinke how far short we come of that which God requireth of vs. To say nothing of that incouragement which men take vnto themselues, of committing wickednesse, when they see others doe the like, and yet scape vnpunished and flourish in the World. For as the Wise man saith, because sentence against an euill worke is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the children of men is fully set in them to doe euill. And therefore seeing wee are so greatly endangered with wicked societie, by beholding their euill examples, let vs carefully auoid them: or if at vnawares we happen to come into such company, let vs (as one exhorteth) be very watchfull ouer our selues, that we doe not sucke in these inticing baits of sinne, neither by our eyes, nor by our eares, lest by little and little wee be inured to it, and lest certaine figures and characters of those euils, which wee haue seene and heard, doe remaine still in our minds to our ruine and destruction. And because wee cannot sufficiently with our owne watchfulnesse preserue our selues from being ouer-taken with this deceitfulnes of sin, let vs with Dauid (hauing set a watch before our eyes and eares) desire the Lord that he will not suffer our hearts to be inclined vnto euill, that we should commit wicked workes with the men that worke iniquitie.

Q. Sect. 5. Euill examples of the wicked vex and grieue Gods seruants

And thus it appeareth that euill examples of wicked worldlings are very hurtfull and pernicious as they corrupt and infect vs with sin: but though we were so preserued by Gods Spirit that there were no danger of taking hurt by this contagion, yet many other euils are incident vnto vs, if we be daily beholders of these wicked examples. For being the children of God it must needs bee grieuous vnto vs to see our heauenly Father thus dishonoured; being faithfull seruants of the great King of heauen & earth, it cannot chuse but much vex and trouble vs, when we see the glory of our Lord and Master impeached by wicked Miscreants, yea, and seeing wee are of the same flesh & blood with these worldly men, the workmanship of the same Creatour, yea, people of the same Country, and (as it were) children borne by the same mother; it must needs afflict our soules with griefe and bitter sorrow, when we behold them daily running on in a course, which will bring them to eternall destruction, both in their soules and bodies. And thus was righteous Lots soule grieued, when he saw the filthy conuersation of the wicked Sodomites. For hee being righteous and dwelling among them, in seeing and in hearing, vexed his righteous soule from day to day, with their vnlawfull deeds. And holy Dauid professeth that his eyes gushed out with riuers of waters, and that his zeale euen consumed him, because his enemies kept not Gods Law, but forgot his words. Yea, thus our Sauiour Christ himself being conuersant among the wicked Iewes, mourned when he saw the hardnes of their hearts.

Q. Sect. 6. If we doe not follow the euill examples of the wicked, we procure their hatred.

Finally, by being with wicked men, and not doing as they doe, not following their examples, we doe thereby exceedingly prouoke their malice and hatred: for it is a sufficient quarrell for a wicked man against those that feare God, if they bee innocent, and seeme to make conscience of those sinnes which they see them commit, because their abstinence from euill seemeth to proclaime their wickednesse who doe commit it, and awakeneth their sleeping consciences, when as they are galled with their refusal. Whereby oftentimes it commeth to passe that the godly being spectators of these euill examples, and denying to joyn with them in their enormities, doe not onely thereby endanger their names to be branded with their obloquies, reproches, and disgraces, but also their persons to their violence and furie; as we may see in the example of Lot, who though he did in most louing and humble manner refuse to communicate with the Sodomites in their sins, yet so incensed them to rage hereby, that they would haue laid violent hands vpon him, had not God miraculously deliuered him from their fury. And as it mooueth them to hate vs; so through our naturall corruption wee are readie to extend our hatred beyond its due limits, abhorring not only their sin, but their persons also. All which euils as they ought, so they may easily be auoided, if we will shun the societie of wicked men, and frequent the company of the vertuous; for so shall wee neither bee allured nor grieued by their examples, nor yet nourish this open hostilitie between vs, but may liue like strangers one to another, seeing we cannot liue as friends. To this purpose one saith, that if wee be spectators of the euil conuersation of wicked men, we must of necessity, either imitate or hate them; both which are to bee auoided, lest thou shouldest either bee like to wicked men, because they are many, or an enemy to many, because they are vnlike: and therefore it is best for a man either to bee conuersant with himselfe, or to keepe company with those who may better him, or whom he may better.

And thus haue I shewed the manifold euils which come of wicked company, through their bad examples: vnto which we may adde the hurt which wee are apt to receiue by their speeches and communication. In which respect the societie of wicked worldlings is dangerous and hurtfull: first, in regard that by their speeches they corrupt vs; for being either worldly or prophane, and spent either about earthly things, as profits and preferments, or in vain mirth, ribauldry, filthines, foolish jesting, & such like wicked discourses; it commeth to passe that by frequenting their company wee become as worldly as they, hauing not only our hearts fast nailed to the earth, but our tongues tuned to the same key, vttering nothing but that which sauoureth of the world and worldly vanities, or which is worse, being corrupted with their filthy communication, wee in the end grow, if not to imitate, yet at least to like, or not so much to dislike them as we ought. For there is a secret poison in worldly & wicked speeches, which when they are admitted into into our eares, infuseth it selfe into our minds, whereby they being corrupted, doe taint also all our speaches and actions; of which the Apostle Paul warneth vs to take heed, Be not (saith he) deceiued, euill words corrupt good manners. Or if they doe not thus corrupt vs, then of necessitie they do much vex & grieue vs, when as wee heare our heauenly Father thus dishonoured, and see those, whose company we frequent, running swiftly the way to destruction and condemnation.

Secondly, the speeches and familiar communication of wicked Worldlings, are hurtfull and pernicious; as they are the Deuils spokesmen to woo our hearts from God, perswading, alluring and inticing vs to withdraw from him all true obedience, by neglecting the duties which hee requireth, or committing the vices which he hath forbidden. For we are to know that in this regard worldly men are very impudent, not sticking in plaine tearmes to blow the trumpet of rebellion against God; and when they cannot catch vs with their wicked company, nor allure vs by their euill examples, they stay not there, but in direct speeches solicite the Deuils suites, either discouraging vs from vertuous actions, by telling vs that they are needlesse, or too troublesome, either that they will not stand with our credit, but traduce our names, and impeach our reputations; or that they are against our profit and preferment in the World, or else prouoking & perswading, yea, alluring and incouraging vnto commit with them sin and wickednes by all manner of perswasions, inticing speeches, faire promises and kind vsage: by which baites they labour to draw all who frequent their company into the snares of destruction and perdition. An example whereof we haue in Putiphars Wife, who laying aside all modestie, inticed Ioseph vnto sin; in the harlot alluring the young man vnto folly; and in wicked Ahab, who gaue vnto Iehosaphat and his followers bountifull entertainment, that hee might hereby intice him to goe vp against Ramoth Gilead. Against which perswasions and inticing baits, the Wise man armeth vs, saying, My sonne, if sinners doe intice thee, consent thou not: If they say, come with vs, we will lay wait for blood, and lie priuily for the innocent without a cause, &c. We will find all precious riches, and fill our houses with spoile. Cast in thy lot among vs, we will haue one purse: My sonne walke not thou in the way with them, refrain thy foot from their path, &c.

The which counsell that wee may follow with the greater care, let vs consider that these temptations are exceeding dangerous, being vsed by men in our own likenesse vnder colour of loue, with pretence of our own profit and aduantage; seeing the Oratour which perswadeth, and the Theame whereon hee discourseth, are so pleasing and well accepted of our corrupt nature. But that we may resist such wicked allurements, let vs know that they are but Syrens Songs which intice to leape into the sea of destruction, and but the Worlds inchantments, whereby conspiring with Satan, it laboureth to carry vs swiftly vnto Hell; like vnto that pleasing discourse vsed by the old Serpent to our first parents, which promised to equall their estate with Gods, but in truth made them in as bad case as the Deuill had not the Lord in mercy relieued and restored them. And therefore let vs stop our eares against these worldly allurements, whereby wicked men intice vs vnto sinne, and like the Deuils Aduocates perswade vs by the hazarding of our soules, to obtaine worldly vanities; or rather let vs, because we will not heare their bewitching tunes, abandon their company: for as one saith, Wee are in good forwardnesse towards the obtaining of our soules welfare, when as wee leaue the company of those who perswade vnto wickednesse, and goe farre off out of this hurtfull societie. And though they would still tie vs vnto them in the bonds of loue; yet let vs abhorre their company and breake off from them, esteeming them of all others our most dangerous enemies; seeing vnder colour of good will, they expose our soules to vtter destruction; and our most pernicious persecutors, who by inticing vs vnto euill, doe not kill the body alone, but plunge both body and soule into euerlasting death.

CHAP. XIX.

That the friendship of wicked Worldlings is to be contemned, and carefully auoided.

AND thus haue I shewed the dangerousnesse of the Worlds temptations, which haue their strength from wicked company. In the next place wee are to speake of those which are grounded on worldly friendship, and to propound some reasons which may moue vs to contemne and auoid it. Where first wee are to know that the following discourse tendeth not to the disgrace of true friendship, or to take away this neere loue and kindnesse betweene man and man; for this is not only one of the chiefe comforts which sweetens worldly miseries, but a notable help and furtherance in the course of godlines. And as the Sonne of Syrach saith, A faithfull friend is a strong defence, and he that findeth such a one findeth a treasure. A faithfull friend ought by no meanes to be changed for any thing, and the weight of gold and siluer is not to bee compared to the goodnesse of his faith. A faithfull friend is the medicine of life and immortality, and they that feare the Lord shall find him: who so feareth the Lord shall direct his friendship aright, and as he is himselfe, so shall his friend be.

Q. Sect. 1. That true friendship is much to be esteemed.

Eccl. 6. 14, 15. &c.

Solem è mundo tollunt, qui tollunt amicitiam. Ambros. de amicit. cap. 7.

Which who so take away from amongst men, they take away (as it were) the Sun out of the firmament; and spoile them of their chiefe comfort: for as one saith, without friends all our cogitations are tedious, our workes toylesome, every Country is an exile or pilgrimage, all life a torment, and without their solace life were no better than death.

Sine amicis omnis cogitatio est tadium, omnis operatio labor, omnis terra peregrinatio, &c. Cassian in 8 Epist.

Of this true friendship which is only among those that are good, in good, and to good ends and purposes wee doe not here speake; yea, rather wee ought earnestly to wish, that this vertue no lesse excellent than rare and hard to be found, might againe returne to the sonnes of men from Heauen, vnto which it seemeth fled, that their comfort in this sweet fruition of their mutuall good might be inlarged and increased. But the following discourse tendeth to the contempt of that worldly, wicked, false and counterfeit friendship entertained among men, which is betweene the euill alone, or the good and bad together in euill things, and for the accomplishment of euill ends: in which respects when this friendship is admitted, it quite excludeth the true loue of God. Neither would I haue Gods seruants to withdraw themselues from Worldlings in respect of ciuill kindnesse, and to professe open enmitie against their persons, but only from hauing neere friendship and familiaritie with them, or any communion and fellowship in that which is euill. For howsoeuer wee are to hate their sinnes, yet wee must loue their persons, and though wee may not in respect of the former euils entertaine them as friends, yet if it be possible, and as much as in vs lieth, wee are to haue peace with all men: and to further with our best indeuours their conuersion vnto God, that so being of one family, wee may loue them as our brethren and fellow seruants: and for the present wee cannot haue them our friends, yet we must willingly haue them (if wee can by lawfull meanes auoid it) our foes and enemies.

Rom. 12. 18. Pacem si charum, malim ignotus, nemini atrocem, &c. Hat omnes amicos habere operosum est: satis est inimicos non habere. Senec. Epist. 14.

But to come to our purpose: wee are carefully to take heed of worldly friendship, when it is an occasion to breake off our friendship with God (as it is, when as it prouoketh or allureth vs to the committing of sin, or to the neglect of any good duty) and labour to please God rather than men, when wee cannot please both together: esteeming such kind of friendship the most hatefull enmitie, and such carnal friends, to be no better than treacherous enemies who doe vs more mischiefe than those who openly discouer their malice, & shew their hatred by offering all outward violence. Whereof it is that one thus exclaimeth against this wicked friendship: O friendship (saith he) too much our enemy, as being a seducer too easily to be discerned, from which proceedeth an appetite and greedy desire of doing hurt, and endamaging others, (as it were) by way of sport and play, without any desire of gaine or reuenge; but whilest companions say, let vs go together, let vs doe it, and they are ashamed not to be as impudent as their fellowes. With which wicked friendship that wee may not be abused and inueigled, let vs consider, first, that we cannot hold this friendship with Worldlings, but we must betake our league and couenant with God, and, as it were, proclaime warre against him; for as the Apostle Iohn telleth vs, hee that loueth the World, the loue of the Father cannot abide in him: and Iames plainly affirmeth, that the amity of the World is enmity with God; and therefore whosoeuer will be a friend of the World, maketh himselfe the enemy of God: into which sinne when Iehoshaphat fell, hee is sharply reproued by the Prophet, Wouldest thou, (saith hee) helpe the wicked, and loue them that hate the Lord? therefore for this thing the wrath of the Lord is vpon thee.

Secondly, let vs consider that this friendship with wicked worldlings is not true, but false and counterfeit. For there is no true friendship, but that which is betweene the vertuous and faithfull, and grounded vpon the true loue and feare of God; for whose sake they also ioyne their brethren, whereby they helpe one another forward in vertuous actions, and further their good ends and indeuours. To which purpose one saith, that all true friendship ariseth and beginneth betweene those that are good, encreaseth among the good, and is most perfect among those who are best and most vertuous. And another affirmeth, that wee cannot be true friends vnto men vnlesse wee bee first friends vnto the truth. With whom also a third agreeth, saying, that all loue of the flesh is corrupt, and that all worldly friendship is false and counterfeit, which is not knit together with the band of Gods feare; there being no true fidelitie in the seruants of the Deuill. Neither is it the fruit of true friendship, that our faith towards God should through it be violated; for he cannot be a true friend vnto man, who hath shewed himselfe vnfaithfull vnto God: nor yet can it be in euill, seeing (as one saith) Friendship is the keeper and preserver of pietie; and therefore that friendship which is with wicked Worldlings, is to be contemned and abhorred, as being false and counterfeit, seeing it is with the euill, in euill, and for euill ends, and not grounded vpon the loue of God, but vpon worldly respects to serue their owne turnes: and vpon selfe-loue that they may haue profit or pleasure by them; in eating, drinking, discoursing, gaming, sporting, and such other carnall delights. Whereupon is followeth that it is deceitfull and inconstant: for whereas true friendship is immutable and perpetuall, because it is grounded on vertue, and on the loue of God, which is vnchangeable; this world-

Q. Sect. 2. In what respects friendship with the wicked is to be auoided.

Q. Sect. 3. That we cannot hold friendship with worldlings, & peace with God.

worldly friendship in flattering and vaine-flatte-, lulling vs in danger vnder these worldly respects and ends of pleasure and profit all, whereupon it wholly reflects and relies. And therefore (as one such) bee sadly warn, that when such a friend as the world, and weigh him as a banquet, neither eate of meate thereof all the time wee imbrace the world, and flourishing in prosperity; think that he imagineth alwaies to be friendly vnto him, vnto whom hee is now thinking this his benefite are sufficient enough to procure friends: whereas some men the more they are obliged, the more they mislike their benefactors: as foes shall moreover, that make debates; but great famous enemies, because all hope is taken away of requitall, and pride maketh them so hate those, vnto whom their necessitie enforceth them whether they will or no, to stand indebted and beholdinge.

Such friendes therefore as are tied vnto vs in these worldly bonds, are not to be esteemed, for when the bands are broken the friends are scattered, like chaffe or some such light matter, which doth with the cool whaste in the sun-shine and calme, how separateth it selfe and flieth away with the least blast of wind blowing, or like vnto the reed which standeth vpright and formerly stiffe and strong in faire weather, but bowes and bendeth any way when the storme ariseth: so these worldly friends whilest the sunne of prosperity shineth, doe adhere vnto vs and seeme firme and constant as though they would neuer leaue vs; but when the least tempest of trouble commeth, and when the world beginneth to frowne, they either hange downe the head and will not see vs, or finde diuerse excuses why they cannot help vs, or like Iobs miserable comforters they make poverty a crime, and vse sugred and subtile our guiltinesse and sinfulnesse; because wee are fallen into this miserable affliction. And therefore let vs take heede of such friends if wee haue them, nor trust vnto them if wee haue them, for like the Swallow they will build and dwell with vs, whilst the Summer is almost ouer, but if wee take hold of them, or offer to lay our hands vpon them, they will flie away: if wee will rely vpon them for succour, they will fall vpon vs and ouerthrow vs to the ground with their oppressions: that we therefore follow the admonition of the wise man. If (saith he) thou be worthy of thy friend, prooue him first, and be not hastie to giue him credit: for some loue him for their owne aduantage, and will not abide in the day of thy trouble. And there is a friend which is turned to his enmitie, and discouereth thy reproch. Againe, a friend is but a companion at the table, and in the day of thine affliction he will not continue: but in thy prosperity he will be as thy selfe, and will vse liberty vnto thy seruants; if thou be brought low he will be against thee, and will hide himselfe from thy face. Depart from thine enemies, and beware of thy friends.

Yea, these worldly friends doe not onely become in time of aduersitie, as vnprofitable as strangers, but also as hurtfull as enemies, their kindnesse and loue degenerating into malice and hatred: and this the former authour also obserueth. There is some friend, saith he, that turneth to enmity, and taketh part against thee, and in contumelie he will declare thy shame. And in another place: There is some companion, which is prosperitie reioyceth with his friend, but in the time of trouble he is against him. Of which the Prophet Dauid hauing experience, complaineth, My familiar friend (saith he) whom I trusted, which did eate of my bread, hath list vp his heele against me. So that in this worldly friendship the prouerb truely taketh place, Too much friendship maketh way for hatred: yea, in truth there is no enmity so dangerous, as that which hath its foundation vpon the ruines of loue; and as in nature, the purest substance is turned into the most loathsome corruption; so the honest loue, which hath no other ground but carnall respects, degenerates oftentimes into the most deadly hatred, and hurtfull enmitie. For being priuie to all their friends secrets and counsels, and well acquainted with their state and condition, they are the more enabled thereby to doe them the greater mischiefe when their loue is turned to spite and malice, euen as a traitor is much more dangerous than a professed enemie, and a fugitiue souldier more pernicious in time of warre, than he that assaulteth with open violence. To which purpose one saith well: That an enemy may be shunned, but a friend cunning of his aduantages is treacherous; and we may easily make head against loue, vnto whom wee haue not committed our counsels, but it is greater perfidie to procure bitter griefes to whom we haue vnfeyned loue.

But as this worldly friendship is very dangerous and hurtfull to our outward estate when it beginneth to fade, so it is much more pernicious to our soules, and spirituall estate whilest it lasteth and continueth; as being one of the most forcible meanes, which either Satan or the world hath to poison and corrupt vs with sinne; and one of the most pearcing arrowes in all their quiuer of temptations, wherewith they inflict deepe and incurable wounds into our consciences, whilest on the one side wee frequent their company, see their euill examples, heare their wicked speeches and discourses, and gine them audience, when as they allure and intice vs vnto sinne; and on the other side are ready to yeeld vnto them in all their desires, for feare of displeasing them; and to like of all they doe, because wee affect their persons. In regard whereof one saith, that that friendship is very harmefull, which is contracted with maliciousnesse. For it is the Law and condition of this friendship, by a similitude and likenesse of nature to infuse wickednesse into those who are in amitie with them. For as in pestilent places, the aire stealingly and by little and little attracted, doth infect the body with an hidden disease; so through wicked acquaintance, we sucke in manifold euils, although wee doe not presently perceive the discommoditie of it. In which respect wee are to contemne, yea, to hate this friendship of wicked worldlings, as being but like sugar, which inticeth vs to drinke the poison of sinne; and the diuels most preuailing orator, in perswading vs to neglect all dutie, and to set our hearts open for the entertaining of sinne.

9. Sect. 8. Their obiection answered, who say they haue had no hurt by the friendship of the wicked.

And thus haue I shewed the manifold euils which come vnto vs, through the familiar society and friendship of wicked worldlings. Against which, if any shall obiect their owne experience, namely, that they haue frequented such company, and intertained such loue and amitie, and yet feele themselues neuer the worse; to such I answere, that either they are so bad already, that they cannot be made much worse, or haue but a while beene linked in this fellowship, and so the poison hath not as yet his operation, or if longer time they haue conuersed with them, and yet feele no ill, it is because wickednesse hath growne on them by degrees, and hath therefore through their negligence bin insensible, they hauing rather declined by little and little, than suddenly fallen into these mischiefes. But let not this incourage them in their course, their case herein being common with theirs who are deepely plunged into sinne. For there is not any man that is suddenly outragiously wicked, but commeth to the height of diuelliſh habit, by degrees, and through a continuall euill custome. Great floods doe not suddenly rise, but after much dropping; mettals are not presently melted, as soone as they are put into the furnace; greene wood doth not forth with flame out, as soone as it is laid on the fire; but yet wishing a while with much and often raising the waters arise, with great and continuall heate the mettals melt, and the greene wood after some weake resistance is burned and consumed. And so although the fire of Gods grace burning in vs, is not quenched at first (as it were) with this water of worldly wickednesse, yea rather perhaps it may through opposition, make it to gather strength, and burne more hotly; but yet if it be much and often cast vpon it, it will in the end put it cleane out. Although (saith one) thou were made of Iron, yet standing continually before a great fire, thou wouldest at last be dissolued and softned; and he that still dwelleth at the next doore to danger, cannot long be safe. By assiduitie a man is often deliuered ouer as captiue to sinne, and oftentimes familiarity hath intangled men, and ministred vnto them occasion of sinning; and what she could at the first would not, that lingring assiduitie and custome hath atchieued. At the first, it may be a Christian mans heart riseth, and his soule abhorreth the wickednesse which hee seeth committed euen by his dearest friends, but at the second time hee is not so much moued, and when he is a little inured thereunto, the loue of his friend weakning the hatred which hee beareth the sinne, he is content to winke at it, and then to tolerate it, and after to like it, and by and by to imitate it, and within a while after to approue, defend, and boast of it. At the first hearing of blasphemie, ribauldrie & corrupt communication, it may be for the present we feele not our selues hurt and infected, but yet (as one saith) it leaueth seede in the mind, and euen after we are departed from them, could giue vs cause to sigh. And as those who heare pleasing musicke, haue, when the melody is ceased, the eares still sounding in their eares; so the talke of wicked men doth longer continue with vs, than it is in hearing, and it is not easie to forget a sound which is so sweet to our corrupt flesh. Neither doth the lingring growth of our corruptions, which by degrees creepe vpon vs, lessen our hurt and danger, but rather much increaseth them, seeing it ouercommeth vs, before wee feele our selues incountred, and inthralleth vs in the deepe dungeon of sinne, before wee perceiue our selues taken prisoners. As therefore those diseases which growe vpon vs by degrees vpon small and not appeare as cankers, are of all others most dangerous and incurable: so these spirituall diseases of the soule, which steale vpon vs by little and little, are most hardly cured, and most endanger vs, because they are not discerned, we till custome hath giuen them full possession, and (as it were) turned them into nature. And as men are no lesse fearefull of a lingring consumption, than of a hot burning ague, because it doth more certainly destroy vs, though it doth not assault vs with like violence: so these corruptions, which stealingly infect vs through the familiarizing and neere friendship which we haue with a ciuill worldling, doth oftentimes more endanger vs, than all the violent prouocations of men notoriously wicked, whereby they labour suddenly, and all at once to plunge vs headlong into wickednes.

THE CHRISTIAN WARFARE.

The second Part.

WHEREIN THE CHRISTIAN IS ARMED AGAINST THOSE TENTATIONS Of the World, which are grounded, on the alluring baites, of Honour, Riches, and Pleasure.

The second Booke.

CHAP. I.

Of those tentations generally which are grounded upon worldly things.

WE have in the former booke spoken of those worldly tentations, which arise from the persons of wicked worldlings, both in regard of their societie and friendship. Now we are to proceede vnto those which are grounded vpon worldly things; all which by the Apostle Iohn are referred to three heads, to wit, voluptuousnes, whose object are vnlawfull and immoderate pleasures; couetousnes, whose object are riches; and ambition, whose object are honours & preferment. All (saith he) that is in the world, as the lust of the flesh (that is, voluptuousnes) the lust of the eyes (that is couetousnes) and the pride of life, (that is ambition) is not of the Father, but is of the world. And these are the chiefe things which Satan, and the world vse, as their alluring baites and tempting fires, wherewith they allure vs vnto sinne, and withdraw our hearts from God, and the loue of spirituall things. These are those bands wherewith they tie vs fast vnto the earth; these are the Idols which they set vp in our hearts with which worldlings (forsaking the true God) commit grosse idolatrie, by louing and trusting in them more than vpon Gods power and prouidence. Finally, these are the rewards and wages, wherewith Satan and the world hire men to doe them seruice, and to tire themselues, spend their strength, and consume their life, in the workes of darknesse.

Against which tentations it behoues vs to bend all our strength, if wee would not be ouercome, and to put on all the spirituall armour prescribed in Gods word, whereby we may be inabled to make resistance. But least in auoiding one extreame wee runne into another, reiecting the creatures of God, because of our owne corruption, and leauing the lawfull vse, because of the vnlawfull abuse; I will shew what these things are in themselues, and what vnto vs; in what respects they are to be loued, desired, and vsed as good, and in what respects to be accounted and reiected as euill; how they are to bee accounted Gods blessings, and how the worlds baits to allure vs vnto sinne. All which I will shew, first generally, and then particularly. For the former wee are to know, that all these three, to wit, honours, riches, and pleasures, are in their owne nature good; for they are the good creatures and gifts of God, which were approued by his owne testimonie, wherein is said, that God saw all that he had made, and loe it was very good. And least we should thinke that together with man, they also had lost all their goodnesse through his fall, the Apostle speaking of the creatures, as they are now in their owne nature, saith, that euery creature

Q. Sect. 1. That these worldly things honours, riches, and pleasures are in their owne nature good and the gifts of God.

ture of God is good, and nothing ought to be refus[illegible]

To this purpose one saith: I say to thee, O Lord, some things, and they be good, because thou the things good, which thou hast created them; there is nothing of ours in them, but that wee sinne in ouermuch louing them, inordinately preferring the creatures before thee who hast created them. Yea they are not only creatures of Gods making, but also blessings which hee promiseth vnto those that serue him, as temporall rewards of their loue and obedience. For so the Wiseman saith, that the riches of honour, and the treasures of God, is riches, and glory, and life, where pleasures also are implyed in riches, which is the very life. Neither hath any but the faithfull any true right vnto these gifts of God, but are meere vsurpers, seeing they doe not performe the condition of Gods donation, in louing, fearing, and serving him: and to those only belongs the right of inheritance, vnto whom the blessing also appertaineth. Finally, the Lord hath bestowed these his gifts vpon his seruants to good vses and ends, namely, that he might be glorified in them, and they furthered and incouraged in the performance of all good duties. And therefore needs must these things be good, seeing they are good creatures, gifts and blessings, created and bestowed by our good God, on good and faithfull men, and that to good ends and purposes.

But yet howsoeuer these things are good, yet not absolutely and immutably, seeing they are subject vnto corruption, and so bee abused by man: in regard whereof the Apostle saith, that the feruent desire of the creature waiteth when the sonnes of God shall bee reuealed; because the creature is subiect to vanity, not of it owne will, but by reason of him who hath subdued it vnder hope; because the creature also shall be deliuered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious libertie of the sonnes of God, &c. And to the same purpose another saith, that these things mutably good, are therefore good, because they are made by the chiefe goodnesse, and therefore mutable, because they are not made of his owne substance, but of nothing: in regard whereof they are subiect to corruption, and are in great danger, vnlesse they bee continually preserued by the same powerfull goodnesse, by which they were at the first created. By reason of which mutabilitie they are not good in any high degree of excellencie, but to be reputed among such good things as are of meane esteeme, as being of an indifferent and common nature, in comparison of spirituall and heauenly things. Neither doe they vnreasonably hold this degree of goodnesse which they haue, but as the Chameleon changeth her colour according to the thing vnto which it is adioyned: so they [illegible] are in the possession of the good and vertuous; but become euill to the euill, and ready instruments of all manner of sinne and wickednesse, whilest they are vnder the gouernment of the wicked and vngodly. So that in respect of vs these things are neither good nor euill, but of an indifferent nature, good to those who vse them well, and euill to those that abuse them vnto sinne, and accordingly they are bestowed of God indifferently both to the good and euill. To which purpose that saith: God would haue these temporall things common betweene [illegible] because if he should giue them only to the good, the euill would thinke that for their sake the righteous serued God: and if he should giue them only to the euill, those who are weake in goodnesse would feare to be conuerted, least these things should bee wanting vnto them, &c. Againe, if these earthly things should be taken away only from the good, the same feare would hinder the weake from turning to God; and if they should be taken away only from the wicked, it would be thought the only punishment which euill men should suffer: whereas [illegible] giueth these things to the good, he doth therefore comfort trauellers and pilgrimes; and whereas he giueth them to the euill, he doth [illegible] good, that they should seeke such things as are [illegible] to the wicked.

Neuertheless howsoeuer these things are in their owne nature good, [illegible] blessings of God, we must haue [illegible] against the things themselues, [illegible] against their abuse and corruption, [illegible] must vse, contemne, and reiect them, when God hath bestowed them on vs, but rather labour to make a good and holy vse of them to the glorie of God, the good of our brethren, and the furtherance of our owne saluation, and so shall they retaine their owne nature, and become truely good vnto vs, whereas on the other side, by rejecting the gifts of God, we shall offer wrong to the giuer, in contemning his benefits, and bewray a certaine Cynicall and Papisticall pride, as we shall afterwards more plainly shew. And therefore (as one saith) abuse not earthly blessings, we were prostrate heretofore with humblenesse, lifted vp with pride. To which purpose another exhorteth vs to flie the world and worldly things, with our conuersation, and not with our body; for they hold vs on the outside, not by nature, but by corruption. But especially doth that wise Seneca write, and truly for our vse, if wee doe but change her Philosophie into true Christianitie: extend (saith hee) slowly-moouing, abroad vncommanded, and vncombined, a rough and ungilded board, professed hatred against money, money, lying vpon the ground, and what-soeuer else is worthy more labour to attaine vnto, their ambitious ends, though they goe in rich and glorious attyre, & vse the ornaments of Philosophy in their schooles and dennes thereby, although to be professed with all humanitie and ciuility; yet as much as they can withdraw and withhold themselues from the vnprofitable conuersation of men. Let vs labour to make all things within vs, and without vs, to agree with them: let not their clothes glister, let them not be set forth with gold, or siluer plate deepely engraued and imbossed with gold: neither let vs thinke it a signe of frugality to vse gold and siluer. Let vs studie to lead a better life then the common sort, and not a contrary: otherwise whilest we labour to auoid them, we shall doing them away, and what they from vnskilfull will hereby come to passe, that they will imitate nothing in vs, whilst they see vs dispise they should imitate all things. Philosophie doth in the very substance prouide the best of both, vsing temperately and soberly from both the difference of professions doth vse. Let vs duly meditate these things, for which we deserue to be made ridiculous & odious. We prepare, vnto our selues (it may be according to nature) but this is contrarie to nature, to torment a wearie mind, to haue costly prepared beds of roses, to spread downy soft pillowes, and to find no rest vnto our selues, to haue oyles, and sweet ointments, and not to know the state of our owne bodies, to abhorre from the vse of common waters, which may be prouided with easie labour. Philosophie requireth frugalitie, not punishment and torture, &c. He is a most absolute and complete man that vseth earthen vessels as though they were siluer; and he also which vseth siluer as though it were earthen: it is a signe of a weake minde not to be able to endure riches.

Seeing therefore these earthly and worldly things are not to be contemned and reiected, because they are in their owne nature good, and the blessings of God, and in respect of vs, good vnto the good which vse them well, and profitable seruants when they are gouerned and disposed by a wise and vertuous mind; let vs in the next place consider how we may so vse them, as that they may be vnto vs truly good and effectuall blessings receiued from God. And first we must vnderstand, that if we would haue these earthly things good, we must labour that they may serue a good master, and that we the true owners of them may be truly sanctified, and made vessels of honour, consecrated vnto God, who in Christ hath procured vnto vs right and dominion ouer the creatures, which we lost in Adam. For if we liue not the children of God and heires of his promise, we haue no title to his goods, but intrude vpon them by vsurpation: if we continue vnregenerate and defiled in our sinnes, we shall taint these blessings of God with our corruptions, and turne them into sinne; and if we who gouerne and dispose of them be euill, we shall imploy them to euill seruices, and making them to accomplish our euill ends & purposes, we shall cause them to be vnto vs euill & pernicious. Foolish therefore is their practise, who labour to haue euery thing good about them, and neglect goodnesse in their own persons, and seeke to excell all others in all good things which they possesse, themselues remaining euill and destitute of all goodnesse, seeing through their corruption they will defile these gifts of God, and of blessings make them to become curses, and notable hinderances of their saluation.

Secondly, although wee are to esteeme these earthly benefits as being the gifts of God, yet wee must take heede we doe not outrunne them, by preferring them before either Gods spirituall and sanctifying graces, or the eternall ioyes and happinesse of his kingdome: for looke how much more excellent the soule is than the body, eternall things than those that are temporall, the Creator than the creatures; and so much are wee in our iudgements to preferre Gods spirituall graces and heauenly ioyes before these earthly and transitorie trifles. Neither shall wee receiue any hurt by this valuation, for the more lightly wee account of these temporall things, and the more highly wee prize those which are spirituall and heauenly, the likelier wee are to receiue both from God, and to retaine them when we haue them: so we may see in the example of Salomon, who esteeming wisedome aboue all worldly pompe and wealth, had both bestowed vpon him by God. Wherefore if we ouervalue these earthly things, and prefer these trifles before the rich treasures of Gods graces, and our heauenly inheritance and patrimonie in his kingdome, the Lord in mercie will either withhold them from vs, if we be his children, or if wee haue them, will dispossesse vs of them for our abuse, vntill wee haue learned to make a right vse of them. And therefore those who enioy these worldly prosperities are to be admonished, that what they haue all things according to their hearts desire, they doe not negligently thinke after the chiefe fruition of all their goodnesse, nor fix their minds vpon those things which they enioy there, least they forget and end their pilgrimage in feasting about temporall, and turne the helpes and comforts of their iourney into hinderances of attaining vnto their iourneyes end, that though they herein delighted much the light of the Heauens, and their shadowes, yet they shall not feele the fruition of the Sunne himselfe: for vnderstanding those earthly things, that comforts of their calamities, and see the rewards of of retribution? let them lift vp their minds aboue all worldly fancies; loose with all their hearts delight they wholly vnto them: for he that contemneth the worldly prosperity, in comparison of that loue which he beareth to a better life, he turneth the fauours of this transitorie life, into the occasion of eternall death. Finally let them so esteeme and vse these outward things, as that they may not withdraw their minds from the desire of heauenly loue; and that they die not take away the griefe of our pilgrimage, seeing they should onely serue for some small comfort in the place of our banishment; nor cause vs to couet vnto these transitorie things, as though we had attained vnto happinesse, seeing as long as we possesse them, we are deprived of those ioyes that are eternall.

Thirdly, as we are not in our iudgements to ouer-value them, so we ought not to set our hearts and affections vpon them; immoderately louing, and ouer-eagerly desiring them; but vsing them as though we vsed them not, let vs giue God our hearts, and set our affections and desires vpon spirituall and heauenly things. Let vs afford vnto them some reliques of our loue, and so much onely as better things leaue; for that which is luke-warme and too cold for God; and those heauenly excellencies is hot enough for these earthly trifles, and as one saith, Let vs rather tolerate them loue them, because as the worlds aduersitie is manifestly pernicious so his prosperitie is their false flatterer: & in another place, Louers (saith he) temporall things, which if they might be spoiled and, that men would haue loued them; which the Sonne of God assumed; neither yet feare consumation, crosses and death, because if they would hurt a man, he would not haue suffered them. But this is to be vnderstood comparatiuely in respect of spirituall things, as hee expoundeth himselfe elsewhere: God doth not (saith he) forbid thee to haue these things, if thou dost not loue them as thy chiefe happinesse, but seeke after and commend them, in that thou maiest much more loue thy Creator: for if the bridegroome hauing giuen his spouse a ring, she should more loue it than the bridegroome himselfe, should she not euen in the very gift of her husband shew an vnthankfull minde, although she should haue her husbands gift? And in another place, The Apostle willeth vs, not to loue the world: he doth not (saith he) forbid vs to haue it, but to loue it: but thus shall we possesse it, and lesse it: and so this fame of worldly things becommeth the birdlime also to entangle holy spirituall wings. Howsoeuer therefore we may affect these worldly things with some small loue; yet it ought not to be ranked vnder that incite loue which we beare to God, and his spirituall and heauenly gifts, as these vaine trifles come short of them in worth and excellencie. yea in truth the loue of Gods temporall gifts, should serue but as little sparkes to inflame our hearts with the loue of the giuer; and but as steps whereby we may ascend and mount aloft vnto that diuine and heauenly loue. For why doe we loue these worldly things, but because they are beautifull, and can they these so beautifull as he that made them? Thou admirest these things, because thou seest not his excellencies, but learne by these things thou admirest, to loue him whom thou dost not see. Question and inquire of the creatures, and if it haue its being of it selfe, then rest in it, but if it haue its being from him, it is in no other respect louely to him that loueth it, but as he preferreth it before him that created it. And therefore purge thy loue, and cause the streame thereof from the filthy sinckes and channell of the world, into the garden and Paradise of God: and what heate and feruencie in loue to the world, let it be all bestowed on the Creator of the world. Finally, howsoeuer we may vse these earthly blessings when God bestoweth them, yet we are to be carefull that wee doe not take our chiefe ioy and comfort in them, but rather in the Lord who gaue them; in the fruition of his spirituall graces, and in the assurance of our heauenly kingdome. For God did not giue vs these worldly contents that we should ioy in them, and neglect our stately palace; hee did not bestow on vs these toyes and trifles that we should rest in them, and contemne our heauenly patrimony; but only hee giueth vs these courser meates, to stay our stomacks for a time, till we come to the great supper of the Lambe; and casteth vnto vs, as vnto little children, these pleasing vanities, to keepe vs from crying and complaining, till wee come to age, and are capable of his heauenly excellencies, and of those glorious gifts of incomparable value. And therefore as wee are not ashamed to be children in knowledge, so neither let vs be children in affection, doting vpon these earthly trifles which were onely giuen vs for a time to vse, and neglecting in respect of them Gods spirituall graces, and that heauenly happinesse, which is prouided for vs to enioy. For as one saith: There are some things of which we are to haue the fruition, some things which we are to vse, and some things which we are both to enioy and vse. These things we are to enioy, that we may be blessed with those things which we are to vse, to be helped and refreshed, whilest we are trauelling towards that blessednesse, that so they may attaine vnto it, and set our hearts vpon it. Now if we who passe and vse them, hauing them set before vs, shall enioy these things which we should onely vse, our course and iourney is thereby stayed, and sometimes also we are put out of our way, or at least hindred in our course, or turned backe againe,

from the obtaining of those things which wee should enjoy, being intangled with the loue of these terrestriall vanities. For to enjoy a thing, is with all our loue to adhere vnto it for it owne sake; to vse it, is to refer that which we vse, to the obtaining of that which we loue, if at least it be worthy to be beloued: for vnlawfull vse is rather to bee tearmed abuse. As therefore if being Pilgrimes, which cannot liue happily but in our owne Country; and being distressed in this our pilgrimage, and desiring to haue an end of our miseries, wee should resolue to returne into our owne country; for which purpose wee should haue need to vse either Ships or Waggons, that so wee might come to our country, which we were to enjoy: but if now the sweetnesse and pleasantnesse of the journey, and our resting in the chariot, should so delight vs, that we should begin to enjoy these things, which we ought only to vse, we would not make any haste to end our journey; and being intangled with this outward sweetenesse, our minds would bee estranged from our country, whose true and solid delights would make vs happy: so being Pilgrimes and Exiles from God in this mortall life, if wee will returne into our country where we may be blessed, wee must only vse this world and not enjoy it, that we may behold the inuisible things of God in our vnderstandings, by those creatures which are visible, that so after the vse of corporall and temporall things, wee may attaine vnto the fruition of those which are spirituall and eternall. To which purpose also he saith elsewhere: I am not ignorant that fruit is of fruition, vse of vsing; and that this difference is betweene them, that wee are said to enjoy that thing, which is not referred to another, but delighteth vs for it owne sake; and to vse that thing, which is desired for another: and therefore wee are rather to vse temporall things then to enjoy them; that so we may obtaine those things which are eternall: and not to be like those peruerse men, who will enjoy their gold, and vse their God; because they do not bestow their money for Gods sake, but only worship God for their monies sake.

And thus are we to vse these earthly things both in respect of our estimation in iudgement, and affection, in louing and desiring them, and accordingly must our practice also be in seeking them: for seeing they are to be lightly valued, and coldly loued, in comparison of spirituall and heauenly things, hereof it also followeth, that in respect of these, they are to bee slackly followed and sought after in our practice, and those things chiefly, and in the first place to bee laboured for, that are of a much more excellent nature, which being enjoyed will make vs truly blessed. For as in worldly things, such as are esteemed of great value are sought after in the first place, and those which are of meane worth, are put off to better leisure; so answerably (these heauenly and spirituall treasures, much more excelling all worldly things, than the richest Diamond in the the World, the vilest pebble stone) it were no better than sottish madnesse, if wee should not giue vnto them the first place, as in our desires, so in all our labours and endeuours; especially considering, that it will be no hindrance at all to the attaining of worldly benefits, if wee giue the priorities to those which are heauenly; both because it is as impossible by our owne care and industry to adde any thing to our stint in our earthly estate, as to adde thereby one cubit vnto our bodily stature; and also because wee haue a promise from God, whose blessing only maketh our estate prosperous, that if we will seeke those better things first, these which are worse shall be cast vpon vs, as it were aduantages into the maine bargaine. For so our Sauiour exhorteth vs, first to seeke the kingdome of God, and his righteousnes, and all these things shall be ministred vnto vs. Matth. 6. 27. Matth. 6. 33.

Q. Sect. 9. That wee must not seeke these earthly things for their owne sake.

And as wee are not to seeke these earthly benefits in the first place, so neither must we at all seeke them for their owne sake, propounding them as the maine end of our labour: for this were to make them our summum bonum, and of inferiour and meane goods, to esteeme them chiefe and principall; but we must in labouring after them, ayme chiefly at the glorifying of God by the vse of them, at the good of the Church, Commonwealth, and of our Neighbours; and finally at the furthering of our owne saluation. Neither must wee euer be at rest, though by our industry wee haue attained vnto abundance of these things, vnlesse in the vse of them we further these ends: nor at all regard these creatures, vnlesse we imploy them so, as that their vse doth giue vnto vs some assurance of the loue of the Creatour. For whatsoeuer we haue without our God, it is not sweet; neither are we to esteem any thing which he giueth vnles also he giue vs himself who giueth all. And as the Infant being richly adorned with precious jewels, and costly clothing, doth not at all esteeme them when he is hungry, but taketh all his delight in sucking the mothers brest: so a Christian man, euen when he aboundeth in all worldly things, taketh little pleasure in them, in comparison of that wonderfull delight, which his hungry soule taketh in God his heauenly Father.

Quicquid nobis adest praeter Deum nostrum, non est dulce: Nouimus omnia quae dedit; sed non dat seipsum qui omnia dedit. Aug. in Psal. 85. Velut insana circumdatus margaritis & indumentis pretiosis, &c. Macarius Hom. 45

And if wee thus esteeme, affect and seeke these worldly things in our iudgement, heart and practice, then will it also necessarily follow, that we will only vse lawfull meanes in the attaining vnto them; contemning and despising them, when as they are offered vnto vs vpon euill and vnlawfull conditions, as being the Deuils alluring baites, wherewith he inticeth vs to offend God, and so hazard the losse of those spirituall, heauenly, and eternall excellencies for the obtayning of these

Q. Sect. 10. That wee must vse those meanes onely which are lawfull for compassing of these earthly things.

base, earthly, and momentany vanities. And then also will wee not bee much troubled, though wee faile of them when wee seeke them, or haue them taken from vs when wee possesse them: so that in stead of them, the Lord giueth vs his spirituall graces, and assureth vs of his heauenly ioyes; as not thinking it much to want these trifles, when we are inriched with those incomparable treasures, and gifts of farre better value. Neither will wee then enuy the flourishing estate of wicked Worldlings, no more than the heire apparant of a Kingdome, enuieth the present possessions of a poore Cottager.

9. Sect. 11. Of the lawfull vse of these earthly things, in regard of our possessing and disposing them.

And thus haue I shewed the lawfull vse of these worldly blessings, in regard of our esteeming, louing, and seeking after them. Now we are also to adde something of their lawfull vse, in regard of our possessing and disposing them; leauing the more full handling hereof, till I come to speake of the particulars. And to say nothing of those former points of esteeming and louing them, which are common both to the seeking and possessing of these things, because it is easie for the discreet Reader to apply it also to this purpose; we are further to know, that if wee would haue a lawfull vse of these things, so as they may indeed be blessings of God vnto vs, then must wee in the first place sanctifie them vnto our vse by the Word of God and Prayer, according to the Apostles rule, euery creature of God is good, being sanctified by the Word of God and Prayer. By the Word, as it doth shew and warrant the right vse of it, so as it may bee done in Faith; and by Prayer, as it is a meanes to deriue Gods blessing vpon it, and to obtaine the assistance of his holy Spirit, whereby wee are inabled to vse it aright, and according to Gods Will reuealed vnto vs. Secondly, we must not when wee haue these things, sacrifice to our owne nets, as the Prophet speaketh; nor ascribe the praise either to our owne merits or to our industry and labour; for this were to rob God of his royall prerogatiue, and to take occasion by his gifts to dishonour the giuer; but acknowledging with all humility, that whatsoeuer we haue, wee haue receiued it from the Lord of his meere bounty & goodnesse, wee must returne vnto him all praise and thanksgiuing, the which is that tribute and homage which our heauenly King requireth of them, who hold their possessions, by the tenure of his free mercy. And this is one of the conditions which the Apostle requireth to the making of the creature good to our vse; Euery creature of God (saith hee) is good if it be receiued with thanksgiuing. Finally, possessing these earthly blessings we are carefully to imploy and vse them, so as they may serue for furtherances and helpes vnto vs, for the better performing of all Christian duties, that so thereby God may be glorified, our Neighbours edified, and our owne saluation furthered, and more and more assured vnto vs: and that we vsing our Masters talents to the best aduantage, may, being found faithfull in little, be made rulers ouer much, and enter into our Masters ioy.

CHAP. II.

Of Honours, and what cautions and conditions are required vnto them, that they may be vnto vs good and lawfull.

AND thus much in generall of the lawfull vse of worldly things. In the next place wee are to speake particularly of the right vse of Honours, Riches and Pleasures. Where first wee are to know, that Honours are of two sorts, the one lawfull and laudable, the other worldly and wicked. The former consisteth not onely in the approbation, which God and our owne consciences giue to our vertuous actions and good parts; but also in the good opinion, and estimation of the wise, vertuous and religious, joyned with their free applause & commendation of those gifts, which God hath bestowed on vs; & of those good workes, and honest and religious actions, which through his grace are performed by vs. The which may be either in priuate Christians of meane place and calling, or in publicke and eminent persons, joyned with authority and rule, or other worldly dignities and preferments. The other is the applause and praise of the rude, ignorant, and vnconstant multitude, joyned with worldly aduancement and preferment, either procured by subtill deuices and wicked arts, making shadowes and appearances of vertues and good actions, to stand for those which are true and substantiall, or immoderately and ambitiously affected for those things in them, or done by them, which in their owne nature are good and commendable. The former kind of honour is lawfull, and to be desired moderately of all Christians, the other is to be contemned and despised.

9. Sect. Of the honour and kinds of honour.

The lawfulnesse of that honour, and of the moderate desire thereof may appeare, first, because it is the gift of God; for it is hee that raiseth vp the poore out of the dust, and lifteth vp the beggar out of the dunghill, to set them among Princes, and to make them inherit the seat of glory, as Hannah speaketh. And Dauid acknowledgeth, that riches and honours come from God, and that it is his hand that maketh great, and giueth strength to all. And therfore these streames must needs in themselues be pure and good, seeing they flow from God, the fountaine of all goodnes,

vnlesse they be polluted through the Deuils malice, and mans corruption. Secondly, these honours are promised and bestowed by God vpon his children & seruants, as his blessings, and rewards of their faithfull seruice. So when Isaac blessed Iacob, this was one part thereof, that people should be his seruants, and nations bow vnto him; that hee should be Lord ouer his brethren, and his mothers children should honour him. To shew vnto vs, that honour and blessednesse may well goe together, and that wee may rule ouer men, and at the same time be the faithfull seruants of our great Lord and Master. Thus the Lord promiseth the people of Israel, that because they had set vp the Lord to be their God, to walke in his wayes, and to keepe his Ordinances, therefore he also would set vp them, and make them high aboue all Nations which hee hath made in praise, and in name, and in glory; so the Lord saith, that he will honour those that honour him; and that the righteous shall be had in euerlasting remembrance, and that the memoriall of the iust shall be blessed. And the Apostle Paul alloteth vnto Elders that gouerne wel, a double portion of this honour as a reward of their faithfull seruice. Neither is it to bee esteemed a reward of small value, being compared with other temporary and worldly benefits; but of great worth and esteeme; for, as one saith, a good Name is a second patrimony; yea, it is to be preferred before Lands and worldly wealth: For, as the Wise man saith; A good name is to bee chosen aboue great riches, and louing fauour is aboue siluer and gold. With which accordeth the saying of the Sonne of Syrach, Haue regard to thy name, for that shall continue with thee, aboue a thousand treasures of gold. And so also it is more to be esteemed than all worldly pleasures, in which respect, the preacher preferreth a good name before a precious ointment, both because it is much more sweete and comfortable to him that hath it, and those which are about him, and also because this sweet scent and fauour spreadeth it selfe much further, doing them good which are farre distant, and is of much longer continuance, for the smell of the Oyntment endureth but a while, whereas the odour of a good Name lasteth for euer: for as the Psalmist saith, The righteous shall be had in euerlasting remembrance. Finally, it is said of a good Oyntment, that it doth make the face shine, and the countenance chearefull, but of a good Name, that it euen filleth the bones with marrow and fatnesse. Yea, in truth a mans fame and good report is to be preferred before life it selfe, seeing the life of an ingenuous & honest man is as bitter as wormwood, when as he hath out-liued his reputation: and also, because the best life is but short and momentany; whereas the fame of the righteous is perpetuall and euerlasting. And this reason the sonne of Syrach rendreth. A good life (saith he) hath the dayes numbred; but a good name indureth for euer. Eccles. 41. 13.

Moreouer, as these honours, fame and good report, are in themselues good, so they serue for good vses, as being notable meanes instituted and ordained of God, both to restraine vs from the committing of sin, because it impaireth our good name and reputation, and to stirre vs vp to all honest, good and vertuous actions, because they are not onely commanded by God, but commended also amongst men. And howsoeuer wee may not chiefly ayme at our owne honour in our obedience, but at Gods glory, yet subordinately and in an inferiour place, we may somewhat respect it. Seeing the Lord hath naturally ingrafted in vs a loue of our credit, and a desire to haue a good name among the vertuous, that it might as a bridle, curbe vs in from running on in sinne, and as a spur pricke vs forward in all vertuous actions. So the Apostle saith; Wilt thou be without feare of the power? doe well; so shalt thou haue prayse of the same. And the Apostle Peter affirmeth, that Gouernours are sent of God, for the punishment of euill doers, and for the prayse of them that doe well. And Paul exhorteth vs, that if there bee any thing of good report, if there be any vertue, or if there be any prayse, we should thinke of these things. Neither is there in truth a greater incouragement on the earth to vertuous and good actions, than the approbation and commendation of those who are godly, wise and iudicious; both because it cheareth the heart, and putteth strength to the bones; as also because being often deceiued through our owne selfe-loue, which maketh vs to ouer-weene our good parts and actions, and to thinke them excellent which are scarce indifferent; we dare not rest in our owne iudgement when wee doe well, because it doth so vsually abuse vs, and consequently through our timorousnes and doubting, we are weakened, and made more faint in doing well; but when generally those who are vertuous and iudicious do approoue and commend our actions and good parts, then these feares and doubts being removed, wee receiue notable incouragement hereby to proceed in our good courses, and vertuous actions. Rom. 13. 3. 1. Pet. 2. 14. Prou. 15. 30.

Lastly, from the examples of those who fearing God, haue been highly in his fauour, we may conclude that fame and vertue, honour and religion may well stand together. As of Abraham, the Father of the faithfull, who was greatly reuerenced and respected, euen among the Heathen Nations; Iosiph, not onely among the Israelites, but also among the Egyptians, and so likewise of Moses, Dauid, Iosias, Iehoshaphat, Esechias, and the rest of the godly Kings, with many others. And in the new Testament, we haue

1. Sam. 2.26.

Yea, our Sauiour Christ himself, vnto whom the holy Ghost giueth the same testimonie: from all which wee may conclude, that honour and estimation amongst men, are in themselues lawfull and good, for otherwise the Lord would neuer haue bestowed them vpon his owne deere seruants, neither would they haue retained them. As also that they are not onely good in their owne nature, and as they are the gifts and blessings of God, but euen in the vse of the faithfull, seeing we haue hereof so many precedents.

Luke 2.52.

Q. Sect. 5. That we must first and principally seeke honour from God.

But howsoeuer honours are good, yet not absolutely and immutably, seeing they are subject to be abused by mans corruption; and therefore whosoeuer would haue honours truly good vnto them, so as they may haue comfort in inioying them, they must carefully labour to haue a holy vse of them, and to this purpose to obserue many cautions. As first, they must seeke to haue these honours from those that are truly honourable, and to be praised of those who are prayse worthy; and principally because the Lord is the bestower of all true honours, they must seeke in the first place to be approued and praysed by him. And to this end they must labour to approue, not onely their outward actions, but also their hearts and secret affections vnto God, setting themselues alwayes in his presence, and performing all their actions as in his sight: and so walking before God in integritie and vprightnes of heart, they shall shew themselues to be such true Israelites as the Apostle describeth: He is a Iew which is one within, and the circumcision is of the heart, in the Spirit, and not in the letter, whose prayse is not of men but of God.

Rom. 2.29.

And not like those ambitious Iewes, who (as our Sauiour saith of them) loued the prayse of men, more than the prayse of God: and receiued honour one of another, and did not seeke the honour which commeth of God alone. Now wee cannot thus approoue our selues vnto God, vnlesse wee approoue our thoughts, words and workes vnto our owne consciences: for as the Apostle Iohn telleth vs, If our heart condemne vs, God is greater than our heart and knoweth all things. And therefore in the next place we must with the Apostle endeauour to haue alwayes a cleare conscience towardes God and towardes men: that so it may approue and giue a good testimony vnto vs. For what will it auaile vs to be commended of men, who are our fellow-malefactors, when as God, who is our Iudge, condemneth vs? What will it profit vs to haue them not only excusing, but commending and extolling vs, when as our own conscience, which is as good as a thousand witnesses, accuseth and giueth testimonie against vs? whereas on the other side, though men should defame vs, yet we might with the Apostle rejoyce in this, the testimonie of our conscience, that in simplicitie and godly pureneſſe, and not in fleshly wisdome, but by the grace of God, we haue had our conuersation in the world.

2. Cor. 1.12.

And thus hauing approued our selues vnto God and our owne consciences; wee must in the next place labour to bee approued vnto men: for this was also a part of Pauls exercise, to haue a cleere conscience euen before men. Howbeit wee are not thus to labour that wee may commend our selues vnto all, seeing this is often impossible, in respect of the contrarietie of mens iudgements; but next vnto God and our owne consciences, we are to endeauour that we may be approued and commended of the godly, vertuous, wise and iudicious: for these being indued with the Spirit of God, are best able to discerne the things of God, and most fit and competent Iudges of vertue and goodnesse, themselues being good and vertuous, and their testimonie also and approbation will bring vnto those that haue it most ioy and comfort, because it is substantiall and well grounded. As for the testimony of the wicked and vngodly, it is not to be desired if we haue it not, nor to be valued and esteemed if wee haue it. So Augustine saith, I desire not to be prayſed of euill liuers, I abhorre and deteſt it; it is rather a griefe than a pleaſure vnto me; but if I ſhould ſay that I deſire not to be prayſed of thoſe that liue well, I ſhould but diſſemble: if I ſhould ſay I doe deſire it, I feare leſt I ſhould be more greedy of vanitie than of ſolidities: what therefore ſhould I ſay? I neither fully will it, nor fully nill it: I doe not fully will it, leſt I ſhould be indangered by humane prayſes; neither doe I fully nill it, leſt they ſhould bee vngratefull to whom I preach. As therefore it is the nature of all men to desire prayse, so it is the propertie of those who are truly wise and vertuous to desire this prayse of those that are prayse-worthy; because wicked worldlings are readie to applaud and commend men when they do euill, and keepe them company in their vngodly courses: in respect whereof a man hath just cause to suspect himselfe, and to examine his actions, when impious men commend them. So the Heathen man hearing that he was praysed by such as he reputed euill, was iealous of himselfe; Haue I (said hee) done any euill at vnawares, that such commend me? And the Lacedemonian when as his King was by lewd persons highly commended, was readie to aske; Can any (saith he) be happy, and not be bitter and distastefull to wicked men? yea, our Sauiour Christ him-himselfe denounceth a woe against those of whom all men speake well, because euill men will not long be in loue and liking with the actions of the good: For as the wicked man is an abomination to the iust, so he that is vpright in his way, is an abomination to the wicked, and our Sauiour hath told vs, that the Disciple is not aboue his Master, nor the seruant aboue his Lord, &c. If therefore they haue called the Master of the house Beel-zebub, how much more them of his household?

But is it then vnlawfull to bee praysed of Worldlings? and are their commendations alwayes to be contemned and rejected? No assuredly, their good word rather than their euill is to be desired, and wee are as much as in vs lieth, to walke vnblameably before all men, and to be without reproofe. For euen the Apostle himselfe laboured in the declaration of the truth to approue himselfe, to euery mans conscience in the sight of God. And lest any man should limit this indefinite speech to the Church only, hee requireth also, that hee who is to be chosen to the office of a Bishop, should be well reported of, euen of them which are without, lest he should fall into rebuke, and into the snare of the Deuill: because as by our good liues wee should edifie our brethren, so also as much as in vs lieth, wee should helpe forward the conuersion of them that are not yet called. Whereas then we are required to neglect and contemne the good report of Worldlings, it is to be vnderstood respectiuely, in comparison of the approbation of God, our owne consciences, or the godly, when both cannot stand together. Neither must we in our actions mainly ayme at their prayses; but rather our care must be, to giue vnto them no iust cause of euill report; and then neither to bee much troubled if they defame vs, seeing our case is common with our Master, nor yet too much affected with their prayses, when they doe commend vs; but yet if continuing in well-doing and in an vpright course, pleasing both to God and good men, we may haue their good word, in respect that they through some common grace receiued, doe begin to like some morall vertues in vs, or doe loue our person by reason of some naturall parts which they affect, or in respect of common humanity, kindred, alliance or some benefit perceiued, we are to nourish rather than neglect it, not only for our owne sakes, who naturally desire to be well spoken of by all, but for theirs especially, in that hereby wee may helpe forward their conuersion, and bring them by degrees from the louing of our persons, to the liking and embracing of our religion and conuersation.

And so much for the persons from whom honour and good estimation is to be sought: the next thing to be obserued, is, that as wee are to seeke it from the good, so also for true vertues and good actions. For honour is the reward wherewith God crowneth vertue, and his good gifts and graces in his seruants, and therefore those that take it vpon them, being destitute of these, are but vsurpers who intrude vpon other mens right. As for example, those who desire to be honoured for their sinnes and vices, for bowsing and drinking, for rioting and wastefull spending, for quarrelling, fighting, reuenging wrongs and such like: which howsoeuer they may make men esteemed and well spoken of among wicked men, like vnto themselues, yet nothing maketh them more base and contemptible in the sight of God, and of all that are good and vertuous. Secondly, men vniustly arrogate this honour vnto themselues for vanities and things of no worth, neither doth so rich a reward as true honour belong vnto men for euery friuolous trifle. And thus did they who built the tower of Babell to get them a name. And Absolon hauing no vertues to eternize his memory, erected a Pillar and called it after his owne name, that hereby his fame might continue to posterity. And so the Psalmist obserueth; that the wicked imagining that their houses and habitations shall continue for euer, call their Lands by their owne names, that so when their liues end their fame may continue. And thus many among our selues erect goodly houses which they neuer inhabit, and stately tombes to lay in their rotten bodies, that by these meanes their honour may bee preserued, and their fame remayne in after ages. Lastly, they vniustly challenge honours who being destitute of all true good, doe put on a Vizard of vertue, and make shew of that goodnesse which they neuer so much as loued or desired; not caring at all to be vertuous and religious, but only counterfeit them hypocritically, that by seeming that they are not, they may obtaine that honour and prayse which they haue no hope of hauing, if they appeared in their owne likenesse. Wherein what do they else but play the Impostors and Deceiuers, challenging the pretious and true coine of honour and glory, for their false and counterfeit wares, worthy in this respect rather to stand vpon the pillory, that all men may take notice of their cosenage, and learne by their example to scorne their base shifts, than to bee aduanced into the seate of honour. If therefore wee would haue true honour, let vs labour to bee that wee seeme, and indeauour more to approoue our hearts vnto God, than our outward actions vnto men, otherwise our honour being but a shadow of a shadow, vaine in it selfe, and grounded vpon a vaine and false cause, is like but to haue a short raigne. For God abhorring hypocrisie, will in the end pull off the hypocrites Vizard, and shewing him in his owne naturall deformity, will expose him to the scorne and contempt of all men. And following the Apostles example, let vs desire to haue prayse attend vpon vertue and goodnesse, and not goe before it, and build it not on the sandy foundation of false shewes and deceitfull colours, if we meane to haue it of any continuance, but on truth, honestie, iustice, puritie and the workes of loue: whatsoeuer things (saith he) are true, whatsoeuer things are honest, whatsoeuer things are just, whatsoeuer things are pure, whatsoeuer things pertaine to loue, whatsoeuer things are of good report, if there be any vertue, or if there be any prayse, thinke on these things.

Phil. 4. 8.

§. Sect. 9. That we ought to affect such honours as are moderate and proportionable to our deserts.

Finally, as wee are to desire honour and prayse for that which is honest and prayse-worthy, so in respect of the measure they should be moderate, and in some proportion fitted to our vertues and good parts; for as it is impious to desire prayse, for that which is euill, so is it vnequall and vnjust, to affect great honours for small deserts; and proud ambition, to desire to bee preferred before those who far exceed vs in vertue and goodnesse. In which respect wee are carefully to take heed of selfe-loue, which makes vs to amplifie our owne good parts, and in comparison of them to extenuate other mens; and causeth vs to looke (as it were) thorow a truncke of a far vnequall bore, turning the small end to our Neighbours vertues, which sc nteth them to our sight, and maketh them appeare lesse and fewer than they are; and the great end to our own, whereby our sight is so inlarged that wee see all and more too. But aboue all things let vs take heed, though we be neuer so excellent, that we suffer and admit those prayses only which belong vnto men, not daring or presuming to encroach vpon Gods Titles and Royalties. In which respect Herod offended, when hee assumed vnto him the prayse due to his Creatour, and the Heathen Emperours, whose pride made them forget their mortality, and to aspire vnto diuine worship. And thus (as I take it) doth this flattering age offend, which giues vnto Princes and great Personages the highest and most transcendent titles of vertue and goodnesse, as most mighty, most excellent, most high, most gracious, most diuine and such like. When how soeuer they may bee excused, that they are not giuen them absolutely, but comparatiuely in respect of other men; or that onely thereby is signified, that they are very excellent in these things: yet herein these phrases and titles thus ascribed, admit of no excuse, in that they leaue none that are higher for God himselfe; and because men hereby in shew to sound of words, match themselues with him, which being at least in apparance of euill, Christians ought to auoide. For whereas it may bee alleaged, that Princes are said in the Scriptures to be Gods; to this I answere, that the name is attributed vnto them, not in respect of any thing in their persons, but onely in regard of their office and ministery; because they stand in the place of God, as his Vicegerents and Deputies, and therefore they haue his title, seeing they sustaine his person: in which sense also the Lord saith vnto Moses, that hee had made him Pharaoh God, that is, his owne Deputy and Ambassadour vnto him. Neither in this respect is this title giuen onely vnto great Princes, but is common with them vnto any inferiour Magistrates, as appeareth in other places. And therefore this title giuen vnto them in respect of their calling and office, excuseth not those, who giue vnto them Gods peculiar attributes, in respect of their persons; in which regard if any should giue the title of God vnto any mortall man, hee should commit horrible blasphemy and sacrilegious impietie.

Exod. 4. 16. & 7. 1.

Psal. 82. 6.

§. Sect. That honours ought not to be immoderately sought.

But as honours ought not to be sought vnmeasurably in respect of the quantitie; so neither immoderately, and ouer greedily in respect of our affection. In regard whereof wee should rather haue it pressed vpon vs, than snatch it with violence; and rather stay till it come voluntarily to attend vpon vertue, than to send for it in post haste; or to compell it by force to performe this dutie: for as it is not to be rejected when it proffereth its seruice, so it is not to be pressed hereunto, least we make it slauish and base, which in its owne nature is free and generous. To this purpose, Augustine admoneth vs, that wee should not wholly accept, nor wholly reject all that honour which is offered vnto vs; for hee that despiseth all honour and fame, for his good parts, and for that which hee hath well done, seemeth to abase, and not thankfully to acknowledge the gifts of God, which is not agreeable with Pietie; and on the other side; hee that embraceth all that is offered, doth not a little exceed the bounds of modestie. And as we are not to doe good actions purposely to this end, that wee may haue the prayse of men; for then wee shall lose the Hypocrites reward; but for loue of God and goodnesse, and to aduance his glory: rather affecting to do those things which deserue fame, than the obtayning of fame it selfe; because honour must bee the fruit and effect of well-doing, and not the chiefe motiue or finall cause; and (as one saith) It is good to be prayssd, but better to bee prayse-worthy. So on the other side when we haue done vertuously and to good ends, and haue due commendation attributed vnto vs, wee are not to neglect or despise it; for this were to shew no true humility, but contemptuous pride, and disdainfull arroganee; whereby men attribute so much to themselues, that they care not what others thinke of them. Yea, seeing honour is the reward wherewith God euen in this life crowneth vertue,

it is altogether as vnlawfull to reject his gift when hee proffereth it vnto vs, as ambitiously to desire it before it is offered. Which moderation if wee would obserue in our affection, it behoueth vs first, to obserue this golden meane in our iudgements: for as on the one side we are not basely to esteem of honor and a good name, lest we reiect it, when it is lawfully offered; so on the other side we are not to ouervalue it, esteeming it of greater worth and excellencie than Gods spirituall graces, or the glorie of his kingdome, or the gaining of this which is but imperfect and of momentanie continuance, weanes our hearts from that which is most absolute and eternall.

And if wee neither ouervalue it in our iudgements, nor too eagerly pursue it with our affections, then will it also follow, that wee will vse onely good meanes for the obtaining of it; for euen common reason will teach vs, not to hazard things which wee esteeme of such infinite value, for the obtaining of those which in comparison we doe but meanely respect. Whereas contrariwise when as wee ouerprise honours and preferments, and too much set our hearts vpon them; it is a strong temptation to moue vs, to the vse of wicked and vnlawfull meanes, for the compassing of them, when as those which are lawfull faile: as wee may see in the example of Cain, Abimelech, Absolon, Haman and many others. And thus ordinarily men offend who affect their owne praises by others dispraises, and grace themselues by the disgrace of their neighbours, treading vpon the necks of those, who are better than themselues, that they may serue as steps whereby they may rise into the state of honour. And so likewise they who labour to aduance themselues by Machiauellian policies, treacherie, falsehood, hypocrisie and deceit; not caring how dishonest the meanes bee, nor how foule the way, so they may at their iourneys end come to the palace of honour, and attaine vnto the glory of the world. But among many other, I cannot omit that vsuall course of bribing, so much practised in these dayes; whereby men blush not to aspire vnto all preferments, although it were so odious euen to the very Heathens, who had nothing but the light of nature to guide them, that they made lawes against this ambition, condemning him who aspired by gifts to honours and preferments, in an hundred pieces of gold, and with perpetuall infamie and disgrace. And yet among vs who professe Christianitie, no way so commonly leadeth to the palace of honour as this sliding. Seeing then if wee would haue our honours lawfull, so as we may haue true comfort in enioying them, wee must auoid all these wicked courses, and vse onely those meanes which are lawfull and honest for the procuring of them.

Furthermore, if wee would haue our honours good and lawfull vnto vs, wee must not in our courses and actions propound them as our maine and principall ends, but alwayes make them inferiour and subordinate to the glorie of God, seeing that before vs as our chiefe and last end, in all our words and actions, and onely desiring our owne fame and reputation, as it doth like an humble handmaid attend vpon it. And this end our Sauiour propoundeth, willing vs, to let our lights shine before men, that they seeing our good workes may glorifie our Father which is in Heauen: And his holy Apostle chargeth vs, that whether we eate or drinke, or whatsoeuer we doe, that all bee referred to the glorie of God. Now this wee doe, when as finding our actions tending to the aduancement of Gods glory, wee resolutely goe forward in them, although that they tend to our discredit and disgrace among men; not caring who speake euill of vs, so that wee be assured that God approueth vs; according to the example of the Apostle, who constantly went forward in his Christian course, by honour and dishonour, euill report and good report. And when as holding on in this way, wee are dishonoured among men, yet shall wee haue no want of honour, seeing the Lord himselfe will be our glory, and lift vp our heads, when as men seeke to tread vs vnderfoot, as the Prophet Dauid speaketh. Whereas on the other side, if wee chiefly aime at our owne praise, wee shall haue the hypocrites reward; if wee affect popularitie, and seeke in the first place to please men, that so we may be had in honour and esteeme, we shall haue little comfort by it, seeing wee plainely shew hereby, that we are not the seruants of Iesus Christ; if wee loue the praise of men, more than the praise of God; and thus immoderately seeke the praise one of another, we are destitute of true faith, as our Sauiour telleth vs.

Moreouer if we would haue our honours good and lawfull, we must not let them, when they are ascribed vnto vs, rest with vs; but returne them wholly vnto the Lord, from whom we haue receiued whatsoeuer is commendable, and praise-worthy in vs. And as bright shining and golden vessels, doe not retaine the beames of the Sunne which they receiue, but returne them backe, and double them by reflection, so hauing from the Sun of righteousnes these bright beames of his grace and vertue, not onely to warme our hearts, but also to shine in our words and actions, wee are to reflect them backe againe with all praise due vnto them, seeing from him alone wee haue receiued them. For euery good and perfect gift commeth from him; and what haue wee that wee haue not re- receiued, from this fountaine of all goodnesse? And as the riuers receiuing their fulnesse from the Ocean, pay their tribute by returning their streames vnto it backe againe, which homage if they should denie to yeeld, their swelling waters would beare downe their owne banks, and drowne the countries: so we receiuing from the infinite Ocean of all goodnesse, whatsoeuer fulnesse wee haue of grace and vertue, and the praises which are due vnto them, are by humble acknowledgement and thanksgiuing, to returne vnto him the whole honour of them; which tribute if we refuse to pay, and shew our rebellion against our great Lord, by incroching vpon his right, thinking to grow rich by robbing of him, and keeping all to our owne vse; these gifts thus retained, will make vs but to swell with pride, and breaking downe the bankes of modestie and humilitie, will not onely empte vs of all grace and goodnesse, but make all our good parts wee haue, hurtfull and pernicious vnto all that are about vs. And therefore let vs, when God giueth vs his graces, and the honour due vnto them, crie out with the people of God: Psal.115.1. Not vnto vs O Lord, not vnto vs, but vnto thy name giue the glorie, for thy louing mercie, and for thy truthes sake. Let vs when we are fruitfull in the workes of pietie and righteousnesse, confesse with the Apostle, that it is not we, 1. Cor.15.10. but the grace of God that dwelleth in vs; and when wee haue these crownes of honour bestowed on vs for our vertues and good parts; let vs with the foure and twentie Elders, cast them downe at Gods feete, before his throne, acknowledging him alone worthy of all honour, glory and power, because he is the author and creator of all goodnesse; and with the blessed Angels and Saints, crie out aloud saying; Praise Apoc.4.10.11. and glory, and wisdome and thanks, and Apoc.7.12. honour and power, and might, be vnto our God for euermore, Amen. For the fuller our mouthes are of Gods praises, and our hearts of humilitie and thankfulnes, the more will the Lord inrich vs with his graces, and powre into minds and soules, the precious oile of vertue and all goodnesse, when the wind of pride and vaine glory is quite expelled.

Q. Self. 14. We must employ our honours vnto good vses.

Lastly, that our honours and good name may be vnto vs truely good and lawfull, we must, when wee haue them, imploy them to good vses, and make them serue not onely for the aduancement of Gods glory, of which I haue already spoken, but also to the good and saluation, both of our neighbours and our selues. As namely, wee ought to vse all the loue, authoritie and credit which we haue with men, as cords to pull them backe in the headlong course of sinne, and as allurements to intice them to follow our example, in those vertues & good parts, for which wee are so commendable. And for our selues, when we consider that God by furnishing vs with his gifts and graces, hath made vs not onely esteemable in his owne sight, but also honourable among men; let this rich reward make vs to yeeld vnto God all thankfulnesse and obedience: let this our credit and reputation make vs carefull in auoiding all sinne, whereby our honour will bee blemished and impeached; and let this garland of earthly honour serue to incourage vs, more cheerefully to runne on in our Christian race, that so also wee may obtaine that precious and heauenly crowne of euerlasting glory.

And thus haue I set downe the cautions which are required vnto lawfull honours, which being obserued, they are good and warrantable; and therefore to bee moderatly desired if wee haue them not, and duly esteemed if wee haue them. Neither is it to be esteemed true humility, but stupiditie and senselesnesse, not to bee affected with the sweet odour of a good name. And howsoeuer ambition, vaine glorie, and worldly and carnall honours, are to be contemned of all Christians, as wee shall afterwards shew, yet these lawfull honours, fame and reputation, wherein the former conditions are obserued, both in compassing and vsing them, may, yea ought to bee desired and esteemed, seeing they tend to Gods glory, the good of our brethren, and the furthering of our owne saluation. For when as wee shine gloriously in the eyes of men, in the light of a godly life, then is our heauenly Father glorified, as our Sauiour telleth vs; both because he is the author and fountaine of all these graces and good gifts, and our Lord and Master, vnder whose rule and gouernment we thus profit in vertue and goodnesse: and also because whatsoeuer praise we haue of men, wee thankfully returne it vnto him. Euen as contrariwise when as we dishonour our selues by our sinnes, wee also cause the name of the Lord to be blasphemed and euill spoken of by those who are strangers to his grace. And therefore though there were no other reason moouing vs to seeke this honour and good report, yet this were sufficient, that by it our heauenly father is also glorified: though wee did not respect our fame, for our owne sakes, yet for Gods sake wee must respect it, because our discredit doth also tend to his dishonour.

So also wee are to desire and esteeme this lawfull honour for our neighbours good; first, because performing a duetie inioyned them by God, they are also made partakers of his promises and rewards. For the Lord requireth in the fifth Commandement, that we should honour them who are superiour vnto vnto vs in gifts, and that wee should acknowledge and giue due respect to his graces wheresoeuer we finde them; and in the ninth Commandement, that we should be carefull in preserving the fame and reputation of our neighbours; the Apostle also chargeth vs, that in giuing honour, we striue to goe before one another; and that wee feare God, honour all men, loue brotherlie loue, feare God and honour the King. And to his Commandements the Lord hath added the promise of long life, as a type of life euerlasting, and temporall Canaan, as a pledge of our heauenly inheritance, of which it is a most manifest signe that we are heires, when as wee loue, reuerence and respect the children of God, for those gifts and graces which wee see shining in them; as appeareth in the fifteenth Psalme, where it is made a marke of one that is to inherit Gods Kingdome, to contemne a vile person for a desperate sinner, and to honour them that feare the Lord. And therefore when our neighbours doe thus respect and reuerence vs, for our vertues and good parts, wee are exceedingly to reioyce, not onely in respect of God, because his will is done on earth, or our selues, because wee are adorned with this crowne of vertue, but also in regard of our neighbours, from whom we haue this honour, because they performe that dutie which God requireth of them, and thereby manifest that they shall be partakers of his promises, and heires of eternall life.

Q. Self. That honourable titles are to be desired for Gods glory.

Secondly, wee are to desire this honour and good estimation for our neighbours sake, that he may thereby be edified, when as he not onely seeth our good example, but also liketh and approueth it; for it is a notable degree to the imbracing of goodnesse in a man selfe, when he beginneth to honour and reuerence it in another. Besides, there is alwayes with this honour and respect, great authoritie ioyned in the partie who is thus honoured, ouer him who yeeldeth it vnto him, which is not forced, but willing and voluntary; and this is very effectuall and powerfull to draw men vnto all good and religious courses, because it procureth audience & respect vnto their words & perswasions. And therefore we ought carefully to maintaine our honor, that so we may also profite our authoritie, for the good and edification of our brethren; in which respect, the Apostle chargeth Timothy and Titus to preserue their credit from contempt, that so hauing more authority with the people, their ministerie might bee more effectuall to perswade them to imbrace the truth, and follow good and vertuous courses. Whereas contrariwise when a mans credit is impeached, and his good name blemished, he looseth all authoritie and meanes of doing good either by perswading to that which God requireth, or in dissuading from sin; seeing no man is willing to receiue his physicke, of whom the fame goeth, that he hath long had the same disease, and cannot cure himselfe.

Lastly, as we are to preserue our good name and credit for the edification of our brethren; so also to preserue them from scandall; least taking offence at our liues, in regard of the ill rumours they heare of vs, they also grow to dislike our profession and religion. The consideration whereof should moue all Christians, to an earnest care of preserving their good name and reputation, not onely by auoiding sinne, but also all appearances of euill; because in this case supposed euils, rumours and iealousies doe as much offend our brethren, casting downe the weake, grieuing the strong, and hardning those who are not called, as those which are truely and really committed. And thus it appeareth that men ought to haue great care of our fame and reputation, in regard that it is a notable meanes of our neighbours good. To which purpose one saith, that a good life is necessarie vnto vs, and a good name necessary vnto our brethren: and as wee must labour to haue a good conscience before God, so also to haue a good report among men for our neighbours sake. And therefore cruell and vnsupportable is their conclusion, who affirme that they will approue their actions to God and their owne consciences, and not at all care what men speake or thinke of them, seeing the wounds which they suffer in their reputation, without our warding them off, do through their name pierce into the consciences of their neighbour, and oftentimes wound their soules to the very death, for which Christ Iesus shed his precious blood.

And as wee ought to seeke his lawfull honour and good report, in regard of God and our neighbours, so also in respect of our selues: neither is it enough that we haue the shining brightnesse of a good conscience, vnlesse wee haue also the sweet odour of a good name; because by this sweet perfume, not onely the standers by are refreshed, but also our owne spirits reuiued, and our hearts cheared, so as we may with more comfort and courage hold on and proceed in our good course. For as not onely the sight or remembrance of the crowne or prize, but also the applause of the standers by refresheth the spirits, and giueth strength to the limmes of those who runne in an earthly race; so also in the running of our spirituall race, not onely the remembrance of the crowne of glory, which they that runne shall obtaine, but also the commendation of the godly and faithfull doth exceedingly reuiue and strengthen vs, to continue constant in our course vnto the end. And therefore sore considering how weake and faint we are, into much as we are daily ready in our selues to slacken our pace, stand still, or turne backe againe: it behoueth vs to desire, and much to esteeme this and all other good incouragements and comforts, whereby wee may be strengthened and holped forward in running the Christian race of righteousnesse.

p. Sect. 20. That we are bound by Gods Commandement to preserue our honour and good name.

Againe, wee are bound by the Commandements of God to do all that we lawfully can to obtaine a good name, and to preserue our honest and reputation among men. For whereas we are commanded to honor our parents, vnder whom are vnderstood all superiours, whether in the gouernment and authority or in Gods graces, gifts and vertues, we are also inioyned to haue the like care of our own credit and honour, and here is this point of right in our selues granted, that the beginning of euils, and the long way to all kinds of vices which vse to ensue is, when as the Apostle charged Timothy, that he should not despise Gods gift bestowed on him. And also whereas in the ninth Commandement God requireth that we should neither hurt nor be wanting to the sauing and good report of our neighbours, it is also commanded that we be diligent and full to keepe our sincere and vnblameable conuersation without blame or imputation of euil, as we may testifie the vprightnesse of our consciences before God and men, and our owne soules with them: for we are guiltie of the breach of the sixth Commandement, who is wanting vnto himselfe, in the ground of preserving his owne life and of the second table who doth not vse all good meanes to preserue his owne christian life to the vse of the fifth and sixth Commandements, who hath not a lawfull and laudable care of preserving his owne honour and reputation. And hereof it is, that because neglect of our fame is a sinne, and sinne is Satans snare, wherewith he catcheth and entangleth vs, therefore the Apostle saith, that a Bishop must be well reported of, [illegible] and haue a good name, lest he fall into reproch and the snare of the deuill. And thus haue I the rest both where is required a lawfull Remedy, and the reasons which should moue vs to desire and esteeme it, to the end that those reasons which shall hereafter be brought to perswade vs to the contempt and shew the vanitie of worldly and earthly blessings, may not make vs to neglect the good with the bad, or despise that which God would haue vs to value and desire, for want of due distinction.

CHAP. III.

Of riches, and that they are good in themselues, and indifferent in respect of their vse.

IN the next place we are to speake of riches, which also are in their owne nature good, as being the creatures of God, whose goodnesse was approued by his owne testimonie both when they were only good in the state of innocencie, but euen after the fall, seeing in the Scriptures they are said to bee the gifts of God: for so it is said, that God gaue Dauid his wiues; and the Lord professeth, that he gaue vnto the Israelites their cities, and vines and oyles, and multiplied their siluer and gold: yea they are not only said to be gifts, but benefits and rewards, which God promiseth to bestow vpon them that serue him, as we may see at large in the booke of Deuteronomie; and threatneth it as a punishment of sinne to deprive them of their benefits: and such a Psalmist saith, that riches and wealth shall be in his house that feareth the Lord. And that which is yet more, they are called the blessings of God: for the Wise man saith, that the blessing of the Lord maketh rich, and he doth adde no sorrow with it: and thus it is said in the Scriptures by a vsuall phrase, that God blessed them whom he enriched, and so they waxed rich. And as the Lord bestoweth riches as his gifts, benefits and blessings, so godly riches acquired in that they should be offered vnto him againe in sacrifices and oblations, and vouchsafed vnto them this honour, to haue his Tabernacle and Temple made and aduanced with them. Finally, the Lord hath bestowed them vpon many of his good seruants, and made them to be vnto them true benefits and blessings, as he did Abraham the father of the faithfull, Isaack, Iacob, Iob and many others, who did not only possesse these gifts of God, but also by the holy vse of them, glorified him, and grew the better inabled to all good and Christian duties.

But howsoeuer these riches are good in their owne nature, and as they proceed from God the fountaine of all goodnesse, yet they are not absolutely and immutably good, but subiect to alter their nature according to their seuerall vses, and to be corrupted and abused by mans sinne, who hath the possession: and therefore howsoeuer they are good, yet in respect of the degree of their goodnesse they are but slow and meane things, and of little worth and estimation, if they be compared with Gods spirituall graces, or the eternall ioyes of his kingdome. For the wise man the Apostle Paul accounted these creatures of God good good and profitable helpes, for the performance of the workes of mercie; yet comparing them with the spirituall riches of Christ and all his benefits, hee esteemed them no better than drosse and dung, yea losse in respect of the other. And this may further appeare in that the Lord doth appropriate his spirituall graces as his chiefe iewels vnto his owne children and seruants; whereas he giueth riches as common gifts both to the good and bad, and more commonly and in greater measure to wicked worldlings, than to those who truely feare him. And with this argument one concludeth, that riches are not absolutely good, or of any excellent nature: For (saith he) if gold had beene good absolutely, without question Christ would haue giuen it to his Disciples, vpon whom he bestowed gifts of vnspeakeable value; but he was so farre from giuing it them, that he did prohibite them to haue it: and therefore the Apostle Peter was not only not ashamed of his pouerty, but also seemeth to glory in it, saying, Siluer and gold haue I none. So another saith, that riches are giuen by God both to the good and euill, lest they should be thought euill, or a good of any excellent nature. If (saith he) gold and siluer were giuen only to the good, they might rightly be thought to be of some eminent goodnesse: and if they were only hurtfull to the euill, pouerty might seeme a great punishment. And if they were only hurtfull to the good, pouerty would seeme blessednesse. But now that wee may know that gold may lawfully be possessed, the good haue it, and that it may appeare that it is not the cause of their goodnesse, the wicked also enioy it, &c. and therefore God hath distributed gold and siluer vnto men, as being good in their owne nature, although they be no chiefe nor great good, but in their meane degree and order, set forth the praise of God the Creator of the world.

Yea so farre are they from any absolute, eminent and perfect degree of goodnesse, that they are to vs but of an indifferent nature, good to the good, who vse them well, and euill to the euill, who abuse them vnto euill, making no man that hath them by their owne vertue and power either the better or the worse, but are good seruants where a good master ruleth them, and wicked rulers vnto an abiect and base master. To this purpose the Son of Syrach saith, that the principall things for the whole vse of mans life, are water, fire, iron, salt, meale, wheat, honey, milke, the blood of the grape, oyle and clothing. And all these things are for good to the godly, but to the sinner they are turned into euill. Of whom Ambrose speaketh thus more plainly (saith he) To haue gold and siluer, is not euill, they are good, but not to all: for they are euill to the euill, and good to the good, not because they doe make them good, but because finding them good, they communicate with them in their goodnes. They are not therefore absolutely good (like Gods spirituall graces) for then they would make vs good, but of a meane and indifferent nature, good in their owne nature, but much corrupted through the fall of Adam.

Aurum & argentum habere vtile est & hos dico bonum esse, sed si bene vsus fuerit, &c. Aug. Serm. 12. tom. 9. col. 57.

Neuertheleſſe, to those who are raised by Christ and are renued and regenerate by his Spirit, they are truely good, both as they are incouragements to stirre them vp to thankefulnesse and obedience, and meanes and instruments of performing that good to which they are incouragements: and finally, as they are vnto them pledges of Gods loue, and earnest pennies of their saluation. For the faithfull receiuing these gifts and blessings from God, and hauing nothing to returne vnto God in lieu of all his benefits, do take vp that wholsome cup of thankesgiuing, and doe praise the name of the Lord, and labour to expresse their thankfulnesse in all holy obedience to his will, being incouraged with these rewards, the which in our estimate iudging according to sense, and too much respecting things present, are precious and of great worth. For howsoeuer in truth these earthly things being compared with Christ and his spirituall and heauenly graces, are as the Apostle reputeth them no better than dung, yet in regard of our weaknesse, and too much loue of these earthly things, wee are more incouraged with them to doe God seruice than with better gifts, and our minds already inclinable to goodnesse, being manured with this earthly dung, become more fruitfull in obedience: as the old wilie Serpent cunningly obserued; Doth Iob (saith he) serue God for nought? hast thou not made an hedge about him, and about his house? and about all he hath on euery side? thou hast blessed the worke of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land.

Q. Sect. 4. Riches are truly good to the regenerate who haue a right vse of them.

Iob 1. 9. 10.

And as they incourage Gods seruants to doe good, so are they vnto them instruments of well doing, and helpes and meanes, whereby they are the better enabled to accomplish their godly and Christian desires. To which purpose one saith, that riches, power and strength hauing in themselues no true felicitie, are the instruments of vertue to those that vse them well; and therefore it is a wretched man that abuseth them; like vnto him who taking into his hand a sword to fight against his enemies, doth turne the point thereof against himselfe for his owne destruction. But especially we are hereby inabled to performe the workes of mercie and of Christian liberalitie, in helping the distressed and relieuing the poore; in which bountie

Q. Sect. 5. Riches are the instruments and meanes of well doing. Basil. de Iniud. Homi. 11.

bountie and beneficence we more resemble our Creator, than in almost any other vertue. And howsoeuer vertue and true godlinesse doth not consist chiefely in the outward fact, neither are any excluded from it through the want of externall things: for a man is to esteemed bountifull who hath a bountifull heart, and is esteemed of God a liberall benefactor to the poore, who hath a large minde and a ready hand to giue, though it be out of smal ability (as appeareth by the example of the poore widow casting in her two mites, and in Christs promise of reward to him that should giue but a cup of cold water to any of his disciples) yet herein rich men haue a priuiledge aboue others, in that they haue meanes to expresse and shew their bountie, and to giue a visible testimonie of their inuisible vertue, in actuall relieuing of the poore, whereby they outwardly receiue much good, and the giuers inwardly much comfort. And thus the Apostle would haue rich men charged aboue others, to do good, and to be rich in good workes, and ready to distribute and communicate, laying vp store for themselues a good foundation against the time to come, that they may obtaine eternall life. And our Sauiour Christ willeth them, to make vnto them friends with the riches of iniquity, that when they should want, they might bee receiued into euerlasting habitations. To this purpose one saith, that gold is reputed good, not because it maketh vs good, but because it enableth vs to doe good. Neither is it bee doubted (saith another) but that a wise man hath more matter and larger scope of shewing and laying open his minde in riches than in pouertie; for whereas the chiefe vertue to bee shewed in this, is to beare it with patience and not to sinke vnder the burthen; in the rich estate he hath a large field wherein hee may shew his temperance, liberalitie, diligence, disposition and magnificence. A wise man will not despise himselfe, though he bee of a dwarfish stature, but yet he would rather chuse to be of a manly and tall pitch; hee will shew the power of his wisdome in a weakish body, or hauing but one eye, but yet he would rather haue a body strong and perfect, and yet so, as knowing that he hath a stronger thing within him; hee can beare with sicknesse, but hee wisheth health. For there are some things which although they bee but small in comparison of the chiefe parts, so that they may be taken away without the ruine of the principall good, which notwithstanding adde some thing to the continuall ioy that springeth out of vertue. And thus riches doe affect him and make him cheerefull, as a prosperous wind doth him that saileth, and as a faire day and a sunnie hancke in the cold of winter. Let therefore no man altogether reiect riches, because others abuse them vnto sinne, seeing the fault is not in riches themselues, but in those who doe not know how to vse them: for as they are hinderances to wicked men, so they are furtherances to the good, whereby they are set forward in the course of vertue. Finally, these riches are to those that vse them well, not only good in themselues, but also pledges of Gods loue, and of our eternall inheritance in his kingdome; for they who haue beene faithfull in these small things, shall be made rulers of much; they who haue well vsed these earthly talents, they shall enter into their masters heauenly ioyes, as our Sauiour teacheth vs. And thus were the holy Patriarchs by the possession of earthly riches assured, as by types and pledges, of the eternall treasures in Gods kingdome, by long life, of life euerlasting; by Manna in the wildernesse, of that heauenly food which neuer perisheth; and by the possession of the earthly Canaan, that they should for euer remaine in the spirituall Sion, and heauenly Ierusalem. And therefore Dauid concludeth, that because God had bestowed on him the blessings of this life, he would without question continue vnto him his loue, and make him to dwell with him for euer in his heauenly habitation.

And thus it appeareth that riches are the good blessings of God, to those that are good, and haue also a good vse of them. The which point may seeme to neede little proofe, or enforcing in this couetous age, wherein the most men esteeme riches their chiefest good, and seeke more earnestly after them, than the glory of God, or the saluation of their owne soules. But yet because Satan is ready to bring vs from one extreame to another; and as he doth vse all alluring inticements, to cause worldlings to fix their hearts vpon them; so when hee hath to deale with a weake Christian, whose affections are weaned from the world, hee contrariwise perswadeth him to hate these gifts of God, and vtterly to reiect them, as being in themselues vnlawfull to bee possessed. And finally, because there haue beene some so farre deluded with these tentations, drawing them to this extreame, that they haue not onely condemned the vse of riches, and affected voluntarie pouertie, but also haue perswaded others to doe the like: as among the Heathens Crates a Philosopher at Thebes, a man of great riches, who when he went to study Philosophie at Athens, cast a great treasure of gold into the sea, saying that hee would destroy it, lest it should destroy him; whose practice [illegible] approueth, who also being possessed with this conceit, runneth much on this string, abasing riches, and magnifying pouertie. And in our times diuers orders among the Papists as the begging Friars, the Heremites, and Anchorists doe religiously abstaine from the vse of riches, and professe voluntary pouertie: It shall not therefore be amisse to adde some thing more concerning this point, that those who maintayne this errour may bee conuinced, and the weake conscience confirmed in the lawfull vse of these gifts of God.

Let this then be the position, that Riches are not to be condemned and rejected, but to be vsed of them that haue them to the glory of the giuer, the benefit of Gods Church, and the furthering of the owners in all Christian and honest duties. And this appeareth, because they are the gifts and blessings of God, which cannot be contemned and cast away, without contempt to his Majestie who bestowed them, vnlesse it be in some cases in which himselfe requireth it. Againe, they are (as I haue shewed) the instruments of doing good, especially of Christian beneficence, and therefore hauing those meanes granted vnto vs by God, wee are not contemptuously to reject them, but to vse these talents to the glory of our great Lord and Master who hath intrusted them to our vse. So our Sauiour Christ doth not bid vs to cast them away, but to make vs friends of them, by liberall bestowing them to charitable vses, that so we may be receiued into euerlasting habitations. And the Apostle Paul doth not condemne the possession of riches, but would haue rich men dissuaded from their abuse, and perswaded to a right vse of them. Yea contrariwise the Holy Ghost teacheth vs to pray against pouerty, as being in itselfe so farre from a state of perfection, that it is euill, and both a cause and fruit of sin: so the wise Agur prayeth, Giue me not (saith he) pouertie, least I be poore, and steale, and take the Name of my God in vaine. And so farre is he from enjoyning this wilfull pouertie, that he commandeth vs to labour and take paines in our lawfull callings that wee may haue sufficient, not onely to relieue our owne wants, but also that wee may bee able to relieue the necessities of other men.

But they obiect, that our Sauiour Christ and his Apostle calleth riches the mammon of iniquitie, thornes, which choke the good seed of the Word, and snares to intangle and drowne vs in perdition. To which I answer, that our Sauiour in calling them so, aymeth not at riches as they are in their own nature, the gifts and blessings of God, nor as they are possessed and vsed by the faithful to good purposes; but as they are abused by wicked Worldlings vnto sinne, either by their vnlawfull getting of them, or as in their possession they are puffed vp with pride, or trust in them more than in God himselfe; or finally as they commonly abuse them, as their instruments, to accomplish and bring to passe their wicked designes. And to this purpose one saith, that there is neither holinesse in pouerty nor fault in riches; but as luxuriousnesse infameth and discrediteth wealth, so holinesse commendeth pouertie. And elsewhere hee saith, that riches are very good to them that know how to vse them, but to him that knoweth it not, they do indeed become euil. He hath distributed and giuen to the poore, (saith the Psalmist) his righteousnesse remayneth for euer. What therefore is better than of thy riches to giue to the poore, by which God becommeth thy debter, in a certaine kind of godly vsury? It is not therefore riches themselues, but their sinfull abuse, which Christ condemneth of iniquitie and euill; neither doe they make a man better or worse, but as they are vsed. For as one saith, There are some rich whose wealth doth not lift them vp in pride, but exalt them by the workes of mercie; and there are some who abounding in worldly wealth, do not seek after the true riches which are of God; neither yet are in loue with their eternall Country, because they thinke it sufficient for them to bee supported with these temporall things. And therefore it is not wealth that is in fault, but the corrupt affection. For all things that God created are good; but hee that abuseth his goods, behaueth himselfe like the Glutton, who through greedinesse killeth himselfe with that food, wherewith his life should be preserued. Poore Lazarus attained vnto euerlasting rest; and the rich Glutton was tormented, but yet it was rich Abraham which did hold poore Lazarus in his bosome, &c. Againe, there are others who are destitute of earthly riches, and yet are puffed vp in pride in their owne conceit: these men wealth doth not lift aloft to make ostentation of their power, and yet the wickednesse of their disposition doth place them in the number of reprobate rich men. Whomsoeuer therefore the loue of life eternall doth not humble, the Scripture accounteth him in the number of the wicked rich, because when God shall come to iudgement there will bee no difference, whether wee are puffed vp with our goods, or with our dispositions and affections. But being well vsed they cease to be in respect of our vse of this indifferent nature, and become truly good vnto vs. For as the Sonne of Syrach saith, Riches are good vnto him, that hath no sinne in his conscience, and pouertie is euill in the mouth of the vngodly. And the Heathen man could say, that howsoeuer riches are blinde if they haue not the eye of prudence to illuminate them, yet they see acutely when they follow wisedome.

Secondly, they obiect that a Christian man is to follow the example of Christs Disciples who forsooke al, and followed Christ. I answere, that the Apostles were said to haue left all, first in regard of their estimation, when in comparison of Christ and his be-benefits they lightly esteemed them, and (as the Apostle Paul professeth) reputed them no better than dung. Secondly, in regard of their hearts and affections, when as they did not adhere vnto them as before time, but contemned them as base in respect of Gods spirituall graces, and heauenly treasures. Thirdly, in respect of their disposition, resolution, and readines to leaue all, rather than they would deny Christ and the profession of the Gospell. In which respects our Sauiour likewise requireth that wee should forsake, yea, hate our father, mother, wife, and children, yea, that wee should deny our selues, and hate our owne liues. Not that hee would haue vs to do thus absolutely, for that were to sin against Gods Commandements, but comparatiuely rather than wee should deny Christ and the profession of his Gospel, when both the loue of these earthly things and our loue towards them, will not stand together. And in the same sense our Sauiour requireth that we should forsake our riches: for the Apostles themselues who are said to haue forsaken all, did notwithstanding after this retaine their goods in their possession; howsoeuer in regard of their extraordinary calling whereby they were tied to goe out of their Countrey ouer all the World to preach the Gospell, they had not the daily vse and comfort of them. For after that Leui is said to haue left all, and to haue followed Christ; in the next words hee is also said, to haue made Christ, and many with him, a great Feast at his owne house, the which he could not haue done, if he had forsaken all, in respect of right and possession, but onely in the former respects. And Peter also who saith, that he had forsaken all, retained still his house at Capernaum, with other necessaries and prouision, as were fit to giue vnto Christ intertainment. And so likewise, hee had his nets and boats, and other necessaries for his fishing, euen after the resurrection of Christ, as Iohn recordeth. And therefore of necessitie, their leauing and forsaking of all, must be vnderstood, not absolutely and actually, but comparatiuely in respect of their estimation, affection and resolution of putting it in practice, when as they should be called thereunto of God. In which regard, wee also are bound to forsake all, not only in disposition but in act; first, in case of Christian apologie and profession of Gods true Religion, when wee are by persecutors put to our choice, either to leaue our riches, or to leaue Christ and his Truth. In which respect also we are to leaue our liues, as our Sauiour himselfe in many places requireth. Secondly, when it concerneth the generall good of the Church; for the common and publike good is to be preferred before our owne priuate and particular. And lastly, when as in time of grieuous persecution, the necessitie of many of our brethren is great, and cannot be supplyed by any other meanes, than by selling away of our possessions, that the money may be imployed to the common vse, as was the case of the primitiue Church in the Apostle times.

Fourthly, they obiect the saying of our Sauiour Christ to the young man: If thou wilt be perfect, goe sell that thou hast, and giue it to the poore, &c. I answer, that this was but a particular trial which our Sauiour tooke of this young Iusticiarie, who bragged that he had obserued and kept the whole Law of God; whereby our Sauiour shewed him how farre he was off from that perfection of righteousnesse which God therein requireth in that hee had not profited thus far, as to preferre God in his loue and affection before his riches, but would rather leaue Christ, than leaue them, if he must needs forsake one of both: That so being admonished of his owne imperfections and wants, hee might flee out of himselfe, and abandoning his owne righteousnesse, he might rest himselfe wholly vpon Christ and his righteousnesse, for his iustification and saluation. Finally, they obiect the saying of our Sauiour, that it is easier for a Camell to go through the eye of an Needle than for a rich man to be saued. But the answere is easie; for our Sauiour speaketh not of the possession of riches, but of their abuse, when as rich men men trust more in them, than in God. For so hee expounded himselfe vnto his Disciples; Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches, to enter into the Kingdome of God!

CHAP. IV.

Of the manifold cautions and conditions which are required to the right and lawfull vse of riches.

AND thus haue I shewed that riches in themselues are not to bee reiected and contemned, as being the gifts and blessings of God, which being well vsed, may be helpes and furtherances vnto the performance of many Christian duties. In the next place we are to consider of those manifold cautions and conditions which are required vnto this lawfull vse, whereby they are made truly good vnto vs; and these are of three sorts: for either they respect the acquisition and getting of riches, or their possession, or finally their administration, bestowing, and imployment. And first, in respect of their acquisition and getting, it is required that it be Christian, iust and honest. In which regard wee must not who professe by our Religion, that wee haue better hopes, giue our selues vp wholly to the scraping and raking of wealth together, ther, suffering our thoughes, our words and actions to be altogether spent about this subiect, as being the mayne end at which wee ayme. But considering that they are not good absolutely, nor in any high degree of excellencie and perfection, but of a meane and indifferent nature; wee must giue them their due place, and neither in our iudgement esteeme them, nor in our affection loue them, nor in our practice seeke them aboue their deserts, or before Gods spirituall graces and heauenly excellencies. But as wee are in our iudgements, when they come in comparison with these, to despise and contemne them, and in our affections to loath them, esteeming them no better than drosse and dung, in respect of Christ and his benefits; so neither are we in our acquisition and seeking of them, to giue vnto them the first place, but according as our Sauiour commandeth, wee must first seeke the Kingdome of God and his righteousnesse, & then without any great care of our owne, God will also minister these things vnto vs. And if this be not obserued, riches which are in their owne nature good, do degenerate and become euill: for as a slaue is of good vse whilest hee keepeth his owne place, and imployeth himselfe about his owne businesse, but becommeth intolerable, when hee presumeth to seate himselfe aboue the King, and taketh vpon him to rule the Common-wealth: and as the seruant is to be well esteemed of his Master, whilest in all humilitie he doth his dutie, but becommeth odious, when hee takes vpon him, not onely to rule him and the whole house, but as a riuall wooeth his Mistresse, and withdraweth her heart and affection from her husband: so riches are good, whilest they hold the inferiour places of slaues and vnderlings, and be at the Owners command, to performe all good duties: but when they presume to seat themselues in the Royall Throne of God, the heart of man, which hee hath appropriated to his owne vse, if they take vpon them to rule their Owners, and to make them to become their Drudges: if being in comparison, of a base and contemptible condition, they exalt themselues in our estimation aboue Heauen and heauenly things; and begin to woo our hearts from God, and our husband Iesus Christ; then they degenerating from their owne nature and condition are to bee despised, and with just contempt, to be trodden and stamped vnder foot.

Secondly, in gathering of riches we must vse moderation, both in regard of our affections, and also in respect of the quantitie of the riches themselues. In respect of our affection in seeking, wee must first auoid that purposed resolution of worldly men, of becomming rich. For vpon this will follow a desire of how with what meanes, when as lawfull are wanting; and so whilest wee get wealth, we shall lose our soules, and lie open to all Satans snares of tentations, when they are couered with the alluring bait of profit. And this the Apostle plainly affirmeth: They (saith he) that will be rich, fall into tentations and snares, and into many foolish and noysome lusts, which drowne men in perdition and destruction. For the desire of money, is the root of all euill, which while some lusted after, they erred from the faith, and pierced themselues thorow with many sorrowes. 1. Tim. 6. 9, 10. There must therefore be in our will and desire, a Christian moderation and indifferencie, whereby we wish to attaine vnto riches, if God grant lawfull meanes, and can be content to be without them, if these honest and just meanes be wanting. Secondly, as our desires must be moderate, so also our haste in compassing them, being content to stay our time, and to waite the Lords leisure, till hee blesseth our labours with fruitfull increase; for otherwise, if as soone as Satan hath set out a bootie, wee presently goe a forraging, and run vpon it without feare of any danger, we shall suddenly fall into his ambushments, and by ouer-hastie pursuit of our prey, make our soules a prey to this destroying enemie. And of this the Wise man fore-warneth vs, that wee may auoid these stratagems of the Deuill: He that (saith hee) maketh haste to be rich shall not be innocent. Pro. 28. 20, 22. And a little after: A man with a wicked eye hasteth to riches, and knoweth not that pouertie shall come vpon him. And in another place: An heritage hastily gotten at the beginning, the end thereof shall not be blessed. Pro. 20. 21. Of this haste therfore let vs take heed, and before we seise vpon riches, let vs consider wel of the means whereby they are to be compassed, and seriously view them before we swallow them, lest Satan hath hid a hooke vnder this baite; and seeing riches are thornes let vs not suddenly catch hold of them, lest they wound our hands, but take hold of them daintily, and with great warinesse. Thirdly, wee must seeke them with quiet and contented minds, and rest satisfied with that proportion which God allotteth vnto vs; and not seeke after them, with an vnsatiable appetite, which the more it hath, the more it coueteth, like those who are sicke of the dropsie, who the more they drinke, the more they thirst; or like the Horse-leech, the Graue, and Hell, of which Salomon speaketh, which cry, giue, giue, and are neuer satisfied. Pro. 27. 20, 30. 15. But of this I shall speake more afterwards. Lastly, wee must affect the attayning of riches onely by such meanes as are lawfull, and warranted in the Booke of God; that is, we must seeke them in a lawfull calling, and by honest courses, not at all coueting them, when as we cannot thus attaine vnto them. In the former respect it is required, that wee liue in a lawfull calling, and therein that we get our riches, and not by playing, gaming, and such like courses condemned by the Lawes of God and men. Neither must we labour after wealth, by incroaching vpon other mens callings; for it is not lawfull for a Minister to inrich himselfe by following the calling of priuate men, no more then it is lawfull for them, to inrich themselues by taking vpon them the calling of a Minister. But euery man ought to abide in that vocation whereunto he is called of God, as the Apostle requireth. And for the other, we ought in this lawfull calling, to vse onely lawfull meanes to attaine vnto wealth, expecting and waiting for Gods blessing vpon them, and not after the fashion of the World, vse those which are wicked and vnlawfull, when those which are lawfull faile. As for example, we must auoid violence, wrong, oppression, extortion, cruelty, as also all manner of fraude, deceit, and craftie courses, whereby we circumuent & endamage others, to inrich our selues. For as the Sonne of Syrach saith, Riches are good to him that hath no sin in his conscience, and the rich man is blessed which is found without blemish. Whereas contrariwise, those who seeke to compasse riches by euill courses, what doe they else but flee from God, and seeke to haue their desires satisfied by the Deuill? What doe they but by gaining a little earthly pelfe, hazard their owne saluation, And what will it profit them to gain the whole World, and to lose their owne soules? as our Sauiour Christ speaketh. To this purpose the Heathen Philosopher speaketh excellently: A Wise man (saith hee) may haue great riches, being not wrongfully taken from any, neither defiled with strange bloud, gotten without iniurie, without any dishonest courses; of which there is as honest a passage and egresse, as they had an entrance, at which none groaneth and repineth but the enuious and malicious: let them be sifted and examined as much as you will, and they will proue honest. In which when as there are many things, which all could desire to bee their owne, there is nothing which any man can say it is his owne: such an one will not resist the benignitie of prouidence, and will neither glorie nor blush in his patrimony gotten by honest meanes, &c. And as a Wise man will not admit a peny ill gotten to come within his doores; so he will not refuse and cast out great riches, the gift of prouidence and the fruit of vertue. For why should he enuy them a place? let them come and stay not, let them take vp a lodging with him. Her will neither boast of them, nor hide them; for that were a signe of a wauering mind how to vse them, this of a mind base and fearefull, as though he hugged in his bosome a thing of great price. He will not (I say) cast them out of doores. For then what should hee say, are you vnprofitable? or doe not I know how to vse you? but as though he could for a money on a foot, yet he had rather goe in his Coach; so if he can lawfully be rich, hee will, and will haue wealth in his custodie, but as a thing which is light and ready to flie away: neither will he suffer it to be troublesome either to any other or himselfe, but he will bestow it, either to the good, or to those whom he is in hope to make good.

And thus much concerning the moderation of our affections in seeking riches: in the next place we are to consider of the quantitie of our riches which is to bee desired, and sought after: in which regard riches are either necessary, sufficient & plentifull, or abundant and superfluous. The necessitie of riches either respecteth a mans nature or his state: the necessitie of nature is, that a man haue things necessary to sustaine and preserue nature, as food, apparell, lodging and such like; with which a man must rest contented if he haue no more: according to the Apostles rule, If we haue food and rayment let vs therewith be content. And these necessaries euery man is bound to desire and seeke after, both that nothing be lacking vnto him for the preseruation of his life, & also that he be not chargeable vnto others. The necessitie of state, place or calling, either respecteth himselfe or others. Vnto the former is required that a man haue not only things fit to sustaine nature, but to maintaine him according to his place and calling: in which a greater or lesse proportion is necessary, according to the dignitie or meanenesse of a mans qualitie or condition. And thus a Noble man hath need of a large allowance to maintaine him according to his Nobilitie, and a King more, to maintaine his Royaltie: and thus besides necessaries belonging to nature, Scholars and Students haue need of Bookes, and Artizans of Tooles. In respect also of others, riches are necessary either to maintain those which are committed to a mans charge, or others who are not vnder his gouernment. For the former, the father is bound to maintaine, not only himselfe, but also his Children, the Master his Family, the Magistrate his Officers; of which a man ought to haue as great a care to prouide them necessaries according to their seuerall conditions as himselfe; and therefore is bound in conscience to desire and seeke after the meanes, whereby hee may be enabled hereunto. For as the Apostle saith, If there be any that prouideth not for his own, and namely for them of his household, hee denieth the faith, and is worse than an Infidell. And this care was in Iacob, where hee saith to Laban, When shall I prouide for mine owne house also? and in the good Huswife described in the Prouerbs, who was diligent to prouide necessaries not only for her Husband and Children, but also for all the rest of her Family. Yea, this care was in our Sauiour Christ himselfe, who had a purse to keepe the money which was fit for the com-

mith store, both for himselfe, his Disciples, and the poore, which we obserue, was not a little great, but a basket so bigge that it exceeded all beliefe. And this prouision of meate serued him not onely to be for the time present, but also for the time to come: for the ending of which lesson the Maggots is sent to the Pismires, to learne prouidence, seeing they in the summer season doe seeke foode for winter, which who so euer doth not practise, is called the sonne of confusion. Neither ought a man only thus to prouide for his charge, that they may haue comfortable maintenance whilest he liueth; but also that they may haue a competencie for their reliefe after he is dead. And thus a good father prouides for his faithfull seruants, who haue set their chiefe strength in his seruice; but especially parents for their children: for so the Apostle saith, that children are not bound to lay vp for their fathers, but the fathers for their children. And Salomon saith, that the good man shall giue inheritance to his children children. In respect also of others who are not vnder our charge riches are necessary, & that both for publick and priuate vse; publicke, as when we contribute to all good vses, which either respect the Church or the Common-wealth: to which purposes we are to extend our helping hand, not only out of our superfluities, but out of our necessities, pinching both backe and belly to performe these publike seruices: priuate, as when out of that portion which God hath allotted vs, we be ready according to our ability to relieue the poore who stand in need of our help.

The second degree or measure of riches, is to haue not only things necessary, but also to haue some sufficiencie & reasonable plentie of them; so as a man may haue not onely wherewith to hold life and soule together, and to prouide in some poore and slender manner for his charge and family, but also such store, as that together with them that depend vpon him, hee may liue comfortably and cheerefully in his vocation. And not only so, but also may be inabled thereby, to be liberally helpfull and beneficiall vnto others, and to aduance their good, whether it bee priuate or publike. Priuate, as by plentifull relieuing the poore, and doing the workes of mercie with a bountifull hand. Publick, when as we haue riches which wee imploy for the good of the Church, in maintayning the Ministerie, & setting forward all meanes of Gods Seruice; and for the good of the Common-wealth, when as we haue wherewith to pay tribute, scot and lot, and to performe such publike seruices as tend to the common good. And in this degree also riches may lawfully be desired and sought: first, because the Holy Ghost doth account this plentifull estate in it selfe more happy, than that of want, whereto it is said by Christ himselfe, that it is a blessed thing to giue, rather than to receiue: and whereas God promiseth it as a blessing to his people, that they should lend vnto many, but not borrow of any. Secondly, because wee are taught by the example of Agur, to pray for this sufficiencie and conuenient plentie. And lastly, because God requireth of vs that we be ready to performe those good duties both publike and priuate vnto others: as namely, that we must not only drinke of the water of our owne Cisterne our selues, but also must let our fountaines flow forth, and our riuers of waters run into the streets; and not only labour to sustaine our selues and Family, but also that we may giue vnto him that needeth. Vnto which wee might adde all those Commandements enjoyning, and exhortations incouraging vs to giue vnto the poore, and to do the works of mercie to those who need our helpe; as also to giue tribute to the Prince, and maynteynance to those who labour in the worke of the Ministerie. All which manifestly proue the lawfulnesse of desiring and seeking this sufficiencie of riches and conuenient plenty, so it be with moderation and with obseruance of the former cautions; for where any duty is commanded, there also the meanes whereby wee are inabled to performe it, are injoyned so farre forth as wee can compasse them by lawfull means. Vnto which we might also adde, that the Lord in his infinite bounty & goodnesse, hath not only created such plentifull store of these his creatures, as are sufficient for necessitie, but also for honest comfort and delight, and hath in many places promised this store and plentie to those that feare and serue him.

Q. Sect. 5. Whether it be lawfull to desire abundance of riches.

The third degree of riches is abundance and superfluitie, when a man hath more than is fit for his place and calling, or than he can or will imploy to any good vses: now the question heere is, whether it bee lawfull for a Christian man to desire and seeke after this abundance and superfluitie? For answering whereof we are to know, that this desire and seeking of abundance is to be condemned as vnlawfull, not simply and absolutely in it selfe; for if wee could desire and seeke abundance of riches, which are in themselues good, by good and lawfull meanes in a moderate manner, in respect of our affection, and vnto good ends, namely, that according to our proportion of riches wee might abundantly glorifie God, and disperse that which wee thus gather vnto the poore, and were made thereby more thankfull vnto God, according to the measure of his gifts, and more humble because wee are more indebted vnto him, I doe not see how this desire should be vnlawfull; for if wee may lawfully vse this abundance when God bestoweth it, it cannot bee that it is simply and absolutely vnlawfull to desire that which we may lawfully vse. But yet this desire of abundance by accident and by reason of our corruption, is euill and vnlawfull; because they who desire abundance doe immoderately desire it, and oftentimes vse euill meanes in seeking to compasse it. Secondly, because in respect of our corruption wee cannot propound purely those ends of doing good, but desire and seeke it for selfe-loue, and for our owne vse. Thirdly, because we desire more then we can, or will imploy to good vses; neither is the fault in the quantitie of our riches, but in our inordinate desires, and vniust detention of them from their right ends. For if we had such an euer springing fountaine of wealth that could neuer bee drawne dry, there were no hurt in it, if we would retaine thereof onely so much as might suffice vs, and serue for our owne necessary and lawfull vse, letting all our superfluitie runne abroad the Countrie for the reliefe of others, and for the refreshing of such poore afflicted soules as are dried vp with griefe and pouertie. For so although wee should haue alwayes abundance, yet should we neuer haue superfluitie, because we haue no more than we well vse. Fourthly, because desiring and seeking abundance, wee doe accordingly take paines in vsing the meanes, whereby wee may attaine vnto our desires; and consequently our thoughts and labours being of no large extent, are wholly taken vp in these earthly imployments, so as in the meane time we neither desire nor seeke as wee ought things of farre greater excellencie, as Gods spirituall graces, and the eternall ioyes of his Kingdome. And lastly, in respect of our corruption this abundance of riches and wealth is the foundation and ground of many dangerous tentations; whereby Sathan choketh in vs the Seed of Gods Word, weaneth vs from the loue of Heauen and heauenly things, puffeth vs vp with pride, and maketh vs forgetfull of God, and of all duties which we owe vnto him. So that like as our bodies, when they excessiuely abound with any humour, though it be neuer so good in it selfe, are thereby cast into desperate diseases, if it be not purged and abated; so it fareth with vs in respect of our states, for when they abound with superfluitie of these good things which are earthly and temporall, and are not abated by imploying them to good vses, they make our soules dangerously sicke in sinne, and betray them to be ouercome by the tentations of the Deuill. And therefore as the discreet Merchant, though his wares bee neuer so good, fitteth his burthen to his Ship, not ouer-loading it with more than it can well carry, for feare lest all should sinke; and if a storme happen, is ready to lighten his Ship, by casting out a part of this aloe, that so the residue with himselfe may escape the danger; so wee are to vse the like wisedome, and not ouer-burthen our minds and soules, with a greater load of these earthly things, than they can well beare, but allow only vnto them a fit and competent proportion; and if Satan taking aduantage of our plenty, doe indanger vs with the stormes of his tentations, wee are to ease our selues by giuing part of that, which otherwise we might well vse, to the poore, to preserue our soules from suffering shipwrack, & so shall we not only saue the rest for our own vse, but casting our wares vpon the face of these waters, shall after many dayes find them, with no small aduantage.

And thus haue I shewed that howsoeuer abundance is good in it selfe, yet in many respects the desire thereof is hurtfull vnto vs. The which may further appeare by these reasons. First, because riches are not absolutely good, but in respect of the end, or vse, for which they are desired and possessed, according to which end they are to be measured & proportiond; for those things which are good in respect of their end, are to bee measured according to this end. As for example, the end of our desiring riches is, that by their vse, we may glorifie God, haue sufficient maintenance for our selues, and be able to relieue others; and consequently our desires are only so farre lawfull as they are measured and tired to these ends; for in all those things whose goodnesse consisteth in a due measure and proportion, either the increase or diminution of this measure must needes bee euill. And therefore to desire more riches than we either can or will vse to Gods glory, for our owne maintenance, or the relieefe of others, must needs be euill and vnlawfull, because our desires exceed the measure of those ends, for which only riches are good.

Secondly, this desire of abundance, not thus to vse it, but to hold it in our owne possession, and to make our selues rich, is a notable signe of diffidence and distrust in Gods promises & prouidence, which maketh men think that they haue neuer sufficient for their maintenance, and for the preuenting of all casualties and dangers of losse, which may befall them, although they haue already one foot in the graue. Thirdly, abundance immoderately affected and accordingly obtained and possessed, is a notable meanes to puffe men vp with pride, to make them to forget God, to insult ouer their brethren, as wee may see in many euen in our dayes, who hauing nothing in themselues worth regard, but being miserably poore in all vertue, wisdome, and goodnes, are yet exceeding proud of their riches, and insult ouer all who are inferiour vnto them in wealth, though they be neuer so much superiour in all graces and good parts. And this was the cause why the Lord did forbid euen Kings themselues to gather much Siluer and Gold, lest their hearts being puffed vp with pride, they should be turned away from God. Now if Kings whose Royaltie is so great, and whose im-imployments so manifold, both for maintenance of their estate, and for defence of themselues and their countrie, might not seeke excessiue riches, and superfluous abundance; how much more vnlawfull is it in subiects and inferiour persons, who haue no such vse of it?

Fourthly, that which wee may not pray for, that we may not desire and seeke, but wee may not pray for this abundance, hauing no promise of it in the Scriptures, whereupon we may ground our faith. Yea rather wee are taught to pray against it, according to the example of wise Agur; Giue me not riches, lest I bee full and denie thee, and say, who is the Lord? and our Sauiour Christ hath taught vs to pray, not for abundance and superfluitie, but for our daily bread, that is, such necessaries and conuenient store, as may comfortably sustaine our liues; and also that wee should not bee led into temptation. Now in respect of our corruption this abundance is a notable temptation and snare of the diuell, whereby hee draweth vs from the loue of God, and fastneth our hearts vnto the earth, besides innumerable other euils, which thereby hee worketh in vs; and therfore we who desire to bee deliuered from temptations, are not wilfully and desirously to runne into them. Lastly, this desire and seeking of abundance for our owne vse is iniurious and hurtfull to our brethren and neighbours; for seeing these earthly things are circumscribed, and but of a finite nature, therefore it must needs follow, that the more that some abound with them, the more others want. And nothing can be more vniust and vnequall than to deprriue others of necessaries, to the end that wee may loade our selues with superfluities. But much more iniurious are they vnto themselues, in that they vnmeasurably hide these good talents of God, and hide them in a napkin, neuer imploying them to the aduancement of Gods glorie, nor the good of their brethren; seeing they doe hereby but increase their reckoning, and (because they can yeeld no better account) their condemnation at the day of Gods appearing. As therefore the flye when she doth but touch and taste the honey receiueth no hurt, but is thereby fed and nourished; but if shee doe ouer greedily runne into it, is intangled and perisheth: so if wee moderately vse a competencie and sufficiencie of earthly riches, they tend to our good and preseruation; but if with too much eagernes we wallow in abundance and superfluitie, in stead of receiuing any good wee intangle our selues, and procure our destruction.

And thus much for the lawfull vse of riches, in respect of our desiring and seeking of them. Now wee are to proceed to their lawfull vse in respect of their possession, vnto which is required, first, that hauing receiued these blessings from God, we doe attribute the praise and thanksgiuing vnto him alone, acknowledging whatsoeuer the meanes haue beene, that he is the chiefe and principall cause of all those benefits which wee enioy, and that we haue receiued them from him without any our deserts, of his free grace and vndeserued goodnesse. For except the Lord doe build the house, they labour in vaine that build it. Yea In vaine it is for vs to rise early, and to lie downe late, and to eate the bread of sorrow, for the compassing of these earthly things; seeing notwithstanding all this paines, if Gods blessing bee not added, wee may end our dayes in want and beggerie. Let vs acknowledge him the soueraigne Lord of all, for the earth is his, and all that therein is, and hauing nothing to returne for all the benefits which wee hold of him, let vs at least pay the tribute of praise and thanksgiuing, and expresse our thankfulnes in all holy obedience to his will. And this is that which God requireth of his people; When (saith he) thou hast eaten and filled thy selfe, thou shalt blesse the Lord thy God, for the good land which he hath giuen thee. Whereas contrariwise if we forget the authour of our good, and as the Prophet speaketh, sacrifice to our owne nets, and burne incense to our yarne, ascribing the praise of that we haue, to our owne wisdome, industrie and labour, or else to any other inferiour meanes and secondarie causes, we shall robbe God of his glorie, and prouoking his wrath against vs, shall moue him in displeasure, either to strip vs of his benefits, or to leaue them vnto vs for our further iudgement and condemnation. And of this sinne the Lord forewarneth his people: Beware (saith he) lest thou say in thy heart, my power and the strength of mine own hand, hath prepared me this abundance. But remember the Lord thy God; for it is he that giueth thee power to get substance, &c.

Secondly, being made partakers of these blessings, let vs labour to sanctifie them to our vse by the word and prayer, as the Apostle requireth. Of which I haue already spoken, intreating generally of the vse of earthly things; and therefore to auoid prolixtie, I referre the reader to that place. Thirdly, to the lawfull possession of riches, is required that wee doe not set our hearts and affections vpon them, but reserue them, chiefly and principally for God and heauenly things; vsing these earthly riches as though wee vsed them not; and being contented to retaine them, (as the pilgrime doth his staffe) so long as they further vs in our heauenly iourney, but depriuing and reiecting them, when they become hinderances and impediments. And this caused the Psalmist glueth vs; If riches (saith hee) that we must returne the praise of them vnto God.

And if wee onely giue them the keeping with this careleſſe regard, and intertaine them with such cold affections, they cannot hurt vs; for not the possession but the immoderate loue of them is condemned. To this purpose Augustine writing on those words; If riches increase, set not your hearts on them, saith thus, Hee who hath not this riches, let him not couetously seeke them, he that hath them, let him not be proud of them: for the Psalmist saith not, see yee haue not riches, but doe set your hearts on them. Hee doth not condemne riches, but the heart affixed to them, because it is not willing to bestow them but hoardeth and hideth them. And another writing vpon the twelfth of Luke, saith, that the rich man is not reprehended, because hee tilled his ground, and gathered his fruits into his barnes, but because he did place the confidence of his life vpon them, and distributed them not to the poore, that so he might haue beene receiued into eternall habitations. On the other side, it is possible that a man may offend in setting his heart vpon riches who neuer had them in his possession, euen as he may contemne them that hath them in keeping. To which purpose one saith: Thou maist sometime finde a rich man humble, who vseth his riches, but putteth his whole confidence in God: and contrariwise, a begger puffed vp with pride, or therefore onely not proud, because he hath nothing to be proud of, but yet seeking that which may swell him vp. Now God doth not regard the riches, but the desire and affection, and iudgeth him according to his concupiscence, whereby he greedily gapeth after temporall things, and not according to his riches which hee cannot compasse.

Aug. in Psal. 131. Tom.8.

And if we doe not thus set our hearts and affections vpon our riches, then will diuers others things follow thereupon, which also are required to the lawfull possession of them. As first, that we be contented with our estate, as being that portion which God alloweth vnto vs, and not repine against Gods prouidence, because wee haue not a larger allowance. For hee that doth not too much affect them, will not too much bewaile their absence, or bee discontent because hee hath not abundance of that which hee doth not much regard; but as the Apostle saith, hauing food and raiment, will therewith be all contented. So also hauing abundance of riches, if wee doe not let our hearts vpon them, then will wee be content to leaue them, when as God the chiefe owner calleth againe for them; if we lightly esteeme of them whilest we haue them, then will we but slightly mourne for them when they leaue vs, neither shall they take away any thing from vs but themselues, leauing contentment, ioy, and comfort which wee haue chiefly in God, behind them. And as we will not reiect them when we haue them, seeing they are the gifts of God, so when they take them to their wings, and flee away, wee will looke after them with a quiet mind, & a careles countenance. An example whereof we haue in Iob; who, because hee reioyced not when his substance was great, and when his hand had gotten much; therefore hee did not much grieue when they were taken away, but in his greatest losse praiseth the Lord. As also in Paul, who, because hee vsed this world as though he vsed it not, and esteemed all the best things thereof but as dung & losse, in comparison of Christ and his benefits, therfore with ease he woke out that other lesson; in what state soeuer he was, therewith to be content. I can (saith he) be abased, and I can abound; euerie where in all things I am instructed, both to be full and to bee hungrie, and to abound, and to haue want. Which who so practise their riches are not onely lawfull vnto them, but also sweete and comfortable; seeing they securely inioy them without feare of losing them. To this purpose one saith, that if worldly riches be wanting, we must not seeke them by euill meanes; if they be present, we must reserue them by our good workes in heauen; neither should they, though they abound, lift vp a mourning and Christian minde, nor breake and cast it downe when they goe away. Finally, if we doe not too much affect them, we will not glorie in them when we haue them, nor bee much ashamed when wee want them, neither will they, if wee esteeme them as vncertaine and momentany trifles, make vs to bee high minded, or to put our trust and confidence in them.

Finally, wee lawfully possesse riches, when as wee keepe a vigilant watch ouer them, that they doe not by our abuse degenerate from their owne nature, and become Satans baites to allure vs, nor his snares to incangle vs; nor his thornes to choake in vs the seed of Gods word, and to hinder the growth of Gods graces in vs; nor that cold water, wherewith he quencheth in vs our zeale of godlinesse, and the good motions of Gods spirit. If then wee would haue our riches in the possession good and lawfull, wee must carefully take heed that they doe not make vs turne backe, nor slacken our pace in the way of righteousnesse which leadeth to life euerlasting, and that they be not tentations, which draw vs vnto sinne and rebellion against God, by too much affecting them, trusting in them or being proud of them. But considering that they are part of that temporall wages which God freely giueth vs for our seruice, let this bountie make vs the more to loue our benefactour, and these rewards make vs more dutifull and obedient. And lastly, we must not hold them in our possession, as being Lords and absolute owners of them; but as tenants at will, who haue them at the pleasure of our great Land-lord, vnto whom wee must giue an account of them at the day of iudgement; and so shall wee not riotously misspend them vpon our owne lusts and pleasures, nor imploy them as instruments to further vs in the course of sinne: but carefully vse them as Gods stewards for the glorie of our master, and for the good of our fellow-seruants, for whose sake also wee haue receiued them.

And so much concerning the lawfull possession of riches. The last thing required to their lawfull vse respecteth their administration and bestowing; and this is, that they bee bestowed vpon good, iust and charitable vses, the which either respect our selues, who possesse them, or other men to whom they ought to be communicated. The vse which respecteth the owners themselues is, that they imploy their riches to the good, preseruation, defence and comfort of themselues, according to their person, estate and calling; and also of all others, who are committed to their charge and gouernment. And vnto this two things are required, first, parsimonie or thriftines, whereby we honestly spare our goods, and preserue them from being wastfully and riotously consumed. Secondly, frugalitie, whereby wee honestly spend our well gotten goods soberly, and moderately vpon our own good and necessarie vses, for our profit and honest delight. The former the Wiseman perswadeth vs vnto. Be diligent to know the state of thy flocks, and take heed to thy heards, &c. The other in the words following: The lambes are for thy clothing, and the goats are the price of the field; and let the milke of the goates bee sufficient for thy food, and for the food of thy family. So he saith elsewhere, that there is nothing better than that a man should reioyce in his affaires, because that is his portion; and that it is good and comely to eate and to drinke, and to take pleasure of all a mans labour, wherein he trauelleth vnder the sunne, &c. For this is the gift of God. Heere therefore two extreames are to bee auoided, the first is sordidous tenacitie, the other is lauish profusion and wastfulnesse. The former vice, as it is hurtfull to all others, so especially to him that is corrupted with it, being like a theefe he robbeth himselfe of the vse of his owne goods, and as well wanteth that he hath, as that he hath not; but of this I shall haue occasion to speake hereafter. The other is the immoderate wasting of a mans goods; when as hee spends these blessings of God lauishly, and aboue his ability, whereby hee bringeth himselfe to want and miserie; or else luxuriously vpon carnall pleasures, and all manner of voluptuousnesse, whereby he is made vnfit for Gods seruice, and ready for the perpetrating of any wickednesse. Both which are carefully to be auoyded, for as the one hath not that he hath, so the other will not haue it long, vnlesse hee rake from others a new supply by vnlawfull meanes. In which respect, as the sordidous person is a thiefe because hee robbeth himselfe; so the wastfull spender is a thiefe, because he robbeth other men, and one while is gripingly courtous, that hee may another while bee profusely wastfull. The vses wherein our wealth is lawfully imploied respecting others, are either publicke or priuate. Publicke, when as we bestow it for the good of the Church and Common-wealth. The vses which concerne the good of the Church, are, that we bestow our riches for the maintenance of the meanes of Gods publike seruice, as vpon those who teach and instruct vs in the knowledge of Gods true religion; vpon the places of Gods worship, and all other necessaries belonging thereunto. And this God requireth, and incourageth vs to the performance thereof by his gracious promise. Honour the Lord with thy riches, and with the first fruits of thine increase: so shall thy barnes be filled with abundance, and thy presses shall burst with new wine. An example whereof wee haue in the Israelites, who offered so bountifully towards the building of the Tabernacle and Temple, that they needed to bee restrained from bringing any more. So also our riches are lawfully vsed and imployed, when as they are bestowed for the publick good of the Common-wealth: as in the maintaining of the royall estate of the King, by tributes and customes, in defending our Countrie in time of warre, in erecting of schooles and hospitals, and such other publicke seruices, whereby the good of the Common-wealth is aduanced and furthered. To which purpoles wee should spare, not onely out of our superfluities, but euen from our backes and bellies, when neede requires; seeing the common good is to bee preferred before our owne priuate, and our Countrie before our states and liues, in that from it we haue had the meanes of our maintenance, yea our first breath, and all other worldly comforts.

Lastly, our goods and riches are lawfully vsed in respect of priuate persons, when as they are bestowed in releeuing the poore members of Iesus Christ. For by this vse wee haue haue receiued them of God, that we should not misspend them in excesse, vanitie and riot; but that as Gods stewards, we should imploy them to the honour of our master, and the good of our fellow-seruants. And this was figured vnto vs in the gathering of Manna, of which the Israelites hauing gathered some more, and some lesse, did afterwards measure it with an Omer, and he that had gathered much, had nothing ouer, and hee that had gathered little, had no lacke: As the Apostle also applyeth it. And this is the cause why the Lord would haue the poore amongst vs, who could (if it had so pleased him) haue made all rich, that as hereby he might exercise them in humilitie and patience, so also the rich in liberality and mercie, and accordingly might giue vnto either a crowne of glory at the day of iudgement. Of which reward they doe not onely depriue themselues, who neglect to make this vse of their riches, but also for neglecting the workes of mercie, and robbing their fellow-seruants of that portion which God hath allotted vnto them, endanger their bodies and soules to the eternal torments of hell fire. For (as one saith) Christ condemneth the rich men in the twelfth and sixteeth of Luke, not because they got their riches by wicked meanes, or bestowed them vpon harlots, or to the perpetrating of murther or other wickednesse; but because they gaue themselues wholly ouer to pride and delicacie, neglecting the reliefe of Christs poore members.

CHAP. V.

Of pleasures, Lawfull, ciuill, and carnall, which are to be desired, and which to bee contemned and shunned.

§. Sect. 1. Of diuine pleasures.

IN the last place wee are to adde something of pleasure, and to consider how farre forth they are to be desired, as lawfull and commendable, whereby also we may more easily discerne in what respects wee are to eschew and contemne them. To which purpose wee are to know, that pleasures are of three kinds: the first diuine and holy, the second naturall and ciuill, the third carnall and wicked. Diuine pleasure is, when as wee delight in the Lord, and reioyce in the fruition of his gifts and graces in this life, and in the assurance of those heauenly ioyes in the life to come. And vnto this pleasure as being not onely lawfull, but religious, [illegible] very commendable, wee are in many places of the Scriptures exhorted. So the Apostle willeth, that reioyced in the Lord. And in another place, Reioyce in the Lord alway, againe, I say reioyce. So as wee ought thus to reioyce, and to reioyce againe with a double ioy; yea, and not sometime alone, but alwayes, and as hee saith elsewhere: we must reioyce continually, not onely when wee abound in worldly prosperitie, but euen in affliction: for as the Apostle saith, being iustified by faith, and hauing peace with God, we reioyce not onely vnder the hope of the glory of God, but also in tribulation. And thus Dauid comforted himselfe in the Lord, when as the people were ready to stone him: and the Apostles reioyced, because they were counted worthy to suffer rebuke for Christ; and Paul and Silas when they were sore whipped, and put into a cruell prison.

§. Sect. 1. Diuine pleasures are most excellent sweete and comfortable.

And this is that principall ioy and pleasure which euery Christian ought chiefly to affect and desire, as being most excellent sweete and comfortable. Which, howsoeuer carnall men cannot relish, but thinke it tedious and loathsome; yet to those that haue euer truly tasted of it, it is much more comfortable and delightfull than all worldly and wicked pleasures. An example whereof wee haue in our Sauiour Christ, who accounted it meate and drinke to doe the will of his heauenly Father: and in his beloued Apostle, who professeth, that hee had no greater ioy than this, that those whom hee had begotten vnto God did walke in his truth. And holy Dauid calleth God his ioy, affirming that hee will be glad and reioyce in him and in his saluation, and mercie which hee extended to him. So that the ioy and pleasure of a Christian conuerted vnto God is not taken away, but onely changed, yea bettered in the change; as much as the Creator excelleth the creature; heauen, earth; and his spirituall graces and eternall excellencies the momentanie and base trifles of the world. And therefore if our hearts were truly sanctified, and wee but a little inured to these heauenly ioyes and pleasures, wee would but a little esteeme the sinfull pleasures of the flesh, which now because wee are carnally minded wee so much doate vpon.

John 4. 34. John 8. 29. vers. 4. Phil. 4. 10. Ps. 13. 5.

§. Sect. 1. Of naturall and ciuill pleasures.

The second kinde of pleasures are those which are naturall and ciuill, when as wee ioy and reioyce in the fruition of Gods temporall and earthly blessings and benefits: the which pleasure is in its owne nature good, but yet not absolutely and immutably, and in respect of the vse of an indifferent nature, good to the good, who haue a right vse of it, and euill to those who abuse it vnto sinne. Concerning the former; Naturall pleasures which consist in meates, drinkes, apparell, houses, musicke, recreations, and in the fruition of other Gods comfortable blessings and benefits, are to those that vse them well lawfull, good and comcommendable: First, because they are the gifts of God which he hath purposely prouided for vs in the creation, and bestoweth them vpon his seruants, as incouragements to serue him more cheerefully obedientlie. For as the Psalmist saith, he hath not only made beasts to serue men, and plants herbs, but also made plants and herbs to yeild the fruit of meats, and waters to make his face glad. He hath prouided for the children not only things necessarie and profitable, but also pleasant and comfortable, seruing for their honest delight, as appeareth in the varietie of colours, smelles, tastes, mettals, stones, fruits, beasts and birds: the lawfull and delightfull vse whereof Gods children cannot refuse without contempt, or at least neglect of the Creators bountie. Againe, the Lord hath mixed these pleasures with all our naturall actions, as eating, drinking, sleeping, and the rest, that wee might be moued to doe those things which are necessarie, because they are also pleasant and delightfull. And therefore wee are not to reiect and contemne pleasures, seeing they are the bountifull gifts of God, but to imploy them so as that they may tend to the glorie of him who gaue them, and to the furthering of our owne spirituall good; neither is their vse, but their abuse onely to bee taken away. To this purpose one saith that the matter of our pleasures which we enioy are the gifts of God, as meates and drinkes, beauties and apparell, &c. and therefore let vs be ashamed to turne Gods graces and free gifts into weapons of sinne: for wee shall grieuously inflame the wrath of the supreame Iudge against vs, if with his owne liberall gifts we fight against his seruants.

Secondly, these pleasures well vsed are warranted and approued in the Scriptures; for the Wise man saith, that there is a time to weepe, and a time to laugh, a time to mourne, and a time to dance; and that it is good and comelie to eate and to drinke, and to take pleasure in all a mans labours, &c. for that is his portion. Yea we are commanded to communicate with one another in our way, and to reioyce with them that reioyce: the which was accordingly practised by the Christians in the Primitiue Church, who met together at their loue-feasts, and did take their meate together with gladnesse, and singlenesse of heart; and greatly delited by the Psalmist, namely, that he might reioyce in the ioy of Gods people, and glory with his inheritance. And in truth this is not only sauce for our meat which maketh it sweet and comfortable, but the seasoning of all other Gods temporall benefits, without which we haue little comfort of them. For what would it auaile vs to bee exalted to the state of honour, or to abound with earthly riches if we should take no delight or pleasure in them? And this is the Wise mans conclusion, I know, saith he, that there is nothing good in them, but to reioyce and doe good in his life. Eccles. 3. 12.

Thirdly, these naturall and ciuill pleasures which wee take in the fruition of Gods temporall blessings, doe serue to good ends and purposes; for they are the matter of Gods praises, and speciall motiues to stirre vs vp with cheerefull hearts, to laud and magnifie his great and glorious name, when as hee not onely bestoweth vpon vs things necessarie and profitable for the preseruation of our liues, but also in his infinit bountie giueth vs to inioy things pleasant and delightfull, whereby our liues are made sweete and comfortable. Againe, this ioy and pleasure is that precious oyle, wherewith being annointed, the countenance is made louely and pleasant: for so the Wise man saith, that a ioyfull heart maketh a cheerefull countenance. It is a soueraigne balsome for a wounded soule, and a precious preseruatiue to continue our health: for as the Wise man saith, a ioyfull heart reuiueth good bloud, but a sorrowfull mind drieth the bones. Yea it is the life of our life, and a chiefe meanes of prolonging our dayes. In which respect the Sonne of Syrach exhorteth vs to desire and affect it: Giue not ouer (saith he) thy minde to heauinesse, and vex not thy selfe in thine owne counsell: the ioy of the heart is the life of man, and a mans gladnesse is the prolonging of his dayes. Loue thine owne soule, and comfort thine heart, driue sorrow farre from thee, for sorrow hath slaine many, and there is no profit therein. To which purpose another compareth a mans life which hath no pleasures or delights, to a long iourney without Inns; in which there is much trauaile, and no comfort or refreshing. Lastly, these pleasures fit and inable vs the better to serue God, both in the duties of religion, and in the workes of our speciall callings: and that first as they are incouragements, which make vs performe these duties with alacritie and cheerefulnes, not only in respect of the present fruition of these earthly pleasures, as being the sweetest rewards of our labours which this world affordeth, but as they serue to put vs in minde of those eternall and vnconceiueable pleasures and ioyes, which are reserued for those that serue and feare the Lord in his heauenly kingdome. And therefore hath the Lord giuen vnto vs these first fruites, and small taste of his euerlasting ioyes in these temporall delights, to make vs long after those fully-satisfying and neuer-ebbing pleasures, and to thinke no labour too much for the obtaining of those pure ioyes which are at his right hand for euermore: seeing euen these earthly pleasures though momentany, and mixed with many miseries and much bitternesse by reason of sinne, doe leaue neuertheles such a pleasant rellish behind them. Secondly, they inable vs to those duties of Gods seruice, and of our callings, as they doe recreate and refresh vs after our painfull labours. In which respect they are exceeding necessarie, seeing in regard of our frailtie and weakenes, it were impossible to trauaile in our Christian course, vnlesse we were strengthned & cheared with these earthly baits. For our bodies would be tyred, and our minds made dull and sluggish, if they stood alwayes bent; neither could wee long labour if our hearts were not cheared and our spirits refreshed with this sweet ointment of pleasure and delight.

Sect. 6. That vnto vs pleasures are of an indifferent nature, holding their goodnesse only when they are well vsed, vnto which is required that our persons be iustified.

And thus haue I shewed that these naturall and ciuill pleasures are in themselues good and lawfull, yea, as I said, they are not good absolutely, immutablie, or in any high degree of perfection. But in respect of vs and of their vse of an indifferent nature, holding their naturall goodnesse when they are well vsed, and degenerating into euill, when as they are abused, as causes, meanes, or instruments of sinne. And therefore in the next place we are to consider, how these gifts of God which are good in themselues, may also bee good vnto vs: vnto which is required, first that our persons be iustified and reconciled vnto God by a true faith in Iesus Christ. For as wee may obserue in the Apostles order, true ioy and reioycing are the effects and fruits of our iustification and peace with God: without which as we haue no right or interest in these pleasures, so are they altogether false and full of vanitie, like vnto the delights of a malefactor which hee hath betweene the time of his condemnation and execution, or vnto a faire way which bringeth him to the gallowes. As therefore Iehu said to Iehoram, what peace can there be so long as the whoredomes of thy mother Iesabel remaine? So may I say to the wicked man affecting pleasures; what pleasures can there be so long as thy sinnes which oblige thee to eternall punishments remaine vnpardoned? But after we haue the remission of sinne, peace with God, and peace of conscience, and in lieu of thankfulnesse spend our strength in his seruice, then is the time of desiring these pleasures, that we may the better thereby be inabled to these duties. Whereby it may appeare, that these pleasures and delights are not onely lawfull to the godly and faithfull, but so appropriated and peculiar vnto them, as that they belong to none besides them: therefore the Psalmist exhorting men to this ioy, doth direct his speech onely to the faithfull: Reioyce (saith he) you righteous, and reioyce in the Lord, and be ioyfull all you that are vpright in heart. And in the next Psalme: Reioyce in the Lord, O ye righteous, for it becommeth vpright mouthes thankefull.

Rom. 5. 1. 3.

1. King. 9. 22.

Psal. 32. 11. and 33. 1.

Secondly, our pleasures must bee moderately esteemed and affected according to their owne nature and worth, and not preferred either in our iudgements or desires, either before our spirituall ioy in God, or the eternall ioyes of his kingdome; with which ioyes when they come in comparison they are to be contemned, and to be loathed and reiected when as they will not stand together. So that if wee would haue these pleasures lawfull, wee must neither ouerualue them in our iudgements, nor set our hearts and affections vpon them, which ought to bee reserued for those other ioyes of farre greater excellencie, but onely esteeming and louing them, as the trauailer doth the pleasures of his Inne, and the pilgrime those delights which hee passeth by in his way: and as the Apostle expresseth it, reioycing as though we reioyced not; let vs place our chiefe ioy in the Lord, and principally esteeme and affect that fulnes of ioy which we shal haue in Gods presence, and those vnspeakeable pleasures, which are at his right hand for euermore.

Sect. Our pleasures themselues must be moderate and referred vnto Gods glory.

1. Cor. 7. 30.

Psal. 16. 11.

Thirdly, as we must moderate our affections, so our pleasures themselues must bee moderate: for being not absolutely good, but as they are referred vnto and limited by their ends; therefore when they exceed these iust bounds, they degenerate and become euill and vnlawfull. Now the chiefe and principall end of our pleasures ought to be the glorie of God, when as we therfore vse them not only that we may with all thankfulnesse acknowledge his great bountie and goodnesse towards vs, but also may bee the better inabled to serue him with all cheerefulnesse in the duties of religion and Christianitie. And therefore wee must take heed if wee would haue our pleasures lawfull, that they further this end; and that they doe not take vp that time which is allotted vnto the seruice of God, nor yet be vsed in such excesse and so immoderately, as shall make vs more vnfit for the performance of these holy duties. In which respect those offend who prophane the Lords day which hee hath set apart for his seruice, by spending it about their owne pleasures and recreations: as also they who so immoderatly vse those pleasures of eating, drinking, exercise and the rest, that they are more fit to sleep, than to serue God in any dutie which he requireth.

Esay 58. 13.

Sect. Our pleasures must be referred to the good both of our soules and bodies.

The other end of pleasures is our owne good, when as they tend to the preseruation of our health, and to the better fitting of vs for all good duties of our callings wherein this rule is to be obserued, that we doe not so much addict our selues vnto them, as that by

by their immoderate vse wee impaire the health of our soules, nor so much abstaine from them, as that by vtter neglecting them, wee ouerthrow the health of our bodies. In which respect it is hard to determine of a just proportion, seeing the quantitie differeth according to the persons, and the callings also wherein they are imployed. For some bodies require more pleasure for the preseruation of their health, and some lesse: some callings are more painfull, spending the spirits and consuming the strength, and some more ease and better indured. And therefore Christian discretion is here required, that thereby pleasures may be proportioned and fitted to the person and state of him that vseth them: and still obseruing these ends, wee are to take heed that wee doe not vnder pretence of vsing pleasures for our health, abuse them in excesse and surfet of these sweet delights; seeing nothing more doth weaken our strength, impaire our health, nor more speedily bring desperate diseases and vntimely death, than the immoderate vse of these pleasures. As also wee must vse the like care that we doe not by them make our selues more vnfit for the duties of our callings, by making our recreations our trades and occupations, spending both our time & strength in them, whereas they should only refresh and fit vs for our lawfull labours, and necessarie businesse.

Lastly, if wee would haue our pleasures lawfull vnto vs, let vs carefully watch ouer our selues in the vse of them, that they be not vnto vs Sathans nets of perdition through our corruption, whereby he catcheth and intangleth vs in sinne: neither is there any more vsuall or yet more dangerous baite wherewith he allureth vs vnto sinne, than by offering vnto vs these pleasing delicates of pleasure and delight. And therefore wee must not with vnbridled affections rush vpon them; but before we giue them entertainment wee must againe and againe consider, first, whether they be lawfull, and then how they may be lawfully vsed, carefully referring them to those good ends for which they were ordained, and vsing them with moderation both in respect of our affections, and also of the things themselues. But especially we must take heed that we doe not fully rest in these temporall and naturall pleasures, as being our last end and chiefe happinesse, affecting to haue but Paradise in this World; for so they will become the Deuils birdlime, in which when we haue wallowed, we shall not be able to mount aloft in heauenly meditations, and notable impediments to hinder vs from the fruition of those euerlasting joyes in Gods Kingdome: but we must only vse them as helps and meanes to further and hasten our speed in our spirituall race, and as reasons and motiues to make vs affect that heauenly joy and pleasure with more ardent loue: concluding with our selues, that if these earthly delights be so sweet and comfortable, then how many, yea infinite degrees more excellent and admirable joyes shall we haue in Heauen, when wee shall haue the fruition of God himselfe, and of all those pleasures which hee hath prepared for his Saints, and that without the mixture of any misery or affliction! And thus much concerning the second kinde of pleasures which are naturall and ciuill. The third and last kind are carnall and worldly pleasures, as surfetting and drunkennes, chambering and wantonnesse, lust and vncleannesse, vnlawfull sports and recreations: all which being in themselues euill and wicked, are not onely to be contemned, but euen hated and abhorred of all Christians.

CHAP. VI.

That we are exceeding prone to abuse these earthly blessings, whereby they become the Deuils snares to intangle vs in sinne.

WEE haue shewed the goodnesse of these earthly things in their owne nature; and also how they may be lawfully vsed of vs, so as they may be truly good and comfortable: from whence also wee may vnderstand how they degenerate from their owne nature, and become euill; namely, when as they are abused by vs, the former cautions and conditions, concerning their getting, keeping, imploying and vsing, being neglected and not obserued. Now we are to know, that through the corruption of our nature, wee are exceedingly prone to this abuse; and whereas by these blessings of God, wee should be made more thankfull, and more obedient, contrariwise, wee abusing Gods gifts are vsually made by them more forgetfull of God, more cold and negligent in performing of all good duties, and more prone to fall into any manner of sin, as both the Scriptures themselues, and the experience of all Ages doe plainely manifest. All which commeth to passe for want of due care in obseruing the former cautions which are required to their lawfull vse, and especially because in our judgements wee ouer-value them, and in our hearts too much loue and affect them, preferring them before Gods spirituall graces, and heauenly excellencies, yea, louing and esteeming the creature better than the Creatour; in regard whereof, men are ready to hazard the losse of these things, which are of infinite more value, by taking any wicked and vnconscionable courses, either for the getting or keeping of these earthly trifles, which they so much admire and affect.

Q. Sect. 1. That through our corruption, wee abuse Gods earthly blessings.

By

§. Sect. 2. That these earthly things through our abuse, become the matter of many grieuous tentations. Mal. 2. 2.

By which meanes it commeth to passe, that these earthly blessings are turned into curses; and through the malice of the Deuill, and our owne corruption, become the matter and occasion of many dangerous tentations, as being the ordinary wages which Satan giueth Worldlings for seruing him in sinne, and his common baites and allurements, whereby hee inticeth vs to offend God, wound our owne consciences, and hazard the eternall saluation of our soules. For when hee seeth, that the sinne whereto hee tempteth vs, is in it selfe vgly and odious vnto vs, either by the light of Nature, or of the Scriptures, whereby our vnderstandings and iudgements are illuminated in the knowledge of good and euill, then doth hee cast ouer it one of these worldly vailes, and couering this deadly hooke of sinne with one of these alluring baites, hee inticeth vs to swallow it, to our ruine and destruction. The which tentations are therefore the more dangerous, because these things being in their owne nature good, are lesse suspected when they are vpon such euill conditions thrust vpon vs; and also because they are of necessary vse vnto vs, which spurre of necessitie pricketh vs forward to vse any meanes lawfull or vnlawfull for the compassing of them, and doth serue as a pretence to excuse our greedinesse; and as a cloake and couer, vnder which by degrees immoderate excesse, and neuer satisfied voluptuousnesse doth creepe vpon vs. For whilest we pretend, and perhaps intend to satisfie only our necessities, and to pay, as it were, our debt to Nature, Pride, Couetousnesse and Voluptuousnesse doe incroach vpon vs, drawing vs on to affect and desire superfluitie and excesse. As when we think to satisfie natute by meats and drinks, being allured with pleasure, we offend through immoderation, and fall into those odious sinnes of gluttony and drunkennesse. When we goe about to prouide apparell to couer our nakednesse, and to preserue vs from the injuries of the weather, pride creepeth in, & moueth vs to sin either in some wanton fashion, or in the excessiue costlines of the stuffe. When according to our dutie we thinke of vsing the meanes of attaining vnto a competencie of riches, for the maintenance of our selues, and those who are committed to our charge, couetousnesse incroacheth vpon vs, and fixing our hearts to this earthly Mammon, maketh vs to desire superfluities, and readie to vse any meanes for the compassing of them. And thus whilest wee open the doore of our hearts to giue entertainment vnto our friends, dangerous enemies attending on them, doe thrust in vpon vs at vnawares, before wee haue any leisure to thinke of keeping them out, and opposing against them. Which being entred doe keepe open the doore for the rest of their company, and so strengthen and backe one another with all their forces, that it is hard, yea, altogether impossible to dispossesse and cast them out, vnlesse we be mightily assisted by the Spirit of God. For desire of honours bringeth in desire of riches; and riches being entred, doe make way for voluptuousnesse. To which purpose one saith, that desire of glory inflameth our hearts with the loue of riches; and for glories sake doe men prouide troupes of seruants, stately horses adorned with golden trappings and rich furniture and the like, not to satisfie necessitie, nor because themselues take any great delight in it, but that they may set out their pompe to the publike view. Howsoeuer, it cannot be denied, but that when any of these vices haue taken strong possession, there is often opposition betweene them, by which garboile wee haue as much trouble and molestation, as at first wee had danger when they entred into vs.

Crebrò peccatum sit dolentis inuenta dum necessitati debita reddimus, voluptatis vitio deseruimus. Greg. Moral. lib. 20. cap. 15.

In regard of which their power & potencie in preuailing with vs, Satan doth most vsually imploy their strength to make a way and entrance for his tentations, setting before vs the booty either of honours, riches and pleasures, when hee intendeth to draw vs into his secret ambushments and snares of sinne. And thus he began with our first parents, alluring them to breake the Commandement of God in eating of the forbidden fruit; because it was pleasant to the eye, profitable for the gaining of knowledge, and would aduance them vnto such a glorious estate, that they should bee equall with God himselfe. And with the same alluring baites hath he intangled and insnared all their posteritie, as the experience of all times hath shewed; in so much, as when he was to encounter our Sauiour Christ himselfe, hee maketh choice of these, as of his most forcible and preuailing weapons; inticing him to vse vnlawfull meanes to please his taste, and satisfie his appetite, to get a name, and obtaine the riches and glory of the World. The which, howsoeuer they could not pierce or wound him; in regard that he was defended with armour of proofe, his perfect puritie, and absolute righteousnesse; yet hee hath much preuailed with them against all others, so as not any hath escaped vnwounded, and without foile out of the conflict, but whilest they haue laboured to defend themselues from the force and violence of one, they haue runne vpon the point of another, and haue exposed themselues vnto danger, euen whilest they thought of auoyding and escaping it. But as Satan hath alwayes herewith much preuailed, so neuer more than in these dayes; in which almost all men are so bewitched with the loue of these earthly things, that they are ready to yeeld vnto any tentation, to neglect any dutie to God or man, and to commit any sin, so as they may attaine vnto their their worldly ends; and compasse these earthly vanities which they so much dote vpon. Neither hath this poyson only infected professed Worldlings, who greedily drink it vp with loue & admiration; but euen the Professors of Gods true religion, who haue proclaimed their defiance against worldly vanities, are so tainted & corrupted with their contagion, that they grow stiffe & benummed in performance of Christian duties; & ready to wound their consciences with sin, when as these pleasing oratorspersuade thē hereunto.

But how dangerous and pernicious these triple forces are, when they are vnited and conjoyned, it may easily appeare if weconsider of their perillous strength being singled the one from the other. For first, how manifold and dangerous are the tentations into which honours plunge men, when as they ouervalue, and immoderately affect them; making them to forget all duties which belong vnto God, and to neglect all good offices naturall, ciuill, and religious which they owe vnto men, without all respect of acquaintance, friendship and kindred, yea, of fidelitie and common honestie, so they may aspire to their proud hopes, and compasse their ambitious ends; not caring whom they tread vnder foot, so they make their falls steps, whereby themselues may rise. Neither doe these tentations onely take hold of worldlings and wicked men, but euen of the deare Seruants of God, as we may see in the example of the Disciples striuing for superioritie, and contending one with another, who should be greatest, and haue the highest place in Gods Kingdome. In a word, so great is the force of this tentation; that (as one saith) no man can sufficiently discerne the strength of this enemie, but hee who hath proclaimed warre against it: for howsoeuer it may seeme more easie vnto any to want this honour and prayse when it is denied, yet it is most hard, not to be too much delighted with it, when it is offered him.

The like also may be said of riches, which through our corruption, are the ground of many dangerous tentations, both in respect of their getting, keeping and bestowing; for, as the Apostle saith, they that will be rich, fall into tentations and snares, and into many foolish and noysome lusts, which drowne men in perdition and destruction: for the desire of money is the root of all euill. And most hard it is to abound with them, and not to abuse them vnto sin, for want of obseruing the sober cautions which are required to their lawfull vse; to which purpose one saith, it is a matter of as great difficulty to abound with riches, and not at any time abuse them, as to stote vpon the waters and not to be ducked. In respect whereof they are likened vnto thorns, which vnlesse a man hold very warily, he is sure to be pricked: and to a Serpent, which who so holdeth vnskilfully, it will winde about his hand, and bite him. In regard of which danger through our corruption, the Scripture speaking of them doth commonly adde some Epithete which may weane our hearts and affections from them, in respect of immoderate loue; as, the [a] deceitfulnesse of riches, [b] riches of this World, the Mammon of iniquitie and such like; and giueth vs many admonitions, that wee should neither ouer-greedily desire them, nor when wee haue them set our hearts vpon them. All which notwithstanding the most men, both Worldlings, and Professors of Religion, are choaked with these thornes, and intangled with these snares, being moouēd with these baits to do many things against their knowledge and conscience, either for thegetting or keeping of them. In which respect Augustine describeth riches thus: That they are a costly danger, to those who possesse them; an euil master, and a treacherous seruant; birdlime vnto our spirituall wings, Fathers of flatterie, Sons of grief and care; a cause of feare to those that haue them, & of grief to those that want them.

§. Sect. 6. That tentations, grounded vpon pleasures, are very dangerous.

Neither are those tentations which are grounded vpon pleasures lesse dangerous, they being commonly made through our abuse, sweet poysons which kill with delight, and pleasant songs which lull vs asleepe in the cradle of securitie to our perdition and destruction. For when a man is glutted with them, how exceedingly doth he forget himselfe and all good duties? and how prone and head-long is hee vnto all vice and wickednesse? there being nothing so bad which hee doth not thinke well becomes him, when his vnderstanding is distraughted with this merry madnesse, nothing so foolish and ridiculous at which he blusheth and is ashamed. But if wee would take a liuely view of those who abound in worldly pleasures, & see vnto what lewd licentiousnes they bring all those who are glutted with them; let vs consider of that notable description of the house of pleasure, which by one no lesse wittily than truly is thus deciphered: The hall (saith he) of pleasure gloriously glistered with kingly superfluitie, or sumptuous furniture, and with curious ingrauen walls, and the floure did swimme with wine; the ground smelled sweetly of odoriferous ointments couered with the bones of dainty fishes, and slippery with flowers, now ready to wither. There was a tumult of boone Companions, a clamorous noyse of Wranglers, the slaughter of needlesse Contenders and Brablers. Musicall mirth and harmony of those that supped together, the noyse of Dancers; lowd laughter of those which were madly merry, flouting and clapping hands of licentious Wantons, all things confused and nothing in naturall order. There was to bee seene women Dancers shorne and polled, pointed with their long locks curious- ly curled; cruditie of Feasters, vnsauorie belching of Gluttons, insatiable thirst of Drunkards, yesterdayes surfet, to dayes drunkennesse, the pots emptied of their drink, and againe filled with the filthy vomiting of the Drinkers, their drunkennesse casting forth a greater sent, than did their Wines, when they were newly pressed. Pleasure her selfe standing in the middle of the rout, cried out, saying: Drinke yee your fill, euen till yombee drunke; and let euery one of you fall downe, and neuer arise. He is chiefe with me, who is most desperately wicked; he is mine, who is not his owne: he is most gracious to me, who is most wicked and pernicious to himselfe. The golden Cup of the Whore of Babylon is in mine hand, which maketh drunke the whole earth, with my Wine haue all the Nations surfetted. He that is vnwise, let him turne vnto me, and him that lacketh wisdome doe I command, saying: Eat sauourly your bidden bread, and drinke your waters, which are sweeter because they are stolne; let vs eate and drinke, for to morrow we shall die. Our life passeth and vanisheth like a cloude. Come let vs enjoy our knowne good, and vse the creatures quickly as in the time of youth. Let vs glut our selues with precious Wines and Ointments, and let not the power of our dayes vnpleasantly passe away. Let vs crowne our selues with Roses before they withers: let there be no pleasant Meadow which our luxuriousnesse doth not passe ouer, and let vs leaue euery where signes of ioy and mirth. For all these are left behind vs, and no man shall carrie any thing with him, but that which he hath imparted vnto himselfe in these pleasures of the flesh. Finally, I am the Mistresse of true Philosophie, neither is there any to this, which teacheth that to be good, which is sweet and pleasant.

And thus haue I briefly shewed how dangerous these earthly things are vnto vs, seeing they are the grounds & occasions of Satans tentations wherby he allureth & perswadeth vs vnto sinne: not (as I haue proued) in their own nature, but as they are abused through the Deuils malice and our corruption, whereby it commeth to passe that wee neglect those cautions required to their lawfull vse, of which I haue before spoken. So that in a word, if wee would know how these things are to be desired, and in what respects they are to be contemned and despised: wee are to affect them, when in their lawfull vse they tend to the setting forth of Gods glory, the good of his Church, and the furthering and assuring of our owne saluation. And contrariwise we are to contemne them, when as being abused by Sathan and our corruption they become tentations, prouocations, and instruments of sinne, and consequently notable impediments to hinder our saluation. To which purpose when they serue, and offer themselues vnto vs vpon these wicked and vnequall conditions; we are not only to despise and reject them, but also to hate and abhorre them, as being the Deuils Sollicitors, who by perswading vs vnto sinne, cozen and deceiue vs, first of Gods loue and fauour, and then of the eternall saluation of our soules.

Now as they are thus abused when the former conditions are neglected; so especially when as wee make Idols of them and impart vnto them diuine worship; more esteeming them in our mindes, and affecting them in our hearts, and more speedily and earnestly seeking them in our practice and all our endeuours, than the fauour of God, his spirituall graces, or the eternall joyes of his Kingdome. Which Idolatrie worldly men vsually commit, & in this respect these earthly things honours, riches, and pleasures, are said to bee the Worldlings Trinitie, which they serue and worship in the place of God. And hence also it is that the Apostle Paul calleth couetous men Idolaters, and couetousnes Idolatry: and the Apostle Iames tearmeth worldlings adulterers and adulteresses, because they exalt these Idols in their hearts, and leauing our true Husband Iesus Christ, commit spirituall whoredome with these earthly vanities. And thus the ambitious Worldling offendeth, who preferreth his owne honour before the glory of God; and more greedily seeketh the prayse of the creature than of the Creatour, and the vaine glory of the World, before the eternall glory of Gods Kingdome. An example whereof we haue in the Iewes, who receiued honour one of another, and did not seek the honour which commeth of God alone. And in the Rulers, who would not professe their faith in Christ, because they loued the prayse of men more than the prayse of God. With which corruption old Elie was somewhat tainted, who honoured his sonnes more than God, and chose rather to please them, than to please his Creatour. And thus doe couetous Worldlings offend, who more esteeme their Gold than their God, and more affect earthly riches, than the spirituall treasures of Gods graces, and glory in his Kingdome; spending more time, and taking more paines to attaine vnto worldly abundance, than for the assurance of their owne saluation. And such an one was Iudas, who sold Christ himselfe for money, and made more account of his Idoll than of our Sauiour; and Demas, who when the profession of Religion, and possession of his earthly wealth would not be reconciled, forsooke that, and embraced the World. Contrary vnto which examples, was the affection & practice of the Prophet Dauid, who loued Gods Word and Commandements aboue Gold, yea, much fine Gold, and esteemed them sweeter than the honey and the honey combe. Finally, in the same these kind voluptuous Worldlings doe commit this grosse Idolatry, which as the Apostle saith, are haters of their pleasures more then louers of God, and as hee affirmeth in another place, make a god of their owne belly: all the more care and paines to please their appetite, than to please their maker, and preferring a dainde dish or some vain toye, before a good conscience and the everlasting ioyes of Gods Kingdom. Wherein what doe these Worldlings else but like foolish Esau sell their birth-right for a messe of pottage; like the fondle Israelites prefer the thraldom of Egypt before the libertie of the sonnes of God, and the Onyons and flesh-pots before their assured hopes of free plentie in the land that flowed with milke and honey? What do they else but like foolish children esteeme shining braslle before pure gold, and their toying trifles wherewith they make themselues poore, before their patrimonie and inheritance? The which their folly and vanitie though they cannot now see, yet hereafter they shal both know it, and with griefe confesse it; when as these earthly vanities being ready to leaue them, they shal also be abandoned of better hopes; & being neither able to retaine these, which their owne [illegible] fondnesse onely maketh seeme[illegible] obtaine the ioyes of Gods heauenly [illegible] dome, which alone are truely excellent, hauing by sinne, neglect and contempt, often made forfeiture of them for the obtayning of the other, they shall end their dayes in griefe and misery. To this purpose our Sauiour demandeth; What (saith he) auaileth delightfull vnto them, of the things appertayning to this present life? is it not a table daintily furnished, health of body, glory and riches? but if thou compareſt these worldly sweets, with the pleasure of a good conscience, they will seeme bitter. And if you will learne this, let vs inquire of one ready to depart this life, or decrepit with old age, and putting him in mind of his worldly vanities, with which in time past he was delighted, and on the other side, of all those good workes, and fruits of pietie, which hee hath euer brought forth in his whole life; and then aske him in which now he doth most rejoyce; we shall find that he will be confounded with shame to thinke of those, and exceedingly rejoyce, when he calleth these to his remembrance. So Ezechias being sicke, doth not comfort himselfe by calling to minde his former glory, kingly gouernment, pleasures and delights, but his seruing of God in integritie and vprightnesse of heart, &c. for as for those things, wee leaue them behind vs, whereas wee carry these with vs into our owne Country; they increase our account which wee must giue, when we are called to a reckoning, but these augment our glory, and, as it were, adde weight to our crowne of happinesse.

Let vs therefore, who haue giuen our names to Christ, & haue in the Sacrament of Baptisme, sworne our selues his souldiers, and professed, that wee will withstand and fight against these worldly vanities; make good this our oath and promise, not adhering with our hearts & affections vnto these earthly things, but let vs, as our Sauiour exhorteth vs, first seek the Kingdom of God & his righteousnesse; and as the Apostle perswadeth vs; let vs, being risen with Christ, seeke those things which are aboue, where Christ, sitteth at the right hand of God, setting our affections on things which are aboue and not on things which are on the earth. Let our conuersation be in Heauen, which is our owne Country, and there let vs lay vp our chiefe treasures, where they are exempted from all danger. Let vs vse this world and worldly things as though we vsed them not, neither in our iudgements esteeming, nor in our hearts affecting, nor in our practice seeking them before Gods spirituall graces, and the eternal ioyes of his Kingdome; but let vs loath & contemne them, when they come in this competition with them. Let not this earthly burthen of the flesh keep downe our soule and spirituall part, from hauing their chiefe residence in those heauenly habitations: for (as one saith) God gaue vnto vs an earthly bodie, that we should carry it into Heauen, and not that by it, the soule should be drawne and fixed to the earth. It is now earthly, but if we will, we may make it heauenly. Let vs not be like those vncleane fishes without fins forbidden in the Law, which continually lie tumbling and wallowing in the mud, but vnto these which hauing finnes doe swimme aloft vpon the waters: and as they, though they bee not able to flie towardes Heauen, yet often indeuour themselues to leape aboue the waters; so although we are pressed downe with these bodies of flesh, yet let vs mount aloft in our soules by heauenly meditations, and not suffer them continually to lie groueling vpon the earth, without any desire or indeuour of injoying that freer aire of spirituall contemplation. And this (as one saith) is the reason why the Lord hath giuen vnto vs a straight and vpright bodie; whereas contrariwise the beasts haue a body groueling towards the earth, that he might thereby teach vs to haue no commerce or communitie with the earth, and the fading vanities thereof, but might with our eyes also lift vp our hearts toward Heauen, in diuine and spirituall meditations. In the time of our infancie, and spirituall nonage, we haue for want of knowledge foolishly affected these transitory trifles; but now being better instructed, and hauing better knowledge of them, let vs learne to contemne them. For (as one saith) the sweetnesse is deceitfull, the labour vnfruitfull, the feare continuall, and our exaltation dangerous. The beginning wicked, the end wicked, and the end wicked: ...in the condition of all things ...in this world, state of mortalitie, which are more grosse, than with [illegible] affected and defined.

...red. It well becommeth children to dote vpon trifles, their want of wit serueing for their excuse; but if when they are come to age, and haue knowledge of better things, they are still fond of these fooleries, and ride vpon sticks, or sit playing in the dust, they seeme to all absurd and ridiculous: and so although our infancie in knowledge might excuse vs, and make our former fondnesse in affecting childish vanities seeme more excusable; yet if now hauing attained to riper yeares, and more knowledge, both of their vilitie and baseneſſe, and of the excellencie of Gods spirituall graces and eternall ioyes, wee will still dote vpon them, and preferre them either in our iudgements, affection, or practise before the other, our folly is so much greater than theirs, as the things which wee neglect to obtaine these trifles, doe excell those things in worth and excellencie, which worldly men doe thinke estimable. Whilest we looke vpon these things alone, and vncompared, wee may thinke them of some worth, and such as may deserue our loue in affecting them, and our labour in seeking them: but if euer we had tasted of these spirituall and heauenly dainties, wee would in comparison of them, loath the other, esteeming them with the Apostle no better than dung and losse, in respect of Christ, and the rich treasures of his benefits. And as those who hauing walked in the bright Sun-shine, can see nothing when they come into darke places; so if with the Apostle, wee had euer seene the glorious brightnesse of the heauenly ioyes, wee should neuer be so cleere-sighted in beholding these earthly vanities; but hauing the eyes of our minds dazeled with the former beauty, wee would looke ouer these contemptible trifles without respect. If wee could share our heart and affections betweene God and the World; haue one look in Heauen, and the other fixed vpon the earth; lift one eie vp to those heauenly excellencies, and cast the other downe vpon these earthly vanities; finally, if we could haue both the honour of the world, and the glory of Gods Kingdome; these temporary riches, & those eternall treasures; the pleasures of the flesh, and the ioyes of Heauen, there were some reason why wee should esteeme, affect, and seeke both, although with no equality, seeing there is such disproportion betweene the things desired. But the Lord hath plainly told vs, that wee cannot serue him and Mammon too, that we cannot bee in amitie with the World, but we must be at enmity with him; and that those who will be partakers of those heauenly excellencies, must at least in their heart and affection, forsake and renounce these earthly vanities, being alwayes readie to leaue all, and follow Christ. And therefore if we would be partakers of that eternall blessednesse, let vs not thinke that wee may pursue both with equall affection: much lesse preferre these transitory trifles before those heauenly ioyes, and euerlasting treasures; but counting this one thing necessary, euen the glorifying of God, in the saluation of our soules, and the fruition of those pleasures, which are at his right hand for euermore: let vs not only basely esteeme these earthly vanities, when they come in comparison with the other; but also hate, reject and contemne them, when they become the Deuils tentations to intice vs vnto sinne, and consequently impediments to hinder vs, in seeking and obtayning this heauenly happinesse.

CHAP. VII.

Of the signes whereby we may know whether we be infected with the loue of the World.

TO which purpose shall the following discourse chiefly tend, namely, to perswade all Christians to contemne these worldly vanities, when as either they are baits to allure vs vnto sinne; or doe weane our hearts from the loue of God, heauen and heauenly things, by inueigling our affection, and enticing vs to loue and set our hearts more vpon them, than vpon those inualuable iewels, and most rich treasures. In which argument that I may proceed with more profit and perspicuitie; and may more effectually cure this running canker, and contagious plague of worldly loue, which hath most perniciously spread it selfe abroad, and infected almost all men, not onely prophane Worldlings, but euen those who would be esteemed sincere Professours, and sound Christians; I will follow the Physicians methode, & first set downe the symptomes and signes of this disease, and then afterwards the remedies, that so we may know whether we be tainted with this contagion, and if we be, then how to cure it. The signes whereby we may know whether we be infected with the loue of the World and worldly vanities, preferring them before spirituall and heauenly excellencies are diuers. First, those things which we most esteeme & loue, on those we most often thinke, and that with vnwearied delight and chiefest comfort: for as our Saiuour Christ saith, where as the treasure is, there will the heart be also. And thus doth the exile take his chiefe delight & comfort, in thinking of his owne Country; the louer of his beloued; the ambitious man of his honours and preferments; the couetous man of

of his riches; the voluptuous man of his pleasures and delights, moouing in their minds, either how they may obtaine, retaine, or augment and increase them. And contrariwise those who most esteeme and affect heauen, and heauenly things, they take their chiefe delight in meditating, of those vnspeakeable ioyes reserued for them in their Countrie, or of the meanes whereby they may bee assured to attaine vnto them. Let therefore euery man examine himselfe before the tribunall seate of God, and call his owne conscience to witnesse, whether he thinke more, and with greater ioy and comfort vpon God, or vpon the world, heauen or earth, those eternall ioyes, or these momentanie vanities. For if God and heauenly things, be the chiefe obiect of our meditations, then doe we esteeme them our chiefest treasures, seeing our hearts and affections are set vpon them. But contrariwise, if it be our chiefe comfort and delight, to thinke on the world and worldly vanities, and if our meditations doe continually runne on them without wearinesse, taking no pleasure at all to call to mind those spirituall treasures, and heauenly excellencies; or if we chance to thinke of them, this thought be as suddenly vanished, as a flash of lightning; it is a most manifest signe, that our treasures are not in heauen, but vpon the earth, that we loue the world better than God, and more esteeme of these transitorie trifles, than of that eternall happinesse in Gods Kingdome.

Secondly, that which a man best loueth, of that hee most talketh and speaketh, with greatest comfort, and vnwaried delight; either commending, or admiring it, or finally conferring of the meanes whereby he may compasse and inioy it; for as our Sauiour teacheth vs, out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh. And the tongue is the interpreter of the minde; and consequently by the tongues language, we may easily gueſſe at the hearts meaning. As therefore the doore-keeper said vnto Peter, thou art surely of Galilee, for thy speech bewraieth thee: so when man taketh his whole delight in worldly and carnall communication, wee may conclude, that he is a citizen of the world, because his speech bewraieth him. For as when the clocke within is disordered, and the wheeles out of frame, the hammer and bell must needs giue a false sound: so when our hearts are inwardly disordered and corrupted with worldlinesse and prophanenes, our speech outwardly accordeth with them. So the Apostle Iohn saith, that because they are worldlings, therefore speake they of the world, and the world heareth them. Thus as the Prophet Esay telleth vs, the niggard will talke of niggardnesse, and thus the ambitious man taketh his chiefe delight to speake of his honours and preferments; the couetous man of riches, the voluptuous man of his pleasures and delights. In a word, whosoeuer hath his minde chiefly delighted with the worlds musick, he hath his tongue also tuned to the same key, and taketh his ioy and comfort in speaking of nothing, but of the world, and worldly vanities. But on the other side, when once our minds are weaned from the world, and when we haue laid vp our chiefe treasures in heauen; when we esteeme God our soules sole and chiefe delight, and with the Prophet Dauid account the Lord our glory and reioycing; when our chiefe comfort is in that assurance which we haue of our heauenly inheritance, and of the eternall ioyes of Gods Kingdome; then doe wee take our chiefe ioy and comfort, in talking and conferring of such matters as concerne the saiuing knowledge of God; then doe heauenly discourses replenish our heart with delight, and then is it our chiefe comfort and contentment, to speake of the excellencie and riches of our blessed patrimonie reserued for vs, or of the meanes how wee may further be assured that we shall inherit and enioy it. Let therfore our tongues be the touchstone of our hearts, wherby we may easily discerne whether they bee of heauenly mettall or of earthly drosse. And let vs examine our owne consciences, whether we take our chiefe delight and comfort in speaking of these heauenly things, and desire to frequent their company most, who vsually intertaine vs with such diuine discourses; and whether in hearing and talking of them, we be not glutted with satietie, but rather affected with cheerefull alacritie, and tickled with inward ioy. And if wee finde that wee can abide this triall wee may be assured to our comfort, that the Lord is our chiefe loue and delight, and that our treasures are not on earth, but in our heauenly countrie the kingdome of God. But if wee finde our selues vnacquainted with this language of Canaan, and take no more delight to heare it, than some vnknowne speech: If after a word or two spoken of these spirituall and heauenly excellencies, wee are straight glutted with loathing satietie, and offer occasion of some other talke, it plainly discouereth our inward corruption, and euidently sheweth, that our hearts and affections are not set vpon God, and the riches of his kingdome, but doe chiefly esteeme, and most feruently loue, the things of this life, the world, and worldly vanities.

But heere some may obiect, that if much thinking and speaking of the things of this world, bee infallible signes, that we loue them more than God, and the ioyes of his kingdome, then who can be acquited of this corruption, seeing the vsuall matter of meditation,

Q. Sect. 3. In what sense our much thinking and speaking of worldly things are signes of dication, and the most ordinarie theame whereon all men discourse, are their earthly affaires, and the things of this life? To which I answere, that whilest we remaine heere, wee are more flesh than spirit, and therefore it is no marvell if our discourses be for the most part worldly and carnall: but yet wee must take heede that wee do not please our selues in our corruptions, but labour to mortifie and subdue them, and to accustome and inure our hearts and tongues, to meditate and talke of spirituall and heauenly matters, as being of chiefest worth and excellencie. And if wee thus doe, then can wee not bee said to loue the world more than God, although wee talke more of it: for not simplie to thinke and speake more of these things, doth shew that we loue and affect them more, but to thinke and speake of them with greatest delight and chiefest comfort. For seeing the obiects both of our meditations and speeches, are offered vnto them by the ministerie of the senses, it is no marvell though we think and speake more of sensible things, though we lesse esteeme them, than of those heauenly excellencies, which are onely intellectuall, and not subiect to the senses although wee most value them in our iudgements, and affect them with our loue. Againe, our ordinarie callings and necessarie affaires of this life, doe inforce vs ordinarily and commonly to thinke and speake of them, more than of spirituall and heauenly things; but hereof it followeth not, that wee loue them more than they, for there is great difference betweene doing a thing often vpon necessitie, and doing it with chiefe comfort and delight. The workman thinketh more of his worke and tooles, the husbandman of his husbandrie, the painter of his picture and colours, than of their beloued wiues and most deare children; but yet it followeth not, that they affect them with more loue, seeing the reason hereof is, because their things are continually subiect to their senses, and the obiect of their labours and imployments; and not because they most esteeme them in their iudgements.

Thirdly, we loue those things most, which we most desire to enioy, and bestow greatest paines and study to obtaine our desire; for according to the measure of our loue in affecting, is our zeale in desiring, and our care and labour in seeking that which wee so much affect and desire. And this also is ioyned with an earnest endeuour, to vse all meanes which may further vs, and to auoid all impediments which might hinder vs in attaining vnto that, which with such great zeale we desire and seeke. Vnto which we may adde an inuincible patience, in suffering and induring all things, for the enioying of that which we esteeme and loue. For (as one saith) euery wicked worldling is so much more patient and stoyicke, to indure any euils, by how much the loue of the world doth more abound in him; and euery righteous man is so much more vnpatient and couragious to endure any afflictions, by how much he is more inflamed with the loue of God. For the loue of the world hath his beginning from our forefathers, his progresse from the delight of pleasure, his strength from the bond of custome: but the loue of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the holy Ghost. And thus worldly men aboue all things desire worldly vanities, thinking no care and study too much, nor paines too great, for the atchieuing of their desire; tyring their wits, spending their sweate and strength, yea consuming their bodies, and exposing themselues to all dangers, that they may attaine vnto their worldly hopes; in the meane time neuer thinking of the saluation of their soules, much lesse endeouring to vse those meanes whereby they may be assured of it. And thus the ambitious man aboue all things desireth honours and preferments, and consumeth his state, relinquisheth all pleasures, bendeth his whole studies, spareth for no labour, and runneth himselfe into most desperate perils, that he may attaine vnto them; the couetous man also holdeth the same course, neglecting his credit, and contemning all delights, that he may scrape together riches; And the voluptuous man, careth not by lust, surfetting, and drunkennesse to make himselfe more vile and contemptible than a brute beast; neither spareth hee for any cost, but consumeth his estate, that hee may spend the time present in delight and sensualitie. And why is this, but because euery one affect their seuerall obiects with their chiefe loue, and therefore thinke nothing too much which either they bestow or suffer for the enioying of them. And contrariwise, they who like the wise Merchant most esteeme and loue the precious pearle of Gods kingdome, his saving truth, and the ioyes of heauen, they will not sticke to sell all the world, with the pleasures, riches, and preferments thereof, that they may compasse and procure them. According to this signe therefore let vs examine our loue, whether it bee more set vpon God or vpon the world; and this may easily be determined, if wee consider whether we doe more earnestly desire the fauor of God & the assurance of our owne saluation, or the fruition of worldly vanities; whether we bestow greater study, cost and labour, in seeking after Gods spirituall graces & eternall ioyes, and indure all this paines with more patience; or in attaining vnto the pleasures and profits of this life. Finally, whether wee could bee content either neuer to haue, or soone to leaue, whatsoeuer in the earth is deare deare vnto vs, if the time of triall ſhould come; rather than wee would not purchaſe the precious pearle, euen Gods loue and our owne ſaluation. And leſt our ſecure conſciences ſhould deceiue vs, with a falſe conceit of this true loue, let vs further examine it according to the ſecond point, namely, whether with more care and diligence we deſire and ſeeke after thoſe meanes, whereby wee may bee aſſured that we ſhall obtaine theſe ſpirituall graces and heauenly happineſſe, which is a liuely faith, with a godly and ſanctified life (for ſanctification aſſureth vs of our iuſtification, vocation, election, and conſequently of our ſaluation) or the meanes whereby wee may attaine vnto our earthly deſires. And then againe, whether we doe with more circumſpection and indeuour auoid thoſe impediments, which might hinder vs from obtaining the heauenly treaſures of Gods kingdome, namely our ſinnes and the tranſgreſſion of Gods commandements, which are that wall of ſeparation betweene God and vs; or thoſe hindrances and lets which croſſe our worldly deſires. And if in theſe reſpects our conſciences iuſtifie vs, then doe we ſurely loue God better than the world; and preferre heauenly happineſſe, before earthly proſperitie. But on the other ſide, if our conſciences witneſſe againſt vs, that wee more deſire worldly vanities, than eternall glorie; that wee wholly neglect this, and beſtow all our ſtudy, coſt and labour in ſeeking and procuring of the other; that wee can willingly finde in our hearts by committing of ſinne to make a forfeiture of our heauenly inheritance, ſo as wee may obtaine by it ſome earthly profit or delight; and finally, that we more carefully auoid the impediments which croſſe our worldly deſires, than ſinne which like a ſtumbling blocke in the way hindreth our paſſage into our heauenly countrie; then doo wee more eſteeme, and more dearely loue the world and worldly vanities, than the Lord himſelfe, and the eternall ioyes of his kingdome.

Laſtly, that which we moſt eſteeme and loue, wee alſo take in it moſt ioy and contentment, and therefore are more carefull ſtill to keepe it whileſt wee haue it, and bewaile the loſſe thereof with greateſt griefe, when as it is taken from vs. The ambitious man moſt reioyceth in the vaine glory of the world, and careth not to loſe his life that he may preſerue his honour accounting it the bitterſt death to liue diſgraced. The couetous man moſt glorieth and reioyceth in his riches, and is content to hazard his ſoule, rather than his wealth. The voluptuous man moſt reioyceth in his pleaſures, and would rather ſell both earthly and heauenly patrimonies, than he would be depriued of his ſenſuall delights. And according to their ioy in keeping them, ſuch is their feare of loſing them, and anſwerable to both is their ſorrow and griefe, when as they are taken from them. On the other ſide, they whoſe hearts are inflamed with the fire of Gods loue, doe moſt reioyce in him, and in the aſſurance of his loue and mercie towards them; and making moſt precious account of this iewell, they had rather loſe the whole world than Gods fauour, or the teſtimonies thereof in their own conſciences; and grieue more when hauing fallen into ſinne, they want the ioy of their ſaluation, and doe not apprehend the loue of God, nor ſenſibly diſcerne the beames of his fauour ſhining into their hearts, as they haue done before times, than if they were depriued of all the honours, riches, and pleaſures of the world. Let euery one therefore according to this ſigne examine himſelfe; and if vpon triall we find, that God is our principall ioy, and that we moſt reioyce in his ſaluation; if with the Prophet Dauid wee had rather ſee the light of Gods countenance ſhining vpon vs, than that men ſhould ſhew vs any worldly good; and when it appeareth, haue more ioy of heart, than worldly men haue when their wheate and oyle abound; if in this we can with him rather place our bleſſednes, that the Lord is our God, than in the enioying of all the proſperitie of the world; if we haue greater care of retaining the fauour of God, & aſſurance of our own ſaluation, and feare of loſing it, than of theſe worldly vanities; and anſwerably doe vſe the meanes, indeuouring aboue all things to leade a godly and ſanctified life, wherby our aſſurance of them is more and more confirmed; and contrariwiſe to keepe our conſciences vnſpotted of any wilfull, knowne, or preſumptuous ſinnes, whereby it is weakened and impaired: And if beſides our purpoſe hauing fallen into theſe ſinnes, and thereby hazarded our chiefe ioyes, we can with more bitter griefe bewaile it, than any worldly ſhame and danger which we incurre thereby; crying out with Dauid: Make mee O Lord to heare ioy and gladneſſe, that the bones which thou haſt broken may reioyce; reſtore mee to the ioy of thy ſaluation, and ſtabliſh mee with thy free ſpirit: then may wee be aſſured to our comfort, that the Lord is our chiefe loue, and that we eſteeme him aboue the world, and worldly vanities. But if contrariwiſe we little reioyce in God, but take all our comfort and ſolace in earthly things; if wee feare the loſſe of our worldly wealth, pompe, and pleaſure, and care not for the loſſe of Gods loue and fauour; if we neuer endeuour to leade a Chriſtian life, nor take any paines in mortifying our ſinnes and corruptions, that we may attaine vnto the aſſurance of Gods loue and our owne ſaluation; and thinke no care or paines too much much to preserue and secure our worldly profits and delights; if we doe not mourne for our sinnes, because by them wee haue displeased God, and hazarded the losse of his fauour, but only in regard of some worldly punishment, which doth accompanie them; and can heartily grieue, when wee are depriued of earthly vanities, and haue no sorrow at all when by sinne wee haue lost the assurance of Gods loue, and of our heauenly inheritance in his kingdome, we make it manifest that our hearts and affections are groueling vpon the earth, and that we loue the world more than God.

Q. Sect. 6. In what sense our ioy and griefe about these earthly things, are signes of our loue of the world.

It cannot indeed bee denied, but that in respect of sense and feeling, a man may more reioyce in worldly things, than in God, and heauenly excellencies, and answerably may haue more care, feare and griefe about the keeping and losing of them, than the other; and yet may truly loue and reioyce in God, and grieue for his sinnes, because he hath displeased him; for as wee are more flesh than spirit, so our carnall affections and passions, are more strong and violent about fleshly and carnall things, than about things diuine and spirituall: both because we haue more corruption than grace in vs, and also because these earthly things which are naturall and sensible, both in their inioying and in their losse, doe more sensibly affect our naturall affections. Whereas our affections towards God and heauenly things are spirituall and supernaturall; and the things which we thus affect diuine and heauenly; in both which respects, they are not so sensible as the other. And therefore the truth of our loue, reioycing, feare and sorrow, about heauenly and earthly things, is not to bee measured by our senses, their quantitie, and violence of our passions, but according to their simplicitie and sincerity. But yet if in our sense, or in the quantitie and degree, our ioy the in world exceed our ioy in God, and our sorrow for earthly losses bee more strong and violent, than it is for sinne, and the losse of Gods fauour, it cannot bee denied, but that it proceedeth from the strength and violence of our naturall corruptions, and that we haue the like corruption in our loue, which in respect of the ardencie and heate affecteth earthly things more than heauenly. And therefore taking notice hereof, that we loue the world more than God, and that wee set our affections more vpon earthly vanities, than vpon heauenly excellencies, we must not rest contented with our imperfections and corruptions, and applaud our selues, because wee haue in vs the loue of God in some measure, and (though not in the heate of our affections, yet) in the soundnesse of our iudgements wee more esteeme him; but we must labour earnestly to perfect our wants, and to mortifie our corruptions, and neuer to be at quiet, but still aspiring from one degree to another, till at last wee attaine vnto that degree of perfection and sanctification, that wee can loue and reioyce in God, more than in the world, and grieue more for his displeasure, than for any earthly losse, and that both in quantitie and degree, and in our owne sense and feeling. For otherwise if these affections which wee thinke sanctified, and in truth, doe stand at a stay, and we be contented with that weake and imperfect measure, hauing not so much as a desire or indeauour, that they goe forward and increase; it is a manifest signe that there is neither truth nor sanctification in them; but that they are false and counterfeit; seeing all true grace is either in the growth, or at least, desireth and laboureth in the meanes, whereby it may grow to more perfection.

CHAP. VIII.

That the best things in the world are but meere vanities, in comparison of Gods spirituall graces, and heauenly excellencies.

Q. Sect. 1. That the best are too much tainted with the loue of the world.

AND thus haue I set downe the signs of worldly loue, whereby this dangerous disease may bee discouered and knowne; according vnto which if wee examine our selues, I doubt not, but many who through their securitie thought themselues sound, & in good case, shall find that they are desperatly sicke of this disease euen to the death, vnlesse they prouide speedily wholesome medicines for their recouerie. Yea and those who are in the best estate, if without selfe-loue flatterie and partialitie, they trie their estate according to these rules, they shall plainely discerne, that howsoeuer Christ hath called and culled them out of the world, yet they haue left some part of their heart and affections behind them; and that howsoeuer through Gods mercie they are pulled (as it were) by strong hand, out of this spirituall Sodome; yet they are ready euery hand-while with Lots wife to looke backe, as being loth to leaue their worldly profits and preferments, and to bee weaned from the pleasures of sinne, which they haue so long sucked with so great delight. They shall finde that they are like prisoners newly deliuered, and freed from their bolts, who by their halting and lamenesse are still put in mind of their old bonds and fetters; that they are like greene and feeble bodies newly recouered of some dangerous disease, that is, weake and void of strength in spirituall graces, and especially in the true loue of God,

God, and his spirituall and heauenly matters, for as much as we finde a measure of this inordinate worldly loue, euen in the very best, and most carefull ouer themselues, very much to hinder, and withdraw our hearts and affections from setting vpon those heauenly matters, and to make vs more dull and vnapt vnto all holy exercises, and duties of deuotion, how much more then will it preuaile with those that are starke dead in sinne, and haue no sparkle of the fire of Gods loue, or any sauour of heauenly things at all? Therefore we must labour to get our hearts first purged, and that vtterly from the loue of the world, before we can euer be truly affected with the loue of God, and his spirituall graces reuealed in Gods word. Fiftly, they (I meane worldly riches, when they are like the barley cakes which Gideons man saw) when a man is conuerted vnto Christ, then they haue lost their force, and liue in spirituall men, whereas the worldly are hardly drawne from their old sinfulnesse, to which they were so long inured, but are ready accordingly to affect their old lusts, and to runne their former courses of sinne and wickednesse, vnlesse they be restrained by their husbanding of Christ and by the power of his spirit, word and chastisements (as it were) by strong hands held backe from running on in their lewd and wicked courses.

And therefore we haue shewed the signes of this disease, so now in the next place I will prescribe the remedies, and first do vse such preseruatiues as may serue, both for preseruance of such as are yet found, who are not yet infected with this spirituall poison, & also for purges to free vs from these hurtfull humors of worldly loue, if they abound in vs, which being applied by the pastor, and made effectuall by Gods blessing, may restore vs to health, though through these rough and noysome humours appearing vs, we were brought into a deepe consumption of sinnes, & euen vnto the very gates of death. And finally, for cordiall restoratiues to restore vs being weak, vnto our perfect health and confirme & strengthen vs more & more in the true loue of God, his spirituall graces & eternall ioyes of his Kingdome. That therefore we may not immoderately loue the world, worldly things, but may contemne them when they come in comparison of heauenly excellencies, and that we may neither affect them, but may hate and abhorre them, as they are the diuels instruments and baites to perswade and allure vs vnto sinne, in these reasons I moue vs first, because there is no cause why we should thus immoderately loue and affect them, neither any reason why we should desire to possesse them in respect of the things themselues, though we did vse, loue and desire them, secondly, because there is no reason hereof in regard of vs, who do affect and couet them. In the things themselues, there is no cause of this immoderate loue; first, for those things we make so much doe vpon and desire after vs, they do not bring vnto vs any true, substantiall, or certaine good: and secondly, the soule being thus affected, they become the instruments of much euill; and therefore as in the former respect they are to be contemned and despised, so in the latter they are to be abhorred and reiected. They do not bring vnto vs any sound and certaine goods first, because they are of no great and desirable goodnesse, though we should long inioy them, and also because they are altogether vncertaine, both in the getting and possessing. They are also of great goodnesse vnto vs, though we could for euer inioy them; first, because these things themselues are vaine, and of no great worth or excellencie, whereupon also it followeth, that they doe not satisfie, nor giue vnto vs any true or sound contentment; and secondly, because they are euerly vnsatisfiable, and besides vaine and accompanied with innumerable euils, and manifold miseries. For if I shall proue that there is no cause why we should desire them, either in respect of themselues or vs; that they bring vs no true good, but contrariwise much euill; that as they haue no great goodnesse in them whilest we haue them, so though they had, yet we haue no assurance of them, that they are vaine, and of no excellencie, and yet mingled with a multitude of miseries, there will be little reason why we should greatly loue them, and much lesse why we should preferre them before Gods spirituall graces and heauenly ioyes, or accept of them as Satans wages, whereby he perswadeth vs to serue him by committing of sin, whereby we hazard the losse of our soules, and of our heauenly inheritance, which are infinitely of more worth than the whole world.

Q. Sect. 3. That the best things the world can boast of, are but meere vanities.

First therefore we are to know, that the world, and the best things which it can boast of, are but meere vanities, and in comparison of Gods spirituall graces, and our heauenly inheritance, of no weight or excellencie; neither is there any thing in the earth great or excellent, but the Christian minde which contemneth and despiseth these highly esteemed vanities. They make a faire shew indeed to those whose iudgements are already forestalled with the false conceit of their corrupt flesh, and seeme to be of some value and greatnesse to those who looke vpon them through the spectacles of affection. But if we pull off their false dresse, and seriously and soundly behold them as they are, stripping off their colours and painted vizards, we shall find the world in his chiefe beauty and pompe to bee but a glorious hypocrite, faire in shew, and foule in truth; promising and promiſſing greatly, and performing nothing; or a beautifull sepulcher outwardly adorned with all cost and bravery, but within full of ſtench and corruption; or likewiſe our faire buildings in chriſtendome, which nothing ſo ſumptuous ſhew to the paſſenger, ſcorne to lodge poore men as vacant ſubiects, but within have no proviſion for inhabitants, nor food to nourish thoſe who ſhould dwell in them. This like vanitie alſo is in all thoſe worldly things, which are ſo eſteemed and admired of thoſe, who have erected them in their hearts, as their idols whom they ſerve and adore; here indeed truly reſembling idols and images, which are outwardly adorned with gold and precious ornaments, and make repreſentation of ſome excellent perſonage, whereas if you examine them any further than the very ſuperficies and outſide, you ſhall find them no better than ſtockes or ſtones. So theſe worldly vanities ſeeme to thoſe whoſe weake ſight can pierce no deeper than the outward ſhew, beautifull and glorious; whereas in truth if we could behold them inwardly with the eye of a ſound iudgement, wee ſhould eaſily diſcerne them to be contemptibly baſe, and of no value. In this reſpect like thoſe goodly and beautifull pageants which being outwardly adorned and ſet forth with gold and painted colours, moue multitudes of people to run after them, and to behold them with loyfull admiration and raviſhing wonder; whereas if you looke into their inſide, you ſhall finde nothing but a few ſticks, raggs, and patches; and in reſpect of their ſubſtance and durablenes ſo ſlight and weake, that they are only fit for a vaine ſhew, and to ſerve for a daies ſport.

Q. Sect. 4. The vanitie of worldly things proued by teſtimonies. Pſal 39.6. Pſal 73. 20.

But this vanitie of the world and worldly things may be more ſpecially ſhewed both by teſtimonies, and alſo euident reaſons: for the former, Dauid affirmeth that man in his beſt eſtate is altogether vanitie; that he walketh but in a ſhadow and diſquieteth himſelfe in vaine. And elſewhere he compareth this worldly proſperitie to a dreame, which delighteth whilſt a man ſleepeth, but when he awaketh vaniſheth away, and leaueth nothing behinde it, but ſorrow and diſcontent, becauſe their loues and hopes are fruſtrated. So the holy Ghoſt ſaith, that the power and proſperitie of the Churches enemies, ſhall be like as an hungrie man that dreameth, and behold he eateth, and when he awaketh his ſoule is empty: and like as a thirſtie man that dreameth, and he hee is drinking; and when he awaketh, behold he is faint, and his ſoule longeth. In which reaſon obſerue withall that the Apoſtle ſaith the figure of this world doth paſſe away; that is, that all worldly things are but ſhadowes and figures ſoone paſſed, and like a ſhadow or a dreame which vaniſh away; becauſe nothing in them ſubſiſteth and ſtandeth in truth. How childiſh therefore is their minde which reſteth ſatisfied, and is proud of dreames, finding no ſolide reſt in thoſe things which ſhortly after paſſe away? The Prophet Eſay compareth the worldlings endeuours in hunting after theſe earthly vanities, to the weauing of a ſpiders webbe, which being made with great labour, is altogether vnfit to make a garment to keepe warme or couer nakednes, and good for nothing but to catch flies. And the Apoſtle Paul affirmeth that before his converſion vnto God, his vnderſtanding, thoughts and communication which were ſpent about worldly things, were meerely childiſh; the which being come to a riper age in Chriſt he put away, exerciſing his minde and tongue about things ſpirituall and heauenly. So others compare the deſires and labours of worldly men to children's ſports, their ſtately buildings to their houſes erected in the ſands, their gathering of riches, to their gathering of ſtones, and other trifles; their honours and preferments, to their kings, lords, and gouernours which they make in play among themſelues; their affecting of earthly vanities, to that great account which children make of ſhiet contemptible toyes, preferring their copper chaines, brooches, babies, rope and ſcourges, and ſuch like trifles, before both their parents and their patrimonie; and finally their fooliſh mourning and lamenting for the loſſe of their riches and preferments, to the ridiculous crying of filly children, when their houſes are caſt downe, or their trifles taken from them. Neither is there any difference betweene them, ſauing that children very eaſily procure thoſe things which they ſo much affect; but worldlings purchaſe their follies at deare rates, and obtaine them with much ſweate and labour; they ſecurely enioy their ſports and delights; but theſe, as they compaſſe their deſires with much paine and difficultie, ſo they poſſeſſe them with much care, feare, and danger. To which purpoſe another crieth out: Fie O wretched man (ſaith hee) that all which thou affecteſt is but meere vanitie, and all folly and madneſſe, whatſoeuer thou doeſt in the world, except that alone which thou doeſt towards God, for God, and to Gods glory; whatſoeuer thou doeſt without God is all fraud and vanitie, becauſe there is nothing good which is without the chiefe goodneſſe.

Eſa. 29. 8.

1. Cor. 7. 31.

But if we would haue a teſtimonie about all exceptions, let vs conſider what Solomon ſpeaketh of theſe worldly things, who had more worldly wiſedome and iudgement rightly to value them, and alſo more experience of them than any other ſeeing he abound-abounded more in all worldly prosperity, than any man that euer liued vpon the earth. For as in himselfe he excelled all mortall men that euer breached, in wisdome and vnderstanding, the which he purposely imployed, to improue all these worldly things to their vttermost value, as himselfe professeth; so in his state hee farre out-stripe all others in prosperity and abundance. For if you respect his honour, the Holy Ghost saith, that there was neuer any among the Kings like vnto him; for he was a mightie Prince, yea, a great Monarch, who reigned ouer all Kingdomes, from the Riuer vnto the land of the Philistines, and vnto the border of Egypt; and he ruled in all the region on the other side of the riuer from Tiphsah euen vnto Azzah; ouer all the Kings on the other side the riuer, and they brought him presents and serued him all the dayes of his life. Yea, and not only they, but all the Kings of the earth sought the presence of Salomon, to heare his wisdome that God had put in his heart, & they brought euery man his present, vessels of siluer, and vessels of gold, and raiment, armour, and sweet odours, horses and mules from yeere to yeere. If ye looke to his riches, hee had all things in abundance, and excelled herein also all the Kings of the earth, as the Holy Ghost speaketh. He had six hundred, threescore, and six talents of gold yeerely, besides that which was brought in by his Tole-gatherers and Merchants, and the presents which the Kings of Arabia brought vnto him: he had a stately Throne of Iuory with fiue steps, and twelue Lions at the ends of them couered with gold; hee made two hundred Targets of beaten gold, fiue hundred sickels going to a Target, and three hundred shields of beaten gold, three hundred sickels going to a shield; his drinking vessels, yea, all the vessels of his house of the wood of Lebanon, were of pure Gold; as for siluer in his dayes it was nothing esteemed, but was as common as stones in the street. For his prouision he had for one day thirtie measures of fine flower, and threescore measures of meale, which according to the least account is two hundred thirtie two quarters, and according to the estimate of others much more; thirty Oxen, an hundred Sheep, beside Harts and Buckes, Bugles and fat fowle. Hee had forty thousand stalls of Horses for his Chariots, and twelue thousand Horsemen. His pleasures also were answerable to his Honours and riches, for looke what delights wit could inuent, or wealth and power prouide, and he denied none of them vnto himselfe; nor withdrew his heart from any ioy, as himselfe confesseth. He had seuen hundred Queenes to his Wiues, and three hundred Concubines, he built great workes and stately houses, he planted fruitfull Vineyards and pleasant Gardens, with goodly Orchards furnished with all manner of fruits, he had his Fountaines and delightfull Springs, his Woods and shady Groues, his sweet Musicke, and in a word, all the delights of the sonnes of men. Besides all which priuate good, he publikely ruled with peace and tranquillitie all his Kingdomes, his whole life. Hee was loued, feared, and admired of all his people for his Wisedome and iustice; and that also which is the ioy and comfort of a good King, all his Subiects liued in great prosperity vnder him. For all Iudah and Israel dwelt without feare euery man vnder his Vine and vnder his fig-tree, from Dan euen to Beersheba all the dayes of Salomon. By all which it appeareth, that as neuer man had the like wisdome, so neither the like prosperity and abundance of all worldly blessings. But heare after all his pompe and prosperity what testimony he giueth to all these earthly things, and that vpon his owne experience. Vanitie of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanitie of vanities all is vanitie. Yea, hee concludeth afterwards that all is not only vanitie, but also vexation of spirit, and that there is no profit vnder the Sunne. If a poore man though neuer so wise, or a Scholer out of his knowledge and discourse had thus proclaimed the Worlds vanity, it might haue beene deemed to haue proceeded from want of experience, because they had neuer trial of them, or from some melancholike conceit, mouing them to contemne that which they had no hope to enioy. And therefore because we should take no exceptions against this testimony, it hath pleased the Lord to teach vs this lesson by such an one as had not only most wisdom to iudge of them, but also most triall and experience of all these things, which the world esteemeth good, and worth desiring, both in respect of his abundance, and great variety of them, and his long, secure and peaceable time, wherein he did inioy them; and that without the mixture of those innumerable troubles, with which other men are vexed and molested.

And so much for the testimonies which serue to shew the worlds vanitie, vnto which innumerable others might bee added out of writings, both diuine and heathenish; but these being sufficient I will come to the reasons, which also proue it. And first the vanitie and worthlesnes of the world and worldly things in comparison of those which are spirituall and heauenly, may hereby appeare, in that they are but Gods common gifts which hee giueth in his infinite bountie, as well to his enemies, as vnto his friends; to those who neglect all dutie, and rebell against him, as well as to his children and seruants, who loue and feare him. Yea, commonly the Lord bestoweth these worldly things in great abundance vpon the wicked, whereas for

2. Sect. 6.
That these worldly things are of no great excellencie, seeing they are but Gods common gifts.

for the most part he giueth them to the godly and righteous, whom he chiefly loueth, but with a sparing hand, and so much onely as may serue for their necessary vse. And this Dauid obserued, whereas hee saith, that his wicked aduersaries were inclosed in their own fat, that they had plentie not onely for themselues, but for their children. Yea so great was the prosperitie of wicked men, and so sharpe his owne punishments and chastisements, that when he considered of it, his feet were almost gone, and his steps had well nere slipt, being ready to preferre the estate of the vngodly, before the blessed condition of the children of God. And thus the Church in the Lamentations complaineth, that her aduersaries were the chief, and that her enemies prospered; whereas shee was afflicted, and her children led into captivitie. But of this I haue spoken more fully when I generally intreated of prosperitie, and therefore will for the generall, adde no more testimonies nor examples.

Psal. 17. 10, 14.

Psal. 73. 2.

Lament. 1. 5.

¶. Sect. 7. That God bestoweth honours as well vpon the wicked as vpon the godly.

Onely let vs consider the truth hereof in those three instances of Honours, Riches and Pleasures. And first for Honours wee shall find, that God hath more bountifully imparted them vnto the wicked and reprobate, than vnto the godly and faithfull. Thus Esau flourisheth in pompe and worldly glory, going attended in great state, with foure hundred men waiting at his heeles; and Iacob creepeth and croucheth vnto him, meanely accompanied with a few poore seruants, that tended his sheepe and cattell. Thus Pharaoh sitteth in the Regall Throne, raigning and ruling at his pleasure, and making his corrupt and vnjust will to stand for law: whereas Moses and Aaron, the beloued of the Lord, are humble suiters vnto him for the peoples libertie, and at his becke to goe and come as he appointed. Thus the high Priests, Scribes and Pharisies, sit in Moses Chaire, and are esteemed the great Rabbins and Doctors of the World; whilest the deare Disciples of Iesus Christ, are basely esteemed as Galileans and poore fishermen, conuented before the judgement seates, checked, taunted, scorned and misused, as though they had beene the very off-scourings of the World. Yea thus doe wicked Herod, Pilate, Annas and Caiphas raigne as Kings, and sit on the judgement seate, absoluing and condemning whom they will: and contrariwise, our Sauiour Christ, the onely begotten and deerely beloued Sonne of God, is haled before them, accused and reproched, scorned and derided, buffeted, spit vpon, whipped and misused.

¶. Sect 8. Reprobates abound with riches as much as Gods seruants.

The like also may be said of riches, with which wicked men commonly most exceed, whereas Gods seruants oftentimes are scanted of necessaries. So Nabal aboundeth in all superfluitie, and Dauid is an humble suiter vnto him for reliefe; the false Prophets are nourished at Iesabels Table, and poore Elias is in commons with the Rauens; the Pharisies and Scribes eat the fat of the Land, and abound in wealth, and the Disciples are forbidden to possesse gold or siluer, yea, to carry a Scrip, wherein to put their necessaries, or to be Owners of two Coats at once; vnto Iudas is the bagge committed, whereas Peter hath neither siluer nor gold, as hee professeth. The Idolatrous Kings and heathen Potentates haue the World at will, strouting themselues in their stately Palaces, and wallowing in their wealth; but Iesus Christ, the Lord of Heauen and Earth, and heire apparant of Gods glorious Kingdome, when he is borne, hath Manger for his Bed, the Stable for his Lodging Chamber, and the Oxen and Horses for his Chamber-fellowes. Neither was hee better prouided for, when hee came to riper age, for as himselfe testifieth, The Foxes haue holes, & the Birds of the Heauen haue nests, but the Sonne of man hath not whereon to lay his head; yea, so vnfurnished was he of wealth at some times, that when hee was to pay poll-mony, hee was faine to borrow it of a silly fish.

Mat. 8. 20.

Luke 2. 7.

¶. Sect. 9. The wicked worldling hath a greater share of worldly pleasures, than Gods children.

Finally, the pleasures of the World are also Gods common gifts, which he bestoweth as well on the wicked and reprobate, as vpon his owne children and seruants: yea in truth much more plentifully haue the enemies of God and his grace, enjoyed them from the beginning of the World to this day, than those who haue feared and serued the Lord. For seeing they are to vs, by reason of our corruption, like Kniues in the hands of children, and sweet and licorous meats, whereon they are apt to surfet, therefore the Lord suffering wicked men, as it were slaues and vassals, to take their liberty, and to vse what diet they list, as not regarding their spirituall health and life, nor caring what becomes of them; hath alwayes had speciall care of his own children, dieting them with such a small pittance, as they may well digest, without impairing the health of their soules; and mixing these delicious drinkes of pleasures, in the bitter cup of afflictions, whereby he hath still purged away these grosse humours of corruption, when they beganne to abound with them through their daintie fare. And thus he suffered those abiects, Ismael and Esau, to spend their time in hunting and reuelling, pleasure and delight; whereas the promised seed, Isaac and Iacob, to whom the promises belonged spent their time in painfull labours, and whilest they kept their sheepe, indured the scorching heate of the Sunne by day, and the pinching cold of the frosts by night. Thus Dauids wicked enemies were so pampered with delights, that their eyes stood out with fatnesse, whereas hee was daily punished and chastened euery morning.

Psal. 73. 4, 5.

...ings. Thus Dives the rich Glutton, clothed himselfe with purple and fine linnen, and fared deliciously every day; and poore Lazarus, beloued of God, is pinched with hunger, clothed with rags, and tormented with sores and sicknesse. Finally, the whore of Babylon is suffered to haue in her hand a golden cup, full of voluptuous pleasures and delights, and not only to drinke thereof largely her selfe; but also to make drunke with her abundance the great Princes, and Potentates of the earth: whereas the poore Saints of God haue allotted to their share the cup of afflictions; wherein our Sauiour Christ vouchsafeth to them, drunke a larger draught, then euer any mortall man. In which respect, the Lord dealeth with mankind, as the wise Physician with his sicke patients; those ouer whom hee is most carefull, in regard both of the loue hee beareth them and the hope hee conceiueth of their recouery, hee straightly diteeth, forbidding them the vse of those meats and drinkes, which by reason of their disease they loue and desire; and giueth them many a bitter potion, and trouble some plaister, that he may hereby restore them to their health: whereas contrariwise those whom he neglecteth, because their diseases are desperate, and past hope of cure, are permitted to vse what diet they list without restraint. And thus the Lord giueth to his deare Seruants whom hee intendeth to cure, the bitter potions of afflictions, and restraineth them of worldly pleasures, which are so delightfull to their carnall appetites; whereas hee suffereth reprobate men, who are desperately sicke in sinne, to glut themselues with these filthy delights, and to haue their owne carnall appetite, as the rule and direction of their diet.

By all which it appeareth, that these worldly benefits of Honours, Riches and Pleasures are common to the wicked, yea, that they haue in them the largest share, and greatest part; whereas contrariwise God bestoweth his spirituall Graces, Faith, Loue, Hope, a good Conscience and the rest, as also the assurance of his eternall and heauenly ioyes vpon his owne seruants and children, who are most neere and deare vnto him. Whereby it is cleare and euident, that these are infinitely of more worth and value than the other; for if wee will acknowledge the Lord to bee a wise Dispenser of his owne gifts, we need not to doubt, but that he giueth his least benefits vnto those whom hee least affecteth, and reserueth his rich treasures, and choiceth iewels, for those whom hee most dearely loueth. Neither can it bee imagined, that if hee esteemed these earthly things of any value, hee would giue them to his enemies, and deny them to his friends, suffer reprobate and wicked men to abound with them, and giue them so sparingly to his owne seruants, yea, to his onely Sonne, in whom hee was well pleased. For what wise man will inrich his slaues, and suffer his deare children to liue in want? be liberall to strangers and enemies, imparting vnto them gifts of great value; and deny the vse of them to his owne Family? whereby it manifestly appeareth, that seeing the Lord infinite in wisdome and in loue towardes his seruants and children, as also in iustice towardes his enemies, doth bestow these earthly things more abundantly vpon the wicked, than vpon the godly; therefore hee esteemeth them but small trifles of little worth or value, which hee bestoweth as temporall rewards vpon his slaues; and as wages for some base and seruile duties by them performed; and that he accounteth his spirituall graces, and heauenly ioyes his chiefe treasures; and gifts of greatest value, seeing he peculiarly reserueth them for his Elect, and bestoweth them vpon his owne seruants and children, who are most deare vnto him. And as Abraham gaue portions to his base children, and so sent them away; reserning his chiefe riches, and the inheritance for his sonne Isaac, the child of promise: so the Lord bestoweth a portion of temporall and earthly benefits, vpon these bastards and base creatures; but as for his chiefe riches of spirituall grace, and his peculiar inheritance of eternall glory, them he reserueth for his owne children, to whom the couenant of grace, and the promises of the Gospell belong and appertaine.

Quem enim fert despiciendo considerat, quia deus omnipotens est, peruersis præstat. Si enim principaliter magna essent, nequaquam hæc eis citò aduersarijs suis tribueret. Greg. Moral. lib 17. cap. 14.

CHAP. IX.

That these worldly things haue their goodnesse onely from opinion, and from competition; from difficultie in obtayning, and from their rarenesse in inioying.

SEcondly, the vanity and worthlesnesse of these worldly things appeareth, in that they haue in them no sound and substantiall excellencie, but what they haue from their opinion who injoy them: being meane to those, who meanly account them, excellent to those who admire and adore them, and base, and of no worth to those who contemne and despise them. So that their goodnesse is not in truth, but in conceit; and if you would know of what value they are, you must not consider them in themselues, but bring them to be measured by the deceiuable eine of mans phantasie, and waigh them in the vaine and vnconstant ballance of humane opinion. In which you shall find no certainty, seeing euery one varieth from another, yea, sometimes from himselfe, now esteeming that which erewhile he contemned, and despising that, which not long since he loued and admired.

Q. Sect. 1. That worldly things haue their chiefe excellencie from opinion.

mired. One maketh Honour his Idoll, aferibing vnto it the chiefe excellency; and in comparison thereof basely esteemeth of riches, and neglecteth pleasures; another adoreth Gold as his God, and careth neither for his credit nor delight, so as his Idoll be propitious vnto him; a third chiefly doteth on voluptuous pleasures, hauocking his estate, and setting his good name and reputation to sale for a dayes delight, or a nights pleasure; yea, wee may often see the same man one while raising the prizes of these earthly Coines, and soone after crying them downe againe; in his childhood and youth, hee chiefly esteemeth pleasures, in his riper yeares and full strength, his Honour and reputation; and in his old dayes despising both these, hee is wholly transported with couetousnesse, and biteth at no bait so eagerly, as at that which is couered with Gold. Now what worth or excellencie can bee in that, which hath its whole subsistence in so vnstable a ground, altering and changing, rising and falling, according to the vaine conceit, and inconstant opinion of mutable mankind?

§. Sect. 2. Opinion maketh honours so much affected.

But let vs consider the truth hereof in those speciall instances of Honours, Riches and Pleasures which Worldlings dote vpon with such great loue and admiration. And first for the Honours of the World, who seeth not, that they are in themselues but bare shadowes and titles, consisting in the obseruance of some idle Rites and Ceremonies, as in higher place, capping, crouching, bowing, kneeling, descents, armes, pictures, words, and termes, which haue in them no substantiall good at all, but onely are esteemed and reputed so, in the conceit and opinion of the giuers and receiuers; the which foundation being altogether vnstable and infirme, that which is built vpon it, must needs bee vaine and mutable; Honours changing and varying, as oft as their opinions who do giue them change and alter. And hereof is it, that the selfe same thing which is honourable in one man, is disgracefull in another; that which is now prayed and extolled, is at another time discommended and disgraced; and those obseruances and ceremonies, which in one place doe most magnifie a mans worth and dignitie, doe in another place and country vilifie and disgrace him; the opinions of men, changing with the aire, and Honours with opinion.

§. Sect. 3. That opinion giueth riches their chiefe excellencie. Aurum & argentum natura terræ est vilis & alba, quam solus hominum

The like also may be said of riches, which although they be more vsefull and substantiall than the other, yet their chiefe goodnesse and excellency consisteth in the opinion of those who desire and possesse them; for wherein worth and excellency we in pearles and precious stones which are valued at such high rates (if at least we measure worth by fruition and vse) but that which they haue from the vngrounded pleasance, and vaine conceit of those who desire them? What great excellencie is there in Gold and Siluer, aboue Copper, Iron and Steele, but that as one saith, by the madnesse of some men, they are become precious? Neither hath nature (as saith another) made them of more value, but the will and opinion of men. For if wee measure things by their vse and profit, Iron and Steele are much more necessary to the well being of man; sithing they do not only serue better for his defence, but also are the necessary Instruments of Husbandry, Arts and Occupations. And yet so strongly this ill grounded opinion preuaileth with worldly and couetous men, that they take much more delight in beholding their Siluer in their darke Chests and Closets, than the comfortable beames of the Sunne in a Winters day, though it be the chief instrument of their life and being; yea are ready vpon all offers to sell the fauour of God, that they may obtaine Gold; and the ioyes of Heauen together with their own soules, that they may inrich themselues with this shining earth and base metall. The like also may be said of Chaines, Bracelets, Rings, and such other massie ornaments; which were they not made precious and estimable by the opinion of those that weare them, would otherwise bee thought cumbersome burthens, and troublesome clogs, which they would not be intreated, and scarcely hired to weare about them; yea, were they imposed vpon them, as a punishment, and not willingly put on as ornaments, they would be borne with some impatiencie. But now so much are they extolled by the vaine opinion and conceit of men, that these things are not onely esteemed good, but in a high degree of excellencie, of which they become proud, as though they were parts of their owne body. In so much as they carry their deare prized fetters, and golden Giues, not only without ease, but also with pleasure and delight; and weare these burthens not onely vpon them, but pierce their eares and make holes and wounds in their owne flesh, that so they may hang these clogs about, yea, fix them fast vnto them. So as it is to be feared lest together with their opinion, their fondnesse and dotage increasing, they will in time with the barbarous Indians weare them also in their lips and nose. To this purpose one saith, that the wife imposeth vpon her rich husband, a necessitie of cost and charge; that she may drinke out of rich plate, sleepe in sumptuous furniture, lie in a siluer bed, load her hands with golden bracelets, and her necke with chaines and iewels. For women are delighted more with seruice, if they be of gold, neither doe they esteeme them vertuous, if they be precious; nor thinke them beside, if their treasure glister not in them. Yea, they are delighted with their their wounds, that they may thrust Gold through their eares, and hang Pearles and Iewels at them: and yet these Iewels haue their weight, and such clothing their cold; they sweat with the burthen of their Iewels, and are chill with cold in their thin Silkes; and yet the opinion of their price helpeth all; and that which nature abhorreth, custome hath established and extolleth.

Lastly, what worth and excellency is in worldly pleasures, more than opinion imputes vnto them? For doe wee not see, that that which to one is magnified as his chiefe delight, is vnto another loathsome and tedious? and contrariwise, that which is accounted this mans Hell, is esteemed another's Paradise? One thinketh hunting and hawking his worldly happinesse, another accounteth it a tedious toyle; one swalloweth downe as pleasing Nectar, and the more hee drinketh, the more hee desireth; another when his thirst is quenched, receiueth it as a medicine or loathsome potion; one pampereth his body, another abhorreth Gluttony, a vile and beastly vice; one taketh his chiefe pleasure in Masking and Reuelling, in carding, dicing and dancing; another hateth them as idle and effeminate sports, and placeth his happinesse in martiall exercises, which the other fleeth as painfull and dangerous. In a word, euery man hath his seuerall delight wherein he taketh his chiefe contentment, and this contentment hee hath not from any worth or excellencie in the thing it selfe, for then it would giue vnto all others the same delight, but from his owne opinion and conceit. And hence it is that his opinion changing, his pleasures also change; in so much as wee may often obserue that those delights which haue beene heretofore his chiefe felicitie, vpon the alteration of his conceit, become loathsome and vnpleasant. And as a man distempered with a burning ague, thinketh wholesome drinks bitter and loathsome; and those which are tart and sowre, pleasant and well relished: which againe being restored to his health, he much disliketh and disliketh: so voluptuous men being distempered with the raging heate of their burning passions, doe oftentimes affect and desire such carnall pleasures, and odious delights, as afterwards they loathe and abhorre; when as the hot fit of their raging passions being ouerpast, they are somewhat recouered to their health, and haue a freer vse of their iudgement and reason. And therefore seeing all these things which the World affecteth chiefly good, haue their worth and excellencie not from themselues, but from our opinion and conceit; let vs no longer adore these Idols which are of our owne making, nor still suffering our selues to be bewitched with our owne phantasies, let vs any more serue and reuerence these things which are but of an indifferent nature, and meane qualitie; because wee haue magnified them in our conceits and seated them in the highest place of our hearts, which in respect of their small worth, scarce deserue any roome at all, or to stand (so much as) behind the doore, vnlesse it were to be at vertues call, to performe such offices and good duties as she appointeth. But let vs learne at last to set our hearts and affections vpon spirituall and heauenly things, which are in their owne nature truely and substantially good, and not like the other; therefore excellent, because wee affect and thinke them so; but therefore to bee esteemed and much affected, because in truth they are of great worth and excellency.

9. Sect. 5. That worldly things are more commended vnto vs by eager competition than by any selfe-excellencie.

Thirdly, the vanity of these worldly things hereby appeareth, in that they are not commended vnto vs so much by their owne worth and excellencie, as by the competition of others who affect and seeke them as well as we. For had we no Corriuals in our loue to whet our affection, and sharpen our appetite, it would soone faint and languish towards these earthly things, there being in themselues no substantial good which might serue as fuell to nourish and preserue it. But when as we see others admire and loue them, wee begin to imagine that there is somewhat in them worth our liking and desiring, grounding this conceit not vpon our owne knowledge and experience, but vpon the iudgement and practice of those who haue gone before vs, or that liue with vs; who likewise haue been after the same manner deceiued and seduced, hauing had some such precedents which they also imitate. And when this conceit hath once possessed vs, then self-loue blowing the cole which phantasie hath kindled, our hearts are presently inflamed with a desire of obtayning that which so many seeke; partly to shew that our owne wisdome, policie and power, if we list to imploy them, can goe as fast a pace as other mens, and can with greater dexteritie and agilitie catch that game after which so many hunt; and partly because wee imagine, that there may be some worth and excellency in these things although we be ignorant of it, which if happily it should so fall out in the proofe and experience, wee would rather at all aduentures enjoy it than another, lest afterwards the worth appearing, we should haue cause to repent of our sloth and negligence, in that we haue suffered others to out-strip and goe before vs. And thus wee affect these vanities not for any good or excellencie wee see in them, but rather to selfe-loue, pride, enuy, and emulation, because we would preuent others, and obtaine that which they so much desire. Like vnto Boyes, who with all eagernesse runne after a ball, not for the loue of it selfe, but that they may catch it before another, whereas they would scarce looke after it, if they had no competitour to contend with them. And as the vulgar people running in flockes to see some vaine sight, do moue others which scarcely know wherfore they make such haste, to goe with them for company, and euen to outstrip their fellowes with nimble speed: so doe they runne with headlong hast in the pursuite of these worldly vanities; not because themselues know any worth or excellencie in them; but because they see that many haue gone before them, and that many are still going speedily in this course, they also goe for company, labouring to preuent them with their haste, and to obtaine that first, which being obtained they doe not know as yet whether it bee worth their hauing and enjoying, yea, and that which is worst of all, after that they see their errour, and hauing had triall of these things in their owne experience, doe plainly perceiue, that they deserue not their labour, nor are worthy of their loue; yet they will seeme highly to value and affect them still, lest the weaknes of their judgements, which so much valued them before they had them, might bee discouered; and make account of them, now they haue them in their possession, lest they might seeme to haue spent all their labour and strength in vaine, which they haue taken and imployed in the procuring of them. Like vnto a Merchant, who hauing trauelled farre and made an hard aduenture to fetch some stones, which report made him beleeue were precious and of great esteeme, after hee hath brought them home doth highly value them still, although the cunning Lapidary haue told him that they are but counterfeit, either that hee may put them off to others at his owne prizes, or at least may not impaire his credit, when as it should bee knowne that hee hath lost all his charges, and receiued no fruit by all his labours. Or like vnto those who hauing vainly spent much paines in the pursuit of some trifle, doe afterwards when they haue found their errour still magnifie and extoll it, not because they thinke it of any worth, but fearing lest they should bee laughed to scorne for their folly and lost labour, they would by their prayses incourage others to follow their example, that so they may be excused by the common errour, and not be ridiculous seeing they haue so many fellowes.

9. Sect. 6. Honours haue a great part of their esteeme from competition, and so also riches, and pleasures.

But let vs consider this in the generall instance of Honours, Riches, and Pleasures. And first if we examine Honours, wee shall finde that they haue a great part of their worth and esteeme from competition, and the contending heate, and emulating desires of those who affect and seeke after them. For whatsoeuer excellency is in a long fetcht Pedigree, sauing that men contend one with another who shal more ennoble themselues by fetching it furthest; or in fame and vaine glory, sauing that they striue who shall be most famous and best esteemed of? or what priuiledge doth the vpper place bring with it, more than the lower, the right hand than the left, or the wall than the channell side, sauing that men emulating one another, doe striue and contend about them who shall haue preheminence? Finally, what worth and excellencie hath high preferment, which commonly is accompanied with most trouble & danger, sauing that men striue who shall ascend higher on this ladder, and in the heate of their contention tread their fellowes vnder feet, that they may rise before them? wherein what doe they else but behaue themselues like children, who goe together by the eares, whilest they contend one with another, who shall be King in their play? whereas within an houre after, the play being done, they are all againe equall, or imagining a little Hillocke to be a strong Fort, doe assault and defend it with as great skill and fury, as though the holding of it were a matter of great importance; whereas after the contention is ceased, it remayneth emptie, and is passed by with neglect and contempt. And so these ambitious men hauing propounded these trifles as the cause of their emulation and contention, and being by reason of their pride and selfe-loue, impatient of any foile, doe with all earnestnesse and eagernesse striue about them; not because they thinke the things themselues for which they contend are worth their paines and labour, but because if they doe not obtaine the victory, they thinke themselues much disgraced, in that they are not able to haue their will. The like also may be said of riches, the competition and earnest pursuite whereof by so many, addeth no small matter to the common opinion of their worth and estimation. For otherwise wherefore doe men so greedily scrape much more than is sufficient for themselues, their charge, or any other good vse wherin they haue any purpose of imploying them, if they did not (measuring their goodnesse by their goods) desire to be better than other men, and therefore couet to excell them in that which they thinke doth make them commendable, & more respected? Why do they hoord them vp in great abundance, and like the Dogge in the Manger neither vse them themselues, nor communicate them vnto any other for their vse and benefit; but that in a kind of enuy and emulation they would exceed all other in wealth, and be accounted great by the large portion which they haue of these small vanities? In a word, why doe they so highly value that which they intend neuer to vse; if it were not that they haue got them with great labour and difficultie, and by their wit and industry haue out-stripped many who were com-competitours with them in this golden suite? Whereas contrariwise if their appetite were not sharpened by this corriualship; if in their eagernesse and emulation they did not thinke that they had lost all that, which they see others gaine; they would not so much esteeme and seeke after needlesse abundance and superfluitie, but would rest contented with that which they did know how to vse. And thus also pleasures are made truly pleasant and delightfull, and are then chiefly esteemed to be of some value, and worth the hauing, when as many contending for them, some one among the rest, hath the inioying them; which if they did lie out in common, and might easily be inioyed without any emulation or competition, no man almost would looke after them, or thinke their fruition worth their cost and labour.

Fourthly, the worthlesse vanitie of these worldly things hereby appeareth; in that they haue not so much estimation from any excellencie that we find in them, when we haue them, as from the great difficultie, which wee haue found in obtaining and comming by them, our labouring, suffering, hazards and dangers, endearing our affection, and increasing our loue; and making vs apt to proportion our estimation, not according to the worth of these vaine wares, but to our owne venture and paines which we haue taken in compassing of them; because we would not be subject to the censure of folly, for not making of a good bargaine. And hereof it is, that these things, though they bee but of small worth, yet are they greatly esteemed, because they are purchased and procured with no small labour; for as nothing is more easily contemned, than that which is easily gotten, according to the common prouerbe: Lightly come, and lightly gone; so nothing maketh a thing more deare and precious, how worthlesse soeuer it be in it selfe, than when it is bought at these deare rates and compassed with much paines and great difficultie; In being the nature of man to haue delight of comming to his ends by the way of opposition, and to thinke it more glorious to inioy his desires by a doubtfull victorie, than by a ready yeelding. And much more doth he desire to breake open a passage for his hopes by violence, than to find a free entrance. Yea, and when outward opposition ceaseth; the inward opposition which he findeth at home in his owne conscience in compassing of these earthly things, doth much raise their price & estimation. For whil the conscience agreeth with the desire, and approoueth of it, giueth free libertie of seeking and inioying, then the thing desired is commonly but lightly set by, and meanely esteemed: but when it is vnlawfull either in it selfe, or in respect of the meanes of comming by it; then the Law of God forbidding it, and the conscience condemning it, doe set a wonderfull edge vpon the appetite, making it the more to affect it, by how much the more difficultie and hazard there is in attaining vnto it; faring herein like the riuer, which when it hath a free current, runneth quietly in its owne chanell; but finding stop & opposition it rageth and swelleth, and breaking downe his banks, ouerfloweth the whole Countrie.

Rom. 7. 8. Cui peccare licet peccat minus ipsa potestas. Semina nequitiæ languidiora facit. Ouid Eleg. lib. 3.

And thus honours are highly valued and esteemed, because they are not obtained without great labour and danger, as abroad by lying in open fields, by watching in the night, and toiling in the day, by innumerable perils in open fight, and secret ambushments, wounds, skarres, effusion of blood, and continuall hazard of life; or else at home by the painefull and carefull seruice of the state, which is often ioyned with as much hazard as labour. By which difficult meanes when they are compassed, they are answerably esteemed and valued, not according to their owne worth, but according to these deare prizes, at which they were purchased. Or if the estimation of these honours bee not aduanced by these outward difficulties, (as in truth this dangerous way of comming vnto honour, was neuer in any age lesse trauelled) yet at lest they are valued the more, in regard of the inward opposition which men find in their consciences, by vsing vnlawfull meanes to attaine vnto them, as namely counterfeiting hypocrisie, machiauellian policies, treacherous falsehood, whereby they raise themselues by supplanting others, not caring by how wicked steps they clime, so they may rise, and place themselues in the seate of honour. The which is the more vsuall path tracted in these dayes, men being now become so politike, that they will not take substantiall paines, to bee rewarded with a shadow, but fitting their worke according to their wages, they compasse vaine honours with semblances of good and vaine shewes. But yet in the meane time by vsing these wicked and vnlawfull meanes to attaine vnto their desires, they hazard their saluation, and for the purchasing of honours by vnlawfull meanes, they set their soules to sale; and therefore it is no maruell if hauing obtained them, they doe highly value them, seeing they haue bought them at such deere rates. And thus riches are most highly esteemed, when as they are most hardly compassed; that only being thought worth the hauing, which cannot be had without much paines and perill; and all other things being esteemed worthlesse and light, which haue not difficultie and danger put into the skale with them, to make them downe waight.

§. Sect. 8. Difficultie in obtaining them, maketh honours and riches so much to be esteemed waight. This maketh pearles truly precious, because they are farre fetched from the Easterne parts of the world, and not only bought at deare rates, but also brought home with great danger. This maketh gold and siluer esteemable, because they are digged out of the Westerne mines with much sweate, and not procured but by great labour and trauell, hazard and danger, both by sea and land. This improueth riches farre aboue their worth, because they are obtained with much labour, care, and watching, by pinching and afflicting the body whilest they let it goe often empty, that they may more speedily fill their chests; and that which is worst of all, by hazarding the eternall saluation of their soules, in vsing wicked meanes, as lying, deceiuing, swearing, forswearing, oppression and all manner of cruelty, for the increasing of their wealth. All which difficulties in getting riches, make men the more to loue and esteeme them when they haue them: whereof it is, that hee who hath thus dearely purchased his wealth, doth alwayes much more affect and value it, than his heire who commeth lightly by it; euen as the mother doth much more account of a childe for which her selfe hath laboured, than of another which should bee bestowed on her of free gift; yea and among her owne children, commonly most affecteth that, in the birth whereof she hath had sorest trauell, and greatest danger.

9. Sect. 9. Pleasures are valued according to the pains which is taken in compassing them.

The like also may bee said of pleasures, which receiue their value and esteeme not from any selfe-excellencie, but from the difficultie and paines which is taken in comming by them; neither are the sweetest delights sauourie and wel-relishing, vnlesse first they bee sauced with the sharpe sauce of trouble and labour. And therefore as men hauing otherwise no great appetite, vsually eate bitter Oliues before they goe to meate to sharpen it, and get them stomacks: so they would bee soone glutted with delights, if an edge were not set on their appetite, by those difficulties and labours which they vndergoe in attaining vnto them. And thus meates and drinkes are much commended when as they are far fetched and deare bought, and (like the water of the well of Bethelem) procured with the hazard of mens liues. Thus such loue is sweetest in inioying, which hath had most difficultie in obtaining: thus triumphs and shewes are the more valued and affected, because of the great preparations that goe before them. Yea and thus also our delights are made much more delightfull by those spirituall difficulties, the word of God forbidding, and the conscience condemning them: for as the Wise man saith, Stolen waters are sweete, and hid bread is pleasant; or as hee saith in another place, the bread which is gotten by deceit is sweete to a man. Neither is there any thing which more commendeth pleasure to a naturall and carnall appetite, than when it thus commeth against the haire, by force or stealth, and is condemned before it is inioyed. Now what can more shew the worthlesnesse of these worldly vanities, than that they haue their chiefe estimation from those things which are shunned and abhorred, and haue almost all their sweetnesse and delight, from other things bitter and loathsome? And as well-waters hauing no heate in themselues, are said to receiue some little warmth by antiperistasis and the inclosure of some greater cold: so these vanities hauing little goodnesse, are made to seeme good, when as they are compassed & incloled with loathed euils, euen as this miserable world it selfe would seeme a paradise to one that should newly come out of hell, not in regard of the happinesse inioyed in the present estate, but of the vnhappinesse and miserie of his former condition out of which hee is escaped. And therefore seeing these things haue in them no selfe-excellencie, but are onely commended vnto vs by troubles, difficulties, and dangers, let vs not in our iudgements esteeme them, nor set our hearts and affections vpon them; but most highly value and chiefly affect Gods spirituall and heauenly joyes; which neede no such miserable orators to commend them, they being in their owne nature of greatest worth and excellencie; and most esteemable and delightfull, when as being freed from all paines and difficulties, wee shall peaceably and continually inioy them, without trouble or molestation.

Lastly, the vanitie of worldly things hereby appeareth, in that they are not so much esteemed and affected for their goodnesse, as for their rarenes; there being nothing in the world so excellent that is much respected if it grow common; nothing almost so meane and triuiall, which proprietie and raritie will not make excellent. For as a tall man is not regarded when the countrie inhabitants are almost all of an high stature; nor those flowers respected, though otherwise beautifull, which grow wilde in euery field; so neither are any worldly things held in price, when as they are embased by vulgar communitie. And this is the cause why Diamonds are esteemed and admired, and the Sunne neglected and little obserued; because this is subiect to the common view, and free to all mens vse, that peculiar to some few onely, and that of the richer sort. This maketh health to bee but slightly regarded, sauing of those who want it, and wealth to bee magnified and extolled. This maketh countrie commodities to be basely valued at home home, and to be much esteemed abroad; and whereas the things themselues are of equall worth and vse, yet the raritie or commonnesse wonderfully altereth the price and estimation. Thus honours and glorious titles if they should be made common vnto all, they would of all be lightly esteemed; whereas now being rarely and respectiuely conferred, they are magnified as the chiefest excellencies. Thus riches haue their worth inhanced to that high account, because few can attaine vnto them; whereas if euery man abounded in wealth, then, as in the time of Salomon, siluer would be no more esteemed than stones, nor gold than siluer. So who would esteeme of costly attire, if all went in royall apparell? who would highly value precious stones, if euery one had them in possession? In a word, no riches would be accounted treasures, if they were no more commended by their rarenesse, than by the worth. And the like also may bee said of pleasures, in which none would ioy, if all did inioy them; nor take any delight in them, if they were communicated to all, or to themselues continually and at all times. But being made daintie in respect of seldome vse, and conferred but to some as choice priuiledges, this makes those who haue them to esteeme them, as much for pride because they are preferred before others, as for any delight they haue in their vse; and those who want them, to long after them, because they also would bee aduanced to these no common priuiledges. This were easie to shew in particulars. For who would take pleasure in great cheare, if all men had full tables, or themselues at all times? Who would delight in beautie or brauerie, if herein all did match them? or in sweete musicke, if they had no other sound in their eares but this melodious harmonie? In a word, there would no worldly thing bee esteemed of any worth, if it were not for raritie and proprietie. To this purpose one of the Ancients saith, that all these earthly things, haue all their grace and excellencie, from their rarenesse and strangenes, neither is there any thing almost much esteemed in its owne countrie, and all abundance in it selfe is neglected and despised. And hence it is that because among certaine barbarians, gold is home-bred and abundant, their prisoners are fettered and inchained with gold; and leading malefactors with riches, they make them so much the more wretched, by how much they are more guiltie and faultie. Whereby it appeareth that these things are not truly and absolutely good vnto vs; for that which is good in this degree, would not be impaired, but multiplied and increased by communicating, euen as the ioyes of heauen are infinitely redoubled, in regard that there being innumerable Saints and Angels, which mutually communicate in one anothers ioyes, according to their number their ioyes also are redoubled and multiplied. And therefore let vs esteeme and set our hearts and affections vpon this heauenly happinesse, which the more common it is, the better it is, according to the nature of true goodnesse; and not vpon these earthly vanities, which because they doe not satisfie those that haue them, therefore they seeke contentment by multiplying and ingrossing them, thinking to finde that in all, which they cannot finde in any part; and affect proprietie in them, because they seeme vnto themselues to want, that which they see others inioy, and to bee robbed of that, which their greedie eye beholdeth in anothers possession.

CHAP. X.

Of the vanitie of Worldly glory, popularitie, prioritie, and the fauour of Princes.

HEE haue shewed the vanitie of all these worldly things, both by testimonies, and manifest reasons. Let vs now more particularly examine the vanities of honours, riches, and pleasures: where wee shall plainely see, that as there is generally no worth or excellencie in these worldly things; so neither in any of these speciall parts and branches. And first for worldly honour, how base and contemptible it is, in comparison either of that true honor of a Christian, before described or the eternall glory of Gods kingdome, it will more easily appeare, if wee consider it in the chiefe parts thereof, and take a serious view of those things which in the world are accounted honourable. For this worldly honour consisteth in fame and vaine glorie, or popularitie and fauour of the common people, or prioritie of place and precedence, or the fauour of Princes, and great personages; or finally in high aduancement and preferment, to places and offices of greatest dignitie and royaltie, or in the concurrence of all, or some of these together: all which are vaine, and of no worth, or true excellencie, as we shall plainly perceiue, if wee doe take but a slight view of them seuerally. And first for fame and vaine-glory, which is nothing else but the applause of the multitude, whereby they magnifie and extoll a man out of their opinion of his worth and excellencie, if wee examine it, we shall find both that it is false and counterfeit, and also that it is vaine and vnprofitable. For it is not that true honour before described, consisting in a good name and estimation of the godly and vertuous, for true worth and deserts;

deserf; but the clamour of the common people, extolling those, whom in a sudden opinion they thinke worthy: which is not (like that) referred to Gods glory and the spirituall good of the partie; but being arrogated to themselues as their owne due, it wholly tendeth to puffe them vp with pride, and a fond opinion of selfe-excellencie. And therefore seeing it is false and counterfeit, how glorious soeuer it appeares, it is not to be valued, but to be contemned as base and forged. For as when we see persons on the stage in glorious and royall apparell, and much more richly adorned, than such as are great Princes and potentates in truth, yet wee doe not reuerence or much respect them, because wee know that they are but personated, and only great by apish imitation: so how goodly a shew soeuer this vaine glorie maketh, yet seeing it is not the true glory of a Christian, but a false and counterfeit shadow thereof, it is to be neglected and contemned.

b. Sect. 2. That worldly glorie is vaine and reprouable.

But as this fame and glorie of the world is false, so also vaine and vnprofitable; as it may appeare at the first sight, if we doe but consider of the name, which by common tradition is giuen vnto it. For although all worldly things are full of vanitie, yet this glory peculiarly hath this title of vaine prefixed vnto it, as challenging it vnto its selfe by a certaine kind of proprietie, or singular eminencie, as though howsoeuer all things are vaine, yet nothing in comparison of this vaine glory. For what in truth is this false fame and glory of the world, but a smoake or vapour, which is tossed to and fro with the breath of euery ones mouth? What is it but a cloud or shadow, which whilest a man thinketh to catch and hold fast, it vanisheth away and commeth to nothing? And what doe worldly men doting vpon this vanitie, and seeking to imbrace it, that they may commit spirituall whoredome with it, but Ixion-like in stead of their goddesse catch a cloud, on which they beget the monstrous Centaures of many misshapen and vgly sinnes? What doe they but like wanton and foolish boyes runne after a sopie bubble, raysed with the breath of their companions mouthes, because it seemeth beautifull through varietie of colours, although it commonly vanish in the pursuing, or at least breake as soone as it is but touched? And yet though this glory bee neuer so vaine, and the pursuite thereof most childish and ridiculous, notwithstanding the wise men of the world fall into this absurd dotage, Chameleon-like gaping after this common aire and feeding themselues fat onely with the conceit of this vulgar breath. And as they seeme to haue their life, or that which is the life of their life, all their ioy and comfort, from the breathing in of this ayre; so also it is the sterne which ruleth them in all their courses, turning them to and fro at the prayses pleasure: neither is there any meanes whereby a man may better carrie these earthly and brittle pitchers, than by holding them by the eares, and tying them fast vnto him by this golden string of praise and commendations. For if they be extolled and magnified, what desperate difficulties will they not vndertake? What dangerous enterprises will they not attempt? What toilesome labour will they refuse to take? or what excessiue cost will they not bestow, that they may continue or encrease their fame and vaine glorie? Againe, if there bee no man that seeth them, or that seeing will commend them, how sluggish and slothfull are they in attempting any vertuous actions, where the least difficultie or danger doth appeare? Herein not vnfitly to bee compared vnto ships, which saile merrily forward whilest they haue a good gale of wind, stand still when they are becalmed, and turne backe againe when the gust bloweth hard against them: so these goe cheerefully forward in vertuous courses, so long as the winde of vaine glory helpeth them forward, stand still and doe nothing worth note, when as they are not praised and commended; and are vtterly discouraged and turned back againe, when they are dispraised for well doing; being readie to embrace any wicked course which promiseth vnto them glorie and reputation. Or like vnto Organe pipes, which are dumbe when they want wind, but being blowed with the bellowes, and well played vpon, yeeld melodious harmonie: so these men wanting the wind of vaine glorie giue no good sound, but being blowed and euen filled with the breath of mens praises, they are ready to yeeld a musicall concent of, at least, a seeming vertue, in their words and actions. Yea so immoderately doe worldlings dote vpon this idoll, that when they haue nothing in themselues of any worth, which they may offer vnto it as a sacrifice to make it propitious vnto them; and that they may eternize this vaine fame and glory vnto posterity; they build stately houses, and call them after their owne names; or erect (as Absolon did his pillar) monuments and sumptuous tombes and Sepulchres, not so much to keepe in their rotten bodies, as to preserue their fame from rotting and perishing. But this is a signe of base nature, so shamefully to begge glorie, the wages of vertue, from posteritie, after they are dead, which they neuer earned for any vertuous actions, that they did when they were aliue; to catch at the shadow of vertue, and neglect the bodie, which when they haue got they are neuer the richer; for who would not esteeme that as light as nothing, which is the reward of nothing, and impudently extorted without desert?

But let vs know that not only these base shifts, but euen this vaine-glorie also is to bee condemned and reiected of all true Christians: First, because it is forbidden and condemned in the Scripture, both in respect of our desires and actions: in the former regard, the Apostle exhorteth vs, not to be desirous of vaine glorie, prouoking one another, and enuying one another: and for the other, hee willeth vs, that nothing bee done through contention or vaine glory, but that in meekenesse of mind euery man esteeme other better than himselfe. And our Sauiour Christ maketh it a signe of an infidell, when they affect these vaine praises one from another, and seeke not the honour which commeth of God alone. And as this contempt of vaine glory is in the Scriptures enioyned, so our Sauiour Christ and his holy Apostle doe prescribe the practise thereof, for so Christ saith, that he sought not his owne praise, yea so farre was our Sauiour from ambitious affecting and seeking this vaine glorie of the world, that he would not receiue of it, when it was offered: I receiue not (saith he) the praise of men. And this also the Apostle Paul professeth, that he sought for no praise neither from the Thessalonians, nor from any other, and that he passed very little to be iudged of the Corinthians, or of mans iudgement: whose example wee also are to imitate, if we would be accounted the true disciples of Iesus Christ.

Secondly, let vs consider that as this vaine glory and vulgar praise is in it selfe vaine, so is it great vanitie and folly for any to desire it; for what is this glory, but, as I said, a smoake, a shadow, and a brittle bubble, which is both blowed vp, & broken with the breath of the ill-agreeing and inconstant multitude? And what can be more vaine & void of excellencie, than that which hath his subsistence and being in so vnstable a ground, as the vaine breath and mutable opinion of the common people? Who as they will extoll a man for a small cause, and oft seldome for counterfeit shewes and appearances only; so oftentimes they will censure their iudgement, and condemne for no cause, their affections soone tyring themselues, if they be not continually nourished with new matter of praise. And who would value that as any worth which standeth or falleth at euery ones deuotion? And as their praises are vaine and of no worth, so also are they vaine and void of wisdome who doe much affect them: for as their folly were ridiculous, who would haue blind men iudge of colours, and account that most excellent which in their doome and opinion is preferred; so is it no lesse absurd to make the vulgar people of the world iudges of vertue and good parts who being blind and ignorant, iudge not according to truth, but according to their fond opinion; and hauing their approbation and applause, to become proud and conceited of it. The which folly of vaine-glorious men is so much the greater in that as they are blind, and therefore their iudgement of no value, so also though it were of any worth, yet it were scarce worth the hauing, in regard of their vnstablitie & inconstancie, being like weather-cocks ready to turne with euery winde, and to alter their opinion with euery flying rumour, this day prayzing, and to morrow dispraising, now extolling those, whom they admire vp to skie, and soone after exclaiming against them with open mouth, and casting them downe againe with their obloquies and disgraces to the lowest part of hell. Although therefore we be delighted with these bright and radiant beames of fame and glory; yet let vs not desire like the Moone to shine with this borrowed light; for then our glory will bee most inconstant; sometimes in the full, and sometimes in the waine, now obscure and darke, a little while after growing and increasing, and when it is come to the full, presently againe decreasing till it come to such obscurity that it cannot be discerned. Herein also like the Moone, in that the nearer wee approach vnto those from whom wee borrow our light by familiarity and conuersation with them, the more the brightnesse of our fame is obscured, they being ape to praise those most, with whom they are least acquainted, and contrariwise the more remote and opposite we are vnto them, the more fully and freely doe they impart vnto vs their praises and commendations. Onely herein they differ and are vnlike, in that the Moone hauing lost her borrowed light, doth restore it againe within a few dayes, and with as great facility as it was deprived of it; whereas those who haue once lost their light of glorie and reputation, which they had from the vnconstant multitude, are seldome againe restored vnto it, or at least after a long time, and with great difficulty: their disgraces herein resembling wounds, which are soone inflicted, but long in curing, and also being healed, a scarre and blemish still remaineth.

Sect. 3. That true glorie consisteth not in vulgar praises, but in the approbation of God and the testimonie of our owne consciences.

Let vs therefore like the Sunne desire to haue our light in our selues; our owne consciences approuing, iustifying, and commending our vertues and good parts; and if wee will needes haue honour and prayse, let vs haue it from within vs; for no man can dishonour him who thus maketh himselfe truely honorable; whereas if wee inwardly dishonour and disgrace our selues with the obloquie of an euill conscience, all the praises and commendations which we can haue outwardly from men, will not all profit or auaile vs. Againe, if wee esteeme our glorie a chiefe treasure, why should we commit it to the custodie of other men, and lay it vp in the weake chest of their mouthes? why should wee stand at their curtesie and deuotion, to haue it when they please, and to receiue repulses and disgraces, when it standeth with their liking? why should wee beg that which our selues may freely giue? and be beholding for that, which wee might haue at our owne disposing? why should we not keep our treasure where we may at pleasure resume it, when wee haue vse of it, but suffer it to be out of our owne hands in another mans keeping, and in case that which we might command, as if wee thinke that the iron barred chest of a good conscience, is not strong or safe enough to keepe this iewell, but needs wee will put it out, and entrust it vnto other safer custodie; then what ridiculous folly is it, to make choice of the vulgar peoples lips and mouthes, being a weake and open case without locke or bolt, which being shut to none, any that list may steale it out? How much better were it for vs to commit this treasure vnto Gods owne custody, so approuing our consciences vnto him, as that we may haue his praise and approbation, seeing it will be most secure and safe in his keeping, because he is most powerfull to preserue it, and most faithfull to restore it? For then would it be out of the reach both of scorne and enuie, and attaine vnto such a perfect greatnes, that neither the prayses of worldlings would increase it, nor their dispraises diminish or abate it? Neither in truth will it ought auaile vs, though worldlings and vulgar people should with ouer so much constancie extoll and magnifie vs, if wee haue not prayse and approbation from God, and our owne consciences; seeing these alone are our witnesse and our iudge, they hauing nothing to doe either to iustifie or condemne vs. For who would not thinke him extreamely foolish, who in running his race or striuing for a masterie, should chiefely affect the applause of the ignorant people standing by, and neglect the skilfull iudges from whom he hopeth to receiue the crowne or garland? Who would not thinke him worse than mad, who being a courtier, and standing vpon his preferment, should carefully desire to bee praised of the blacke guard, and neglect the approbation of the King himselfe and his chiefe counsellers? But this and much greater folly doe they commit, who neuer regard the commendations and prayse of our chiefe iudge and King, and the Saints, his chiefe nobles; in the meane time aspiring with all their wits and endeuours, to haue the applause of vaine worldlings, whose good word cannot helpe them, nor their ill word hurt them.

Lastly, let vs consider, that though honor and glory were to be desired and sought of vs, yet now there is no time of affecting most of it; that the approbation of God, the good report among the godly, and the testimonie of our owne consciences; but we must (as I haue shewed) returne all honor vnto God, saying with Dauid, not vnto vs, not vnto vs, but vnto thy name giue the glory. For why should we much affect honour in this vale of teares, seeing by our sinnes we daily dishonour God? Why should wee desire prayse and glory in the world for our vertues and good parts; seeing they are so defective and so full of wants and imperfections, that they are sufficiently prayed, if they bee pardoned; and haue glorie enough, if they be not disgraced? Wee are heere full of sores and wounds, and therefore we had more need of salues to heale vs, than of glorious ornements to grace and beautifie vs: we are substantially emptie of true vertue and sanctifying graces; and therefore it better becommeth vs to seeke after the spirituall food of our soules, whereby wee may be filled and satisfied, than to gape after the winde of words, which may well puffe vs vp with pride, but cannot satisfie vs. We had needs of wholesome nourishments to keepe vs from starving, and doe we wantonly affect liquorous dainties? Wee were necessaried clothes to keepe vs warme, and doe wee looke after these curious and slight ornaments? Wee are here poore pilgrimes in the place of our exile and banishment, painfully trauelling towards our heauenly countrie, and dare we dreame of glorie, crownes, and swelling titles? yea rather let vs first seeke the substance, and then at our leisure, looke after ceremonies; let vs first take care for the bodie of vertue, and then the shadow of honour will follow of its owne accord; let vs heere, according to the Angels song, ascribe all glorie vnto God in the high heauens, and rest contented, whilest wee continue on earth, with peace and good will, expecting our crowne when wee haue finished our course, and waiting for fulnesse of honour and perfect glorie, when as being freed from all corruption, we shall bee perfected also in all grace and goodnesse.

And thus much concerning vaine glory and worldly fame. The next branch of honour is popularity, consisting in the immoderate desiring, and ambitious seeking of the loue and fauour of the common people, the which is as vaine and worthlesse as the other, and therefore their folly is no lesse, who are much affect it, and dote vpon it. We may indeed, according to the Apostles counsaile, labour to haue peace with all men, yea yea, we may moderately desire to please all, so as God be not displeased, and to haue their loue and fauour, so that we vse lawfull meanes only, and doe not so eagerly hunt after the fauour of men, as that we are ready to purchase it by the losing sale of the loue of God: but this is that popularitie which is to be condemned, when as we ouer-value their loue aboue its worth, when we too much dote vpon it, hauing it in our hearts aboue the loue of God; or finally, when we seeke it first and principally, not caring what hypocriticall shewes, and false semblances, what subtile policies and wicked deuises we vse for the compassing of our vaine desires. In all which respects this foolish popularitie is to be condemned and rejected. To which end let vs consider: first, that it is a foolish thing to number fauours and not weigh them: and secondly rather to please many, than to please those which are good. For, as one saith, what can be more absurd than to make high account of their fauour joyned all together, and to contemne them all when they are singled and seuered? But how much more is it grosse and impious, to endeauour rather to please a multitude of wicked Worldlings, than God himselfe? and by winning their fauours in that which is euill, to heare this testimony sounding in our consciences, that we are not the seruants of Iesus Christ? Secondly, it may serue to weane vs from immoderate seeking of these vulgar fauours, if we doe but consider that it is a matter of great difficultie, and almost impossibilitie to please the multitude, and not to displease those which are wise and vertuous; for such difference and contrarietie there is betweene their iudgements, dispositions, and affections, that that which the one discerneth, the other condemneth, that which the one liketh, the other loatheth, and that which they approue and magnifie, these improue and justly condemne. If therefore we cannot please both, who would not chuse to please rather the better than the greater part? who would much care for their fauour & approbation, whom himselfe neither fauoureth nor alloweth? or greatly desire to be liked of those, whom he doth not like, nor vnto whom he would be like, neglecting in the meane time, the loue and liking of the wise and vertuous, whom he inwardly reuerenceth and admireth, because they are ouermatched with multitude? To this purpose one saith, that it is a shame for a Christian to affect the pleasing of those whom he should not imitate: for either they are not good, and then being euill, it is no glorie vnto vs to be praysed of them; or they are good, and then we ought to imitate them: but those that are good, are good through their vertue, and vertue affecteth not that which is in the power of others vnto vs: and therefore he that imitateth the good, doth not ambitiously desire any mans praysse; and hee that imitateth the euill, is vnworthy of praysse.

But as it is hard to please the multitude, and to please also those which are wise and good: so it is a matter of much more difficultie, to haue their fauour and the loue of God; because the vulgar multitude being infected with many corruptions, affect those chiefly who are like themselues, and who are ready by euill arts to compasse their fauour, and to run any wicked course which may fit their phantasie, and please their humour, for the obtaining of their loue. And therefore one concludeth that hee will neuer indeauour to please the vulgar people; for those things (saith he) that I know and approue they allow not, and those things which they allow, I know not. Who can please the people whom vertue displeaseth? that fauour is gotten by wicked arts: and they that will please them, must become like vnto them; neither will they approue thee, vnlesse they acknowledge thee for one of their company. Now it is a matter of much greater moment, what thou seemest to thy selfe, than what thou appearest vnto others. Seeing then the multitude is for the most part euill, and we cannot please euill men but by euill meanes, it followeth hereupon, that they who will be gracious with the vulgar crew, must be vngracious in themselues, and they who will please the wicked route, must displease God, yea, and themselues too, if they haue any grace or goodnesse in them. And hence it is that our Sauiour Christ denounceth a woe against such as are pleasing to all. Woe be vnto you (saith hee) when all men speake well of you; because it is impossible to haue the liking and approbation of the wicked, vnlesse we lose the fauour of God, by joyning with them in their wicked courses. An example whereof we haue in Herod, who affecting popularitie, did to gaine the fauour of the people, put to death the Apostle Iames, and when hee saw that it pleased the Iewes, hee proceeded further, and apprehended Peter, with a purpose to bring him likewise to the slaughter. As also in the corrupt Gouernor Festus, who though he knew Paul innocencie, yet to get fauour of the Iewes he left him still in bonds.

And as this too much popularitie is a notable meanes to thrust men head-long into wicked courses; so oftentimes it is the vaile and shadow wherewith men maske and hide all manner of sinne, and a meanes by the furtherance whereof they incourage themselues to commit horrible crimes and outragious wickednesse; as Murther, Treason, Rebellion, Parricide, and what not. An example whereof we haue in Absolom, who ambitiously affecting the Kingdome, though it were with the murther of his most deare father, ther, vseth this popularitie, as the vaile of his wickednesse, and as the chiefe meanes of accomplishing his Deuillish purposes. And the like is to be obserued in almost all ambitious Traytours, who aspiring vnto Soueraigntie, doe in the first place lay this as the foundation of their proud rebellion, to become gracious with the common people. Finally, as it is the cause of much sinne, so commonly it exposeth those who doe imbrace it, vnto danger and punishment: for the loue and fauour of the vulgar people being exceeding mutable and inconstant, euen like the weather and calmenes of the Sea, doth draw men on to the pursuing of desperate attempts: and when the least perill appeareth, forsaketh and leaueth them in the middest of danger. In which respect it is fitly compared to a faire and fauourable wind, which inuiteth passengers to put forth into the Sea, and hauing brought them into the mayne, either there leaueth them becalmed, or turning about raiseth against them a dangerous storme. In respect of both which sinnes and dangers, that commonly accrew to those which are popular, euen the Heathen man esteemed it a part of happinesse, to be rather scorned, than magnified by the multitude. And therfore let not vs, who professing Christianitie should haue more profited in true wisdome, account it a part of our felicitie to be highly aduanced in their loue and fauour; but contemning this dishonorable honour, of being gracious with the graceless, and pleasing to the wicked multitude, let vs labour in the first place to please God, and to bee approoued by our owne consciences; and in the next place to maintaine our good name and reputation among the godly and vertuous; not looking to the smalnesse of their number, but to the greatnesse of their worth, & the excellency of their iudgement. In which respect we should preferre one of these sharpsighted Eagles, before a whole swarme of those buzzing flies.

O funestum malum populi diras, fauor, quem fortuna secunda ratis implet, vixque ita sibi constat eadem, deserit alto fessos mari. Senec. in Octauia.

Felix nondum est quem turba non deridet. Senec.

Turpe dictu placuisse multis.

And thus much concerning popularitie. The next branch of Honour is priority or precedencie, consisting in the hauing or taking of the vpper place, or better hand: a thing in it selfe so vaine and friuolous, that it is vnfit to bee the subiect of any graue and Christian discourse: but yet so much esteemed and stood vpon among Worldlings, out of their pride and selfe-loue, that they more bend their thoughts, and spend their labour, in attaining vnto this vanitie, than about the assurance of their owne saluation, or those vnspeakable ioyes of Gods Kingdome, being more studious and carefull of hauing an high place among men, than to haue any place among the Saints in Heauen. Yea, so doe they value this priorities and vpper hand, that they vsually make it the occasion of mortall quarrels, and desperate fraies, and thus rather to hazard the losse of their liues than the losse of their place, which their pride makes them thinke is due vnto them. But Christians who must deny themselues, and in all humilitie follow their Master Christ, must learne to contemne this idle vanitie. To which purpose we consider, that if wee will follow our Sauiours counsell, we must take the lowest place at Feasts and Meetings, vntill others taking notice of our worth doe preferre and cause vs to sit higher: if we will be aduised by his holy Apostle, we must indeed contend about Honour, yet not in taking, but in giuing it; we must striue to haue the precedence, but in humilitie, outstripping others, in preferring them before our selues; In giuing honour (saith hee) go one before another. And againe, Be not high minded, but make your selues equall to them of the lower sort. Furthermore, let vs consider, that this difference of places & hands, is a matter of opinion onely, which bringeth vnto no man any true worth or reall good; yea, rather it maketh them hated for their pride and insolence, when they presse higher than beseemeth them: and if opinion should vary (as it doth in diuers times and Countries) then the supposed worth of this vanitie would alter also, making the wall worse than the out-side, and the middle better than the vpper end. Let vs remember that the Heathen Monarch could teach vs this lesson, that not the place the man, but the man doth dignifie the place: and foule shame it is for Christians to excell him in pride, whose ambition was such that the whole World could not satisfie it. Let vs know that this priuiledge of place on earth is common to the wicked and reprobate, so that when we haue seated our selues as high as we can, there are many hundreds in Hell that haue bin higher than we. And therefore let vs not striue for an high place in the world, but rather that we may haue some place in Gods Kingdome, and thinke with our selues what shame and confusion it will bring, to those who hauing in this life had the highest places among men, shall in the life to come mauger their pride, be thrust downe into one of the lowest places of Hell, and haue the Deuils and wicked Spirits insulting ouer them.

Q. Sect. 10. The vanitie of priority of place and precedencie.

The fourth branch of worldly Honour is aduancement and preferment, which either respecteth persons, or places and dignities: the former is, when as men are extraordinarily aduanced into the fauour and estimation of Princes & great Potentates of the world, which howsoeuer it is to bee esteemed in it selfe good, when as it is obtained by lawfull and honest meanes, yet it degenerateth and becommeth euill vnto those who aspire vnto it as their chiefe goodnesse; in their iudgements preferring, in their affections desiring, and in their practice seeking, the fauour of mortall and earthly Princes, before the fa-

uour and loue of the immortall and heauenly King; which is the case of all those who vse wicked and vnlawfull courses, either to gain, or retaine their loue; as lying, dissembling, hypocrisie, sycophancie, fawning, flattery, and other such Deuillish arts and policies. But howsoeuer Christians are much to account of the loue of their Princes and Rulers, when enioying it, they may also retaine the lowe and fauour of God, because they are his Deputies and Lieutenants vpon earth: yet when there is such opposition betweene them, that both will not stand together, (as it alwayes hapneth when either it cannot be gotten or kept but by sinfull and wicked meanes) then is this fauour of great Potentates to be lightly esteemed, yea, to be contemned and reiected, that we may retain the fauour and loue of God; according to the example of the three children, who howsoeuer they were in chiefe fauour and estimation with Nebuchadnezzar, yet when they could not enioy it still, vnlesse they would offend God, by committing Idolatry, in worshipping the golden Image, they let his fauour at naught, and regarded not his displeasure and fierce wrath: as also in Iohn the Baptist, who though hee were in good account with Herod, yet hazarded the losse of his esteeme, and incurred his indignation, rather than hee would neglect his duetie, in admonishing and reproouing him for his sinne.

Which examples that wee may imitate, and learne to loathe this sweetnesse of worldly fauour, when the poyson of sinne is mixed with it, let vs consider that it is not onely vaine and vnprofitable, but also dangerous and hurtfull. The vanitie chiefly appeareth in the vnconstancie and mutabilitie of it, and that both in respect of the fauour it selfe, and the persons fauouring. For the former, who knoweth not, that it is vsuall in the Courts of great Princes, to be one day in fauour, & the next in heauy displeasure; now graced with the chiefe Honours of a Kingdome, and soone after disgraced and vtterly neglected? An example whereof we haue in Haman, who being the Kings chiefe Fauourite, ruled all at his owne pleasure; and the next day following was hanged vpon the gallowes which himselfe had made for Mordecay. The which alteration often hapneth, for a small cause, often vpon an appearance and surmize only; and not seldome vpon meere phancie and will, that they may please themselues with varietie of new Fauourites; for as they oftentimes aduance them highly into their loue without any desert, vpon conceit and opinion only, so this varying their loue also varieth, sometimes turning to a cold neglect, and sometimes into mortall hatred. In which respect Princes Fauourites are fitly compared to Counters vsed for computation and casting accounts; which being all in themselues of like value, haue, according as it pleaseth the accountant to place them, a farre differing estimate, some standing for thousands, some for hundreds, and some for vnites; yea, and those which now haue the place of the greatest summe, doe by and by stand for the least and those which were of least estimate, are soone after taken for the greatest number. And in the same regard Princes fauours are likened vnto a tender eye, which the least moat falling into, causeth to water, and sometimes is offended with a blast of winde: for so the smallest trifle often changeth their affection, & sometimes meere winde of words, the rumours and tales of Backbiters and Sycophants moue them to displeasure. Of this Dauid had experience, who being greatly in Sauls fauour, suddenly procured his hatred, for no other cause, but by his owne worth and good deserts, and the others iealousie and vniust suspition. And therefore hauing by his owne experience, come to the knowledge of this inconstancie and mutabilitie; he saith that it is better to trust in the Lord, than to haue confidence in Princes, because where he loueth, hee loueth to the end: his loue and fauour being immutable and vnchangeable. To which purpose also Ieremy saith, that the hope of the hils is but vaine, and the multitude of the mountains, but in the Lord our God is the health of Israel. But though it were granted that the fauour of Princes were immutable, yet there is no cause why wee should set our hearts much vpon it, for as much as themselues are mortall, and ready to leaue vs when wee most beare our selues vpon them, and to faile vs when as wee thinke their loue our chiefe strength. And this argument Dauid vseth to dissuade vs from trusting in Princes, because their breath departeth, and they returning to their earth, all their thoughts perish; accounting him blessed who puts his whole confidence in the Lord, whose loue is vnchangeable and himselfe eternall, and not in the Kings and Potentates of the earth, whose loue is mutable, and themselues mortall, and consequently their fauours are a vaine stay to rest vpon, seeing they die with them: neither let any man thinke, that their fauours receiued are annexed to the Crown, and will continue by succession, seeing there is nothing more common, than for the heire to hate them, whom his father or predecessor loued and esteemed, it being the nature of soueraigne power not to ioy much in others loue, but rather to delight themselues in creatures of their owne making.

But as this fauour of worldly Princes is vaine, so also is it vnprofitable, neither bringing to those that haue it any great good, nor exempting & freeing them from any great euil.

Q. Sect. 13. That the fauours of Princes are vnprofitable.

It doth not make them better or more vertuous; yea, oftentimes much worse, and more vitious than those that want it, puffing them vp with pride, and causing them to bee insolent in all their carriage and behauiour. It doth not free them from dangers, but rather exposes them vnto them, nor deliuereth them from any great euils, as from the wrath of God, sicknesses and diseases, death and condemnation. And therefore the Psalmist willeth vs not to trust in Princes, nor in the sonne of man, because there is no helpe in them. And yet their fauours were more to bee valued and esteemed, if as they did not greatly helpe vs, so they did not much hurt vs: But the truth is, they lay vs open to many perils, and subject vs to many euils. For to say nothing of those dangers of sinne, to which they hazard vs, by making vs to forget God and our selues, with all good duties which wee owe to both: they expose vs also to many worldly perils, as to the hatred of all those who enuie our aduancement, and disdaine that we rather than they should bee partakers of such extraordinary fauours; and to all their cunning and malicious plots, whereby they seeke to vndermine vs, & to worke our ruine. Yea, no small dangers doe we runne into, in respect of these great Potentates, who doe affect vs; because their loue is vnconstant, and seldome doe they vary and change towards their great Fauourites, but it is with their vtter ruine. In respect wherof familiaritie with them, is as if one played with a tame Lion, whose greatest loue is joyned with imminent danger; seeing if hee be but a little angred, he hath alwayes power to pull them in pieces, which though hee doe not euery day put in execution, yet is he daily feared; and though they often scape his pawes, yet commonly at last they are payed home once for all. Lastly, as the fauour of great Potentates exposes their Fauourites into many dangers, so doth it also commonly plunge them into innumerable euils, and first and especially by drawing them on to base flattery to please their humours, and retaine their fauours; being ready alwayes to speake, not what is most profitable, but what is most plausible, not what they know is the truth, but what they thinke will be best accepted. To which purpose one saith, that those who come into fauour with great Personages, must make account to betray the truth, or to lose all friendship. Secondly, as they must forgoe the truth, so also their libertie, and become true vassals and slaues, ready to further all their designes, and that oftentimes with the hazard of their goods and good name, yea, (which is worst of all) of their soules, by being their instruments in effecting and bringing to passe things vnlawfull and wicked. In which respect it is a hard thing to be esteemed of great Potentates, and not to bee vile and base to a mans selfe. Lastly, by setting our hearts vpon the fauour of Princes, we expose our selues to that fearefull curse, denounced against all those who trusting in man, & making flesh their arme, doe withdraw their hearts from the Lord. And therefore seeing so little good, and so great euill commeth of the fauour of great Potentates, when we set our hearts too much vpon it; let vs learne to weane our affections from this worldly dotage, and contemning the fauour of the greatest Monarch, when it commeth in comparison with the loue of God; let vs first and chiefly labour to be assured of the fauour of our heauenly King, as being most profitable and immutable, bringing with it no hurt, yea, turning all our euill into good, and inriching vs with earthly peace and securitie in this life, and with eternall glory and happinesse in the life to come.

CHAP. XI.

Of the vanitie of worldly power and authoritie.

THe other branch of worldly preferment, is aduancement to high places and dignities: as places of Magistracie, Nobilitie, Empire and Soueraignetie. The excellencie of Magistracie chiefly consisteth in their great power and authoritie, which they haue and exercise in ruling and gouerning others, who are inferiour and subject vnto them, the which is in it owne nature good: for as Iob saith, God is the fountaine of all power and wisedome: and the Apostle telleth vs, that there is no power but of God, and the powers that be are ordained of God, and that Magistrates who exercise this power are the Ministers of God, to reward the good and punish the euill. To which purpose one saith, that power it selfe is not euill, but hee that abuseth his power and authoritie; it is not authoritie that is euill, but ambition: finally, thus farre forth the ordination of power is from God, that hee is to be accounted the Minister of God who doth vse his power well; and therefore it is not the fault of the Office, but of the Minister, neither can the Ordinance of God displease, but the action of him who doth ill administer it. The Emperour giueth honour, and hath his due prayse; but if any abuse this honour conferred vpon him, it is not the fault of the Emperour, but of the inferiour Iudge. What shall we say then? is it good to vse power, and to desire honour? good I say, if it be lawfully conferred, and not ambitiously snatched. But yet as I said of the rest of worldly blessings, so of this, it is not good absolutely and immutably, mutably, but of an indifferent nature in respect of the vse, good to those that make good vse of it, euill to those who abuse it vnto euill. So one saith, that riches, power and strength, are the instruments of vertue to those that vse them well; although they haue no true felicitie in themselues: and therefore he is no lesse miserable who abuseth them, than he who taking a sword into his hands to fight against his enemies, doth turne the point thereof against himselfe, to his owne ruine. Vnto which abuse wee are naturally most prone, partly whilest wee set our hearts and affections more vpon it, than vpon our spirituall aduancement to be the sonnes of God, and heires apparant of his Kingdome, and therefore take more paines in getting, and more care in keeping this earthly preferment, than that spirituall and heauenly aduancement, of which we are ready to make forfeiture, by vsing sinfull and wicked meanes for the compassing of the other; partly whilest being puffed vp in pride we glory in our power and authority, despising and contemning those who haue not attained to the height of our preferments, and partly by putting too much trust and confidence in it, as though we were able to stand in our own strength, and to outface and discountenance any danger by our owne power. But that we may not too much esteeme, affect, seeke, or glory in this authoritie and power, but may learne to despise whatsoeuer portion thereof wee haue in our elues, in comparison of our spirituall priuiledges, and eternall aduancement in Gods Kingdome; let vs consider that, in respect of them, they are of no excellency or profit; but contrariwise being abused, through our corruption, they are vsually the causes both of sinne and punishment.

That there is no great excellencie in this power and authoritie, it appeareth in that God bestoweth it as a common gift both vpon the good and the bad; yea, commonly those vnto whom he vouchsafeth the least, or no measure of grace, are most aduanced to these worldly dignities and preferments; and those which are aboue others inriched with earthly glory, are often passed by, when as there is choice to be made of such, as shall haue spirituall and heauenly aduancement: for so the Apostle saith, that not many wise, not many mighty, not many noble, are called, but God chuseth the foolish things of the world, to confound the wise, and the weake things of the world to confound the mighty. And thus we read that the first mighty man on earth, were those wicked Giants, who were the issue of that vnequall match betweene the sonnes of God, and daughters of men: and after the stocke Nimrod began first to bee mighty on the earth, and like vnto these succeeded many others, both among the Heathen Nations, and also Gods chosen people, who, the more mighty they were in power and authoritie, the more weake commonly they were, in all grace and goodnesse. All which serue as examples of the Apostles rule and obseruation, that not many mighty are effectually called; and consequently that there is no true excellencie in greatnesse, seeing it is so often void of goodnesse; and therefore those who most excell in it are neglected by God, when as those which are weake are called and chosen.

9. Sect. 3. That worldly authoritie and power doth not profit vs for the attaining to grace and vertue.

And as there is no cause to glory in greatnesse, in respect of any excellencie there is in it selfe: so neither in regard of any great profit it bringeth vnto vs; seeing this might and authoritie doth not helpe vs to the obtaining of the best things, which are to bee desired, nor to the preuenting or escaping of the greatest euils, which are to be shunned. We cannot with all our might and authoritie command one sanctifying grace, or furnish our heart with one vertue; yea, commonly this worldly power rather opposeth against grace, keeping it from entring where it is not, and nipping, curbing, and suppressing it where any seeds thereof are sowne; whereas they who are weake and contemptible, being manured by Gods Husbandmen, doe like gentle and light grounds bring forth fruitfull increase of vertue and goodnesse; whereas the other, like stiffe and strong clay, doe choake and bury whatsoeuer good seeds of grace are committed to them. And as this is to be obserued in seuerall persons, so also we may note a great difference in the same men in these different estates: for how many haue we seene, who before they haue had preferments, haue beene humble, courteous, religious, and inriched with many graces and good parts, who being aduanced to dignitie and authoritie, are changed with their estate, becomming proud and insolent, disdainfull and contemptuous, irreligious, and prophane, or at least colde and negligent in all good Duties the power of Gods Word becomming vnpowerfull vnto them, and their zeale being cooled, when this winde of vaine glory hath but a little blowne vpon them? And this difference is obserued by an Ancient in the state of the Primitiue Church, which being borne and come to some age and strength, did grow in the middest of persecutions, and was adorned with the Crowne of Martyrdome: but after it had Christian Princes indued with power to defend and prouide for it, it increased with riches, but decreased and declined in vertue and all goodnesse. Neither doth this power and authoritie helpe vs at all in our warfare against our spirituall enemies; for these Principalities and Powers cannot be ouerthrowne with humane might, and these fleshly weapons are farre too weake for this spirituall encounter; yea, rather it betrayeth vs vnto danger, seeing wee are more apt to trust vnto it, when wee find our owne might, and it alwayes faileth vs when wee most relie vpon it. It doth not incite vs to true greatnesse, and the chiefe magnificence of a Christian; which doth not consist in abilitie to doe much, but in a willingnesse to doe that which is good; neither will doing of great things make a man good, but doing of good things makes him great.

Si magna sectari non bonus eris, sed si bona magna.

D. Bern. Ser. 4. That hee who hath most authoritie ouer others, hath least in ruling himselfe.

Finally, this worldly power and potencie, doth not helpe vs to the obtaining that most esteemable victory of ouercomming a mans selfe; neither doth it assist reason in subduing and ruling of our affections and passions; yea, rather when the vnresistable flood of power, is joyned with the violent streame of our owne passions, it causeth them more to swell and rage, bearing downe all where there is but the least appearance of opposition; whether it bee the inward stop of conscience, or the outward stop of admonition or restraint; making their will to stand for law, and all that to be lawfull, whatsoeuer liketh them. Neither doe they now measure their designes and actions by the rule of equitie and justice, but by their owne power and abilitie, thinking that they may doe, what they can doe; and often desiring more power, to doe that which they cannot now atchieue, whereas they haue already more than they can well vse, their passion & power ouer-ruling their reason, which should be in subjection, and obedient vnto it. And whereas the doubling of their authoritie & power, should make them redouble their care to vse it with sobrietie and moderation, and their abilitie to do what they list, should the more restraine their list, and will, within the bounds of honestie and equitie, now having the raines of libertie put into their hands, they run on in wilfull courses, oppressing and bearing downe with violence, whatsoeuer standeth in their way, and but seemeth to hinder them, fretting and fuming against any that dare presume to say they doe amisse, and thundring in their pride & impatiencey sharp reuenge against all, who haue but in the least degree displeased them. So that whereas before, their anger and wrath, like a flash of lightning, appeared and vanished without doing any great hurt; now power like a Thunderbolt being joyned with it, maketh it to become deadly and pernicious. Lastly, this worldly power and authority doth vs no good in attaining vnto our chiefe good, neither haue wee our heauenly happinesse by command, but by intreatie, not by authoritie, but by humilitie and submissiue suite. So that in this regard wee haue greater cause of glorying in the least drum of spirituall grace, than in the greatest measure of worldly authority and might; according to that of the Prophet, Let not the strong man glory in his strength, but let him that glorieth, glorie in this, that he vnderstandeth and knoweth the Lord. Yea, though our power and authority were such, that wee could command the Deuils, and ouer-rule the infernall spirits, yet wee must not, as Christ said to his Apostles, Reioyce in this, that the spirits are subjected vnto vs, but rather reioyce in this, that our names are written in heauen.

Quod non potest, vult posse qui nimium potest, Senec. in Hypolit.

Minimum debet libere cui multum licet.

But as this worldly aduancement, power and authority helpeth vs not to the attaining of any chiefe good, so neither doth it exempt or free vs from any great euils. It doth not priuiledge vs from dangers: for as the Psalmist saith, The King is not saued by the multitude of an host, neither is the mightie man deliuered by great strength. Yea, rather it exposes men to many perils, their greatnes making them but the fairer markes for enuy to shoote at, and inflaming many as ambitious as themselues, to vse all their art and power for the vndermining of their estate, that so out of their ruines they may raise their owne preferments. It cannot deliuer vs from the just vengeance of God in the day of his visitation, the Lord hauing a thousand means to weaken vs in our greatest strength, and being able to make our owne power and authoritie the instrument of our destruction: for if he do but blow vpon vs with the breath of his displeasure, our proud might shall serue but as an ouer-greese sailes to ouerturne vs, and our owne strength shall become the instrument of our ruine. It doth not free the mind from cares and griefes, nor our bodies from sicknesses and diseases; yea, the more authoritie a man hath, the more is his care and trouble, and though hee be in neuer so great place, yet the Ague and Gout, Apoplexies and Palsies, Consumptions and such other griefes and maladies, will not bee afraid of him, but counting as Officers from a superiour power, will in despight of all his glorious greatnesse, hold him vnder their arrest, till they haue a discharge from our chiefe soueraigne. Neither doth the greatest earthly power, and transcendent authoritie free any from death; for as the Psalmist saith, Man shall not continue in honour, hee is like the beasts that die: and death feareth the Scepter no more than the Goad; he regardeth the stately Throne no more than the basest foot-stool, & with as vndanted courage he entreth into the Princes Palace, as into the poorest Cottage. Finally, after death we shall haue no priuiledge by our authoritie and greatnesse, when as wee shall all appeare before the judgement seate of God: for then both Magistrates and people, mighty and impotent shall be all alike, and receiue their just sentence according to that which they haue done done in their flesh, whether good or euill, without any respect of persons: for as Elihu saith, Hee accepteth not the persons of Princes, and regardeth not the rich more than the poore, seeing they are all the works of his hands. Yea rather at that time they shall find hereby great hurt and inconuenience, seeing it will then but increase their bils of accounts, of which then they are to giue a reckoning; for this power and authoritie were committed vnto them by God, as his good talents, which they were to vse for the honour of their Master, and for the good of their fellow seruants, which being well imployed, might haue gained much glory vnto God, and good vnto his Church, in maintaining and vpholding his worship and seruice in preseruing and defending his true religion, in countenancing and rewarding the good and vertuous, and in disheartning and punishing the wicked and vicious. In which accounts if they come short, they shall at that day haue little joy of all their former authoritie and greatnes; seeing it will but increase their debts, and make them to find so much the lesse fauour, by how much they haue abused the greater mercie.

And thus haue I shewed that authoritie and great power, is vaine and vnprofitable to those, who too much set their hearts vpon it. It followeth that I also shew that it bringeth vnto vs, being thus abused, much euill, and that both in respect of sinne and punishment. It is the cause, being abused through our corruption, of many sinnes, but especially of those two hainous and mother sinnes, pride and iniustice. For being aduanced vnto these high places, it is vsuall with them to forget by what power they were thus aduanced; and leauing their dependancie vpon God, they begin to wax proud of themselues, and thinking it too base to sustaine the place of Gods deputies, they aspire themselues vnto the supreame soueraignetie, and rebelliously affect diuine honours. So Nebuchadnezzar being by his greatnes puffed vp with pride, forgate himselfe to be a man, and would needs haue his image worshipped by all his people; and this was vsuall among the Heathen Poemtates, who ambitiously desired to be deified, and to haue their statues and images erected, vnto which diuine worship was to be imparted. And thus Vzziah, howsoeuer hee was a Prince of the better sort, yet when hee grew mightie, it is said of him, that his heart was lift vp to his destruction. And as it maketh men proud in respect of God; so in respect of men, most insolent, disdainfull and tyrannicall. It is true indeed, that those who vse their authoritie well, doe keepe an humble minde in an high estate, like the Sunne, which the higher it is, the lesse it seemeth, and doe not so much looke at their superioritie of state and order, as at the equalitie of their naturall condition; and considering that all by nature are equall, and that it is sinne which maketh this difference of superioritie and inferioritie betweene them; therefore they aduance their power to beare sway ouer their vices rather than ouer their persons, and whilest they remember that they punish sinne, they doe not forget that it is punished in their brethren. Neither doe they (as one saith) so much reioyce to rule ouer men, as that they may profit them by their gouernment, knowing that the ancient Patriarks were not so much Kings ouer men, as Pastors ouer sheepe, and that when God said to Noah and his sonnes increase and multiplie, and fill the earth, adding that their feare and dread should be ouer the beasts, fowles, and fishes, hee doth not say also that it should be ouer men, because mens terrour should be ouer beasts and not ouer men. Although indeed holy gouernours desire to be feared of their subjects; but it is when as they see that they do not feare God, that at least they may be restrained from sinne by this feare of man, who doe not stand in awe of Gods judgements. And therefore they are not proud of this feare, in which they seeke not their owne glory, but the just carriage and demeanure of their subjects: neither doe they desire to bee feared of ill liuers as they are men, but as they behaue themselues like beasts ouercaried with sensualitie: and when there it no vice to punish, they doe not reioyce in the excellencie of their power, but in the equalitie of their condition, and are so farre from desiring to bee too much feared, that they refuse to be too much honoured. But the most part through the corruption of our nature, are apt to abuse their power and authoritie vnto pride and tyrannie, imagining that they exceed all that are subject vnto them, as much in vertue, as they doe in titles; in worth and desert, as they doe in dignitie and power; and measuring themselues not by the rule of Gods word, nor by the testimonie of their owne consciences, but according to the hyperbolicall, or rather lying prayses and commendations of palpable flatterers; and beleeuing that they are such as these false glasses, would seeme to make them, they wax proud of their greatnes, esteeming their inferiours as base and contemptible, and thinking that they are good for nothing but for their vse, and that like cyphers they onely serue to make vp the summe of their greatnesse. And therefore they rule them not according to Law and equitie, but according to their will and pleasure, neuer considering what they ought to doe, but what by their power they are able to doe; nor thinke what is good for their inferiours but for themselues, as though it were their summum bonum and chiefe happinesse, if by their labours, wealth, lands and liues, they can procure vnto them the least pleasure or profit, or giue them the least ease of any trouble. So that it is a matter of greatest difficultie to excell in authoritie, and to beate downe pride; to haue great power, and not to thinke it greater than it is; to rule ouer inferiours, and to insult ouer and contemne them as base and abject. And therefore great potentates had neede to haue that saying sounding in their eares: The greater thou art, the more humble thy selfe in all things; and so shalt thou finde fauour before the Lord.

Ecclesiasticus 3.19.

§. Sect. 7. That worldly authoritie vsually is accompanied with vniustice and oppression.

Cui plus licet quàm par est, plus vult quàm licet.

The other sinne into which power and authouritie commonly plungeth men, is vniustice, violence and oppression; for they that haue power to do more than is fit, commonly haue also will to doe more than is lawfull; because they imagine that their power is most magnified, when as it extendeth it selfe beyound all bounds and limits of either law or reason. And thus the Author of the booke of Wisdome bringeth in mighty men incouraging one another to commit all outrage and cruelty: Let vs (say they) leaue some token of our pleasure in euery place, for that is our portion, and this is our lot. Let vs oppresse the poore that is righteous, let vs not spare the widow, nor reuerence the white haires of the aged that haue lined many yeares: let our strength be the law of righteousnesse, for the thing that is feeble is reproued as vnprofitable. In which cruell courses, when as they are long fleshed, they follow them, as bruit beasts their prey, when their bellies are full; not for hunger, but for wantonnesse, affecting wrongs and oppressions, not for any pleasure or profit they haue in the thing done, but onely for the delight they take in doing it; and chiefly glorying in their power and authoritie, because they are inabled thereby to doe mischiefe; as though there were no musicke so sweet to their eares, as the outcries of the wronged, and the groanes of the oppressed. Neither is this any rare fault of the mighty, seeing (as one complaineth) inferiours in all places are subject to the couetousnesse and oppression of those who are stronger than they, and the weaker a man is, the more fit hee is thought to bee made a prey. For it is amongst them as among deuouring fishes, the lesse becommeth the food of the greater; and he againe being assaulted with a stronger than he, becommeth his prey, who before deuoured another, and one belly now holdeth them both, giuing an example to the mighty of reuenged iniurie. Whereby it appeareth that this power and authoritie being vsually seuered from iustice, becommeth hurtfull and pernicious: for as those signes, Castor and Pollux, appearing both together vnto sea-fairing men, comfort them with the hope of faire weather, and a prosperous voyage; but being seuered and appearing alone portend a tempest: so when power and authoritie are ioyned with wisdome and iustice, they bring with them much profit both to priuate men, and to whole societies; but when this power is seuered and diuided from the other, it bringeth forth no other fruites than crueltie, rage, oppression, and all manner of hurt and mischiefe, and that both to those who are vnder it, and to those also who thus abuse it. For as for them, they are not masters of any thing which they enjoy, all their goods and substance being daily endangered to their spoyle and rapine; the which their iniuries they must indure not onely with silence and patience, but at least with outward cheerefulnesse and thankfulnesse: for if they seeme but to take notice that they are wronged, they doe make way for a new mischiefe, and put them in minde to redouble the iniurie. And therefore the best way for these inferiours, is willingly to offer that to these powerfull tyrants which they seeme to affect; for to denie vnto them lesser things, is to promise vnto them greater, and by withholding from them some things, to make them masters of all. Yea oftentimes by crossing their desires they doe not onely expose their goods to the spoile, but their liues also to danger, as we may see in the example of Naboth, who labouring to hold his vineyard, lost his life and his vineyard too. Neither is this abused power and authoritie lesse pernicious to those that haue it; for making themselues hereby odious to all, they twist snares to catch themselues, and fall into their owne pit, whilest either they expose themselues to popular rage, or pursuing the weake doe fall into the power of those who are stronger; like the wolfe, who ouergreedily following the lambe, doth himselfe fall into the Lyons paw. So that it is truly said, that he who therefore doth iniurie because hee is able, will not long bee able because hee hath done it. And wisely did the Heathen man aduise those who desired to vse their power long, that they should vse it sparingly whilest they haue it; for they who doe all they can, will not long bee able to doe what they will.

Cedit hic reges cakset vt omnes, perdatq; aliquos nullumq; leuet, tantum vt nocent cupit esse potens. Sene. in Octauia Ambros. Hexamer. lib. 5. ca. 5.

But as this abused power and authoritie plungeth men into sinne, so it subjecteth them to the euill of punishment: for depriuing them of the chiefe humane strength and defence, namely the loue and good will of those that are about them, it exposes them to the enuie and hatred of all, so that those who flatter them with their mouth, threaten their ruine ruine in their hearts, and whilest they creep and crouch vnto them, they watch for desired opportunitie to tread vpon their neckes, and to solace themselues in their vtter ruine. Yea they are not safe from the conspiracies and attempts of those whom they repute their neerest friends; and euen those who guard them, are so falsehearted towards them, that oftentimes they had need of another guard to defend them from their treacherie. And hereof it is that these great Potentates are continually exposed to innumerable dangers, which threaten a fearefull and shamefull downfall, whilest euery one enuieth their greatnesse, and none almost suppores it, vnlesse it bee that they put to their hands to vphold it whilest it standeth by its owne strength, being readie to pull them away when it a little towereth, and standeth most in need of their helpe. And as they are thus endangered by false friends, so also by open and professed enemies, who hauing through the abuse of their power beene wronged and iniured, doe daily waite for opportunitie of taking reuenge, and feed themselues with hope of seeing their ruine, when as they may pay them home with their owne measure. From which dangers and euils, though they be defended through the greatnesse of their power, yet are they not priuiledged from the continuall feare of them; neither is it might, and powerfull tyrannie, but innocencie, iustice, and well-deseruing that bringeth secure peace. For hauing abused their power to oppression & violence, their guiltie conscience, as it were, an implacable furie, continually haunteth them, making them to expect what they haue deserued, and to feare, as much as they haue him. Whereby it commeth to passe, that howsoeuer they are sometime safe, yet they are neuer secure, but spend their life in continuall agonies & perplexities. Now what is this continuall anticipation of euils through feare and dreadfull expectation, but a daily suffring of them, the greatest part of worldly euils being the feare that goeth before them?

But say they could escape both feare and danger from men, yet deserued vengeance from God shall surely ouertake them, for abusing that power and authority which they haue receiued from him, to his dishonour, and the hurt of their brethren, whereas they might by a good vse thereof haue gained vnto him much glory, and benefited those who were vnder their gouernment. For the Lord when hee commeth in visitation, will not respect the mightie more than the weake and impotent; yea rather taking delight to ouer-master and confound their ground greatnesse, wherewith they haue opposed against him, he draweth them first to punishment, and maketh their condemnation more heauie and intolerable, for the mightie shall be mightily tormented. Neither is it a matter of more difficultie vnto him, to tread vnder foote these ouertopping Cedars, and strong okes of Bashan, than the weakest bramble, or lowest shrub. For as the Apostle saith, the weakenes of God is stronger than men, and hee is able by the weake things of the world to confound the mightie. He leadeth away Princes as a pray, and ouerthroweth the mightie; he powreth contempt vpon Princes, and maketh the strength of the mightie weak, as Iob speaketh. In regard whereof, there is no power of man of any continuance, but that which being guided with wisedome, and grounded on vertue, is supported and vpheld by his omnipotent might: yea contrariwise as a building which wants a good foundation, the greater and higher it is, the more neare it is to a dangerous downefall, seeing its greatnes and height doth but helpe forward and hasten its owne ruine: so these high Babels of power, and greatnesse, which haue not vertue for their ground and foundation, but are onely vnderpropped with the weake staies of violence and tyrannie, are neere vnto confusion, when the lest breath of Gods wrath doth blow vpon them.

9. Sect. 10. That spirituall power is much to be preferred before that which is worldly.

Seeing therefore this worldly power and authoritie is through our corruption so subject to abuse, and being abused is the cause of so manifold euils, let vs learne not to esteeme it ouermuch, or to set our hearts vpon it, but rather let vs labour after spirituall power and might, and as the Apostle exhorteth vs, let vs be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might, and put on the whole armour of God, that we may be able to stand against the diuell, and may obtaine a glorious victorie ouer these spirituall enemies of our saluation: for if wee be assisted with this power we shall be able to do all things, as the same Apostle speaketh, Let vs labour after that power whereby we may be inabled to master and ouercome our owne sinnes and corruptions, and to subdue and keepe them vnder, to mortifie and slaughter them, when they rebell against the spirit: for this is the chiefe and greatest power wherein a Christian man should reioyce, not to be able to offend God by doing euill, which we shall haue when we come into our countrie, and the next to that is to refraine our selues from sinne, vnto which the corruption of our nature leadeth and inclineth vs. Let vs chiefly desire to haue that authoritie and might whereby we may be inabled to rule and gouerne our selues, and to moderate and keepe in order our owne passions and affections; let vs shew our strength in ouercomming our pride couetousnesse, ambition, lust, anger, desire of reuenge, and the rest: for as the Wise man telleth vs, he that is slow slow to anger, is better than the mightie man; and hee that ruleth his owne minde, is better than he that winneth a Citie. Neither will it ought auaile vs to rule ouer the whole world, and in the meane time to be slaues vnto our owne lusts; to haue all nations vnder our subiection, and to haue within vs tumultuous passions, and disordered affections, which continually stirre vp in vs ciuill and intestine vprores and seditions, when as they rebell against the rule of holy reason, and resist the good motions of Gods spirit. Finally, if wee would haue that strength which is worth esteeme, let vs like true Israelites labour after such power as may preuaile with God; and after the example of our fore-father Iacob, let vs wrestle with him by our prayers and strong cries, neuer letting him depart from vs, till wee haue obtained a blessing, which shall bee accompanied here with comfort, ioy, and peace, and with eternall blessednesse and true happinesse in the life to come. And thus much concerning the vanitie of worldly power and authoritie.

Eph. 6. 10, 11. Phil. 4. 13. Magna potentia non posse malum. Pro. 16. 32.

Hos.12.3.4.

CHAP. XII.

Of the vanitie of worldly nobilitie.

¶. Sect. 1. What nobility is, & the signes thereof.

THE second kind of preferment or aduancement is worldly nobilitie, which wee will first distinguish from that nobilitie which being good and lawfull, is to be approued and respected; and afterwards shew the vanitie of that, which being worldly and wicked, is to bee despised and contemned. And first we are to know that nobilitie generally considered, is nothing else, but that honorable greatnesse, fame and reputation, which men haue deriued vnto them from their progenitors, both by reason of their famous vertues, and notable deserts, and also their aduancement to places of dignitie and greatnesse of estate, conferred vpon thē for their worth by their Prince and countrey: the which together with their fame and great esteeme, is deriued successiuely from them to their posteritie. The signes of which nobilitie are diuers, as a memorable descent, and famous genealogie, deriued a farre off from their first welldeseruing and aduanced ancestor, or first founder of their house, vnto their next parent; honorable tieles, wherewith the race from time to time hath beene enobled, armes and coates granted vnto them, for their merit and seruice of state, as a perpetuall remembrance of their wel-deseruing: vnto which wee may adde those statues, and images, which in ancient times were vsed to continue a glorious memorie of their progenitors.

The which order of nobilitie is good and warrantable, as may appeare by these reasons. First, because in the first wel-ordered common-wealth, the kingdome of Israel, euen whilest the Lord himselfe did hold in his owne hand the right of royaltie, gouerning them by his owne Law, and ruling ouer them as their chiefe Soueraigne; this superioritie of nobilitie was established, there being set ouer euery tribe their Princes and Peeres, who were both in fame and state chiefe of all the rest; as also in that he did appropriate both the soueraignitie ouer the common-wealth, and chiefe superioritie in the Church, vnto certaine tribes and posteritie, who being thus enobled by God, did hold this honour peculiarly to themselues, vnto the time of Christ. Secondly, this difference of order, that there should be some noble, and some inferiour and common people, hath its ground both from ciuill policie, for the wel-gouerning of the common-wealth, which could not well stand, vnlesse these potent Peeres, as it were chiefe pillars, did vphold it; and also from nature its selfe. For the Lord hauing bestowed some heroicall gifts and graces vpon some speciall men, as wisdome, magnanimitie, fortitude, magnificence, courtesie, liberalitie and the rest; doth also for the good of common-wealthes vsually vouchsafe, that there should be certaine seeds of these vertues deriued after a secret and vnknowne manner, from them successiuely vnto their posteritie, whereby being come to maturitie, they resemble their ancestors in these speciall graces. And howsoeuer God sometimes altereth this order and course of nature, either to punish some speciall sinnes of that familie, or to shew his owne absolute omnipotencie, which cannot be subiected to nature, or inferiour causes, suffering some to degenerate from their ancestors, and to lose these heroicall gifts; as also conferreth them vpon some other of meane qualitie, whom it is his pleasure to aduance; yet most vsually he holdeth the former course; and though one of this noble posteritie doe degenerate, yet commonly the seeds of these vertues, which haue lien hid in him, and as it were buried vnder the earthy burthen of his corruption, are deriued from him to his of-spring, and being (as it were) againe quickened and reuiued shew themselues. Euen as a father being by some accident maimed of an arme or legge, doth neuertheless beget perfect & well formed children, because generation is not tied to one individuum or singuler person, but to the whole kind and ordinarie course of nature. And this propriety of gifts which are of speciall eminencie, wee may obserue in other creatures, as in plants, trees, birds and beasts; that as they are bestowed vpon some of them, them; so they are continued to their whole kind and race, vnlesse some by accident doe degenerate, as for example, thus clons and yong grafts resemble the tree from which they were cut, admitting no alteration, though they be grafted into a new stocke; and thus horses take after their race, dogs after their kind, and hawkes and other fowle participate the nature and properties of that ayre in which they are bred. Lastly, nobilitie serueth for good vse, as it is a meanes both to restraine from vice, or at least from open and notorious crimes, and to prouoke men to good and vertuous actions; for being hereby as lights set vpon an hill, vpon which the eyes of all men are fixed and fastned, they are restrained from many open and grosse sinnes, for feare of dishonoring themselues and blemishing their reputation, and incited to many vertues and ciuill actions, for the maintaining of their credit and estimation: which ends, though they be not religiously good in themselues, when as they are onely, or chiefly propounded, yet are they the cause and occasion of good both to the Church and commonwealth. By all which it appeareth, that nobilitie is so much esteemed of all, and to be reuerenced and respected of inferiours; and therefore those speeches of Heathen Philosophers, and also of many Christian writers, which tend to the bringing in a paritie amongst the faithfull, and an absolute contempt of nobility, are either themselues to be contemned and reiected, or else to bee applied to that false and counterfeit nobilitie, which consisteth only in outward titles, and in the worth of ancestors, being in its selfe worthlesse and destitute of all vertue and goodnesse.

Which error that we also may not fall into, in shewing the vanitie of nobilitie, we must distinguish it into two kinds: the first we may tearme true and complete nobilitie, when as men doe ioyne with that honour, which they haue from their ancestors, their owne vertues and good deeds, especially religion and true godlinesse; that so they may be noble, not only by inheritance, but also by their owne purchase, and appeare no lesse good in the sight of God, than glorious in the eyes of men. And this is that true nobilitie, which wheresoeuer it is found, is to be reuerenced and respected with double honour, both for the greatnesse which they haue from their ancestors, and for the goodnesse which is in themselues; yea and so much more for this than for the other, as goodnesse excelleth greatnesse, in the iudgement of all who are endowed with true wisdome. Neither is this true nobilitie much respected and valued amongst all good men onely, but it is also most acceptable vnto God, for howsoeuer the Lord is no respecter of persons, but regardeth vertue in the begger, as well as in the King; yet hee more respecteth and rewardeth the vertues and good parts which he findeth in true nobilitie, than in the common sort; partly because they more glorifie him, and doe more good to his Church, being more exemplarie, and drawing on their inferiours to their imitation; and partly because they haue stronger tentations to draw them aside out of their course of goodnesse: and therefore when they continue in the right way, and after a more dangerous conflict, obtaine a more glorious victorie than priuate men, it is no maruaile if they haue a greater reward, and richer crowne allotted vnto them.

b. Sect. 4. That worldly nobility is of no worth or excellencie.

The other kind of nobility is worldly and imperfect, when as men are enobled only for the vertues and deserts of their ancestors, hauing no worth or good parts in themselues, wherein they doe in any degree resemble their predecessors; but retaining only their name, titles, armes and honors, doe wholly degenerate from them in their vertues and good qualities. The which nobilitie, howsoeuer it maketh a glorious shew in the world, yet is it in truth base and contemptible, as being no true nobilitie, but a bastardly and degenerate offspring, or but as a dead truncke, which retaineth some outward forme or shape, but wanteth vertue and goodnesse which is the soule thereof, whereby it should haue its chiefe essence and Being, without which it soone roteth and perisheth. And this is that worldly, maimed, and lame nobilitie, which is to bee neglected and contemned: first, because it is of no worth or excellencie vnto any, being seuered from true vertue and godlinesse, in that they haue lost the chiefe and formall difference, whereby they were first aduanced about the common sort, namely those heroicall vertues, and good parts, which first enobled their ancestors. Neither is it birth and succession alone that can make noble, for as the Heathen man well obserued, there is no King, who hath not descended of seruants; no seruant, which hath not had a King for his predecessor, long time hauing made a mixture of all estates, raising some from the dunghill, to the throne; and deposing others from great honours, to the lowest contempt and most abiect disgrace. Againe, if we respect our common matter, we are all made of the same earth and clay, and readie when God taketh away from vs the breath of life, to become all alike, and to turne into the same principles whereof we were made. If we looke vnto our pedegree, we haue the same Adam, the same Noah, for our common ancestors, neither did the Lord make one man of more precious matter, ter, to be the roote and first progenitour of the noble, and another of baser mould, to bee the first beginner of the poore and contemptible; but one and the same Adam to be the father of all. Finally, if we respect the soule, our more excellent part, may we not also say with the Prophet, Haue we not all one father? hath not one God made vs? and hath not the same Creator breathed into vs the same breath of life? In all which respects there is no superioritie, but we are all alike the creatures of God, and brethren one to another. And as there is no difference betweene diuers peeces of the same lumpe of clay, although the one bee contained in a golden, the other in a earthen dish, not betweene two peeces of wood of the same tree, because the one is couered with rags, and the other with cloath of gold: so there is no difference of excellencie, betweene the noble and ignoble, the King and the meanest subiect, if they be considered in this generalitie of nature, though there be no comparison betweene them in their worldly estate. Wherein then doth the excellencie and superiorite of the noble consist, aboue those who are of meane birth? Surely chiefly in this, that the Lord hath giuen vnto them the priuiledge of certaine heroicall vertues, excellent parts, and good deserts, whereby they are aduanced to honour and places of dignitie. And therefore those Nobles who are destitute of these vertues and good parts, and defiled and imbaced with all manner of sinne and vice, haue in them no sparke of true nobilitie, being depriued and destitute of this formall difference; nor yet any right of superiority ouer their brethren from nature, but only haue an hereditarie shadow thereof, and that onely by vertue of tyrannicall custome, or at least ciuill and politike order.

Malach. 2. 10.

Q. Sect. 5. That there is no cause why any should glorie in worldly nobility.

Let no man therefore boast himselfe of his farre fetcht pedegree, vnlesse hee can proue also a succession of vertues and good parts. For the further hee deriueth it, the neerer hee commeth to Adam, in whom there is not so much cause of glorying for his aduancement, as of shaming for his sinne and downefall. And if hee that ascendeth thus farre, would rise one degree higher, he should finde his next ancestor to bee the dust and clay, in which there would bee more reason of humiliation, than of pride in the next descent, seeing hee may iustly say with Iob to corruption, thou art my father, and to the worme, thou art my mother, and my sister. Let him not bee proud of his large reuenewes left vnto him by his ancestors, if he be disinherited of the riches of their heroicall graces, nor yet vaunt himselfe of their greatnesse, being quite destitute of their goodnesse; let him not glorie in the shadow of honourable titles, being abandoned of the substance of their inward vertues, and their outward well deseruing; let not their varietie of armes, and rich coates puffe them vp, seeing these were gotten by others, and should it they had their deserts bee lost by them, it being a matter of great equity, that vice should lose, that which vertue hath wonne. Finally, let them know that boasting themselues in their emptie and worthlesse nobilitie, they doe herein commend others, and not themselues; and like beggerly mates, become proud of borrowed apparell, shewing plainly that there is nothing worth praise in themselues, seeing they chiefly stand vpon borrowed rules, and vaunt of the vertues and well deseruings of other men.

Iob 17. 14.

Againe, the worthlesnesse of this worldly nobilitie hereby appeareth, in that God infinite in all wisdome, and true iudgement, esteemeth and respecteth it not: for as a gift of small value he imparteth it as well to his enemies as to his friends, and aduanceth to this same nobilitie, the idolatrous Pagan, prophane Christian, and wicked worldling, as well, yea more commonly, than his owne children and seruants. So when himselfe was to make choice of men whom hee would aduance to sit vpon the royall throne, and to rule his people Israell, he neglecteth the great nobles of the land, and chuseth Saul, who was seeking his asses; and he afterwards being reprobated for his wickednesse, for the next succession, hee taketh Dauid from following of his sheepe. And this order he also obserueth in chusing such as he purposeth to aduance to be first true members of the kingdome of grace, and afterwards to reigne with him in his kingdome of glorie. For as the Apostle witnesseth, not many mighty, not many noble are called, but he chuseth the weake things of the world to confound the mighty things, and vile things of the world, and things that are despised hath God chosen, and things that are not, to bring to nought things that are. Which sentence much more terrible than the thunder, should shake these high Cedars, and pearcing the hearts of the proudest nobilitie, should make them quake and tremble, for feare lest themselues should be in the greater number whom God hath passed by; and neuer to be at rest, till they haue gathered vnto themselues by their fruits of sanctification, certaine and particular assurance, that they are in the small number of these not many whom God hath called. For what will it auaile them to haue ruffled it out in worldly pompe, for a short and momentanie life, and to be eternally reprobated of God, and excluded from the vnspeakable ioyes of his kingdome; yea also to suffer for euer with the prince of darkenes, the inexplicable torments of hell fire?

Thus

Thus also our Saviour Christ the onely Sonne of our supreme Soueraigne, and heire apparant to the Kingdome of Heauen, neglected and contemned this worldly Nobility, both in himselfe and others. For howsoeuer hee was descended of most ancient and Royall Progenitours, and might haue assumed a glorious stile, and most honourable titles; yet he regardeth them not, nor any whit standeth vpon these worldly priuiledges, but vsually called himselfe the Sonne of man. And howsoeuer being both God and man, hee might haue chosen for his next parent, some great Princes, equall or superiour in dignitie to any of his Ancestors, yet he is contebt to be borne of a simple Virgin, the espoused wife of a poore Carpenter. Neither did hee regard this Nobilitie any more in others, for being to chuse Apostles & Disciples to attend his person, and to bee (as it were) the chiefe Courtiers of this heauenly King, he passeth by the Nobles of the World, and maketh choice of silly fisher men, and poore Artificers. Finally, as the Lord himselfe thus meanly accounteth of worldly Nobilitie, so also hath he taught vs to value and esteeme it: for howsoeuer he would haue vs in our outward carriage, to obserue ciuill order, yet hee maketh it a note of an heauenly inhabitant, to contemne a wicked man, how glorious soeuer hee be in the World, and to honour those that feare the Lord. Where by the Antithesis and opposition hee plainly sheweth, that he who feareth not God, is to bee esteemed a vile person, though hee haue neuer so many honourable Titles; as the Holy Ghost also stileth Antiochus Epiphanes, howsoeuer the honour of a worldly Monarchie was conferred on him. Whereas contrariwise he honoureth the Saints which are vpon the earth, with the title of Excellencie, calling them also a chosen generation, and Royall Priesthood, yea Kings, which raigne together with God, and his Sonne Iesus Christ.

But as there is no excellency in this worldly Nobility; so though there were, yet it deserueth no great esteeme, in regard that it is so momentany, and also mutable: for say it should continue with them as long as they liue, yet what were this to be esteemed, seeing life it selfe being but a bubble or vapour, is ready euery day to vanish away? yea, though their name should out-liue them, and their glorious fame should continue after them, euen to the end of the World, yet what is this in comparison of eternitie? But alas it is not so; for the iust iudgement of God beating downe their pride, doth cause the name of wicked Nobility to rot sooner than their bodies, leauing no remembrance behind them, vnlesse it be of their sinne and shame: yea, this worldly Nobility is not only momentany, but also mutable, and altogether vncertaine to continue vnto this short period of life, seeing for their ill deseruing they out-liue their Nobility, & their crimes like deadly poysons tainting their bloud, do vtterly imbase their honour and reputation. In regard of which mutabilitie, the ancient Nobility of Rome were accustomed to weare Moones vpon their Shooes, that being lift vp with their glory and greatnesse of State, they might haue this swelling asswaged, by hauing continually before their eyes this example of mutability. And this changeablenesse of estate they are subject vnto by the iust iudgement of God; for it is righteous with him, that these false lights serving for no other end, but to seduce their inferiours, should bee quite put out and extinguished, and that their Nobility should be taken from them, when as it is not so much a grace vnto them, as they a shame to it.

Plutarch. de quæst. Rom. quæst. 96.

And thus it appeareth that this worldly Nobility is of no great worth or excellency, both in respect of the vanity and also the momentany continuance thereof; whereby it is cleere and manifest, that newly aduanced vertue, or as we call it, vpstart Nobility, and of the first Head, being joyned with worth and desert, whereby it is raised, howsoeuer it hath not the precedence in ciuill meetings, yet without all comparison, is to be preferred in the judgement and estimation of all that are good, before ancient nobility, which in the race of succession hath out-lasted vertue, and is contaminated and defiled with vice and wickednesse. The which howsoeuer it is scarce acknowledged amongst many that professe Christianity, yet was it plainly discerned and confessed by the Heathens, who had no other guide than the light of nature. One saith, that it is better to purchase Nobility by desert, than to haue it by inheritance. Another saith, that hee esteemeth Nobility chiefly for goodnesse, and that he would account him to bee ignoble and base, who is vnjust and destitute of vertue, though hee could deriue his pedigree from a better than Iupiter. So Harmodius vpbrayding Iphicrates, a famous Emperour or Commander with baseneſse of birth, receiued a fit answere: The honour (saith hee) of my house beginneth with me, and the honour of thine endeth with thee. So the wise Socrates answered a vicious Nobleman, objecting vnto him meanenesse of birth: My parentage (saith he) is a disgrace vnto me, and thou to thy parentage. Finally, another concludeth, that it is much better to bee the parent of a mans owne Nobility, than to corrupt and disgrace it, hauing receiued it from his Ancestors. With these accordeth that ancient Father, who affirmeth that it is much rather to bee chosen to bee adorned with vertue, though a man be of obscure parentage, than being descended of famous Progenitours, to abound

9. Sect. 9. That vpstart Nobility ioyned with vertue, is to be preferred before that which is destitute of it though it be ancient.

abound with vices; euen as the Rose is better which yeeldeth a fragrant and sweet smel, though it spring from a prickling plant, than a thorne or briar, growing in a fruitfull soile, which is good for nothing but for the fire. To the same purpose, the Sonne of Syrach saith, that If children liue honestly, they shall put away the shame of their parents, but if they be proud with hautinesse and foolishnesse, they defile the Nobilitie of their Kindred.

But as this worldly Nobilitie is vaine and of no worth: so also is it altogether vnprofitable, being seuered from those vertues and good parts which were in those Progenitours, who did first ennoble the Family. For as it doth not profit the streame that it floweth from a cleere fountaine, when as it selfe is full of filth or mud, by reason of the filthinesse of its owne channell: no more doth it auaile any to haue noble and vertuous Ancestours, when as themselues are poysoned and corroped with dishonourable qualities, and disgracefull vices. Who would not think his folly ridiculous, who being himselfe lame, should be proud because hee is descended from able and actiue parents? or being himselfe blind, should boast of his Progenitours quicke eye-sight? or being dumbe, should bragge of their eloquence? or finally being a starke foole, should glory and vaunt himself in his Ancestors wisdome? And surely it is no lesse absurd for any, to beare themselues high in the vertue and worth of their Predecessours, when there is nothing in them but vice and worthlesnesse; there being farre greater cause why their Progenitours should be ashamed of such a degenerate offspring, than why they should bee proud of such Ancestors, whom they doe not at all resemble in their vertues and good parts. It is true indeed that a young Colt is much esteemed for his race, and the vntried Whelpe for his kind he commeth of: but if being come to proofe, there bee no courage or mettle in the one, nor any swiftnesse or sagacitie in the other; notwithstanding their race and kind, wee esteeme no better of themselues, but as Iades and Curs; because it is not the goodnes of their kind which will helpe them in the race, or cause them to winne the Game, if they be vtterly void of selfe-excellency. And so in like manner, howsoeuer greatnesse of birth may commend young Nobilitie, as giuing some hope in course of nature, that they will resemble the worth and vertues of their Progenitors: yet when being come to riper age, they plainly discouer that they are vtterly degenerate, full of base qualities, ignoble and vicious: they (notwithstanding the worth of their Ancestors) are to be esteemed seruile and contemptible. For as parentage doth not absolutely conferre vertue, so neither Nobilitie, and as vertue it selfe is not hereditary, so neither is Nobility, which (as I haue said) is chiefly grounded vpon vertue and goodnesse. Wee see by experience, that from the same oare commeth base drosse and pure Gold; from the same roote, a sharpe prickle and a sweet Rose; and from the same graine of corne, both straw and chaffe, and also pure wheate. And it is often to be seene that the same vertuous parents haue both good and bad children descended of them: so faithfull Abraham had an Ismael, as well as an Isaac; and Isaac as well a prophane Esau, as a vertuous Iacob: good Samuel had a desperate off-spring: and holy David had as well an Absolon and Adoniah, as a Salomon, and a Nathan. Whereby it appeareth that vertues cannot bee entailed like lands, or though such an entaile were made, yet it proueth no perpetuitie, seeing it is easily cut off, when as they degenerate from their Ancestors, and hold a contrary course in all manner of vice and wickednesse.

But let vs consider the vnprofitablenesse of worldly Nobility in some particular examples. Cain as we know, was the first borne of Adam, who had his descent from God himselfe, & was heire apparant to the whole World; but what did it auaile him to haue the most excellent man for his Father, and the Soueraigne King of Heauen and Earth, in some sort, for his Grand-father? Or what did his great birth-right profit him, when as defiling his heart with rage and cruelty, and his hands with innocent bloud, hee made himselfe to become a base Vagabond vpon the earth? What did it benefit Cham to bee nobly descended of that great and righteous Patriarch Noah, the second mayne root of repaired mankind, when as by his wickednesse he became subject to the curse, and being free-borne, did by his vice and sin make himselfe an abject seruant? What did it profit Ismael to bee the first-borne of faithfull Abraham, or Esau to be the eldest sonne of religious Isaac, when as the one becomming a derider of Gods promises, was (as it were) excommunicate and cast out of that Family, to whith the Couenant of Grace was made and appropriated; and the other shewing himselfe a prophane contemner of holy and heauenly things, lost both the birth-right and the blessing? It were infinite to stand vpon such particulars; and therefore for breuitie sake, contenting our selues with these few, let vs also consider the truth hereof in a whole people or country. What Nation in the World was euer comparable in Nobility to the people of the Iewes? who being descended from Abraham the Father of the faithfull, had the Lord himselfe for the first and immediate founder of their Commonwealth, yea, for their King and Soueraigne, who iudged, ruled and gouerned them, as it were, by his owne mouth in difficult causes, holding in his owne hand the Royall Lawes and and Prerogatiues, till they vnthankfully desired another King, and would needs be ruled like other Nations. Againe, that which other people counterfeited, they truly had; namely, the Lord himselfe for their Lawgiuer, who proclaimed the chiefe summe of their Lawes by his owne glorious voice, and at large expounded them by his faithfull seruant Moses: all which were much more excellent than the Lawes of any other Nation. Moreouer, if wee respect antiquitie, they were most ancient, there being no Histories that make mention of any Common-wealth, which was constituted long after the Common-wealth of Israel: for whereas all Writings and Records were meerely fabulous among the Heathens before the Warres of Troy; the learned haue found that this War was long after the setling of the State of Israel, when as they had Iephthe for their Iudge. Finally, there was neuer any Nation, who could so plainly and distinctly shew the antiquitie of their Houses and Kindred, by reason of that exact diuision of their Tribes, Families and Inheritances, which was religiously obserued among them. But yet what did all this Nobilitie of the people of Israel auaile them, when as degenerating from their Ancestors, they lost their vertues, the true life and soule of their Nobilitie, and became vicious and polluted with all manner of sinne? Surely nothing at all; for doe not the Prophets of God notwithstanding all this (looking vnto what they were, and not respecting from whom they were descended) call them the seed of the wicked, corrupt children, people of Gomorrah? Doe they not tell them, that the cursed Cananites were their Kindred, their Father an Amorite, and their Mother an Hittite? Yea, doth not Iohn the Baptist goe further, calling them a generation of Vipers, and charging them no more to challenge Abraham for their Father, seeing they nothing resembled him in his faith and other vertues? And doth not our Sauiour himselfe disgrace them with the same title? and when they gloried in their Nobilitie, because they were Abrahams seed, doth not he tell them, that if they were the children of Abraham, they would doe the workes of Abraham; and plainly affirmeth that they were the children of Deuill, because they did his will, and resembled him in performing their wicked lusts? So small account haue Christ and his Prophets made of this worldly Nobility, being seuered from vertue and polluted with vice and wickednesse. Neither is it any maruell if that Nobilitie which is derived from earthly parents, doth nought profit those who doe not imitate their vertue, when as Kindred and Consanguinitie with Christ Iesus himselfe, who was not only man, but also the glorious Sonne of God, did not at all auaile those, who were not as neere vnto him in faith, as they were in bloud: for when it was told him that his mother and brethren did waite to speake with him, lightly accounting of earthly Kindred, he farre preferreth before it that kindred which was spirituall, affirming that his Disciples, who heard and obeyed his Fathers will, were his brethren, sisters and mother. And how little heeded he of those who were his brethren in the flesh, and did not adhere vnto him by a liuely faith, it may plainly appeare in the seuenth of Iohn, by that disagreeing Dialogue that was beweene them. So when a woman admiring his doctrine cryed out, that the wombe was blessed that bare him, and the paps that gaue him sucke, he correcteth her speech, saying, yea, rather blessed are they that heare the Word of God and keepe it. And therefore if this Consanguinitie with Christ Iesus himselfe bee vnprofitable, vnlesse through faith we be of spirituall kindred with him, how little will it auaile vs to claime the most noble on earth for our Ancestors and Progenitors, if we be degenerate from them in vertue, grace and goodnesse?

And thus haue I shewed that this worldly Nobility hath in it neither worth nor profit. But we are further to know, that most commonly it is accompanied with much hurt; for first it puffeth men vp with a proud conceit of their owne greatnesse, and maketh them to contemne all others, whom they excell in noble Ancestors, Titles, Armes and such like Honours, in regard whereof Nobility is called the fuell of pride: the which (as one saith) Christian Nobles should bee farre from, because together with the poore and ignoble they call God their Father, which they cannot truly and religiously say, vnlesse they also acknowledge them to bee their brethren. Yea, it causeth them not only to carry and demeane themselues proudly towards men, but also towards God himselfe, by whom they were aduanced to their greatnesse, and maketh them quite to forget that they were euer thus beholding vnto him, to cast his Commandements behinde their backs, and either vtterly to neglect the duties of his worship and seruice, or at least the publike means thereof, contenting themselues with their priuate and home-deuotions. For thinking it vnfit for their Nobility and greatnesse, to adioyne themselues with the vulgar people, and that they should imbase their honour too much by comming into the publike Congregation, they content themselues with their Chaplaine, as Abisha with his Leuite, and not indiuring the publike Ministery, where sinne is reproued without respect of persons, and the conscience searched to the bottome; they commit themselues ouer to his cure, who hauing his present meanes and future hopes wholly depending vpon them, dare not say any thing that may incurre their displeasure; nor yet apply any salues to their festred sores, which might cure them to the bottome, because they would too much vexe and trouble their delicate and wanton patients; but only such healing salues as draw ouer the sore a faire skin of carnall security, but leaue the core behind, and neuer free them from the inward putrefaction. And this (I doubt not to say) is one chiefe and speciall cause of the irreligion and prophanenes of the Nobility of these times, because they neglect the Ordinance of God in the publicke Ministery of the Word, which is the ordinary meanes of conuersion and saluation, and either doe not at all performe this outward seruice vnto God, or else after their owne fashion, without power or profit, making him first of their charge, vnto whose charge they commit themselues; their seruant, before they make him their shepheard, and to depend vpon them for his bodily nourishment and meanes of life, before they will depend vpon him for their spirituall nourishment and the food of their soules, which they will haue cooked after their owne fashion, and fitted to their daintie palate with their own pleasing sauce, or else hee is sure to lose their fauour, and with it the fruit of all his labours, and all the hopes of his tedious seruice, and base dependancie.

¶. Sect. 13. That nobilitie seuered from vertue, disgraceth those that haue it.

Secondly, this worldly Nobility which is seuered from vertue, doth but disgrace those that haue it, and when they by their worth are not an honour vnto it, it becommeth a dishonour vnto them. For it is vnto them as a light, which not only draweth mens eyes to looke vpon them, but also doth consequently discouer their vices and deformities, and set them out to the publick view: euery one being apt to obserue the faults of their superiours, as foule staines in finer clothes and as blacke clouds hiding from their eyes the Sunnes brightnesse; and to passe that censure, that it is most vncomely for those of so good birth, to disgrace themselues with so euill a life. So that they who are of greatest estate, haue in their actions and carriage the least liberty, because their doings are more curiously obserued, and sharply censured, and much being expected from them, they are much more blamed than other men, when as they come short of expectation. In which respect, one compareth these Nobles to such Musicians, as comming in with costly clothes and excellent instruments, doe moue great expectation in the beholders; but hauing harsh and vntunable voices, and a rude and vnskilfull touch, all their brauery tendeth to their more disgrace, not only because themselues are ignorant Bunglers, but also do abuse and deceiue the beholders expectation. Againe, as it doth disgrace themselues and sheweth their faults, so also hauing discouered them, it much aggrauateth them, both as it sheweth greater vnthankfulnesse towards God, by abusing his more rich mercy, wherewith hee hath priuiledged them aboue others, and also because their sinnes, by reason of their greatnesse, being more exemplary, doe draw on their inferiours to their imitation. And consequently as it doth aggrauate sinne, so it doth increase their condemnation, Gods iustice proportionating the punishment according to the measure of meas faultinesse; so that where sinne hath runne ouer, there also iudgement doth ouer-flow. Now the vices of Nobility are greater, and more inexcusable than other mens, both in respect of the former reasons, and also because they haue degenerated from their Ancestours, and with their neglect of other meanes, haue not at all profited by domesticall examples, nor been bettered, although their worthy Progenitours haue left vnto them the memoriall of their vertues, as a paterne for their imitation. But of these points I shall haue occasion to speake more hereafter, and therefore will here briefly passe them ouer.

Seeing therefore this worldly Nobility is of no excellencie, vnprofitable and momentany, and so farre from bringing vnto vs any great good, that it is through mans corruption the cause of much hurt, let vs not ouer-ualue it, or too much set our hearts vpon it; but learning to despise and contemne it, as being of small worth, let vs labour to aduance our selues to spirituall and heauenly Nobility; both because it is most excellent and profitable, and also not like the other, peculiar to some few, but common to all, who setting their hearts and affections vpon it, do with all their desires and indeuours seeke and sue for it.

The excellency of this spirituall and heauenly Nobility, appeareth both in their freedome that haue it, and also in their aduancement. They are freed from the slauish tyranny of Satan, and from the base seruitude of sinne: so that as the Apostle saith, it shall no longer reigne in their mortall bodies. The which is to be esteemed the chiefest part of true Nobility, when as holding nothing from these base Lords, they owe all their fealtie, allegiance, and seruice to the Lord of all, and supreame King of heauen and earth. Whereas contrariwise, they who are most noble in their worldly estate, are notwithstanding all their honours and high titles, of a most abiect and base condition, as long as they remayne, in the slauery and bondage of sinne and Satan; for what more vile seruitude can be imagined, than to be the seruant of sinne, and to remayne Sathans Drudge, ready to doe his will? Againe, this spirituall and true Nobility freeth vs from the the ouer-ruling power of our corrupt affections, and from the tyrannie of our violent passions, bringing them vnder the rule of the Law of God, and in subjection to holy reason. The which priuiledge worldly Nobility wanteth, and consequently bringeth with it small grace or profit. For what auaileth it a man to be outwardly glorious in the World, and inwardly base in himselfe? to haue other men to cap & crouch to him, when as he serueth more vicious and base Masters than the worst that serue him? and whilest others stoope vnto him, and doe him honour; he disgraceth himselfe by stooping and yeelding to his vile affections and violent passions? Finally, this true and Christian Nobility, doth cause vs so stand boldly in the presence of our great King, in assurance of his loue, and to offer vnto him our willing seruice, not for seruile feare, either of his heauy curse pronounced in his Law, or of his fearefull punishments denounced against sinne, either respecting this life or the life to come; but out of a free and generous disposition, because we loue him, who hath loued vs first, and thinke nothing too much which we can doe for his glory, who hath not thought the life of his dearest Sonne, too deare for vs, but hath freely giuen it for our Redemption and Saluation; whereas worldly Nobility hath no such priuiledge, seeing it neither confereth vnto vs the confidence of sonnes, nor freeth vs from the slauish feare of seruants. For notwithstanding all this worldly glory, men may quake with feare, when God sheweth the least signe of his powerfull presence, and either vtterly neglect the duties of his seruice, or performe them securely with carelesse neglect, or with great terrour and trouble of minde.

The aduancements also of spirituall Nobility are ten thousand times more excellent than those which belong to that which is worldly. By this we stand in the presence of Princes, by that in the presence of the glorious King of Heauen and Earth: by this we haue on the fauour of earthly Kings, by that we haue alwayes the fauour of the King of glory: by this we haue earthly reuenewes which are but momentany, by that an heauenly inheritance, which is euerlasting; by this we are honoured and esteemed of men, by that of the Saints and Angels, yea of God himselfe; by this we are chiefe seruants to the great Monarches of the World, by that we become chiefe seruants of the great Monarch of Heauen and Earth. Yea, we become a kin to Christ Iesus himself, euen his brothers & fellowes, as himselfe witnesseth, and through him the adopted sonnes of God, and not onely sonnes, but also heires, not of an earthly inheritance, but of an heauenly Kingdome, immortall and vndefiled. In regard whereof the Scriptures giue vs the titles not onely of Nobility, but also of Royalty, and affirme directly that wee are made of God through Christ, not only great Officers of his heauenly Court, but also Kings who shall reigne with him in all ioy and glory. And therefore as much as a sonne excelleth a seruant, Heauen Earth, and God himselfe mortall Princes; so much more we are in our iudgements to esteeme, and in our endeauours to seeke the nobility of a Christian, aboue and before the nobility of a Worldling. Vnto which we may the rather be incouraged, because whereas this earthly Nobility is conferred but vpon a very few; as either vpon those who are nobly descended, or vpon such whose great vertues and deserts, ioyned with no lesse good hap, and extraordinary successe in al their courses and carriages, doe aduance to the seat of honour, and dignifie with those high Titles; this Nobility of a Christian may certainly be attained vnto, of as many as doe with their desires and indeuours seeke after it, vsing the meanes which God hath ordained for this purpose; namely, the diligent hearing and fruitfull obeying of Gods Word, and a liuely faith in Iesus Christ. And therefore let vs more esteeme, affect, and seeke that which excelleth, both in worth and certainty; and contemning this worldly nobility which is commonly vnprofitable, often hurtfull, seldome, or not without great difficultie attained, and but for a moment of time retained and possessed; let vs aspire with an holy and happy ambition, vnto that heauenly Royalty, which we may certainly find if we carefully seeke it, and hauing obtained it, shall haue with it al profit without hurt, ioy without molestation, and happinesse without end. And thus much concerning the vanity of worldly Nobility.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Kingdomes and Monarchies.

THE last and highest degree of worldly aduancement and preferment, is Kingdome and Soueraignty, Empire and supreame Dominion, whereby men being exalted into the Royall Throne, doe rule and gouerne whole Common-wealths. Of which I shall need to speake the lesse, because much of that which hath beene spoken concerning power, authority, and Nobility, may easily by the diserete Reader be fitted and applyed hereunto. And therefore I will adde onely some things which may serue more peculiar to this Royall and Soueraigne aduancement. Where first we are to know that the following discourse is not intended to shew the veuity, or perswade the contempt of cruell and barbarous tyranny; which being odious to God and men, needs no reason to moue all to haue it in detestation and base esteeme, but of lawfull Monarchies and Kingdomes, abused either by quer-valuing their worth, or through the corruption and foolishnesse of gouernment. The contempt whereof as we ought not to be absolute in any, bas only in respect of abuse (for it is a thing of as great esteeme as any else in the world, when as a good King ruleth well, and not according to his owne lusts and vnlimited pleasure, but according to the Law of God, the Law of Nations, and the particular Lawes of his owne Kingdome) so ought it not to bee in all, but in those only who are either possessed, or in possibility of this supreme soueraignety; vnlesse it bee as wee vnderstand it comparatiuely in respect either of spirituall graces, or heauenly ioyes. For as for those who are in subiection, they are to honour and esteeme their Soueraignes in the next place to God himselfe: seeing this rule and authority is Gods Ordinance, and Kings are his Deputies and Lieutenants, & (as it were) the great Stewards of his family, whom hee hath dignified by giuing them his own name and Titles, and hath bound vs by his Word to owe and yeeld vnto them all honour, loue and dutie. So the Apostle saith, Let euery soule be subiect to the higher powers; for there is no power but of God, and the powers that be are ordained of God, &c. And as it is to be highly esteemed of the people, as being an Ordinance of God in it selfe good; so also because it is so necessary to the well-being of a Common-wealth, that it is impossible without it that it should stand, much lesse flourish and prosper. For looke what the Shepheard is to the sheepe, the Pilote to the ship, the Captaine to the Souldier, yea, the head and heart to the body; and such is the King to the Common-wealth.

2. Sect. 2. That royalty and supreme authority is the gift and blessing of God.

And in the same regard this preferment of soueraigne and transcendent power is to bee duely valued and esteemed of those, who are by Gods prouidence aduanced to this Royalty: seeing it is a great gift and royall prerogatiue, wherewith the Lord hath honored them aboue all their Brethren, requiring a proportionable thankfulnesse, which they can neuer yeeld, vnlesse they know and esteeme the benefit: yea, it is not only a gift, but a blessing, expressed in that mayne blessing, wherewith God blessed Abraham, the great Patriarch and Father of the faithfull; I will make thee (saith hee) exceeding fruitfull, and will make Nations of thee, yea, Kings shall proceed of thee. Vnto which who so are aduanced, they seeme to be preferred aboue the estate and condition of meere men, in respect of their place and office, in regard whereof they haue Gods Name and Titles imparted vnto them. And this also the Lord seemeth to imply by his Prophet, where hauing giuen charge that no man should enter by the East-gate of the Sanctuary, because the Lord had entered by it: in the next words he saith, that it shall appertaine to the Prince, both to take therein his repast, & to make it the way of his passage, to come in and goe out thereby. Neuerthelesse howsoeuer Kingdomes are the chiefest of worldly preferments, yet are they not to take vp the chiefest place in our iudgements and affections, seeing they are but of meane worth, being compared with Gods spirituall graces, or the eternall ioyes of his Kingdome. In respect whereof they are to be meanly valued and moderately desired, that is, neither to be refused when God giueth them, nor to be affected when as he denieth them, not giuing vnto vs lawfull meanes, of attayning to them. Yea, they are directly to be contemned and rejected, when as they come in competition for our loue with those other excellencies, as being in comparison of them worthlesse and vnprofitable, and when they are thus abused, hurtfull and pernicious: which who so doe, they shew greater and more Christian magnanimity in this contempt, than others in affecting, or, hauing obtained them, by raigning in all their royalty. An example whereof we haue in Gedeon, who was more ennobled for denying a Kingdome when it was offered vnto him, than his sonne Abimelech who with cruell and vnnaturall ambition aspired vnto it.

But let vs consider of some reasons which may shew the worthlesse vanity of worldly Kingdomes, in comparison of Gods spirituall graces or heauenly ioyes. The first may be taken from the manifold troubles and incumbrances which a Kingdome bringeth with it, euen to those who iustly come by it, and wisely manage it; the which are so innumerable, irksome and burthensome; that if men were not more supported with ambition, than with reason, they would be ready for wearinesse to sinke vnder the waight, and to vnload themselues of this intolerable greatnesse, to finde ease in a more priuate life. Of this the Heathen Monarch hauing experience, said vnto one who admired his happinesse, and measured his inward comfort and contentment by his outward rule; If (saith hee) thou diddest know with how many euils this Diadem were replenished, thou wouldest not take it vp, though thou foundest it vpon a dunghill. The truth hereof may be more euident, if wee consider but some few particulars: for first, what wearying and wasting care is euen a good King subiect vnto, whilest he desireth and studieth to act well his Kingly part, so as he may haue the applause of God and his Angels, and that both in respect of himselfe, and also those which which hee taketh for his subjects? And for himselfe, both in regard of his person and priuate actions, and also in regard of his place and publike gouernment. For the first, his care is extraordinary, that he may become a patterne and president vnto his people, whom they may imitate; and to this end hee desireth to shine before them by a good example, making his owne life both the exposition and example of his lawes, and appearing both without substance or semblance of euill, to be also as good as he appeareth. For hee considereth that the Princes life and manners, are the square and rule, according to which his subjects frame themselues in their whole course and conuersation: and therefore hee seeth how much it behooueth him that the square bee straight, least the worke be crooked, and the whole common-wealth brought out of frame. He knoweth that he ruleth ouer reasonable creatures, and therefore studieth first to conforme himselfe to the rule of reason in all his actions, that so they may the better subiect themselues vnto his gouernment, and may suffer him to rule as well in their hearts as in their outward actions. Hee findeth by experience that Princes examples are most effectuall exhortations, either to good or euill, and that their liues are more powerfull then their lawes to incline and moue, to the better or worser part: and therefore hee spendeth himselfe in studying this diuine oratorie, that his life and example may speake good things vnto his people. Hee considereth that Kings errors are like the eclipses of the Sunne, which though they bee seldome seen ouer, yet bring damage and hurt to all sublunary and inferiour bodies: and therefore he is alwayes mouthfull and heedfull ouer his wayes, that his brightnesse bee not blemished by any vitious fume, which might stop and hinder the influence of his good parts, from being profitable to his subjects and inferiours.

The like care hee taketh for the well demeaning of himselfe in his publike gouernment, hauing alwayes in his minde, that hee ruleth ouer men, that he is to gouerne them by Law and reason, not according to his lusts: that hee shall not alwayes gouerne, but that the time shall come when Princes & subjects shall be both alike: and finally, that he must giue an account of his gouernment before the supreame King of heauen & earth, who respecteth not the person of Princes, nor regardeth the rich more then the poore. In regard wherof, his care is great and continuall, not how he may rule according to his will, but according to reason and law, making loue and awefull maiestie, seuerity and sweetnes, mercie and justice, to striue which shall haue the preheminence, or rather neuer to striue, because he tempereth them with equall iudgement and wisdome in a heauenly harmonie. He considereth that as he is a King, so also he is the father of his countrey: for what is a common-wealth but a great familie, ouer which God hath set Princes as parents, not only to rule, but also to prouide for, preserue and defend them? and therefore how great his care must needes be, to nourish and protect so great a charge, let priuate fathers iudge, who find enough to doe, to order and prouide for their small company. Yea he discerneth plainly, that a King in the common-wealth is like the soule in the body, which howsoeuer it be not directly and immediately touched and affected, either with the delights it tasteth, or with the griefes & miseries which it indureth; yet doth it communicate in both, by sympathie and fellow-feeling: and therefore he doth not lay vpon his subiects heauie burthens, because he also is pinched with that waight which oppresseth them, he enuieth not, but greatly reioyceth in their prosperitie, because hee communicates with them in their contentment; and if for the good of the whole body of the common-wealth, he finde it necessary to receiue, rather than take of their goods, that they may inioy the rest with peace and comfort, he onely croppeth them, or rather pruneth them, that they may grow the better, and doth not stocke them vp by the roots. And as the Heathen Prince saith, hee doth like a good shepheard, only fleece them in seasonable time, and not pull off skin and all; knowing that the chiefe treasure of a Prince is the riches of his subjects, and their coffers his best exchequer. Finally, good princes remember that they are Gods deputies, therefore their care is that they may be like him, not hauing their greatnes to exceed their goodnes, but as their power inableth them to doe what they will, so their goodnesse limiteth them to the doing of that which is profitable for their subjects: the which their case is so much more vigilant, because they know that there will bee an end of their Lieutenantship, when as they shall be called to an account of their gouernment, and receiue either the reward of their iustice, or the punishment of their corruptions, and ill-deseruings.

Bonus pastoris est tondere pecus, non deglubere. Tiberius apud Suetonium.

Finally, as the good Prince is continually troubled with care about himselfe, that he may performe his duties: so he taketh no lesse care, that these duties performed may procure the good and wel-fare of his subjects: as for example, that by his wisdome and prouidence, they may haue both necessaries and sufficient plentie, that by his discreet gouernment they may bee kept in good order, that by his administration of justice, euery one may possesse his owne right, and be preserued from wrongs and iniuries: and finally, finally, that by his circumspection and power, his subiects may be preserued from forren forces, and inioy secure peace. For being the father of his country, he is with a fatherly affection to care for the good of his children, as well as his owne; he is the skilfull pilot in this great ship of the common-wealth, who foreseeth the sterne, and ordereth all for the preseruation, not onely of himselfe, but also the whole ship, and all the passengers who haue committed themselues to his care and prouidence. And as it is not enough for the rule or square to be straight it selfe, but it must also serue as the instrument to make other things conformable to it in a true straightnesse, and to level and make euen the whole worke: so it is not enough for a good prince that he bee in himselfe vpright, iust, and furnished with all vertues which become a priuate man; but his care must also be that those that are committed to his charge and gouernment, may communicate with him in all vertue and goodnesse, because he is a publike person, and the head of this great body which must gouerne and direct his members, as shall be most honorable for himselfe and profitable for them. Now although this necessitie of taking extraordinarie care for his owne person, and all the rest of his subiects be an happie necessitie, because it forceth to that which is good, and howsoeuer he may haue comfort in the fruit thereof, yet who knoweth not that in it selfe it is vnpleasant and troublesome, and so bitter and distastefull that it may well weane any from the loue of greatnes?

Secondly, though a crowne may seeme to make a glorious shew, yet is weigheth so heauie, and sitteth so vneasie vpon the head, that those that haue it can take little delight in wearing it, and those that want it, if they loue their owne ease, would if they once felt the waight, be well content that they are not aduanced vnto the honour, because also they are not pressed with the weight. For what doth he else who is aduanced to this height of greatnesse but take like beare vpon his shoulders the waight of the whole common-wealth; and whilest hee is lifted vp into the seate of honour, is pressed downe againe with his weightie burthen? What doth hee else but toile with the greatest labour of all, euen the labour of the minde, continually studying how he may either preserue or aduance his owne glory, and his subiects good: and what is hee better then sinketh vnder the burthen of gold, than he who is oppressed with the waight of earth? what ease hath the more that toileth in the golden mine, than hee who labourth in the clay pit, or quarrey of stones? They are aduanced indeed with the glorious title of monarches, kings and soueraignes; but what are they in truth but the great seruants of the common-wealth, who labour and take paines for the generall good? What are they but stewards of this great familie, who whilest they haue the rule and disposing of all, haue also the care and burthen of all laid vpon them? and what is their reigne, but as one of them spake by experience, a glorious seruitude? Wee know that the pilote as hee hath the greatest rule in the ship, so he hath the greatest part in the paines and labour; for his minde is exercised whilst others are at rest, and watcheth at the sterne whilest the passengers securely sleepe. The capeaine likewise as hee hath most honour, so hee carieth the greatest burthen; for whilest the common souldiers take care, and prouide onely for themselues, hee also extends his care, prouidence, and labour for the good and preseruation of the whole companie. Now if the rule of a ship, or of a smaller cottage bee so burthensome and laborious, what shall we thinke of the gouernment of a whole countrie and common-wealth.

Thirdly, these great potentates are much more turmoyled with the violence of their affections than priuate men, their greatnes adding strength to their passions, and making them furious and vnresistable, or themselues more impatient if they bee resisted; their anger is more easily inflamed, because their greatnesse maketh them impatient of bearing the least iniurie, although it exposeth them also to more than any other. Being incensed, they burne inwardly with a desire, and burst outwardly into the act of more furious reuenge, measuring the punishment which they take of the parte offending rather according to their owne greatnesse, than to the fault which is committed, and hauing herein power in their hands to doe what they will, they often doe more than they should. Their hopes are greater both in respect of the obiect and things hoped for, and in respect of the affection it selfe, their great power making them beleeue that they can compasse whatsoeuer they desire; and the more strong their expectation was, the greater is their impatiencie when as it appeares frustrate; not so much oft times for missing the thing, as for not hauing their will; or because it doth appeare that their power is limited and not omnipotent. Their griefes are more in number, and more piercing and sharpe in their operation than other mens; both because of the manifold causes thereof, which must needs happen often in the multitude of their affaires; and also because the greatnesse of their spirits doth make them much to aggrauate them through their impatiencie, and gaulish their minds the more through their much struggling. But of all other passions they are most troubled and perplexed with feare, it being a thing necessarie, that they whom many feare, should also themselues feare many; and that they who imploy themselues with manifold businesses of great moment, and plot sundry inconvenient to many, and together with hundred perills and dangers. Neither doth the multitude of enemies so much amaze them, because they are secret and vnknowne, nor their force so much as their hidden treacherie. For as the bullet is more dangerous than the sword; because killing before it is discerned, there is not made so great preparation against it, and blowes of enemies, being given secretly and vnawares, are much more to be feared than the violence of professed enemies, because they wound and giue no warning. Now these secret foes are much more common to princes than open enemies, seeing their greatnes is no spur apt to stirre vp enmitie against them, than to make a cure in those in whom it is found to hide and dissemble it, because here especially professed hatred taketh away occasion of reuenge, and turneth the mischiefe vpon his head that threatneth it. In regard whereof princes, whilest they know not whom to feare, are apt to feare all, and vpon small occasions to haue euen those whom they haue chosen to guard them in iealousie and suspition. Whereby (as one saith) they are in worse estate than subiects; seeing these feare but one, and they all.

Neither in truth are their feares endlesse, or greater than their dangers; for their might and glory exposes them to the enuie of all that are ambitious, who though they haue not their greatnesse of state, yet are they no lesse enemies in hearts, and therefore are euer readie as vndermine and supplant them by their treacherous plots and conspiracies, when as they conceiue the least hope of aduancing themselues by their ruine. And as they are much endangered through enuie, so no lesse by the hatred of their inferiours, for if they should find no other fault in them to prouoke their malice, euen their goodnes is sufficient argument to make them hated of the wicked, and their vpright administring of iustice is enough to make them abhorred of the lewd and licentious. In which regard princes must make account either by doing of their duties to be hated of men, or by neglecting it to be hated of God; to sit still and doe nothing worth the doing, or by instituting worthy actions sit for their greatnesse, to indanger themselues to the treacherous practises of the malicious. Besides these dangers, vnto which enuie and malice exposes them at home, they are more endangered than others in respect of open enemies & forraine forces: for it is not to supplant priuate men that armies are leuied, but the king is the marke at which they leuell; whose life to them is more than the destruction of tenne thousand subiects, because it is no lesse mortall to the common-wealth when the head is cut off, than if the whole body were mangled in peeces. Neither are they more endangered by enemies than by false friends, (euing experience teacheth that many who haue escaped safe from all the attempts and forces of their professed foes, haue beene catched in the priuie snares, and secret treacheries, which those whom they accounted their dearest friends haue laid and plotted against them. For it is impossible for these great potentates to satisfie the desires of all that depend vpon them, and by preferring some before others, they procure the secret hatred of the rest, whom pride and self-loue maketh beleeue that they should deserue to be aduanced, and this maketh them ioyne with their enemies when as they promise to satisfie their hopes, and to repaire their ruined estates. Now these dangers are more dangerous and more deeply, and that iustly, apprehended of Kings, than of subiects, not only for that they haue more to lose than the ordinarie sort, but also because they extend to the no lesse hurt of the common-wealth, than of themselues, which good Princes loue better than of their owne liues: for when the Prince is hurt, the whole common-wealth bleedeth at his wound; and when this great shepherd is smitten, then the silly sheepe are scattered and indangered at the mercie of the rauenous wolfe.

§. Sect. 9.
Of the vngratitude of the people towards their gouernours.

Fourthly, Princes are no little vexed with the ingratitude of their people, for when they haue taken all their care, and indured all that labour, and hazarded themselues to all those dangers, whilest they indeuour to gouerne their subiects with iustice, and to preserue them in peace and plentie; all their paines is rewarded with vngratitude, their good deeds with euill words, their doubtfull actions with sinister censures, and malicious interpretations; the common people being naturally apt to condemne that in superiours, which being aboue their reach, they are not able to vnderstand, and to mislike the present gouernment, let neuer so vnblameable. Neither is it possible for any man to please all that ruleth many, nor to doe that which is acceptable vnto God, and to gaine the applause of the vulgar people; seeing they are diuided into so many phantasies as they haue heads, the which are not only diuers, but expressly contrary to one another; this man loueth what that man hateth, and one admiring what another despiseth, and desiring what another loatheth lotheth & abhorreth: so that it is impossible to reconcile truth and falshood, and light with darknesse, as to accord this dissenting multitude, or to vnite their opinions and affections to the approuing and disliking of the same thing. Now vpon these often mislikes of the passages of gouernment, followeth also a mislike of the gouernour, and a wearines of being vnder his rule, ioyned with a desire of the successors aduancement; whom when they haue, they serue with the same fauor, being as readie to traduce his gouernment, maligne his person, and to censure all his actions, as they were his predecessors.

b. Sect. 10 The great account that Princes haue to make at the day of iudgement.

And these are the euils which accompany kingdomes in this life, euen when the Prince affects and desires to gouerne well. But that which may more weane mens hearts from the loue of soueraignty, about all these euils and inconueniences, respects the life to come: mainely, that great reckoning and account which Princes are to make at the day of iudgement. For howsoeuer in this life they are priuiledged from giuing a reason of their actions vnto men; yet the great King of heauen and earth, from whom they haue receiued their Empire and dominion will audit all their accounts, and haue a reckoning of all those rich talents which he lent vnto them. Then must they yeeld an account how they haue spent their great riches and reuenewes, how they haue imployed all their supreame power and authoritie, for the executing of iustice and iudgement, and for the rewarding of the good, and punishment of the euill: how they haue spent that precious time allotted vnto them for the gouernment of the people, whether they haue imployed it to the best aduantage for the glory of their Lord and good of their subiects, or elsehaue consumed it in carnall pleasures, and prophane riotousnesse. Then must they giue a reckoning of their owne life, whether they haue shined as lights before their people, and led them in the wayes of godlines by their good example; or contrariwise haue scandalized them by their euill liues, and misled them into the by-paths of sinne as precedents of wickednes. Finally, they must be accountable at that day, for not only all those sinnes which themselues haue committed, but also for all those committed by their subiects, vnto which they haue beene either principals, by their commandement, or accessaries through their connyuencie, and neglect of the execution of iustice. Now if a mans owne sinnes shall haue a burthen intolerable, then what shall become of them who must giue an account also of the sinnes of many thousands, which through their default haue been committed?

b. Sect. 11.

But besides these manifold euils which attend vpon kingdomes, euen when they are well gouerned, there are innumerable others which doe accompany them when they are abused: vnto which abuse man through naturall corruption is most prone. For this highest worldly prosperity puffing men vp with pride, doth make them forgetfull of God, negligent in all good duties, and so consumes all vertue, as befitting rather priuate men than themselues, who are so powerfull, potent and glorious, that they needs not the helpe of vertue to commend them. Or if at all it bee vsefull vnto them, they thinke that onely a colour or shadow of vertue may serue the turne, to grace them to the deceiued eyes of the common people, though they haue no substance thereof, but are vtterly destitute of it in deede and truth. And as this greatnesse of estate vsually hindereth men in the course of vertue, so doth it as commonly cast them headlong into all manner of sinne; as contempt of religion, prophanenes, and vtter neglect of all holy duties, pride, insolencie, cruelty, oppression, vnbridled reuenge, and the rest, making euery thing lawfull which liketh, and to seeme good in their iudgements, which they haue an appetite vnto in their loose and vnlimited affections. But especially through their transcendent and ouer-topping power they are prone to the sinnes of iniustice, oppression, wrongs and iniuries, as the Lord describeth their manners and course of carriage, (when he would discourage his people from affecting their gouernment) of which sinnes few Rulers can with good Samuel and Moyses acquite themselues, and plead not guiltie, if the Lord should summon them to iudgement. Now what are kingdomes to be esteemed if they be void of iustice, and full of wrong, cruelty and oppression? Surely (as one saith) where this sacred iustice is not admired, great kingdomes are but great theeueries; & as the wise Philosopher accounted them, great monarches are but great theeues, if they rule by iniustice and cruell tyranny. Finally, of what worth or prise are the royalties of a kingdome, if ruling inferiours, they become slaues to their owne vices, and whilest they command others, are themselues at the command of their base affections and corrupt passions? For when this royalty and seruitude of vice are ioyned together, it maketh (as one compareth it) such a Prince, like vnto a King taken prisoner of the Barbarians, who suffer him still to weare his crowne, and to keepe on his royall apparell, but yet force him therein to performe all base offices; as to carrie water, to grind in the mill, and drudge in the skullery; in which case his goodly ornaments do but serue with more despite, to put him in mind of his misery, and (as it were) the more to vpbraid and cast in his eyes the greatnesse of his fall, and the lastnesse of his destruction. And surely this [illegible] must likely set foorth the abiect condition of wicked Kings: for there is no seruitude so vile and base as this of sinne which may well disgrace all royalty and soueraignetie, but can neuer be graced by it.

Finally, vnto this quill of sinne, into which kingdomes though abuse do mislead the great potentates of the world, we may adde the mill of punishment, which has [illegible] companion, still waiteth vpon [illegible] the Monarchie [illegible] breaking the law in their owne hands, [illegible] from comming to the bar, & [illegible] from the iudgement seate of earthly men, yet can they not escape the iudgement seate of God, but of necessity they must come to their answere, and vndergoe [illegible] punishment when the Lord comes in visitation. A notable place to this purpose we haue in the sixth chapter of the booke of Wisedome, vnto which for breuitie sake I referre the Reader. So also Iob saith, He ouerthrowes the state of Kings, and leades Princes in a prey, and ouerturneth the mighty: but peruerts sentence from the Princes, and maketh the strength of the mighty to faile. Now the punishments which more especially the Lord inflicteth vpon euill Princes are for the time of their raigne terrible feares, and affrighting horrors: and secondly he alloweth to their tyrannie but a very short time, and then bringeth vpon them sodaine destruction. In the former respect tyrants and wicked Kings are most miserable in the middest of all their royaltie and nobilitie, being continually haunted with deadly feares, as with hellish furies, and so affrighted through the guilt of their owne wickednesse, that they neuer rest, nor haue any peace or true ioy in their hearts, in the middest of all their outward mirth and iollitie. They feare company like cowardlinesse, that for feare of ambushes, and this for want of helpe. In the day time they seldome looke straight forward for feare of being surprised at vnawares, but continually they looke asklew with many fearefull glances, as though they were in a world of enemies, and looked who should giue the first stab. Neither haue they more rest in the night; for hearing the least noise stirring, they suspect a conspiracie, and being alone, they are affrighted with horrible dreames, and fearefull visions. They are so much in feare of their enemies that they are neuer quiet till hauing contriued their ruine, they haue also brought them to destruction. And of their friends so iealous and suspitious, that the least occasion turneth the confidence which they haue of their fidelity into doubting and distrust, which being a little nourished with selfe-guiltinesse, their friendship is turned into enmitie, and their loue into mortall hatred. So that a tyrant is neuer in safety, no not when hee is compassed with his strongest guard: for a king cannot there be safe, where nothing is in safety from the king: or though he should be sometime safe, yet can he neuer be secure, for it is of necessitie, that he whom many feare, should also himselfe feare many, euery one desiring his destruction, whom he seruilely feareth; and that his owne danger may bee preuented with the others ruine. And hereof it is that howsoeuer tyrants desire rather to be feared than loued, yet they are ready againe to feare this feare, lest what they threaten against others bee retorted vpon their owne heads. In regard of which terrors and continuall feares many tyrants and wicked kings could desire to be vnburthened of their greatnesse, that they might also bee deliuered from these dangers and expected euils; but that they hold their kingdome as a bandog by the eares, there being neither safety in keeping nor forgoing it. For howsoeuer at first it was in the tyrants choice whether he would lay claime vnto it or no; yet hauing taken it vpon him, he hath not the like liberty and safetie to desist from his gouernment when he will, in regard of the many outrages which hee hath committed, and iniuries which hee hath offered, which would be punished and reuenged, if he were not still armed with soueraigne power.

9. Sect. 13.
That God bringeth vpon euill kings hastie destruction.

The second small punishment which God inflicteth vpon tyrants and euill kings, is hasty and vnexpected destruction; which is so common and ordinarie, that a man shall hardly find a king that reigneth long which ruleth wickedly: insomuch that the wise man of Greece being demanded what he had seldomest seene; answered, a tyrant liuing to old age. The which as it is chiefly brought to passe through the just iudgement of God, who when there is none to iudge & punish, doth himselfe goe the circuit, and sit vpon the bench; so in respect of second causes it standeth with reason, that he for whom euery one layeth snares should at length bee catched of some, though he haue escaped many. And well were it with tyrants if this were all their punishment to haue a shamefull death after a sinfull life: but this is but the beginning of their miserie; for after this first punishment of bodily destruction, inflicted vpon them (as it were) at the quarter sessions; there is a farre greater reserued for the time of Gods generall assises, euen the eternall death and condemnation both of their bodies and soules, as a just recompence of all their oppressions, iniuries, cruelties and outrages which they haue offered against their brethren, for whose good and preseruation all their power of of gouernment was by God committed to them.

And thus haue I briefly shewed the manifold euils which accompanie kingdomes, whether they bee well vsed or abused; all which may serue as reasons to shew their worthlesnesse, and to incite all, that if they will needs be ambicious they would aspire to kingdomes of greater value and excellencie; namely, that soueraignty and regiment which is spirituall and heauenly. And first that they spiritually raigne whilest they continue on earth, that so they may continually raigne in the kingdome of heauen. So the author of the booke of Wisedome exhorteth: If your delight (saith he) bee in thrones and sceptres, O kings of the people, honour wisedome, that you may raigne for euer. Now this regiment is chiefly exercised in our selues, when as deposing sinne from raigning in our mortall bodies, we doe erect in vs the kingdome of Iesus Christ, suffering him to raigne in vs by his word and holy spirit. And when by vertue hereof our reason being sanctified and assisted, doth raigne and rule ouer our corrupt affections and vnrulie passions, reforming some which may be seruiceable, and subduing, mortifying, and slaughtering others which are vnprofitable and vnmendable. Especially when as wee crucifie our carnall concupiscence, our greedie auarice and proud ambition, and set vp in our minds true contentation, which maketh vs truly kings, injoying all, and needing nothing, and neither hoping after that we haue not, nor fearing to forgoe that we haue. Which kingdome euery one may haue, and none can take away.

wisd. 6. 21:

Rex est qui metuit nihil. Rex est qui cupit nihil hoc regali sibi quisque dat. Senec. in Thyeste.

Finally, if we will needs raigne as kings, let vs not affect and set our hearts vpon earthly kingdomes, but rather let vs bee content here in this vale of teares to suffer with Iesus Christ, that wee may eternally raigne with him. Let vs not aspire vnto worldly monarchies, where the impossibility of obtaining may justly free vs from affecting and hoping: for as the world hath but one sunne, so a kingdome admits but of one soueraigne; but let vs seate our affections in heauen, where we shall all raigne as kings, and yet one not any whit lessen another's dominions; but the greater the number is, the greater is the royalty and glory of all, the greater also is their joy and happinesse. Finally, let vs not much affect this earthly soueraignty, which is accompanied with so many cares, troubles, labours, feares and dangers; but rather let vs set our hearts vpon that kingdome of peace and glory, where there is no care to disturbe our quietnesse, no trouble to hinder our happinesse, no griefe to distast our joyes, no feares nor dangers to disquiet our minds; but secure rest, vnspeakeable happinesse, glory without measure, and joyes without end; which whosoeuer seeke shall surely find, and hauing attained to it, shall neither be disturbed in it, nor deprived of it.

Chap. XIIII.

Of the worthlesse vanitie of worldly riches.

NOt this haue I shewed the vanity of worldly honours and preferments. Let vs in the next place consider of worldly riches; which if wee throughly examine wee shall finde, that howsoeuer worldlings make such high account of them that they preferre them before the saluation of their soules: yet they are in truth if wee compare them with Gods spirituall graces and heauenly joyes, vaine, worthlesse, and void of excellencie. For if honours which are esteemed more excellent, are, as we haue shewed, vaine & of no worth; and pleasures which are more sweete and comfortable are (being thus compared) of no value or esteeme, as wee shall see hereafter; then how great is the vanitie, and how small the excellencie of worldly riches, which are of a more base and contemptible nature, being but (as it were) seruants vnto the other, which are onely desired and prouided to serue for their vses and imployments? Neither doth any man (vnlesse it be some foolish miser, who in getting riches haue lost their wits) esteeme of riches for their owne sake, but as they serue for their vse, either to aduance their honour and reputation by bestowing them bountifully, where they may haue most credit; or for the obtaining and enjoying of their pleasures and delights. To which purpose serue stately houses and rich furniture, pleasant gardens, and fruitfull orchards; daintie faire, and soft clothing; which ends if riches aduanced not, they would like contemptible garbage rest vntouched in the earths bowels without any to admire or sue for them. Now if these ends themselues which are their chiefe good be void of excellency and full of vanity; then how vaine and worthlesse are these base riches, which in an abject subjection serue but (as it were) to hold the stirrup to mount men vp into the seate of honour; or for porters to open vnto them the doore of pleasures? And this was the cause why the Apostle Paul so lightly valued them, that comparing them with Christ and his righteousnesse, hee esteemed them no better than dung; which if it bee not vaine and base enough to shew their vanitie because it is of some vse and profit, consider that the wise Salomon valueth them by that which is yet of lesse worth, worth, calling them nothing: Wilt thou (saith he) cast thine eyes vpon that which is nothing? and lest yet this Nothing should haue some esteeme, as doing no hurt, though it doe no good: the Apostle further telleth vs in the former place, that hee esteemed the things of this world as losse, which is worse than nothing, that he might win Christ, and be partaker of his righteousnesse.

But let vs consider of the worthlesse vanity of worldly wealth in some particulars: and first, what great excellency is there in large Lordships, and great lands, seeing the whole earth is not so big as a pease, in comparison of our heauenly Country; and yet they who hold the greatest possessions, haue not so much as a little pricke or point in this small Globe of the World: and therefore (as sometime Socrates said to Alcibiades) haue not so much when they glory most in it, as may haue the least place, or smallest resemblance in the greatest Map? What worth or excellency is in them, because they hold them in fee-simple, and haue them as perpetuities annexed to their successours, seeing though they should thus continue to the end of the world, it were but a moment of time in respect of eternity? And yet the longest liuer hath but a small part of this moment, euen to the short period of his owne life: so that to him notwithstanding the glorious Titles of fee-simples and perpetuities, his inheritance and possessions are but momentany, and (as it were) tenements holden at will, out of which hee is ready daily to be turned at the Land-lords pleasure. And yet these small Lands oftentimes bring with them no small incumbrance; seeing as an heauy load they oppresse mens mindes, so as they cannot mount vp aloft in heauenly meditations, nor haue their conuersation in their owne Country, being clogged with this lumpe of earth: and these momentany possessions, are causes vnto many of no momentany mischiefe; seeing they depriue them of their euerlasting inheritance, when they set their hearts vpon them: especially if (as the Prophet speaketh) they haue vsed oppression to inlarge their Lordships, joyning house to house, and field to field, inclosing Commons and dispeopling Townes, that the poore being rooted out, they may place themselues alone in the middest of the earth: by which cruelty inlarging their possessions which are but momentany, they make themselues subject to an eternall woe, and most fearefull malediction.

Neither is there more excellency or worth in gold and siluer, which by the wise Salomon are reckoned & ranged among those vanities, which bring no good to the Owners, but vexation of spirit; and by the Prophet directed by Gods Spirit, they are called thicke clay, which haue their valne and prehemi-nence aboue other earth, because they are a little more shining and refined; neither haue they their worth and value from nature, but from mens opinions. For (as one noteth) those things which are naturally excellent, doe shew their own excellency without any Mounte-banke to commend them, or to set them out to the shew, as the Sugar his sweetnesse, the Sun his brightnesse, and the earth his fruitfulnesse: but these wares which are of imaginary worth, need a Monitour to tell vs of their excellency, or otherwise wee should not know, much lesse admire them. For if we doe see Copper gilt, we are delighted with the beauty of the mettall, and wee call it Gold; but when those which are more skilfull come and admonish vs that wee are deceiued, our errour and admiring wonder leaue vs both together. Moreouer, wee see that God in the very placing of these mettals, would take away from vs al opinion of their worth and excellency: for whereas the Lord hath placed his creatures according to their dignity (man only excepted, who is in the place of his Exile and Banishment) as the holy Angels in the highest Heauen, the Sun, Moone and Starres in the Firmament, the Elements as they are more pure, so in place one Superiour vnto another: hee hath seated these so much admired mettals, in the intrals of the most grosse element, as though hee would haue vs so far from seating them vpon our heads, or our hearts vpon them, that hee would haue vs with contempt to tread them vnder our feet. Which also seemeth to haue beene practised by the Primitiue Church, who deliuered not the price of their possessions into the Apostles hands, but cast them at their feet, to shew how meanly they accounted of them. And as hee hath placed them in this inferiour place, as fit to be contemned, so also in the hidden cauernes of the earth, farre remote from humane sight, out of which they are not gotten without infinite toile and labour; that he might hereby withdraw our greedy eye from looking after them, and our couetous hearts from desiring them; or at least though wee should couet them, yet we might be discouraged with this intolerable paines in the pursuite of these worthlesse vanitie. Besides he hath not there seated them in their beauty and perfection, fined and purified, but in their Oare, vnsightly and base to look vpon, as hauing in it much more drosse than pure mettal, fro which it is not purged and refined without endlesse moyle, and labour of the workmen: who besides all their paines haue their health thereby so impaired, and their faces blemished with swartnesse and dead paleness, that they seeme to haue taken vpon them the deformities of the mettall, and to haue beene content to make themselues vgly, that it may receiue beauty and brightnesse. Notwithstanding all which vaine man doting vpon this this worthlesse pelfe, is not discouraged with all these labours, but is content to spend his life and strength in searching and seeking, digging and mining, purging and refining of this earthy drosse, not caring to lose himselfe that he may find it. And that which is worst of all, when by the worke of his own hands hee hath brought it to its full beauty and perfection, he doth not only make it his chiefe ornament, who is much more comely and gracefull in himselfe, placing it aboue his head, which God had seated vnder his feet, but also erecteth it as his idoll in his heart, & (as it were) falleth downe before it to adore and worship it, whilest hee loueth, trusteth and hopeth in it more than in God himselfe, whereby it commeth to passe that their soules are more deformed who possesse it, than their bodies who in the Mines digged for it; and more indangered to death eternall, than they to any temporary perils: for howsoeuer their Gold it selfe shall be vnto them but a momentany good, yet the rust thereof shall continue to the day of Iudgement, to be a witnes against them for their confusion and condemnation, as the Apostle speaketh. Seeing therefore these base minerals are in themselues so contemptible, and bring vnto vs so little profit, and oftentimes no little hurt: we may well admire, and euen be astonished at the cause, why men should so dote vpon them, louing them so dearely, and the ioyes of Heauen so slightly, and taking so great care and paines for them, whereas they take little or none for the sauing of their owne soules. So as it may seeme that there is in them a kind of witchcraft which thus seduceth and abuseth their admirers, seeing there is no reason to be giuen, either in nature or religion, why men should contemne those eternall treasures and heauenly excellencies, and pursue with a besotted and madding affection, this earthly trash and base vanities. Let vs therefore learne wisely to stop our eares against these Charmes; and howsoeuer wee are not vtterly and absolutely to reiect Gold and Siluer, as being the creatures of God: which (as hath beene shewed) may serue for good vse; yet let vs take heed that we doe not set our hearts vpon them, but contemne and despise them, when they come in comparison with Gods spirituall graces, or our heauenly patrimony. And making account of money, as Trauellers of their prouision for their journey, which being moderate serueth for their vse, and to helpe them forward; but being excessiue and superfluous, toileth them as an heauy burthen, and hindereth them in their way; let vs content our selues with a competencie and sufficiencie; & being not able to attaine vnto it, let vs supply that with our minds, which is wanting vnto our outward estate, laying vp our chiefe treasures in Heauen, where (as our Sauiour saith) the rust cannot corrupt them, nor Theeues spoile vs of them.

Fascinatio quædam est huiusmodi res, quæ earum & vrgentium & nobis tanti pendatur, & animarum nostrarum nulla cura, Chrysost. in. 1. Thess. 5.

Neither is there lesse vanity, or more worth in other kinds of riches: for what true excellency is in rich iewels and precious stones, which are by the Creatour contemptibly cast vpon the earth and sands with worthles regard; but being sought and found by men, are sold at such high rates, as not their owne worth, but the buyers phantasie sets vpon them. In regard whereof the same iewell or stone altereth the price according to the worth of the Owner, and that which is esteemed in the hand of a poore man at a small value, becommeth precious and of great worth when a richer and more noble Master is Owner of it. So that these are commended by their rarity more than by their excellency; by opinion rather than sound reason; by the wealth of their Owners, rather than by their own worth, & are in truth meer trifles for wantons to play with, rather than any solid or substantiall good, which brings true profit to those who are possessed of them. The like also may be said of rich furniture, and sumptuous houshold stuffe, which in comparison of those more excellent things, are meere vanities and worthlesse trifles. Neither is there any cause why any man should much desire these things if hee want them, or glory in them if hee haue them; for the chiefe ornaments of a house are not gorgeous Hangings, rich Beds and such like furniture; but the vertues and graces of the Inhabitants, the wisedome and discreet gouernment of Superiours, the duty and obedience of inferiours, with piety, honesty, and good order obserued of all. Euen as contrariwise the chief disgraces and deformities thereof, are not walls couered or coloured with nothing but smoke; empty roomes, or poore furniture: but when (as our Sauiour speaketh) it is cleane swept of all vertue and goodnesse, and blemished and dishonested with disorder, vice and wickednesse. Again, the great labour which these things of small worth require, may serue to wean the hearts of any from them who are not too full of pride and vaine glory: for as at first they are not easily gotten; so they are kept with no lesse difficultie, there neuer wanting occasion of looking to them, folding, vnfolding, brushing, cleansing, altering, remouing; to say nothing of the manifold discontents and occasions of anger which they bring to the Owners, if any of them chance to miscarry, or to be misused. In all which the trouble and griefe oftentimes exceed the comfort and contentment which they bring vnto them. Or if there be such care, prouidence & pains vsed, that none of these things happen, but all is preserued in its full beauty and good order; then it is a manifest signe that most of their time is spent about these vanities, and the

the whole mind so wholly possessed & taken vp with them, that the soule is neglected, and little or no paines taken to decke it with the rich ornaments of Gods spirituall and sanctifying graces: so that when one commeth into a rich mans house where there is such costly furniture, so curiously and carefully disposed and ordered, he may probably suspect that he setteth all the goodnesse of that house at the first view, and that there is nothing better then that which presenteth it selfe in the outward shew. Furthermore we are to know that these glorious things bring to the Owners no lasting delight, or durable contentment: for howsoeuer whilest they haue them but in their desires, or are newly possessed of them, they take great pleasure to thinke vpon and behold them; yet when as they haue them continually in their eye, and that they are become common & ordinary, their delight presently ceaseth; especially if they chance to see more rich and costly things of the same kind in the possession of other men. And no maruell, for if the Sunne it selfe becomes worse to daily worketh no extraordinary delight, although the darke night comming betweene his setting and rising, setteth fine edge on our tired affections; how much lesse are wee to expect that wee can find it in these earthly trifles, whose chiefe glory being compared to the Sunnes brightnesse, is but obscurity and grosse darkenesse? Finally, the more we abound with these rich furnitures, the more are wee exposed to the feare and danger of fire, thieues, yea, filly moathes, which howsoeuer they be base and contemptible, yet haue they power enough to pull downe this pride, and to consume the matter and occasion of this vaineglory. Or if all these with prouidence be preuented, yet these spirituall theeues doe seldome faile to expose vs to envy, which vsually fasteneth vpon these outward appearances of worldly happinesse, and finding pineth those vnto whom it possesseth, though they want the meanes to make ostentation of such pompe and glory. Seeing therefore these things are not onely full of vanitie, but also of many euils and inconueniences, how much better were this cost bestowed vpon the poore members of Iesus Christ, then vpon these needlesse superfluities, many whereof are so fine and costly, that the Owners can neuer almost find in their hearts to vse them, but keepe them locked vp in their chests, suffering them to see the Sunne, vnlesse some speciall occasion, which happeneth but once a yeere, when as pride meeteth them to shew to all its bravery, causeth them to make ostentation of all their glory? How much more were it for their credit and profit with their neighbours beneficially to many poore to dwell in such houses then pompously furnished? How much more wisely should they employ their wealth for the good of men, than vpon Carpets and hangings? vpon liuing and reasonable creatures, than vpon dead and senselesse wals? How much more profitable were it to haue clothed friends, than adorned Lodgings, the one seruing for defence, the other exposing them to the prey? Lastly, it may well weane our hearts from being in loue with this riotous excesse, if we consider that it will make our account more hard and difficult at the day of judgement. For how doe we thinke will this reckoning be accepted of our Lord and Iudge, when as we haue spent his Talents vpon needlesse superfluities, and suffered the poore members of Iesus Christ, for whose vse also we receiued them, to want necessaries? when as wee haue adorned our wals with Arras and Tapestry, and suffered men created after Gods Image, yea, our Brethren and fellow members of the same body, to starue for want of cleese to couer their nakednesse? when our Horses are decked with Gold, Silke and Velues, and poore Christians neglected, not affording them rags to couer them, and bread to feed them? How will this goe for currant at this great Audit, that we haue suffered in the time of dearth a great many to starue for want of relieſe, whereas wee might haue redeemed their liues from death, by parting with an vnprofitable jewell, or some needlesse furniture which is scarce euer vsed? or how can wee then hope to finde mercy with God, when as we haue shewed so little compassion to one another?

Auro parietes, auro laquearia, auro sustentat capita columnarum, & nudus atque esuriens ante fores nostras Christus in paupere moritur, Hieron. ad Gaudent.

And thus it appeareth how vaine and worthlesse these rich jewels, and costly furniture are justly to be valued and esteemed. Let vs in the next place consider of stately houses and sumptuous buildings, wherein worldly men so much glory and delight; in which after due examination wee shall find no more excellency, or lesse vanity. And first, if we will credit the wise Salomon (who hauing for a time his affection greatly set vpon them, wanted neither wit curiously to contriue his stately Buildings for most conuenient vse, and greatest state and glory, nor yet wealth to second his inuentions) he will tell vs on his owne experience, that when in this kind we haue done all wee can, yea, all we will, and in our hearts desire, wee shall, in the end, of all cost and labour, find nothing but vanitie and vexation of spirit. Againe, if there were any excellencie in these sumptuous buildings, it is chiefly the glory and prayse of the builders and workmen, whose art and skill is hereby commended, and not of the worke master and owner, who had no other part to act in these workes, but to disburse the money and beare the charge. The house therefore doth not grace the inhabitant, but he his habitation, whereas he maketh it an holy Temple for religious duties, a mansion for vertue and good order, the seat of good hospitality, and a place of refuge and relieſe for the needy and afflicted. Neither will theſe ſtately buildings greatly profit vs, for they doe not bring to the Owners any ſound joy, quiet and contentation, which dwell more often in poore Cottages than in ſtately palaces. They doe not free vs from care and griefe, wherewith ſtately buildings are often peſtred, when as thatched houſes are priuiledged and exempted. They doe not preſerue their Lords from the encounters of ſickneſſes and diſeaſes; yea, rather there lieth an open paſſage to let in Gouts, Palſies, Collickes, Conſumptions, when as they are kept out from entring ſuch ſlender buildings, as will ſcarce beare off a ſtorme, or hold out raine. The thickneſſe of their ſtone or well timbred waller, nor the ſtrength of their nailed gates will ſerue to keepe out death; neither will the height of their buildings make him need a skaling ladder, when he commeth to aſſault their liues; for when hee knocketh the doores flie open, and he findeth an eaſie paſſage into their ſecret Chambers. Furthermore, let vs conſider that the moſt ſumptuous buildings haue within a while a time of ruine; and though they are aſſaulted with no outward violence, yet they haue their periods, when as they will fall with their owne waight. Beſides, oftentimes they come through fire, ſorren forces, and ſuch like caſualties to vntimely ruine; for not only in the ages of men, but alſo in buildings, immature death, and vnexpected deſtruction, rageth with fury vnreſiſtable, which if we know not by our owne reaſon, let at leaſt the example of others teach vs. For behold the ſtately buildings which haue beene of old, what are they now but ruines? And where are their Builders, which in all this coſt affected a name, but rotten and conſumed in the graue, without name or memory? Laſtly, let vs remember that theſe ſtately houſes are ſeldome erected without oppreſſion; for either Nabaths Vineyard lieth neere vnto them, which if he loue his life hee muſt ſell them, becauſe it is conuenient to make them a Garden, or the poores houſes ſtand on the beſt ſeat and muſt giue place, or hinder their proſpect, and muſt be pulled downe; or elſe they muſt gratifie them (though for feare more than loue) with their labour, Carts and carriages without wages or reward. By which courſes, when theſe ſumptuous and beautifull Buildings are erected, a grieuous wo and beauy curſe lieth vpon the Owners: Woe vnto him (ſaith the Prophet) that buildeth his houſe by vnrighteouſneſſe, and his chambers without equitie; that vſeth his Neighbour without wages, and giueth him not for his worke, &c. Shalt thou reigne becauſe thou cloſeſt thy ſelfe in Cedar, did not thy father (though hee dwelt in more homely buildings) eate and drinke and proſper, when hee executed iudgement and iuſtice? when he iudged the cauſe of the afflicted and poore, he proſpered, &c. The like woe the Prophet Eſay thundreth out againſt thoſe, who ioyne houſe to houſe laying on them this curſe from God, that their houſes ſhould bee deſolate, and though they were great and faire, yet they ſhould be without any inhabitant; according to that malediction denounced in the Law, thou ſhalt build an houſe and not dwell therein. Which curſe lieth heauy vpon many Builders in theſe dayes, though they neuer thinke vpon their burthen, who make ſtately Houſes and neuer inhabit them, and ſpend all in building, but nothing in hoſpitality; as though the vſe of building were only, like the Pyramides of Egypt, to make a glorious ſhew; and as though they had no other inducement to be at all this charge and labour, than theſe had that built the Tower of Babel, that is, to threaten Heauen with their Houſes height, and get a name vnto themſelues vpon the earth. Seeing therefore theſe ſumptuous buildings are alwayes vaine and worthleſſe, and often accompanied with ſinne and wickednes; let vs learne (though the World and worldlings ſo highly value them) to contemne and think baſely of them; labouring to be inhabitants of that Diuine and Angelical habitation, which is not made with hands, but eternall in the Heauens. And when beholding theſe ſtately Houſes on earth, wee begin to be beſotted with their momentany beauty and falſe glory; let vs preſently caſt vp our eyes towards Heauen; and if hauing lifted our minds and meditations vpon that heauenly and diuine beauty, we doe from thence reflect our eyes vpon the chiefe glory of earthly Buildings, they will ſeeme but as childrens houſes, which in play they build vpon the ſands, which euery blaſt of winde defaceth, and euery waue of water waſheth away; and as the houſes of Spiders, which being made with great labour, are with themſelues eaſily bruſhed away with a Wing or Broome. For then wee will eaſily conclude, that if there be ſuch goodly habitations in our pilgrimage and place of baniſhment, then much more glorious Manſions are prepared for vs in our owne Country, where the Lord is purpoſed to glorifie and reward vs: if Gods enemies haue ſuch ſtately Palaces on earth, then how much more excellent hath the Lord prouided for his children in Heauen? If the great Monarches of the World haue Manſion Houſes beſitting their might and majeſty; then how glorious is the Court of Heauen, and chiefe Manſion Houſe of the King of Kings, which he hath purpoſely fitted and prepared, as is moſt beſeeming his glory and greatneſſe? Surely being ſuitable and agreeable vnto his Majeſty, which is infinite, it muſt needs alſo be of vnſpeakable and incomprehenſible excelcellencie. If the World haue ſuch a goodly vaulted roofe, beautified with ſuch glorious Lights, and imbelliſhed with ſuch ſhining Stars; then what ſhall we thinke of our heauenly habitation, whoſe floore is much more glorious than this ſtately roofe? Finally, if the Kings of the earth haue their Marble, Iuory and Ieat, to adorne their Buildings, then may wee well conceiue that which the Apoſtle ſaw, namely, that our heauenly Citie is of much more precious ſtuffe, the wals of Iaſper, garniſhed with all manner of precious ſtones, the gates of Pearle, and the ſtreets of Gold. And therefore if wee affect ſtately Buildings, let vs contemne theſe baſe Cottages on earth, and labour to be Owners of thoſe glorious and heauenly Habitations; which as they are by infinite degrees more goodly and excellent, ſo are they alſo euerlaſting habitations, which neuer need repaire, nor any whit abate of their firſt glory.

And thus haue I ſhewed the vanitie of ſumptuous buildings. Let vs in the next place conſider if there be any more worth and excellency in many Seruants, & a great retinue; where alſo we ſhall find, that howſoeuer it is pronounced a glorious thing in the world, to haue a multitude of attendants, and a great traine attending at their Maſters heeles, yet it is but a meere vanitie, yea, if it be poſſible, more vaine than any of the former. And this alſo appeareth by the teſtimony of the wiſe Salomon, ſpeaking vpon his own experience, who ſeeking herein for ſome worldly happineſſe, miſſed of it; and hauing retained ſuch a multitude of ſeruants, as ſerued not only for his neceſſary vſe, but alſo for pompe and ſhew, for pleaſure and delight; concludeth of this as of the reſt, that he found nothing in it, but meere vanity and vexation of ſpirit. Vnto which teſtimonie we may adde diuers reaſons, which ſhew the worthleſnes of this great attendance: for howſoeuer a man hath hereby from the mouthes of many, the goodly Titles of Lord and Maſter, & the outward reuerence of Cap and Knee; yet what is hee in truth, but a common ſeruant vnto them all, and euen (as it were) the Steward of the Family, who taketh the care and paines to prouide them of all neceſſaries? yea, which is worſe, hereby he becommeth a ſeruant to his owne auarice and concupiſcence, it being a chiefe cauſe and motiue which inducech him to toile and labour, ſcrape and rake together, to oppreſſe and incroach vpon other mens rights, that he may haue wherewith to maintaine this numerous multitude to attend vpon him. The which errour were ſo much the leſſe, if all theſe men thus entertained, were faithfull wel-willers, and (as one ſaith them) humble friends, ready at all aduentures to ſeeke his good, and to ſtand in his defence with their owne hazard: but contrariwiſe experience teacheth, that among many ſeruants are many enemies, who becauſe they are reſtrained of their wils, or puniſhed for their faults, or not rewarded according to their expectation, though it may be aboue their deſerts, maligne their maſter, and wait for occaſion to ſhew their hatred. Now theſe domeſticall foes are of all others moſt dangerous, becauſe they are no leſſe priuy to all their Maſters infirmities, than ready to diuulge them vnder-hand, where they may moſt diſgrace him; neither can any thing he doth in the Family be hid from thoſe who wiſh him worſt, becauſe as hee hath many eyes to obſerue his hidden counſels and greateſt ſecrets, ſo hath he alſo many tongues to reueale and vtter them. Yea, and that which for feare they but ſecretly whiſpered whileſt they remayned in the Family vnder the gouernment of their Maſter, they are ready with profeſſed malice to proclaime publikely when they haue left his ſeruice, and be vnder the rule of another, vnleſſe they be reſtrained more with feare of their new Maſter, than with loue of the old, leſt he might juſtly ſuſpect that hee alſo ſhall receiue at their hands the like meaſure, when they leaue his ſeruice. Now this miſery is ſo much the more miſerable, not only becauſe it is impoſſible to preuent theſe dangers, which come by theſe ſecret Traytors, who are hidden and vnknowne, but alſo becauſe they are faine vnwittingly to nouriſh theſe Vipers in their boſome, feeding, clothing and rewarding them, when as they do them moſt hurt, and are ready vpon all occaſions to plot againſt them any miſchiefe. Vnto this wee may adde, that where there is a multitude of ſeruants, there are alſo many contentions and domeſticall quarrels, much brawling and wrangling, clamour, and noiſe; which muſt needs be exceeding troubleſome to the Gouernour, when as he muſt be faine to be a ſtickler in theſe frayes, and euery hand-while be diſquieted himſelfe that he may ſet them at quiet, and accord their differences and contentions. Yea, but at leaſt where there are many hands there is an eaſie and quicke diſpatch of houſhold buſineſſe, and all things are done ſeaſonably and in good order, to the contentment of the Maſter; ſurely nothing leſſe. Yea, contrariwiſe, vnleſſe there be an exceeding wiſe and ſtrict gouernment, there as are moſt Seruitours, there is worſt ſeruice, diſorder, negligence and confuſion: either becauſe the ſlothfull are incouraged to continue in their idleneſſe, ſeeing they may eaſily hide it in a crowde, and faſten their negligences and defaults vpon ſome of their fellowes; or becauſe the diligent are diſcouraged in their painfull labours, ſeeing others marre that which they make, and alſo for that particular notice cannot well be taken of their Gouernours, by reaſon of the multitude of their wel-deſeruing, that ſo they they may receiue due prayse and reward. Or finally, because they straine courtesie, and put off the businesse to one another, thinking his fellow may doe it as well as he; whereof it commeth to passe, that that is neglected of all, which might be done of many. Moreouer, he who entertaineth a multitude of seruants, doth hereby waste and consume his estate, which might be much better spent, not only by continuall feeding so many idle bellies, and clothing so many backes; but also because where multitudes are, there is much lauishing, spending and rioting, none taking care to spare or saue any thing, because his faithfulnesse and frugality would not be obserued among so many; and therefore seeing all will be spent, he thinketh best to doe like his fellowes, and to take his share before all be gone. To say nothing of their pilfering and purloyning for their owne vse, and their wastfull prodigalitie in bestowing vpon others their Masters goods; if at least they can haue them as their instruments and Deputies to doe their businesse, whilest they spend their time in pleasures or idlenesse. Finally, it is a thing of great difficultie to gouerne well such a multitude in the Family, to keep them in good order, and to make them diligently to performe their duties to God, their Master, and to one another: for if euery one findeth it a hard matter to rule a few in such sort as God requireth; then surely it must needs be almost impossible to rule so many. And this commeth to passe, partly because the Master among such a multitude cannot haue his eye at all times vpon all, to obserue their disposition, cariage and behauiour; and partly because there is almost alwayes amongst a great number some corrupt and vicious, who, like scabbed sheepe in a flock, infect and taint their fellowes with their wicked behauiour and conuersation. Lastly, what doe they else who entertaine a great multitude, but take vpon them a great charge, of which they must giue an account how they haue discharged it at the day of iudgement? For it is not sufficient for such to haue liued like good men, if they haue not also carried themselues as good Masters; nor enough that they haue themselues serued God, vnlesse also they haue beene carefull to make those vnder their gouernment to ioyne with them in the like seruice. And if so bee through their default, either because they haue not encouraged them in good, or discouraged and restrained them from euil, they haue neglected their duty and liued wickedly, they shall be found accessary vnto, and guiltie of their sinnes before God. Which if Masters would but seriously thinke vpon, they would not be so much exalted and delighted to see the gloriousnesse of their sumptuous traine, as amazed and affrighted to consider of the greatnesse and difficultie of their reckoning and account.

Chap. XV.

Of the vanitie of costly and braue Apparell.

The last thing wherein we will consider the vanitie of riches, is costly and braue apparell; which is a thing so much esteemed among Worldlings, that they place in it no small part of their happinesse, thinking themselues best when they are braueſt, and most esteemed when they haue got on the richest suite. And this maketh them to set their hearts so vpon it, that they thinke no time too much, no cost too great, which is spent in adorning of themselues; yea, they are readie to sell Religion, Conscience, and Credit, to purchase this excessiue brauery; and to commit all manner of wrongs and injuries, oppression, and violence, to maintaine their gay and gorgeous apparell. Which folly, that we also may not fall into, let vs learne basely to esteeme this, which the World so much admireth, and to contemne it as a trifling vanitie; which is not onely void of all worth and excellencie, but also through common abuse, subiect to much corruption and sinne. And yet lest for the abuse wee should reiect the lawfull vse, and Cynically refuse that Christian libertie, which God herein hath liberally allowed vnto vs; let vs in the first place consider, that there is a good and lawfull vse of these rich Attires, and costly Apparell; namely, when as they are well fitted & sorted vnto the calling of those that weare them. For as the Lord hath made diuers estates and degrees of men; so would he haue euery one to Apparell themselues according to their degree and calling, that so these diuers orders and conditions of men may the better be distinguished the one from the other: Kings with Royall Apparell, Nobles according to their Nobilitie, with that which is rich and costly; Gentlemen, as beseemeth their Gentry; and the meaner sort according to their qualitie and condition. The which difference may lawfully appeare both in the matter, and also the forme of their garments. For in the former respect, it is lawfull for those who are in high estate, to weare Silkes and Veluets, Gold and Siluer, Iewels and precious stones; neither were these creatures causelesly created, but for the vse of men; and that not only Heathens, Worldlings and Infidels, but chiefly and principally for Gods owne children and seruants, who onely haue iust title and interest vnto them. The like difference there may also be in the forme or fashion of Apparell; for the King and the meane Subiect, the Courtier and the Countriman, the Gentleman & Yeoman, the old and the younger sort, as they are not to haue the same matter of their apapparell, but one more coſtly, another more meane and cheape according to their qualitie. & it is fit that they ſhould alſo differ & be diſtinguiſhed in their ſeuerall fashions, as doth beſeeme euery ones degree and calling. And thus in the time of the Law the Iewes had a peculiar kind of apparell allotted vnto them. The Prophets had their rough garments, whereby they were knowne: kings and queenes had their royall ornaments; the man one kind of apparell, and the woman another, which was vnlawfull for them to interchange. Thus Rebecca had her golden abilements and bracelets; and the Iſraelites their earerings and other iewels, & that by the appointment of God himſelfe. And our Sauiour Chriſt the welbeloued of his father, ſeemeth to allow vnto courts and kings houſes, ſoft raiment and gorgeous apparell, as beſeeming thoſe who in the world are aduanced to theſe high places. Yea but the Apoſtles Paul and Peter doe forbid this brauerie and gorgeous garments as vnbeſeeming Chriſtians. I anſwere, that their ſayings are not to bee vnderſtood as generall and abſolute prohibitions; but onely as admonitions, whereby they withdrew them from ſetting their hearts vpon pride, vanity and brauery, as though they were things greatly to bee eſteemed and deſired, to the end they might fix them vpon the ſpirituall ornaments of the ſoule, Gods ſanctifying and ſauing graces, as being much more excellent; which alſo appeareth by the antitheſis there vſed. Againe, this gorgeous apparell might bee interdicted thoſe Chriſtians vnto whom the Apoſtle wrote, as being in thoſe dayes for the moſt part of meane quality and condition, as the Apoſtle elſewere affirmeth; and therefore howſoeuer it were lawfull in it ſelfe, yet it was altogether vnbeſeeming their eſtate. Beſides that, the Church was then vnder grieuous perſecutions, in which reſpect theſe coſtly ornaments were vnfit, as being a time of humiliation; and alſo becauſe of the great wants of the many poore members of Chriſt, which the richer ſort were to relieue, not only out of their ſuperfluities, but euen out of ſuch neceſſaries, as might otherwiſe haue well beſeemed their place and calling.

So that notwithſtanding this obiection, it is lawfull to weare rich & coſtly apparell, if it bee fitted to the eſtate and condition of thoſe that weare it. Yea men may offend in the contrarie extreame, when as they vſe ſuch baſe and beggerly attire, and in ſuch a ſordidous and ſlouenly faſhion, as is altogether vnbeſeeming men of their quality, valeſſe it bee in ſome particular caſes, as in the time of faſting and humiliation, or when the Church is in extremitie and want, and muſt of neceſſity be relieued &c. When notwithſtanding decency and comlineſſe may bee obſerued, though it bee but in a poore habit and meane attire: and therefore the practice not onely of ſordidous miſers is to bee auoided who will not be at the coſt to maintaine themſelues in ſuch apparell, as their place and calling requireth, but alſo of thoſe, who out of their religion, or rather ſuperſtition, goe in beggerly and poore clothing, to make oſtentation of their humility, and contempt of the world. All which looke the ſame way, though vnder another vizard, with thoſe proud cynicall Philoſophers, who affected the glory of the world by their contempt of brauery, euen as ſome of themſelues who were infected with the ſame diſeaſe judged of others, whom they ſaw tainted with it. So Socrates telleth Antiſthenes that he could ſpie his pride through the holes of his cloake: and another hauing cenſured the Rhodians for their pride in apparell, and afterwards ſeeing the Lacedemonians in baſe and ſordidous clothes, ſaid, behold another kind of pride. So one of the ancients ſaith, that there may be glorying, as well in baſe, as in gorgeous apparell, which is ſo much the more dangerous, becauſe it deceiueth vnder the colour of Gods ſeruice: and therefore another exhorteth vs to auoid the one extreame, as well as the other; becauſe the one ſauoureth of wanton delicacie, the other of vaine glory.

But I ſhall not neede to ſay much of this argument in theſe dayes, wherein men and women generally are fallen into the contrarie abuſe of exceſſe, forgetting all reſpect of order or degree. For whereas our Sauiour reſtrained gorgeous apparell to Kings courts, now it is growne common in euery houſe, without any reſpect of ſtate and calling: gentlemen going in their attire and habit like nobles, the yeomanry like the gentrie, cottagers like yeomen, citizens like courtiers, ſubjects like Princes, and ſeruants like maſter and miſtreſſe; as though their eyes were ſo dazled with pride, that they miſtooke anothers apparell for their owne. The which abuſe as it hath tainted all, ſo eſpecially the women kind, who decke themſelues with ſo many vaine toies, & load their bodies with ſuch gorgeous attire, as that we may truly ſay with the Heathen man, that they are the leſt part of themſelues. Neither are worldlings alone infected with this contagious plague of brauerie and exceſſe, but the profeſſour of religion and the prophane perſon, the harlot and the honeſt woman, are ſo like one another in their habits and attire, that a man ſeeing them both, can put no difference betweene them, as one of the ancients in his time complained. And therefore ſeeing this running canker hath infected and corrupted the whole bodie of our ſtate, it were to be wiſhed that our ancient Lawes against this excesse were put in execution. Or because our sores are growne so desperate, that they cannot be cured wth ordinarie and easie medicines; that there were prouided for them some sharpe corrasiue, like the Lacedemonian Law, which ordered vnder a great penaltie, that none but harlots might vse glorious and rich apparell; that so honest women might bee brought out of loue with this pride and brauerie.

¶. Sect. 4. Of the abuse of apparell, in in respect of costlinesse.

Now these abuses of apparell are either in respect of the causes, or the vse thereof. The causes are the matter, forme, or end. In regard of the matter men shew their vanitie and sinne, first, when in the cost bestowed on the stuffe, they exceed their calling or abilitie, wearing such things as are aboue their estate, or more than their rents, reuenues, or other meanes may well maintaine. In which kind there was neuer greater excesse since the beginning of the world, than in our times, euery one herein exceeding their state and condition; the tenant will haue as costly stuffe as his land-lord, the farmer as the gentleman, and ordinary gentleman as great nobles. In so much as the abler sort sticke not to hang the price of a good farme at their wiues eare, and a great lordship about their neckes; and the poorer sort neglect all good duties, yea pinch their owne bellies; that they may weare the most costly stuffes, and adorne their backes with silkes and velvets. So that wee may justly take vp that complaint vsed by an ancient of his times, namely, that whereas the thing couered, should much exceed in value the couer or case in which it is contained; as the iewell the cabinet, the soule the body, the body the garment: now contrariwise, when as the body it selfe being set to sale, would not yeeld many groats, one suite of apparell wherewith it is adorned, is not bought for many pounds. Of which excesse of cost in maintaining pride, wee might well bee ashamed, if we considered that our first parents had no better cloathes of their owne making, than such as were made of fig-leaues; and when God prouided for them, their apparell was of no richer stuffe, than beasts skins, which were only fit to couer their nakednes, and to keepe them from the iniuries of the weather. Secondly, in respect of the matter, they offend who make choice of such stuffes as are so slight, as will serue to no vse, but to couer their nakednesse (for which also sometimes they are vnprofitable) and are almost no sooner made, than worne out, which they purposely affect that they may shew varietie of brauery, and often change into new fashions. Wherein as they doe much exceed their ancestors in costlines, who clothed themselues with the dearest, but yet most lasting stuffes; so doe they take away one chiefe end of superfluous apparel, which was, when themselues had laid it aside, to clothe therewith the poore members of Iesus Christ.

And as men sinne in respect of the matter of their apparell, against their particular callings, by exceeding their state and meanes; so also they offend against their generall calling of Christianitie in respect of the forme and fashion, and that both in the excesse and defect. For as Christians ought to looke that the matter of their apparell be not ouer costly; so also they should take speciall care that the fashion be graue, sober and modest. For so the Apostle requireth, that women should array themselues in comly apparell with shamefastnesse and modestie, not with broyded haire, or gold, or pearles, or costly apparell. And the Apostle Peter likewise chargeth them that their apparell shall not be outward, as with broyded haire, and gold put about, &c. Now in this respect people offend two wayes: first, when as they affect fashions, which are not graue and modest, but light, vaine and wanton; whereby they outwardly discouer the lasciuious lightnesse and vaine immodestie of their hearts, and by hanging out this signe of incontinencie, doe set their honestly to the sale. And of this kind are those habits and attires especially, which doe not couer the naked parts, which God and nature would haue hid; as also when men effeminately affect fashions like vnto women, and women mannishly goe in such apparell, as doth hardly distinguish them from men. Secondly, they offend through phantasticall pride, which moueth them as often to change their fashions, as the Cameleon his colour, a sinne vnto which our people in this land are exceedingly addicted, and therein notablie shew their vanitie and follie. For if constancie be an inseparable fruit of wisedome; so that they who are most wise, are most vnchangeable in their courses and actions, because at first they are able to discerne what is best, and knowing it adhere vnto it (whereof it is that God who is infinite in wisedome, is also immutable in all his counsels) then must also by the same reason mutabilitie, and phantastical change, bee a notable effect and signe of follie, which being not able to judge of that which is good, often shifteth and changeth, that at last it might find it out. Againe, vpon this often change there followeth another mischiefe; for when they haue tired their wits, and runne through all fashions which themselues can thinke vpon, they craue aid of forraine inuentions, and follow the fashions of others countries; sometimes the French, and sometimes the Italian, one while the Dutch, and soone after the Spanish. Now it is vnlawfull not only to breake the Lawes and statutes of our countrie; but also

1. Tim. 2. 9.

1. Pet. 3. 3.

¶. Sect. Of the abuse of apparell in respect of fashions.

also the manners and customes, wherein they are odd diuisers from Gods word; secondly, in the breach of humane societie, for in manie things in our habit we differ from the rest. And as wee are loth to be iested by the Lawes of strangers: so neither ought wee to follow their customes, vnlesse they be much better and more conuenient than our owne: which also when we haue received them, we must constantly hold vs to them, that so they may in time grow reasonable among our selues. Neither must euery one according to his owne phantasticall humour vary from his countrie fashion, seeing that euerie is vgly and monstrous which agreeth not with the whole body; nor must hee through vaine inconstancie affect strange fashions, for this also will induce him in time to imitate their vices and corruptions. In which respect God threatneth to punish Princes and kings children (who a man would think should in this kind be allowed greater libertie) because they were clothed with strange apparell, and would not follow their countrie fashion. In the defect also men offend through slouenly vnhandsomenesse, not caring how their apparell hangs vpon them, nor how beastly and nastie their clothes are, so they keepe them from the cold, into which disorder they fall either through slothfull negligence, because they would not be at the labour of dressing themselues, or through affected pride, seeking for praise at the backe dore, and desiring to be talked of, and to seeme notable for somewhat. But this also is vnlawfull; for the holie Scripture which forbiddeth excesse in broidered haire, pearle and gold, doth also require that wee should clothe our selues in handsome, decent and comely apparell, as becommeth shamefastnesse and modestie.

Lastly, men offend in their apparell in respect of the ends thereof, the which are two, honestie and profit. In regard of the former, apparell is worne by man to couer his nakednes, and to hide his shame which after his fall insued by reason of sinne. The other end is profit, which is two-fold, first for necessarie vse; secondly for honour and comelinesse. Apparell is necessarie vnto vs; for howsoeuer before the fall there was such a iust temperature of the aire, that it was not at all offensiue to mans naked body, and consequently in this behalfe there was no neede of garments; yet through sinne this temper being lost, and an inequality following of heate and cold, both intolerable vnto man, and hurtfull to his health, apparell became necessarie to preserue him from the outward iniuries of the weather, and to keepe him in equall temperature. Secondly, apparell is profitable for comelinesse, honour and ornature, not onely as it couereth naturall deformities, but also as it now maketh the body seemely and gracefull, which in its selfe was more comely and beautifull before the fall. And this end the Apostle speaketh of, where hee saith, that vpon those members of the body which we thinke to be lesse honourable vpon these we bestow most abundant honour, and our vncomely parts haue more abundant comelinesse. And in the verse following, that God hath tempered the body together, and hath giuen the more honour to that part which lacked. And these are the ends of apparell; in which manie failing doe shew much vanitie and sinne. For how manie are there in these dayes who dishonest themselues by their wanton and light garments, wearing such as will not couer their nakednesse, but discouer their bare breasts to open view, whilest their apparell either couereth them not at all, or in couering doth not hide them? How many are there who in apparelling themselues haue least respect to necessary vse, or to preserue their bodies from the iniuries of the weather, but affect thin and subtile fineneſse, more than wholesome warmenesse desiring rather to bee adorned than clothed, and to delight others eyes, than to preserue their owne health? Finally, how many are there who doe not honour their bodies with graue and decent apparell, but disgrace themselues with phantasticall fashions, and lasciuious habits; proclaiming by their outward garments, their inward pride and wansonnesse, as though they would haue all men to take notice of their vanitie and lightnesse?

Q. Sect. 7.
Of the abuse of costly apparell in respect of the common vse thereof.

And these are the abuses of apparell in respect of the causes thereof. In regard of the vse also it is abused, when as gorgeous and costly apparell, which might sometimes bee lawfully worne in respect of the dignitie of the person, is daily and ordinarily put on, for greater ostentation of pride and vaine-glorie. For as wee may offend by wearing such rich and costly garments as are aboue our state and calling; so when these might well beare it in due time and vpon fit occasion, wee offend also when we shew excesse in neglecting these circumstances, and in keeping reuels all the yeere. And this was the sinne taxed in the rich glutton, not that hee was clothed in purple and fine linnen; but because hee was excessiue in respect of time, vsing these costly ornaments euerie day. In which respect men and women greatly offend in these times, who (not obseruing the course and customs of their ancestors, which hauing this rich attire befitting their callings vsed it sparingly, at certaine great festiuals onely or some few extraordinarie meetings) doe make it their daily habite, and (as we say) worke-a-day attire, as though the chiefe end of their comming into the world, were to prank themthemselues in riotous pride, and superfluous braurie.

And thus haue I shewed in what respects apparell in which worldlings so much delight, is vaine and sinfull. Now in the next place, let vs consider of some arguments which may weane vs from this vanitie, and may moue vs, both in our iudgements lightly to value it, and in our affections to despise and contemne it. The first reason is, that God in the Scriptures hath forbidden this glorious and gorgeous apparell, vnlesse it be to some persons, and at some times. So the Apostle Paul giueth women in charge that they array themselues in comely apparell, with shamefastnesse and modestie, not with broidered haire, or gold, or pearles, or costly apparell (but as it becommeth women which professe the feare of God) with good workes. Likewise the Apostle Peter willeth them that their apparell should not be outward, as with broidered haire, and gold put about, or in putting on of ornaments; but that the hid man of the heart should bee vncorrupt, with a meeke and quiet spirit, which is before God a thing much set by. If therefore wee would shew our obedience to our great Lord and master, wee must not conforme our selues to the fashions of the world, by wearing such costly apparrell, and glorious or garish habits, as beseeme not our place and calling. But alas such is the vanitie of the times, that people sticke not to come into the publicke congregation, whereout of Gods word this pride and excesse is condemned, with their broidered, curled and frizled haire; gold, silkes, veluets, and excessiue braurie, as though they would openly professe their disconformity with the Scriptures, and rebellious disobedience against God, in doing that which hee forbiddeth before his face, and euen in that very time when by his word he doth condemne it: as if they should plainely say, I will not forsake the fashion of the world, though it be neuer so much or oft forbidden. Which as it is a great offence among our selues, so doth it scandalize pagans, infidels and worldlings much more, and as a stumbling block in the way hinders them from the profession of our religion, when as they heare our doctrine, and see our practice; obserue what the Scriptures which wee professe to beleeue, and propound as the rule, according to which wee frame our liues, condemne and forbid this vanity, and we euen when we heare them read, vie that excessiue braurie, which the heathens themselues would neuer tolerate.

§. Sect. 8. Reasons to diswade all from abuses in apparell: first because God hath forbidden this excessiue braurie.

1. Tim. 2. 9. 10.

1. Pet. 3. 3. 4.

Secondly, if we would call to minde the first originall of apparell, we should haue little cause to affect braurie, or to wax proud of gay cloathing; for had our first parents continued in the state of innocencie, they should haue remained glorious in themselues, and not haue needed any apparell; but hauing transgressed Gods commandement they saw their nakednesse, and being ashamed of their deformities, they sought to hide themselues, and to couer their shame by the helpe of garments. In which respect what is our apparell but a daily monitour, to call our sinnes and shame to memorie? What is it but a Lazers cloth, cast ouer our filthy sores of sinne, that wee may not become lothsome through our deformities to our selues and others? and consequently what doe they which vaunt themselues in this vanity, but like the thiefe, who being adiudged to weare an halter in perpetuall remembrance of his foule crimes, doth make him one of silke, or gold twist, and seeing it to make a glittering shew, doth wax proud of that which should rather humble him, as being a continuall testimonie of his sinne and shame? so they wax proud of that which is the ensigne of their sinne and miserie, and conuert the habits which were giuen vs to hide our sinnes, into sin it selfe. Againe, if we consider the vse of apparell in the first institution, which was not onely (as I haue said) to couer our nakednesse and hide our filthinesse; but also to preserue our bodies from the iniuries of the weather, wee shall finde little cause which may moue vs to affect or delight our selues in this superfluous braurie. For this enmitie betweene vs and the creatures which makes vs neede these armours of defence, puts vs in minde of the cause thereof, which was our enmitie with God by reason of our sinne; these couers to hide vs, argue to our shame, that there is something vnder them which needes couering; and these plasters, though they be of silke or veluet, shew that vnder them are some loathsome sores, which being seene would disgrace and shame vs. In all which respects the most glorious garments bring with them cause of blushing rather than of boasting; for before man sinned hee was glorious in his naturall beautie; and a garment to him would haue beene but as a cloud to the sun, which doth not grace it but hide its brightnesse. Neither would these ornaments haue more adorned him than a silken case a sweete rose; but when his beautie was by sinne blemished, then, like the withered rose reserued in a bag of silke, hee was driuen to seeke for ornaments, and to supplie naturall defects with the helpe of art. So that he who is proud of these poore supplies, is like vnto him who being blind glorieth in siluer eyes; or vnto a lame man, who hauing lost his legge, boasteth and braggeth of a gilded stumpe, which was not giuen him for glory and ostentation, but as a poore support to hold him vp, and as a sorie helpe to relieue his miserie. And this the Lord plainely in-inclined in thoſe firſt garments which hee gaue our gree progenitours; for howſoeuer hee could as eaſily haue prouided apparell of ſilke, as veluet, curiouſly imbroydered with gold and ſiluer, as of any meaner ſtuffes, yet hee clothed them with beaſts ſkins, which were oncly fit for thoſe vſes of hiding their nakednesſe, and defending them from the weather, and ſerued rather to humble than to puffe them vp with pride, not onely by putting them in minde of their brutiſh condition, but alſo of their frailety and mortality, ſeeing the creatures for their ſakes were already ſubject to death and vanity.

Thirdly, let vs conſider, that howſoeuer it may beſeeme worldlings to let it out daily in their gorgeous attire, becauſe they haue nothing to glorie in but theſe outward things; and alſo haue their proud habits ſuting with their proud hearts, and the reſt of their outward carriage and behauiour; yet it much misbeſeemeth Chriſtians herein to faſhion themſelues to the cuſtome of the world; for their chiefe ornaments are not outward and carnall, but inward and ſpirituall, when as they are decked with Gods ſanctifying graces; they are moſt glorious when they are moſt humble, and what hath humility to doe with the enſignes of pride? they are beſt adorned with modeſty and chaſtity, which outwardly ſhew themſelues in ſober and graue attire; and therefore what haue they to doe with phantaſticall faſhions, and the wanton and light habites of laſciuious and filthy harlots? They come neereſt the truth of their profeſſion, when as following the rule of the Scriptures, they put on the habit of holineſſe, and array themſelues in comely apparell, with ſhamefaſtneſſe and modeſty, and are adorned with good workes, as it becommeth thoſe that profeſſe the ſeruice of God: why therefore ſhould their practice giue the lie to their profeſſion, by accuſtoming themſelues to weare gorgeous and gay garments, which harlots vſe as baites to ſet out their beauty to the ſale, and to intice vaine perſons to follie and filthineſſe? Why will Chriſtian women ſeeme ſuch as they would beeloth to be, and hauing nothing to ſell, why doe they hang out ſignes to intice cuſtomers? Finally, ſeeing in our Baptiſme wee haue renounced the world with the vanities and luſts thereof, why ſhould wee in our apparell ſhew our ſelues as vaine as the vainest, or hauing caſt thoſe luſts out of our hearts, as it were, the chiefe city, why doe we ſuffer them to reſt vpon our backes, as in the ſuburbs, where they ſpare vnto many day to make a iourney, and to bring with them all vice and vanitie? Againe, let vs remember, that if our Sauiour Chriſt would not haue vs, who profeſſe our ſelues children of our heauenly father, to take any care for food and raiment, but to reſt our ſelues vpon his all-ſufficient prouidence; how much leſſe would hee haue vs to trouble our braines about curious and coſtly ornaments and vaine faſhions? how farre would hee haue vs from ſpending our time and ſtudy about variety of colours, imbroydery, iewels, dying and curling of haire, painting, periwigs, and ſuch like vanities? Finally, ſeeing wee profeſſe our ſelues pilgrims on earth; why ſhould we goe like, not onely citizens, but courtiers of the world? and ſeeing we ſay that wee are trauelling towards our heauenly countrie; why doe we loade, not ſo much our bodies, as our minds, with the intolerable waight and heauie care of variety and ſuperfluity of ſuits, made more maſſie and burthenſome with gold, ſiluer, and precious iewels; all which before we come to our iournies end, we muſt leaue behind vs, if at leaſt we doe not make the poore our porters to beare them for vs.

Fourthly, that wee may bee weaned from this vanity of coſtly and gorgeous apparell; let vs conſider that it is of no worth and excellencie: for the moſt rich clothes doe not better the body that weares them; much leſſe the mind that takes care to prouide them; but as it is vnto this the bellowes of pride, ſo vnto the other an vnprofitable burthen; and were it not for opinion and affection which lighteneth the load, what leſſe waight and cumber is there in a chaine of gold, than in a chaine of iron? what leſſe trouble to haue the fingers loaded with gold rings ſet with poiſned diamonds, than to weare vpon them rings of beaſts ſet with flint or ſmall peebles? ſeeing the price doth not lighten the burthen, but onely a deceiuing and falſe conceit? Againe, what excellencie or worth is there in the richeſt ſilkes, and fineſt clothes, the matter of the one being the excrement of vnwreling wormes, the other the fleece of the ſillie ſheepe? both which within a ſhort time weare out to ragges, or with vntimely decay may bee conſumed with moathes and filthy vermine, and what excellencie is in that, which as wormes breed, ſo wormes deſtroy? And of what worth is that to be valued which man borroweth from beaſts and creeping things, which are creatures farre inferiour vnto himſelfe? A noble man much ſcorneth to borrow clothes of a meaner perſonage, or being by preſent neede conſtrained to be thus beholding, he would rather be aſhamed than glory in it: although theſe both are creatures of the ſame kinde, made by the ſame workeman, and caſt out of the ſame mold, and yet man borroweth ornaments from all the inferiour creatures; from one his fleece, from another his skin, from this his light feathers, from that his teeth teeth and solid bones, from wormes their intrailes, from cats their excrements, from the sands its stones, from the earth its gold; and when with the crow he hath made himselfe gay with these borrowed feathers, hee glorieth and vaunteth himselfe in his owne worth, as though they grew all vpon his owne backe; and that nature and not art, had put this difference betweene him and others.

§. Sect. 12. That in this brauerie wee haue no preheminence before those who are of base condition.

Quid enim sibi vult plerumque illud aurum? ea enim qui in scena sunt ista conueniant, & meretricibus, quæ omnia ad lasciuiam & spectantur. Chrysost. in Hebræos cap. 12. Homil. 8.

Let not therefore any who professe christianity much affect these trifling vanities, or hauing them, glory in their base toies, vnto which beasts, birds, and silly wormes haue the first title and most naturall interest, whereas man onely commeth by them (as it were) by conquest, violence and force of armes. With all which ornaments when men or women haue with great cost and labour decked themselues, yet shall they find small excellency in them, seeing herein they are matched by many, and exceeded by some; and that not those onely of the noblest rancke, but also such as are of meane and base condition; as players, dancers, harlots, who adorne themselues with as glorious apparell as the best, that ravishing the minde and dazling the eyes of their beholders, they may allure them to offer to this idoll of beautie and glory, the sacrifice of fooles, and to become contributors towards their maintenance in these lewdest courses. Yea not onely are they herein matched by men, but also with their horses, whom vsually they adorne with gold, velues, and imbroderies, and because them to communicate with them in an equall share of this glory and brauerie; and what excellencie is in that, wherein man is not priuiledged aboue the brutish creatures? To this purpose one of the ancients speaketh fitly: I pray you (saith he) shall we esteeme those comely which equally decke their horses and mules with golden ornaments? you bestow other things, that priuiledge vs richer then, to make vs fooles. They communicate with some bestowe on their horses and their mules, like kind of ornaments belonging to them both; and by the same things, they desire to make their minds glorious and famous, wherewith they adorne their coaches, traines and attendants? Yea herein men are not onely equall with the beasts, but also inferiour to the senselesse creatures; for when they are in all their royalty and brauerie, they are not to be compared (as our Saviour Christ speaketh) with the lilies and flowers of the field; and who would thinke that any piece of mans excellency, who was created after Gods owne image, after Gods image, wherein these inferiour creatures doe so farre exceed him?

Vti & in hac vanitate exercitemur, qui lauerati & equos & vxores amicimur, &c. Chrysost. in Philip. 3. serm. 10.

Mat. 6. 28. 29.

§. Sect. 13. That this exquisitenesse and curiousnesse of ornaments is of no vse, but meerely vaine.

Fifthly, on this worthlesse vanity and inutility and want of profit, for howsoeuer worldly men procure them with great cost and labour, as if their chiefe happinesse consisted in them; yet they doe them no good, nor make them a whit the better when they are adorned with them. For howsoeuer purple and scarlet, siluer and gold, silkes and veluets haue in them some beautie and glory, yet they doe keepe it to themselues, and doe not communicate it to those that weare it; and therefore seeing the glory which commeth by the putting on of the apparell, vanisheth away when it is put off, without leauing any signe behind; it hereby appeareth, that it is the glory of the vesture and not of the owner. So that vicious men haue little cause to glorie in this externall and strange beautie, when they haue lost their owne, the inward vertues of the minde. As therefore no man iudgeth a horse the better which is set out to sale, because he hath a veluet footecloth, or golden trappings, yea rather suspecting this brauerie, he vncouereth him of them all, and looketh vpon him in his naturall beauty: so neither is a man to bee esteemed better for his glorious ornaments, but laying these aside, weare to value him according to the inward beautie of his minde; for if that which is outwardly seene of man, is not man, but the soule, vnto which his body is but the case or couer; how much lesse are wee to esteeme gay apparell any part of mans excellencie and goodnesse, seeing it is but a meere accident, which may easily be put on, and with more ease laid aside?

But this vnprofitableneſse will better appeare if wee consider that this glorious apparell doth not aduance those ends for which it is vsed: for first, whereas it is put on as an ornament to commend vs, it is manifest that it faileth herein; for (as one saith) he who thinks that gold adornes him, must acknowledge himselfe inferiour to that whereby hee is adorned; and being inferiour, hee is no more a master of it but a seruant: now what is more absurd than for a man to acknowledge himselfe inferiour, and lesse comely and beautifull than this Lydian fragment? Neither in truth doth this gay clothing adorne and commend any in respect of their state and person, body or mind, if it be excessiue in its selfe, or immoderate and too too common in respect of time; for if a man thus goe about his calling, in stead of making himselfe commendable by all his cost and labour, he is of some enuied, of others scorned; one he prouoketh to anger, another to laughter, and all to displeasure and dislike; yea they who bow vnto those thus richly adorned and doe them reuerence, euen in the performance of these outward complements, doe secretly condemne them in their hearts, censuring them of pride, vanitie vanitie and wantonnesse, seeing if they were not wholly possessed of these vices, they would not with so great cost and labour attire themselues aboue their calling, nor with such phantasticall and light fashions deforme their bodies. Wherein the just iudgement of God threatned against the proud lieth heauily vpon them: for when they thinke by their cost and brauerie to exalt themselues in euery ones iudgement, and to be commended and approued of all that behold them, the Lord resisting them in their pride, pulleth them downe, and maketh them to please none, whereas they intended hereby to please all. For God approueth them not, yea, rather hee professeth to oppose against them; the vertuous and humble like them not, for hating pride in themselues, they cannot loue it in others; those who are as proud as themselues are not hereby pleased; for they who are their Superiours disdaine that they should match or come neere them in brauery; their equals emulate and contend with them who shall exceed other; their inferiours enuy and maligne them because they cannot bee as fine as they; yea themselues are not pleased with themselues, because they neuer think that they are braue enough, which is the reason that they so often alter their attires and change their fashions, because none can long please them, and giue contentment. In a word they please no body with their brauery, but onely the prince of Pride, whose subiects and seruants they professe themselues by wearing his badge and liuery. So that if a man would commend himselfe to the iudgement of all: it were a much wiser course to attire his apparell according to his place and calling, yea, to carry a lower saile than the wind may well beare, abating somewhat of the brauery which his estate may well warrant and maintaine: for hereby also we shall find it more true, that he who exalteth himself shall be cast downe, and hee who humbleth himself shall bee exalted, euery one seeking rather to adde vnto his prayse, who rather endeuoureth to deserue it, and to detract from him, who too much affecteth and catcheth after credit and commendations.

And as costly and gorgeous apparell cannot commend the person or state of any; neither doth it make their body or minde more commendable, whether they be beautifull or deformed, indued with rare vertues, or defiled with foule vices. For if they bee beautifull by nature, what need they the helpe of art, for it is but a vaine thing to seeke to adde vnto that which is perfect already? if deformed, goodly ornaments do not much to the hide, as story doth not adde any praise in the iudgement; euery one being ready to attribute a great part of their beauty and comelinesse to the setting forth and garnishe in apparell, imagining that almost any other would bee as praise worthy as they, if they were so decked and adorned. In which regard a careless neglect of beautie better pleaseth; and oftentimes not to be adorned is in stead of the best ornament. Againe, this brauerie as little helpeth those who naturally are deformed, seeing it doth not take away their deformities but rather sheweth them, when as it inuiteth the eies of all to behold them, and so causeth them to think in their iudgements, that so great cost is but ill bestowed. Neither doth it at all profit the mind of man, whether he be indued with vertue, or blemished with vice; for if the glorious beames of vertue doe shine in any, the brightnesse thereof so much excelleth these outward ornaments, that they adde no more grace to a man, than a Candle-light when the Sunne shineth. Contrariwise if the mind be destitute of vertue, and deformed with vice; this outward decking will little auaile to furnish it with the one, or cleare it from the other. It will not make any more religious, humble, just, and temperate; yea, rather as experience sheweth, it bringeth men to the contrary extreames, it doth not abate pride and vaine glory, yea, rather it increaseth it; it doth not extinguish the heate of lust, but rather doth inflame it; it doth not warme our hearts with Charitie, nor repell the force of the Deuils Darts, but causeth rather our loue to freeze, and endangereth vs to Satans blowes; it doth not free vs from injustice, raging anger, enuie, malice, intemperance, couetousnesse, ambition and such like vices, but rather giueth occasion and way vnto them. In which respect a vicious man adorned with glorious garments, is like a dead Corps stucke with flowres; or like a glorious Sepulchre, containing in it a putrified and rotten bodie, which is tainted thereby with vnsauourie stench, but can giue no beautie or excellencie to the dead and corrupted carcase. So that rich attire neither beautifieth nor bettereth either the body or the minde; and therefore those who being destitute of vertue or of naturall beauty doe thinke to adorne and commend themselues by their goodly Apparell, fall into the errour of the Painters Boy, who being to paint the faire Helen, and wanting art to set forth her beautie, daubed Gold on her apparell, making her clothes rich, because hee could not make her face beautifull.

Secondly, Worldlings vse these rich ornaments because they would be more admired and respected; the which end also is often frustrate, especially, when as by often vse they are made ordinarie; for Gold and Siluer, Silkes and Veluets, being as common as Stuffes, Cloth, and Freese are within a while as little regarded and admired. Yea, though men could match the Sunne in gloris, yet if with with the Sunne they should daily appeare in this brauery, it would work in the beholders no wonder or respect, howsoeuer at the first sight they were much admired; yea, contrariwise because they waste their states, and spend all their liuings in maintaining this brauery, and superfluous excesse, which was heretofore bestowed, vpon charitable vses and good hospitalitie; therefore the meaner and poorer sort, receiuing no reliefe or comfort from them, detest their pride, and enuie their brauerie. Much wiser therefore was the course held by our fore-fathers, who hauing indeed costly attire befitting their callings, did not weare it commonly, but by the seldome vse thereof, made it the more to bee admired and respected, and howsoeuer making their garments of the best and most lasting Stuffes, they did not need to change them, but wore the same clothes many yeeres together; yet wearing them so seldome, and with such great distance of time comming betweene; and not glutting either themselues or others with their common vse, it was all one, as if at euery good time they had changed their suite and fashion. By which wise frugality they were enabled to keepe good hospitality, and to performe the workes of mercy; whereby as they had comfort to their owne consciences; so did they deserue the loue & reuerence of their inferiours towards them, when as they tasted of their bounty and goodnesse. Especially they were not driuen through their excessiue expences to inhance rents and increase fines, but hauing sufficient of their owne to maintaine their port, they were able to afford to their poore Tenants their Houses and Lands at such easie rates, as they might comfortably liue vnder their shelter. Whereby as their loines did blesse them, when they enjoyed these benefits from them; so in the time of peace they had so many seruants as Tenants, ready for all imployments; and in time of warre so many Souldiers, who in all dangers were ready to liue and die with them. Whereas now their pride hauing set rents and fines vpon the extremest racke, because nothing sufficeth to maintaine their excessiue brauery, and hauing turned hospitality and the workes of mercy into rich iewels, sumptuous furniture, and gorgeous apparell; their Tenants stand vpon equall termes with them, seeing their Houses and lands being brought to the Market Hill, they had onely a bare penny-worth for their penny, and therefore as their need is vnwilling (vnlesse they be forced by oppression) to doe them any seruice, or to hold but vpright them and any danger. So that whereas heretofore Gentlemen so [illegible] wealth, that it serued notably for their defence in time of perill; now finding it vpon leuells [illegible] Plate and Furniture, [illegible] peace it repoiseth them to Enuy, and the danger of Theeues, and in time of warre to the common spoyle.

And thus haue I shewed the vnprofitablenesse of costly and gay apparell: which if it be not sufficient to weane our hearts from it, let vs further consider that it is not onely empty of profit, but also full of euill, both in respect of sinne and punishment; for it is euery way sinfull as being sinne in it selfe, the cause and also the effect of sinne. Concerning the first, they who exceed in this excessiue brauery offend first against the majesty of God himselfe, not onely by transgressing his Commandement, whereby he hath forbidden it, and by neglecting his worship and seruice, because their whole time almost is taken vp either in caring for, prouiding, or putting on their ornaments; and thereby either want time on Gods Sabbaths to come to his publicke seruice, or else rush into his presence without all due preparation; but also through the grosse abuse of his creatures and good blessings bestowed vpon them. For they were not made Stewards of these rich Talents, that they should bestow them in excesse and vanitie: but that with the surplussage of their wealth they should relieue their poore brethren, & performe the works of Charitie and Mercy, which either respect the good of the Church or Common-wealth. And therefore fearefull will their account be at the day of Iudgement; when as it will not excuse their neglecting the poore members of Christ, to say they could spare nothing from these vses, because all was too little to maintaine their brauery and excessiue cost in apparell; nor yet that their riches and reuenues was great, and therefore they might well adorne themselues in gorgeous attire; seeing their wealth was not giuen them, that they should waste it in superfluities, but that they should bestow it in relieuing the poores necessities, in which respect this excuse of abundance will be no better, than if a man should cause his garments to be made farre too large and long for his stature, and excuse himselfe by this, that he had too much stuffe. For as it is absurd and ridiculous, to make the garment not after the measure of the bodie, but the quantitie of the peece out of which it is cut: so is it no lesse absurd to waste a mans substance in such costly apparell, as is aboue his calling, and not fitting to his state and condition, because hee hath abundance of wealth lying by him.

Secondly, herein they sinne against themselues: first, by neglecting their soule, which is their most excellent part, whilest their whole care and paine is taken vp in adorning of their bodies; for too much care of the bodie plainly argueth, the too little care of the soule; richnesse in apparell, pouerty in vertue; outward ornaments, inward deformities, and spirituall nakednesse, and (as one saith) ſaith) Whileſt men are cloathed with ſilke and purple, commonly their conſciences are ragged and beggarly; whileſt they gliſter with jewels and chaines, their manners vſually are loathſome and fordidous. In which reſpect they are not vnfitly compared to Beares or Coffins; for as they are moſt adorned, when as they haue a dead body in them; ſo theſe bodies are moſt decked with gorgeouſneſſe, when they haue in them a ſoule deſtitute of vertue and dead in ſinne. And in the ſame regard one of the Ancients compareth them to the ſtately Temples of Egypt, which had the outward Courts, Porches, Walls and Rooфes, richly adorned with Gold, Siluer, curious caruing and ingrauing, and with all other ſtately and gorgeous ornaments; but if a man ſhould goe no further into the inmoſt parts, to ſee the Idoll which was there worſhipped, in ſtead of ſome goodly Image ſet out according to the reſt of the brauerie and pompe; he ſhould find nothing but the baſe picture, or other reſemblance of ſome Cat, Crocodille or vgly Serpent: for ſo theſe women who load themſelues with Gold, Siluer, Iewels, and coſtly apparell, if this outward glory be remoued, and they more narrowly ſearched what they haue in the inmoſt Temple of their heart, they cannot ſhew vnto vs Gods Image ſhining in his ſpirituall graces, but rather a man ſhall find in them Crocodiles and Serpents, that is, beaſtly luſts, pride, wantonneſſe, immodeſtie, and ſuch like impieties. Againe, thoſe who affect this coſtly apparell hurt themſelues, whileſt by their pride and exceſſe brauery they lie open to the hatred and enuie, the cenſures and bitter frumps of all that ſee them. For euen thoſe who are ſober, graue and humble, when they ſee thoſe who are inferiour vnto themſelues in place and calling, ſo farre outſtrip them in this outward brauerie, cannot chuſe but diſdaine and ſcorne it; and others who thinke themſelues as good as they, comming ſhort of them for want of meanes, or will, ſo to beſtow their coſt, doe as much enuie and hate them. This ſheweth the extreame folly of theſe vaine perſons; for whereas they might haue loue in due reſpect among their Neighbours good cheape, they rather chuſe to purchaſe hatred, enuy and contempt, at theſe deare rates. Finally, by this outward brauery they diſgrace themſelues, and bewray vnto euery obſeruer beholder the ſecret corruptions which lie lurking in their hearts. For when the heart is infected and poyſoned with the damnable vice of pride, it tainteth outwardly the whole body with the markes and tokens, which commonly prognoſticate death and deſtruction, without repentance. So if the outward with folly, it diſcouereth it ſelfe in fooliſh and phantaſticall faſhions; if with prodigall vanity, it appeareth in the outward ſuperfluitie; if with leſt, it ſheweth it ſelfe in a wanton habit: and finally, if it be an heart ſoft and effeminate, it will eaſily be diſcerned, by ſoft rayment and wanton delicacie. So that as one ſaith, this vanitie of apparell doth not ſo much adorne the body, as diſcouer the mind; and as the ſonne of Syrach telleth vs, A mans garment, exceſſiue laughter, & gate, plainly declare what perſon he is. And therfore the Lord reproouing Iſrael ſaith, that their pride did teſtifie againſt them to their face, becauſe they did diſcouer it outwardly in their very countenance and gay apparell.

Laſtly, by wearing theſe coſtly and gorgeous garments they alſo ſinne againſt their Neighbours: firſt, by way of offence, when as by their example they allure and draw them on to imitate their brauerie; for ſuch is the pride of mans heart, that he is impatient to be any way inferiour to thoſe whom he eſteemeth but his equals; and therefore when he ſeeth his Neighbour in coſtly clothing, fearing leſt he ſhould be preferred before him, he inwardly diſdaineth, enuieth, and vieth with him who ſhall excell in brauerie; whereof it commeth to paſſe, that this vanity of gay apparell, hauing infected any corner, doth in a ſhort time like a running canker ſpread it ſelfe ouer a whole Countrie. Againe, they are ſcandalous to thoſe who are without, as they hinder and diſcourage them by their pride and exceſſe from the imbracing and profeſſing of their Religion, when as in this they can perceiue no difference betweene a profeſſour of Religion, and a profeſſed vain perſon; the children of God, and the children of the Deuill; thoſe who profeſſe mortification, and they who are worldly & profane. Whereas contrariwiſe, if they were according to their profeſſion, humble, modeſt, graue and ſober, in their habit and outward carriage, they might moue them to a liking of their Religion for their vertues ſake, who profeſſe it, and in time draw them on to the profeſſion and practice of it. Finally, if in ſinceritie of heart we profeſſe and practiſe Chriſtianitie, and yet be ouertaken with this vanity, as we doe thereby wrong our ſelues by impairing our good name; ſo by ſeeming that wee are not, wee giue occaſion to wicked worldlings of falling into ſinne, whileſt for this infirmitie they are readie to blaſpheme Gods Truth, which wee profeſſe, and cenſure and condemne vs for hypocrites and wicked perſons, who are as proud, wanton and laſciuious as any other. Which ſuſpicions wee ought to ſhun by auoiding theſe outward appearances of euill; for if my heart bee cleane and vpright in it ſelfe, why ſhould I giue occaſion to haue it ſpoond and blemiſhed in anothers conceit and eſtimation? Why ſhould wanton and laſciuious perſons haue any hope of finding that in me which I abhorre? Why doth not my habit proclaime the affection of my heart, lest impudencie should be incouraged to taint it, by infusing the poyson of lust and wantonnesse by my eares? Why should I not professing charity seek rather to edifie than destroy my Neighbour: and being a Souldier of Christ why should I not put on mine owne armour, badge and liuery, and manfully professe open emnitie against the World and worldly vanities?

ℙ. Sect. 20. Their excuse taken away who pretend inward humilitie though they exceed in outward bravery.

That therefore will not serue their turne which Professors of Religion vsually say for their excuse; that whatsoeuer men may think of them when they see their brauerie and vanitie, yet they haue cleere consciences towards God; though their apparell be garish and wanton, yet their minds are humble and chast; and though they fashion themselues according to the World, and doe after the custome of the most, yet they are not of the World, nor approue of worldly vanities, but could find in their hearts, if others would accompany them, to lay all these proud clothes and wanton fashions aside; whereas now they are carried away with the the streame of time, and are ouer-ruled euen against their owne minds by the tyrannie of euill custome. For we are bound to labour with the Apostle to haue a cleere conscience before God, and before men; wee ought to conforme not only our hearts, but also our outward habits vnto the obedience of Gods Law and reuealed will; and so to performe the duties of the inner man towards God, as that wee ought also to haue speciall care, that our outward carriage be not scandalous to our Neighbours. We must procure honest things, not onely before the Lord, but also before all men, as the Apostle enjoyneth vs. We who professe Christianitie, are as the lights of the world, and as a cittie set vpon an hill: and therefore our endeauour should be so shine before others in all holinesse of conuersation; neither is it enough for vs to haue light in our selues, but wee should also haue our lights so to shine before men, that our heauenly Father may be glorified, and our Brethren edified in the holy faith. We must not onely be good, sober, humble and chast for our owne sakes, but we must also appeare so, for the good of others. And the Christian must haue his head and heart so full of the sweet Oyle of Gods sanctifying graces, that they must also ouerflow euen to his garments and shirts of his clothing, that by these precious Odours, not only himselfe may be comforted, but others also may be refreshed by the perfume of his holy example. Neither ought they vse to vnseemly fashions, and excessiue costlinesse in their apparell, because it is the common custome of the times; seeing we haue an expresse Commandement, that we should not fashion our selues according to this world, nor conforme our selues to the fashions of the world; but be outwardly changed by the inward renuing of our minds. Wee must not stay our reformation of apparell till we may carrie it with most voices, nor expect a Parliament to take away these abuses; not laying them aside till we haue the whole Countrie to beare vs company; but the Law of Gods Spirit ruling in our hearts, must make vs herein to be a law vnto our selues, seeking the reformation of that which is amisse, though none would accompany vs in well doing. For if so be worldlings and vaine persons bee bold on the behalfe of their Master Satan, to bring into common vse costly attire, and strange and wanton fashions, whereby they poyson and corrupt all that are neere vnto them by their il example: why should not wee who professe the name of Christ, shew the like or greater boldnesse in a better cause, obeying our Lord and Master, and labouring by our modest, graue and sober apparell, to moue others to imitate vs, and reforme their vanitie, and excessiue brauerie, by our good example? Which if in these times Christians would begin, there is great hope that their endeuour would haue good successe; not onely because many would be drawne for conscience sake to follow their practice; but also because the most being almost cloyed with the common vse of brauery, and all quite tired with the excessiue charge which goeth to the maintaining of this costly apparell; doe inwardly desire reformation, so it might be generall, and could be content to weare more modest, sober, and frugall Attire, if the rest of their Neighbours would beare them company.

But here the weaker sexe doth further obiect, that either they must offend others by putting on this rich and vaine apparell, or their Husbands by laying it aside; who vnlesse they adorne themselues, will either bee displeased with them, or at least take no delight in them; and better it were to offend strangers by excesse, than those who are so neere and deare vnto them, by not setting themselues forth in such apparell as best pleaseth them. To which I answer, that if any haue such Husbands, delighted with folly and vanitie, their Wiues haue in this kind greater libertie than other women, because smaller inconueniences are to be vndergone, that greater may be auoided; but let such vnder colour of libertie beware of licentiousnesse, and vnder shew of pleasing their Husbands, let them take heed that they doe not displease God, wound their owne consciences, and offend their Brethren, by wearing such costly or garish apparell, as is either aboue their particular state and calling, or not beseeming their generall calling of Christianitie. For howsoeuer they ought to please their Hus-

Husbands rather than strangers, yet they should labour more to please God, than them both, yea, euen their Husbands in that which is good, rather than their Husbands in that which is wicked and vnlawfull. But further I admonish them to take heed lest this be a meere pretence and false excuse, and that they doe not by this brauery studie to please their Husbands, but rather their owne proud humours, yea, euen strangers themselues, whilst they affect by this brauery their esteeme and commendations. For if they angled onely for their Husbands loue, they would exhibit this bewtie before his eyes alone, more carefully adorning themselues at home whilest they are in his presence, than when they goe abroad into other company: whereas they follow the contrary practise, curiously decking themselues when they are to goe forth into the company of strangers, and putting all off againe when they come and returne vnto their husbands. Finally, let such know that if at all they are constrained to seeke to please them by these vaine ornaments, it is for the most part for want of better things, whereby they should be commended. For if in their behauiour and conuersation they were religious, wise, modest, sober and sober, and towards their Husbands meeke, humble, louing, and respectfull, they would by these vertues and duties please them better, if they haue any religion, conscience, or true wisdome, than by wearing the goyest ornaments: or if they be yet strangers to the grace of God, they may through his blessing winne them (as the Apostle teacheth vs) to the profession and practise of Religion, by this their holy and vertuous conuersation.

And thus it appeareth that the wearing of costly and gay apparell, vsurping out of time and calling, is in it selfe a sin. It followeth now for vs to shew that it is both the cause and effect of other sins much greater than it selfe. And first, it is the cause of many sinnes, which men daily commit, both against themselues & against their neighbors, in both which regards an excessiue brauerie is a fruitfull mother of much wickednesse. It is the cause of lust and wantonnesse both in themselues that weare it, as it doth effeminate the minde and softeneth the heart, making it vaine and wanton, and fit readie to receiue any impression of lust, as also in others, as it doth incourage them to giue the assault to chastitie, with hope of obtaining victory, when as these weapons of Wantons being displayed, do presage nothing lesse than the foyle in the first encounter. It is also the cause of much pride; for as pride first breedeth brauery, so no sooner is it borne, but presently it nourisheth the mother that bred it, making men in these gay clothes to thinke better of themselues than otherwise they are more meanly attired, and to contemne others as base, who are not decked in such rich attire. It causeth men, and much more women to misspend their time, whilest they consume a great part of their life, either in casting with themselues how they may be most braue, and what fashion will best become them; or in putting their purposes in execution, whilest they spend the greatest part of the morning in prancking and trimming of their bodies; or finally, in contriuing their plots, and vsing the meanes for the vpholding and maintaining of their excesse. Whereby it commeth to passeth, that they haue little or no time to adorne their soules with Gods sauing graces, knowledge, faith, charitie and the rest, but remaine ignorant, impenitent, secure, and full of infidelity; neither yet to performe the publicke duties of Gods seruice, nor their owne priuate deuotions, (for they dresse themselues by the houre, and pray by minutes) nor finally the duties of their particular callings in their houses and familes. For whereas the calling of the woman-kind tieth them to keepe the chiefe part of their residence at home, imitating the Snaile which carrieth her house vpon her backe; contrariwise hauing spent a great part of the day in dressing of themselues in their rich & costly attire, they haue now no power to stay at home, but needs they must goe abroade to shew their brauery, as thinking their costly apparell and vain fashions not worth the wearing, vnlesse they might be seene often, and much admired. And to say truth, such are as well abroad as at home, seeing by their habit they haue made themselues vnfit for any huswifely dutie; for neither may they come neere those places which require their chiefe residence, for soiling of their clothes, neither are they able to stir themselues more than Images, for the performing of any businesse. Yea, to that height of pride is the world come, that euery pettie Gentlewoman scorneth to be seene in any such huswifely imployments, whereas in ancient times, Princes and Queenes thought it their chiefe glory, as we may see in the example of Salomons mother.

And as this pride of apparell is a cause of much sinne in respect of themselues that vse it; so also in regard of others, whether we respect priuate persons or the whole Common-wealth. For what greater euils I pray you is there of bribing and extortion, fraud and cousonage, oppressing of the poore by cruell Land-lords, whilest vnmeasurably they increase their fines and inhance their rents, yea, of wrongs and injuries, rapine and violence, theft and sacriledge, than this excesse in costly apparell, men being resolued to run any desperate and wicked course, rather than they will want maintenance to their pride. Neither doth this excesse in apparell bring lesse mischiefe to the Com-

more wealth than to prouide for them. For first, it vexeth them all order of ciuill society, whilest euery one is in the outward habit no distinction of degrees: but the superiour and inferiour, the Master and the Seruant, the Mistris and Mistresse, the Nobleman and Gentleman, and the Gentleman and Farmer goe all alike, so as by the outward habite they cannot possibly bee discerned the one from the other. 2. Sine, it is the chiefe occasion of the decay of good hospitality, which is a principall pillar that vpholdeth the Commonwealth, as being the meanes to preserue loue and neighbourly friendship among the richer sort, and to giue releefe to the poore, who stand in need of helpe. Now whereas there was much hollowed this way by our Ancestors, whilest they contented themselues with meane attire; now they who succeed them, although they haue doubled and redoubled their fines and rents, cannot keepe open doores, but are faine to leaue their Countries, and to lurke in corners of great Cities, to saue charges in housekeeping, being not able with all their meanes to maintaine halfe their fore-fathers Family, because all which they can take and scrape together, is much too little to maintaine their bravery in apparell. Finally, there is no cause equall to this of impouerishing the Common-wealth, of causing dearth and scarcitie of all things necessarie, and consequently of bringing the whole Commonalty to want and misery. For to maintaine this excesse in apparell, Land-lords are faine to racke their rents; and the Tenant being not able with all his labour properly to maintaine his charge, and pay his rent, is constrained to raise the prices of all his Country commodities, as double rate. Artificers and Tradesmen are likewise forced to increase the prices of their worke and wares, being not otherwise able to maintaine their Families; and none smart so much as the poorer sort, who being destitute of meanes, haue no entercourse of dealing with the rest, nor cannot (like the other) heale their owne wound by biting of their fellow, or being not able hauing done their worke to forbeare the sale, are for the sustaining of their present necessitie faine to part with their wares at such rates as the buyers please to giue them. Finally, nothing doth more impouerish the Common-wealth than this excessiue bravery, seeing our monies and chiefe Commodities, which are of much better vse, are daily transported into other Countries, to buying in lieu hereof nothing but costly Stuffes, Silkes and Veluets, gold and silver laces, and such like toyes and vanities, which within a few moneths wearing come in rags, not worth the taking vp if a man should find them in the streets. In which respect this pride of apparell endamageth the Land more than any other wastfull expence; for how great much cost is superfluously bestowed vpon sumptuous Buildings, Plate, and excesse in diet, yee haue the riches of the Common-wealth continually amongst vs, and doe but onely change their Master, and that commonly a richer for a poorer: whereas this apparell is the cause why our chiefe riches and treasures are yeerely transported into other Countries, and in the meane time their own commodities are vilified and lightly esteemed, and the poore people want imployment, or at least a sufficient reward for their great labour. To say nothing of the durable continuance of houses & plate: whereas these gay clothes euery yeere, yea, (in our times) almost euery quarter, must bee new either in themselues, or at least in their fashion, and so bring a continuall and heauy charge to all that vse them. In which regard though Religion and Conscience should not preuaile with vs, yet (me thinkes) ciuill policie, and loue of our Countrie and common welfare, should perswade vs to loath and lay aside this pride and bravery.

And thus is apparent that this rich and costly attire is the cause of many euils. Now to the end that we may plainly see, that it hath neere alliance to all kinds of wickednesse, we are further to consider that it is also the effect and fruit of sinne, namely, of pride and self-loue, which worke in men a desire to seeme excellent, and in all things to exceed other men, howsoeuer oftentimes they faile of their end, for as much as others being as proud as they, rise and contend with them for this preheminence. Neuertheless though they misse the marke, yet doe they continually ayme and shoot at it, propounding this as the maine end of all their bravery and excessiue cost, that they may excell & put downe others. And thus some adorne themselues that they may seeme more beautifull; some that they may be thought more noble and better descended, and some that they may be reputed more wealthy, and of better estate than the rest of their Neighbours. And as hereby they labour to aduance themselues into the highest seat of mens hearts, and seeke to be greatly esteemed, and much admired of all that looke vpon them; so by the same meanes they aspire to haue the precedence before others, the vpper hand & highest places in all meetings, not because these things haue any worth in themselues, or merit the least part of their cost and labour, by any true good which they impart vnto them, but because their pride affecteth them, as signes which argue their excellencie, and as meanes to make them more respected than other men. So that this gay apparell is (as one truly called it) the very enseigne of Pride, and nest of Luxury; for take away beholders and admirers, priorities in estimation and precedence in place, & there would would need no ſtraunge reſtraint to prohibite this exceſſe.

Finally, as this exceſſiue brauerie in apparell is euery way euill in reſpect of ſinne; ſo alſo it is euill in regard of puniſhment: for firſt, thereby the mind is exceedingly vexed and troubled, not onely in inuenting fashions, and in ſtudying how the body may be moſt beautified and adorned; but alſo in laying plots and contriuing meanes to maintaine this brauery. For men beſtowing exceſſiue coſt aboue their meanes about this vanity, are forced to runne into debt, which is the very bane of a quiet mind, and to borrow moneys vpon vſurie, or to take vp their ſtuffes at worſe rates, which by reaſon of the increaſe of the price, and defect of their ability, they are commonly worſe able to repay at the time appointed, than when they tooke it vpon credit; and therefore they are forced to trie and tire all their friends, to change often their creditors, borrowing of one to pay another, to receiue proud repulſes, euen of thoſe whoſe lending is their liuing; to endure vpon euery default of payment hard words, and bitter menacings; yea oftentimes ſuites, arreſts, impriſonment, and many ſuch like miſeries: for as the wiſe man ſaith, thoſe that borrow loſe their liberty, and become thrals and vaſſals to thoſe who lend vnto them. By all which courſes neerely the minde is exceedingly tormented, as being continually vpon the racke of paſſion; reioycing when they haue borrowed, ſorrowing when they are to pay, fretting when they receiue repulſes and diſgraces, and fuming when as though default of payment they haue hazarded their ſtate by mortgages and ſtatutes, fines and forfaitures, or their perſons, when as they goe daily in danger to be arreſted and impriſoned; but alſo their ſtate is vtterly ruined: for their ordinarie rents and reuenues not being ſufficient to maintaine this pride and prodigall exceſſe, they are after much ſhuffling and tumbling among their creditors, forced to ſell ſome part of their lands to pay their debts; fooliſhly imagining that they may hereafter (it may bee when their charge increaſeth) liue vpon a part, whom the whole before could not ſuffice: of which vaine hope when as they faile, they (being ſtill reſolued to abate nothing of their brauerie) are conſtrained to ſell one part of their reuenew after another, till within a while the whole eſtate is ruined & brought to nothing. When as being pinched with want and miſery, they are glad of cloth and freeſe, who before adorned ſilke and veluets, valeſſe they were cut and mingled, pinked, and laced, as beſt ſuited their vaine fantaſie: and to become loathſome and troubleſome gueſts at other mens tables, to whom before pride had ſhut them out of their owne houſes, were able to giue liberall intertainement vnto others. To ſay nothing of thoſe who end their dayes in priſon, and lie in holes and dungeons: wanting meate to ſuſtaine their pinching hunger, and homely clothes to couer their nakedneſſe, the which notwithſtanding is the caſe of many, as the counters and iayles in all places can beare me witnes. And as hereby they diſquiet their minds and ruine their temporall eſtates, ſo do they bring vpon themſelues for their pride, Gods heauie puniſhments, and fearefull malediction; for the Lord by his prophet threatneth, that the high looke of man ſhall bee humbled, and his loftineſſe abaſed, and that the day of his viſitation ſhall fall out moſt heauie to the proud and haughtie, and vpon all that is exalted, that is may be made low. And more particularly he denounceth miſerie, pouerty and deſtruction againſt the daughters of Sion, becauſe being haughtie in their hearts, they exceeded in this wanton and coſtly attire, and threatneth that in the day of his vengeance he will viſit the princes and the kings children, for their vaine faſhions, and ſtrange apparell.

Seeing therefore this coſtly and gorgeous apparell, is forbidden in the Scriptures, and is the badge and remembrancer of our ſinne and ſhame: ſeeing is misbeſeemeth thoſe who profeſſe Chriſtianitie, to affect or vſe it, much more to dote and ſet their hearts vpon it, becauſe it is in it ſelfe vaine and void of excellencie, and vnto them not only vnprofitable, but euery way euill, both in reſpect of ſinne and puniſhment; let vs labour to weane our hearts and affections from this worthleſſe and wicked vanitie, that we may place and fixe them vpon much more excellent and precious ornaments; ſtriuing and indeauouring to adorne our ſoules with the ſanctifying and ſauing graces of Gods Spirit, which will not only ſerue for garments to hide and couer our ſpirituall nakedneſſe, wherewith being cloathed, we ſhall appeare beautifull and glorious in the ſight of God, and all his holy Saints and Angels; but alſo for armour of proofe, to defend and preſerue vs from all the furious aſſaults of our ſpirituall enemies: and as the Apoſtle exhorteth vs, let vs aboue all things labour to decke our ſelues with humilitie, and with the wedding garment of faith, and a good conſcience; and put on Ieſus Chriſt, that being cloathed with his righteouſneſſe and obedience, we may bee accepted of God in his beloued, and ſo ſhall we, when we haue finiſhed our courſe with much ioy and peace, haue thoſe long white robes of glorie, and eternall happineſſe beſtowed vpon vs in the day of Gods appearing, and as fit gueſts of the bridall chamber, follow the Lambe whitherſoeuer he goeth.

CHAP. XVI.

§. Sect. 1. Worldly pleasures are of no worth, in comparison of heauenly ioyes.

NOw thus haue I shewed the vanitie of riches in the speciall kinds thereof. Now it followeth in the last place that we examine worldly pleasures, to see if we can find any more worth and excellencie in them, than in the other: where vpon the truth wee shall find, that howsoeuer they may be preferred before honours and riches, as being the end of them both: for therefore doe men affect honors, because they delight and please them, and riches because they would enioy them, and reioyce in their fruition, as also because they are much more free from trouble, and full of sweetnesse; whereof it is that the wise Salomon, who had experience of them all, concludeth, that among worldly things there is nothing better, than that a man should reioyce in his affaires, because that is his portion: and that there is no profit to man, but that he eat and drinke, and delight his soule with the profit of his labour: yet neuertheless if we compare them with the spirituall ioy of a Christian in this life, or the heauenly ioyes in the life to come, they are to be esteemed vaine and of no value, and to be contemned as being altogether worthlesse and void of excellencie. For howsoeuer Salomon comparing them with other worldly things, doth giue them the preeminence; yet considering them in their owne nature, ioyned with our vse, hee condemneth them as vaine and vnprofitable, in respect of any sound good, or true happinesse which they bring vnto vs. I said in my heart (saith he) goe to now, I will proue thee with ioy, therefore take thou pleasure in pleasant things: and behold this also is vanitie. I said of laughter, thou art mad: and of ioy, what is that thou doest? And afterwards hee saith, that he sought for ioy and contentment, in stately buildings, fruitfull vineyards, pleasant gardens and orchards, sweete and delightfull musicke, and in all other worldly pleasures which his heart could thinke of; but in conclusion found, that there was nothing in them all, but meere vanitie, and which is worse, vexation of spirit.

§. Sect. 2. That worldly pleasures are gifts of an inferiour nature, which are bestowed most plentifully vpon the wicked.

But how vaine and void of excellencie these worldly pleasures are, it may hereby appeare, in that if we take them at the best, they are but of a meane, inferiour and imperfect nature, whose goodnesse chiefly consisteth in their mediocritie and measure, rather than in the pleasures themselues; which measure being exceeded, they become vile and loathsome, as we may see in the excesse of eating, drinking, playing and the rest. Now how base and meane is that good to be esteemed, whose abstemious vse is better than full fruition? and whose limited measure is more commendable, than plentie and abundance? yea how void of excellencie, and neare vnto nought is that to bee accounted, which becommeth euill by increasing, and when it hath greatnesse, loseth goodnes? And hence it is, that the Lord, whose most wise iudgement is the true ballance, that discerneth solid good, from light vanitie, esteeming these worldly pleasures, as vaine and worthlesse trifles, carelessely casteth them in common among all, and suffereth the bad as well as the good, his enemies as well as his friends to communicate in them. Yea seeing that the wicked set their hearts vpon them, and loue them much better than their Creator, and his owne children, being too carnally incorous, prone ready to surfet vpon these sweet meates of worldly delights; hauing scattered them in common among all, in his iust iudgement to the one, hee leaueth them to their owne libertie, and letteth them gather their fill: and in his rich mercie to the other, he holdeth them backe, when they runne after them with too eager an appetite, and suffereth them to feed vpon them but sparingly, and in small quantitie. And because being tainted with the fall of our first parents, as they still retaine some goodnes of their creation, so there is infused into them a malignant qualitie, which filleth those who too much feed vpon them, with the grosse and dangerous humors of corruption: therefore the Lord the wise Physition, either restraineth his patients, whom hee intendeth to cure, from their vse, or if yeelding so much to their appetite, he suffereth them to feed vpon them; hee doth so correct and qualifie them with the cordiall preseruatiues of his grace, that they doe not hurt them; or if the grosse humors of sin breed in them by this voluptuous diet, he purgeth them away with the bitter potions of troubles and afflictions. So that the wicked haue a greater portion in these worldly delights than Gods dearest children; yea and much more carnall pleasure in their fruition, because in the security of their harts they inioy them, letting the raines loose to their licentious will, and suffering their appetites to take their fill, vntil euen they glut themselues with these delights, & be made drunke with abundance of pleasure. Whereas the children of God dare only taste of these bewitching cups, or if being allured with the sweetnesse, they take a more deepe draught, they feele them bitter in digestion, for not only doe they find much trouble in the very fruition of their pleasures, whilest they are faine to watch with great care and vigilancie ouer their hearts, that they doe not surfet of these delights, by exceeding iust measure, lest in pleasing themselues they displease God; but finding finding that they are shuttle and ouertaken, they haue their sweet pleasures so wrely sauced, with greefe, griping of the heart; and checkes of conscience, and afterwards when the delight is vanished, it leaueth behind it bitter sorrow and repentance. Whereby it appeareth that the children of the world haue in this respect a greater share in these carnall pleasures, than the children of God: and therefore our Saviour Christ plainely telleth his Disciples, that they should weepe and lament, when as wicked worldlings should reioyce; and solace themselues in their delights. The which also the experience of all times hath plainly proued: for Dauid was afflicted and persecuted, when his wicked enemies wallowed in their delights, and through their daintie fare, ease and pleasure, had their eyes swollen with fatnesse; so the rich Prophet fate daintily at Iesabels table, whilest poore Elias is fed by the rauens, and glad of any scraps: proud Herod delighted himselfe with his feasts and reuels, whilst holy Iohn Baptist lieth in prison, expecting death; and the rich Glutton goeth sumptuously and fareth deliciously euery day, whilest poore Lazarus is couered with sores in stead of cloathes, and being famished with hunger cannot haue the crummes of his table, or the least part of his needlesse superfluities. By all which it appeareth that these worldly pleasures are of little worth, seeing the Lord doth so plentifully bestow them vpon those who are most vnworthie; and that they haue little goodnesse in them, because with a sparing hand hee imparteth them vnto the good, and suffereth those who are voide of goodnesse to bee glutted with them.

But how vaine and worthlesse these worldly pleasures are, it may further appeare, in that the Lord more freely, and in greater measure bestoweth them vpon the brutish creatures, than vpon those who are reasonable; implying thereby that they are so base and contemptible, that they are fitter for beasts than for men. And this may easily appeare, if wee consider that the brute creatures haue full freedome in the vse of their delights, hauing no Law to limit them but their owne appetite, and consequently are priuiledged in their pleasure from all blame, guilt and punishment; whereas man is limited by the Law, so as he dare not doe what hee list, but is pulled backe with feare when his appetite most draweth him on, being subject to punishment when in his delights he exceedeth due measure. Or if hee desperately goe on, hee hath all his mirth marred with the pangs of an accusing conscience, and loseth much of his present delight, through feare and expectation of future punishment. Against which they are so guided by instinct of nature, and haue their appetite so fully conformable to its direction, that they take delight in those pleasures, which are vnto them most good and profitable; they joy in that food which is most fit for their nourishment, and take pleasure in no more than will doe them good; they satisfie in seasonable time their naturall lusts, and enioy their sports when it best pleaseth them; they doe not compasse their pleasures by fraud or iniurie offered to those of their own kind, nor enjoy them enuying, or being enuied; their pleasures are free from shame, because they are free from sinne, and haue not like men their delights damped with lookers on. They haue more strength and health than men to enjoy their pleasures, and their appetite is no more strong to desire these sweete delights than their stomacke to digest them; they haue no crudities in concoction nor superfluitie of ill humours through bad digestion; or if they haue, they can easily cure themselues with their knowne physicke, and neuer need the apothecaries lothsome drugs. Finally, they securely enjoy their pleasures without feare of losing them; and when the object of their delight is taken away, they haue no carking care in seeking it, or griefe for losing it. By all which is appeareth that the brutish creatures haue many priuiledges in their pleasures more than men; and therefore farre be it from vs to set our hearts vpon these vanities, as though they were of great worth and excellencie, seeing the very beasts herein excell and goe before vs: for (as one saith) if this were mans chiefe good to enjoy pleasures, in vaine was reason and wisedome bestowed vpon him, seeing he might more easily and perfectly attaine vnto and enjoy them, if hee had onely the guide of sense and sensuall appetite, like the brutish creatures.

Lastly, howsoeuer these worldly pleasures be vaine and worthlesse in themselues, yet they become more base and of lesse value, by reason that we are ready through our corruption to abuse them vnto sinne; being apt in the middest of our delights to forget God, and neglect his seruice, to vse prophane iesting, and wanton communication, intemperance, and excesse; and finally to remaine in our security and hardnesse of heart, putting farre from vs the euill day, and together with it our repentance and conuersion vnto God. In which regard the wise Salomon saith, that it is better to goe into the house of mourning than into the house of feasting, because this is the end of all men, and the liuing shall lay it to his heart; and that anger is better than laughter, because by a sad looke the heart is made better; and finally, that it is a signe of a wise heart, when it frequenteth the house of mourning, and a badge of folly, when it moueth vs to haunt

Q. Sect. 4. That worldly pleasures are of lesse esteem because they are apt to be abused.

Eccles. 7. 2, 3, 4.

the house of mirth. But of this I shall haue occasion hereafter to speake more largely, as also of the vncertaintie, inutility, and hurtfulnesse of worldly pleasures, all which prouue them most vaine and worthlesse; and therefore it shall suffice in this place to haue thus briefly touched them.

5. Sect. 5. That the vanity of worldly pleasures should make vs to seeke spirituall and heauenly ioyes.

Seeing therefore these carnall delights are so vaine and void of excellencie, let vs not like filthy swine, take our chiefe joy and contentment to wallow our selues in the puddle of worldly pleasures: neither let vs like the serpentine brood creepe groueling vpon our bellies, licking the dust of these earthly and sensuall delights; but rather let vs seeke while wee continue here, to take our chiefe delight in the Lord, in meditating and studying in his word, in doing his will, in our reconciliation and peace with God, in our spirituall joy, grounded vpon our assurance and hopefull expectation of our heauenly happinesse; and finally in all other Gods spirituall fauours and graces. For if the heathen man justly taxed such of folly as did seeke for pleasure in tauernes, rather than in their owne houses: and in vnlawfull sports, rather than in their honest labours; how much more are we to be reproued, if we seeke for our joy and delight in voluptuous, carnall, and sinfull pleasures, which being vaine and momentanie, doe end in bitternesse, and eternall woe and miserie, and not in Gods loue, holy obedience, and all other testimonies of his mercy, and pledges of our owne saluation? In which (if our hearts were not too too carnall, sauouring onely earthly things and our negligence exceeding great, in making a holy and comfortable vse of them) we might take infinite more true delight and comfort in one day, than wee haue done in all worldly pleasures and vaine sports in our whole life. An example whereof we haue in the kingly prophet, who had so weaned his affections from the world, and inured them to feed on these spirituall banquets, that feeling their sweetnesse he could not in comparison thereof relish at all the chiefe comforts which he found in the world: for so he professeth, that he had more joy of heart when the light of Gods countenance shined vpon him, than worldly men had, when their wheate and wine did abound; that he desired Gods Law rather than gold, yea though it were most pure in qualitie, and much in quantitie; and that he found more sweetnesse in it than in the honie and honie combe; that Gods testimonies were his delight and his counsellers; that he had taken Gods testimonies as his heritage for euer, because they were the joy of his heart, and that he rejoyced in Gods word, as one that had found a great spoile. And therefore when for his sinne hee had lost the sense and feeling of this delight and comfort, it was not all the joy and pleasure of a kingdome, that would giue his mind contentment, but as one robbed and depriued of all his pleasure, he earnestly desireth God to restore it vnto him: Make me (saith he) to heare ioy and gladnes, that the bones which thou hast broken may reioyce: restore vnto me the ioy of thy saluation, and stablish me with thy free Spirit: and elsewhere, he saith, that except Gods Law had beene his delight, he should haue perished in his affliction. So it is said, that when the people offered willingly towards the building of the Temple, they reioyced with great joy. And thus our Sauiour Christ tooke such pleasure in doing his Fathers will, that it more delighted him, than to eate his meat when he was an hungred; and his beloued Apostle professeth, that he taketh no greater joy in any thing, than to see the fruits of his Apostleship, and to heare that his sonnes, whom he had begotten vnto God, did walke in his truth. Which examples (if we had the like holy hearts & sanctified affections) wee would follow, weaning our selues from delighting in worldly vanities, that we might wholly joy in the Lord, and in these spirituall pleasures; which if we would doe, then should we find more comfort in this course, than euer the world could afford vnto vs; for the Lord would not giue vs joy with a sparing hand; but as the Prophet speaketh, wee should bee satisfied with the fatnesse of his house, and God would cause vs to drinke out of the riuers of his pleasures: yea then should we be, as he also saith, eternally blessed: for they who delight in the Lord in this life, they shall find in his presence in the life to come, fulnesse of joy, and pleasures at his right hand for euermore.

CHAP. XVII.

That worldly things doe satisfie, nor bring contentment to those that haue them.

HAuing shewed the vanitie of the world, and of those worldly things which are most admired and affected. It now followeth that according to my order propounded, I also proue, that by reason of this their vanitie, they doe not satisfie, or bring contentment to those who most abound with them. For whereas that which is substantially and truly good, filleth and replenisheth the place where it is, these worldly things which are but vaine shadowes and false resemblances of this goodnesse, being receiued into our hearts, though they much cumber the roome, yet they doe not fill it, but

6. Sect. 1. That worldly things cannot bring contentment.

but in this greatest plentie, leaue the greatest emptinesse. They promise indeed when we pursue them, that they will giue vs contentment: (when wee go for them; and thinke the hardest in the Prouerbe) when they haue vs once fully, and to the continuing of our finall damnation, by setting our hearts on them more than God, that we shall quite our selues of our loue: and those who are inflamed with these inticements, wherewith all their desires and painefull endeauours they pursue these bewitching vanities, they imagine like the foolish builders of Babel, that they shall eternize their name, and climbe vp euen into heauen in their owne conceite: but vpon triall they find nothing but trouble and confusion: for these goodly castles of their hopes which the great Magazine of heauen offered vnto them for the wages of their painfull seruice; as places of sure refuge in all wants and dangers, vanish away when in their greatest need they flie vnto them for succour and defence: and these beautifull Strumpets, with whose loue hee hath wounded their hearts from God, like shadowes vanish, when they come to imbrace them, leauing behind them no comfort or contentation. In which respect those who doe vpon worldly vanities, and thinke to satisfie their minds in their fruition, are like vnto the hungrie man, who dreameth that he eateth, but when he waketh his soule is still empty: or to the thirstie man, who dreameth that he drinketh, but arising from his sleepe remaineth still a thirst, as the Prophet speaketh: or as the Wise man pronounceth them, they are like vnto the graue and destruction, which are neuer satisfied: and to the horse-leaches, which crie, giue, giue, and are neuer filled. And as those who being vexed with the disease called the dogge hunger, are alwayes eating, but neuer satisfied, so as it is more ease to burst their stomacher, then to satisfie their appetite: so howsoeuer worldly men are still feeding their hopes and desires, with these earthly vanities; yet their minds remaine as emptie and vnsatisfied, as they were when they first tasted of them: whereby the vanitie and worthlessenesse of these worldly things plainly appeareth, seeing that is said to bee vaine, which like a shadow maketh some appearance, but filleth not the place where it is found: and they are vaine, so also they are worthlesse and of no value: For as that is not to be esteemed pure, which is enough; because it satisfieth not: so contrariwise, that is not to be esteemed good, or greatly to be valued, which doth not satisfie the minde; but leaueth the same empty, and his owner full of nothing but vexation and discontentment.

Yea so farre are these worldly things from satisfying them that loue them, that they inlarge their desires, and set an edge vpon their appetites, seruing rather for sauces to sharpen the stomacke, than for substantiall food to allay the hunger, and for baits to allure vs rather than meate to satisfie vs. For those who most deuour them, doe most desire them; like those that are diseased with the dropsie, who being full of water, doe most complaine of drought, and crie out of want, when as they are ready to burst with fulnesse. And as those who are sicke of a burning feuer, how soeuer in the time of their health they were not much troubled with thirst, being inwardly vexed with the raging burning of their disease, doe desire abundance of drinke; and hauing that they longed for, are not satisfied, but the more they drinke, the more they thirst, because it is an vnnaturall heate which causeth this vnnaturall appetite: so when soules are in health, a little doth content them, but when they are diseased with the burning heate of worldly concupiscence, this vnnaturall appetite is neuer satisfied, but the more they haue, the more they desire, and the neerer they are to abundance and superfluitie, the further they are from contentation. And whereas at first they had some stay of themselues, and some power to moderate their desires, now hauing giuen the raines to their concupiscence, it runneth on with headlong violence, and admitteth no restraint: like vnto those standing on the top of a steepe hill, who how soeuer they can easily rule themselues whilest they keepe their place, or if they warily creepe downe by little and slow degrees, yet if they begin once to runne, they can make no stay, till with great perill they come headlong to the bottome.

The reasons of this vnsatiablenesse are diuers: first and principally it commeth to passe through the iust iudgement of God, who (seeing worldlings loue his gifts better than himselfe that gaue them, and in stead of being moued by his bountie to serue him with more alacritie, doe commit idolatrie with these earthly vanities) doth lay this heauie curse vpon them, that they shall not be able to satisfie them or giue contentment, yea rather the more they shall feed vpon them, the more their hunger shall bee increased. And this is that iudgement and malediction which the Lord denounceth against the Israelites, for neglecting the duties of his seruice, that they should eate and not haue enough; the which iudgement was accordingly inflicted on them, as the Prophet Haggai telleth them: Ye haue sowen (saith he) much, and bring in little, ye eate, but yee haue not enough; yee drinke, but yee are not filled; yee cloath you, but yee be not warme; and he that earneth wages, putteth the wages into a broken bag. Another reason things possessed doe but inflame the desire.

Q. Sect. 3. The reasons why the mind of man cannot be satisfied with earthly things.

Hosea. 4. 10. Micha. 6. 14.

may be, that our appetite and the desires of our hearts being spirituall, are in comparison of these earthly things almost infinite, and of such exceeding large extent, that the whole world cannot fill & satisfie them, there being no end or limits set vnto them, or at least such as the earth and earthly things cannot afford vnto vs. The which vnsatiablenesse of the heart by the world (one wittily saith) is implied and signified by their diuers figures, for the world is round, and the heart three cornered; and a triangle cannot be filled with a circle. It is therefore the Lord alone that can satisfie this insatiable heart of man, for being created of a spirituall substance, and according to Gods image, and that to this end, that it might be a fit temple for his holy spirit, there is nothing lesse than God can fill and satisfie it. And therefore that soule which seeketh full contentment in any thing saue God, is like those vncleane spirits which seeke for rest but find none: yea it is not only frustrate of all fruite of its labour, but findeth that which it seeketh not; that is, much disquietnesse and vexation of spirit. These worldly vanities being vnto them like wind to the body which puffeth vp, but nourisheth not; tormenteth, but not satisfieth. Whereas on the other side, he in whose heart God lodgeth and dwelleth by his holy spirit, is throughly filled, and fully satisfied; and though it should enlarge it desires beyond the bounds of the highest heauen, yet should no part thereof be emptie and vnreplenished, for as the Psalmist telleth vs, if we delight in the Lord, he will giue vs our hearts desire; and rather than it should not bee satisfied he will giue vs himselfe, whom who so enjoyeth can want nothing. And therefore we should not set our hearts vpon these worldly things which cannot satisfie vs, but vpon the Lord, whose fruition bringeth full contentment. And because (as one saith) no man possesseth God, but hee who is first possessed of him, let vs become a possession vnto God, that he may become a possession vnto vs; and if we haue him we shall haue enough: for what can satisfie him whom the infinite Creator cannot satisfie? Another reason of this vnsatiablenesse of mans minde with these worldly vanities, may bee their difference in nature, in that it is heauenly and spirituall, and these earthly and corporall, in regard whereof there can bee no proportion betweene them; and therefore as it is impossible to replenish a corporall emptinesse with a spirituall substance, as a chest with vertues, or the stomacke with wisedome; so is it no more possible to fill a spirituall emptinesse with a bodily substance, as the soule and minde of man with earthly treasures, or worldly preferments. And therefore when we feed our hungry soules with this vnnaturall food, it doth not satisfie our appetite, but rather encreaseth our hunger. Whereas if wee feed them with spirituall food which is of like substance vnto themselues, they will thereby bee nourished; and if we hunger after the bread of life, and desire to replenish our emptie soules with Christs righteousnes, we are by him pronounced blessed, because we shall bee throughly satisfied. Finally, our appetites are vnsatiable, not through any necessity which wee haue of earthly abundance, but through vnlimited and vnnaturall greedinesse; for in respect of vse, nature is content with a little, as well as with much; but when the soule being sicke of worldly concupiscence, hath once passed the limits of nature, whereby these things are measured vnto vs, according to necessity and profit; the desires thereof become endlesse and infinite, and are by accesse of these vanities rather encreased than diminished. For being applyed to the minde to cure it of this vnsatiable greedinesse, like weake and ouer gentle medicines, they onely stirre the humours of our corrupt concupiscence, whereby we become more dangerously sicke than we were before, but doe not all purge and free vs from them.

Let vs not therefore foolishly imagine that our minds can bee satisfied and filled with these worldly vanities, nor greedily affect and seeke after a greater measure, when as we are not sufficed with a lesse, supposing that the accesse of quantitie may bring contentment; seeing the hunger which wee feele in our hearts proceedeth not from the want of earthly abundance; but because it is vnnaturall nourishment for the mind of man, so that it can no more satisfie our soules hunger, than it can satisfie our bodies to feede vpon the wind. And therefore as his folly were ridiculous, who being an hungred should seeke to satisfie his appetite by gaping after the wind; and finding that a lesser gale would not suffice, should run to the wind-mill hill to receiue a greater: so no lesse foolish are those worldly men, who finding their hearts emptie, and tormented with the hunger of greedy concupiscence, doe thinke to stay their appetite by feeding vpon this wind of worldly vanities; and failing of their expectation in a lesser quantitie, thinke to attaine vnto their hope, when they have heaped vp to themselues a greater; for the defect is not in the matter, but in the nature and qualitie of the nourishment, there being no similitude or proportion betweene a spirituall soule, and corporall substances. They doe indeede for the present season to satisfie and asswage the hunger, but afterwards it is enraged with greater greedines: euen as cold drinke doth giue some present cooling and refreshingeo him who is in a fit of a burning Feuer, but soone after the heat returning with greater violence bringeth with it more intolerable thirst. And as the fire is the first casting on of wood or oile, hath for the instant the heat thereof somewhat abated, but presently after having caught hold of the matter, it maketh much more hote than it was before: so worldly men pursuing these earthly vanities, after they haue attained vnto their hopes, haue for the instant some contentment; but within a while the rage of their concupiscence reuiueth and increaseth, tormenting their soules with more vnquenchable thirstinesse than that which they felt before they tasted them. If therefore we would haue such sufficiency of these worldly things as may bring contentment, wee must attaine vnto it by moderating our affections, rather than by multiplying these vanities; if wee would haue this eguish thirst slaked and asswaged, it must not be by larger drinking of these vnsatisfying drinkes, which will but encrease our appetite; but by purging away the feruing choler of worldly concupiscence, which is the true cause of our vnsatiablenes. And if we would haue this deuouring fire of our greedie desires quenched, let vs not foolishly heape vpon it more of that matter whereby it is nourished; but rather cast on it the water of carelesse contempt, whereby this flaming heate will bee soone extinguished. For much more easily shall wee finde contentment, and haue our soules satisfied, by diminishing our desires, and cutting off our greedie concupiscence, than by nourishing them with outward supplies, seeing they are not nourish affections, for then they would delight in necessaries and not in superfluities, but monstrous births, aberrations, and corruptions of nature, which were rather strangled than nourished, insatiable diseases and dropsies of the soule, which torment with fulnesse, and are soonest cured by longest abstinence.

But this insufficiencie in worldly vanities to satisfie that minde and giue contentment, will more clearly appeare, if we would make vse of our owne experience, and set them before vs as examples who haue most abounded with them. For how many doe we daily see aduanced to the highest honours, abounding with riches, and wallowing themselues in all earthly delights, who are as vnsatisfied and farre from contentment, as those who want them? How many shall wee obserue consuming their dayes in melancholick passions, and tumultuous discontent, whom the world hath enriched with his best meanes to make them happy? how many are there who are heauy, sorrowfull, and euer complaining, who if they were asked cannot tell what they want, as though they were pressed downe with the weight of their own felicity, and thought themselues vnhappy, because they haue drunke so deeply of the Worlds happinesse? And this commeth to passe because this Sun-shine of worldly prosperity doth mollifie & effeminate the mind, making it foolishly wanton, and through wantonnesse wayward and peeuish; and through this froward waywardnesse, hardly pleased with all the worlds best fauours, and discontented when the least occurrent crosseth their will, or but the least appearance of euill looketh towards them. Herein like vnto foolish children, who being brought vp vnder seuerer discipline, and continually restrained of their will, doe patiently endure it, though they are denied necessaries, and are much affected and ouer-joyed when they haue a little liberty, or some small fauour vouchsafed them from their Gouernours; whereas if they be cockered by their Parents, and haue in all things their wils and vaine humours satisfied, they grow in a while so wanton, and through wantonnesse so wayward, that nothing will please them, or keepe them from crying & complaining; but are much more froward in their fulnesse, & discontented in the fruition of all that they can desire; than the other in their greatest wants, and when their wils and appetites are most crossed.

9. Sect. 6. That honours bring no contentment to those that haue them.

And thus haue I generally shewed the insufficiencie of worldly vanities, for the bringing of contentment to those that haue them. Let vs now take a more speciall view of it in honours, riches, and bewitching pleasures. And first for honour, how should it satisfie and giue contentment, seeing it is but a name, title, or conceited shadow, which hath its subsistence in the vngrounded opinions and vaine breath of the vnconstant multitude, and like a smoake is carried about with the winde of mouthes? And therefore those that rest vpon it for the sufficing of their ambitious and hungry appetites, haue that slender pitrance of the false Pastors, through Gods just judgement allotted vnto them, in stead of meat feeding vpon the aire; and with Ephraim they gape after the wind which puffeth them vp with vain-glorious pride, but affordeth vnto them no substantiall nourishment: and therefore vnto such the saying of the Prophet Haggai may fitly be applied, ye haue eaten and are not satisfied. In which respect this breath of honour is not vnfitly compared to the smell and odour of the Kitchin, which doth not nourish, or so much satisfie with the sent, as it doth sharpen the appetite by the sight. By reason whereof ambitious men are insatiable in desiring honours (because they are vaine and doe not satisfie) and being not filled with that which they affect, they conceiue no end nor satisfied appetite; still they are climing the Ladder of preferment, and as fast as they themthemselues in the throne of highest honour; but neuer doe they finde contentment in the things they so much desire; for either they catch a fall whilest their hast in climing exceedeth their prouidence and herd; or being come to their desired height, they are not so much satisfied with this superlatiue and transcendent glory, as discontented and displeased, because there is no higher place vnto which their ambition may aspire. It may be when they first gaue way to these proud desires, they propounded vnto themselues some low or meane pitch, which if they could attaine vnto, their deceitfull heart promised them to rest contented; but as the rich Glutton craued but a drop of water to coole his tongue, when as a whole Riuer would not haue quenched his tormenting heate: so at first they desire but small preferment, and (as it were) to set vp but one foot vpon this Ladder, but finding herein little ease, they aspire higher and higher; till at last they haue ascended so high, that they hold it vnsafe to turne themselues, or stand still vpon this tottering Ladder, and thinke there is no securitie till they be come to the top, and haue seated themselues in the Royall Throne. Manifold examples hereof we haue in the Book of God, and in the Histories of all ages. It was not sufficient for Corah and his companions, to haue chiefe places in the Congregation, so long as Moses and Aaron were aboue them. Abimaleth could not induce to gouerne with his Brethren, but he must be sole Monarch, though to accomplish his desire, he must commit them all to the slaughter. It was nothing to Absalon to bee the Kings Sonne, in possibilitie after his fathers decease to weld the Scepter, vnlesse presently he may clime vp into the Throne, though hee could no otherwise ascend, vnlesse he would make his desire fathers dead body his first step. Among the Heathens it is said of Cæsar, that he could indure no superiour, and of Pompey, that he could not abide an equall; and of great Alexander it is recorded, that the world could not satisfie his ambition, and therefore his great Soueraignty and Monarchy could not bring vnto him so much ioy and contentment, vnto refrayne teares, because there were no more worlds to conquer; or as some haue it, because hearing there were many, he had not yet conquered one. And of the most of the great Emperours wee see it manifest, that earthly glory could not satisfie them, vnlesse they also assumed vnto diuine honours, and were reputed among the Gods. Neither is it any marueil if these men could not get out of this intricate and endlesse labyrinth of pride, hauing no better guide than blind nature to lead them; seeing the Apostles, who had heard so many holy and powerfull Sermons of Humilitie, preached by our Sauiour Christ, and confirmed vnto them by his gracious example, were yet notwithstanding so ambitiously affected, that they thought it not preferment enough to haue chiefe places in his glorious Kingdome, but contended which among them should haue priority and chiefe preeminence: whereas the most meane aduancement in that heauenly happinesse, is a much more glorious preferment, than to be a perpetuall Monarch of the whole World. By all which it appeareth, that after wee haue once drunke of this poyson of ambition, our inward burning heate maketh our thirst so vnquenchable, that wee shall sooner burst than rest satisfied. And therefore the Prophet fitly compareth this thirsting after worldly honours, to the thirst of Drunkards, for as their first Cups serue to quench their thirst and satisfie nature, but those which follow, inwardly inflaming them, doe remue and increase their appetite, till at last it grow insatiable: so whereas these men might haue rested satisfied and contented, when their honours and preferments were moderate, now hauing by addition of more matter inflamed their hearts with the fire of ambition, nothing will suffice, but their desires (as the same Prophet speaketh) being inlarged like the gulfe of Hell, and the vnsatiable jawes of death, can no more be satisfied than either of them; neither doe they euer thinke whence they ascended, but onely whither they are purposed to clime; nor euer marke how many they haue out-ranne in this race of honour, but only obserue how many are still before them.

So likewise there is no satietie or content in riches, if once men begin to set their hearts vpon them, for though the couetous man hath in euery ones iudgement far too much, yet in his owne he hath not enough; though in others conceit he seemeth to abound, yet to himselfe he seemeth to want. Well may he fill his chests, but not his mind; and sooner may he by oppression make thousands poor, than make his owne minde rich with content; for couetousnesse may bring riches, but not rest, and empty others, but not fill it selfe, like Pharaohs leane kine which deuoured the fat ones, and yet themselues were in neuer the better liking. Yea, though it were possible for couetous men to empte the Western parts of Gold and Siluer, and the East of Pearles, yet all this would not repleniish their hearts emptinesse: neither can riches euer bring content to the mind, vnlesse it bring it first to them; but the more mans dropsie heart drinketh of this golden stream, the more is is inflamed with vnsatiable thirst. So Salomon telleth vs that there is no end of couetousnesse: for (as he saith) he who is infected therewith, commeth on euermore greedily; so elsewhere, he that loueth siluer shall not be satisfied with siluer, and he that loueth riches shall be without the fruit thereof. An example hereof we haue in Achab, who was not satisfied with the riches of a Kingdome, but greedily coueteth Naboths Vineyard, taking no ioy in all that hee had, because his poore Neighbour had that which pleased him: and in the rich man in the Gospel, who had filled all his barnes, but not his heart, and therefore he resoluеth to inlarge them, that they might bee somewhat proportionable to his minde; a thing foolish, because impossible; for though they had beene neuer so large and full, yet the capacitie of the heart being farre greater, he would still haue found it emptie and vnsatisfied.

It is true indeed, that these worldly riches promise contentment, and the heart of the couetous man deceiuing him, maketh him beleeue, that when he hath filled such a bag, & raised his state to such a proportion, when he is become Master of such an house, and hath purchased such Lands or Lordships, it will then rest satisfied and contented, whereas hauing attained vnto his desires, his greedie appetite groweth faster vpon him than his wealth; and all that he addeth to his estate is but fuell to increase the flame and fury of his concupiscence; for when he hath what he would, he hath not that he now willeth; but the obtaining of one wish is the beginning of another; and when he hath heaped all he can together, it putteth not an end to his concupiscence, but only serueth as a degree or step, whereby it may ascend higher. And this commeth to passe partly because riches are vaine, and therefore fill not; partly because they are not the naturall food of the soule, and therefore cannot satisfie it; and partly in that the desire and appetite of mans heart, hauing passed the naturall bounds of necessitie and vse, becommeth so vnsatiable that nothing may suffice it: for that which is abundant vnto nature, is too little for luxuriousnesse & greedie auarice. And from this vnsatiable desire of still hauing more couetousnes with the Grecians hath it name; for it is called πλεονεξία, because it is the nature of couetousnesse, to make men when they haue that they desired, still to desire more; and when they haue that also, yet to remaine still vnsatisfied. And though they haue more than they can tell how to vse, yet their care and labour in heaping after more is no whit abated, like vnto an hungry stomacke whose appetite exceeding the faculty of concoction, doth desire more than it can digest. In which respect the couetous man is fitly compared to the Sea, Quicksands, which deuoure all they can come by, and yet remaine vnsatisfied; hauing that their insatiablenesse tendeth to the poore of Mankind, whereas the greedinesse of couetous Misers, is to humane societie hurtfull and pernicious; no lesse to the greedie Dogge, who hauing one bit after another cast vnto him by his Master, swalloweth them downe, and as though he had none giuen him, still looketh in his Masters face for more: wherein to say truth they are much worse; for whereas the Dogge casteth his eyes vpon his benefactour, they neuer looke vp towards the author of their good, but like the vnthankfull Hogge their eyes and hearts are inclined towards the earth, and neuer by thankesgiuing vnto God acknowledge him the fountaine of these benefits: or as themselues doe compare themselues; they are like vnto the graue, swallowing downe all whole, like those that goe downe into the pit: or as Salomon compareth them, they are like vnto Hell, which is neuer satisfied. And to this (as one saith) the Gentiles alluded, calling Pluto the Prince of Hell, and the couetous rich man by the same name, not only to note that they are subiects of that Kingdome, but also that the couetous man is an vnsatiable gulph of riches, who the more he swalloweth and deuoureth, the more he burneth in concupiscence. In vain therefore do couetous men toile themselues, whilest they seeke to satisfie their hungrie appetite by multiplying their wealth; for as the Ivie groweth with the Oake, so doth couetousnesse with riches, and as their wealth increaseth, so likewise doe their desires that haue it. Wherein couetousnesse resembleth a River which hath but a small beginning, and a weake course at the head & fountaine from which it first springeth; but receiuing by the way many Brooks which fall into its streame, groweth strong and vnresistable; for so when a man first letteth couetousnesse into his heart, it is but weake and easily checked; but when wealth and riches come vpon him, the streame of his concupiscence groweth so violent, that neither reason, nor religion can withstand it.

Prou. 1. 12.

Prou. 30. 15. Ditem dicunt Gentiles inferorum praesulem, arbitrum mortis. Ditem appellant & diuitem, &c. Ambros. lib. de Nabuth. cap. 6

By which it plainly appeareth, that the more couetous men abound with wealth, the more their pouerty is encreased, for seeing the minde is the true measure of riches, and hee onely is to be accounted rich who hath such sufficiencie and plentie as doth giue contentment; and seeing (as I haue shewed) those who set their hearts vpon riches, haue by their increase their appetite also increased, and the more they abound in wealth, the lesse are their minds filled and sufficed, therefore it must needs follow, that as they increase in externall riches, so like wise their internall pouerty is increased. For the more they haue, the more they desire, the more they desire, the greater is their want, and the more they want, the poorer they are; and consequently the more they haue, the more their pouerty is increased. What they haue not, that they desire; what they desire, or that (at least in some iudgement) they stand in need; how great therefore is the want of these rich Beggars, which need all the wealth that is in the

Q. Sect. 9. That couetous men, the more they abound, the more they want.

Tota mundo regit, cujus non capit mundus cupiditates, Ambros. de Naburh. cap. 12. Chrysost. in Rom. 8. Ser. 13 the World, saving that small pittance which they hold in their owne possession? So that (as one saith) this vice of couetousnesse hath in it such contrarieties, that it is like vnto a Riddle; seeing he that hath most, hath also the greatest want; for as they increase in wealth, they increase in their wishes and desires, and great desires argue great wants. For example, whilest a man is poore he wisheth onely for hundreds, promising vnto himselfe contentment if he could obtaine his desires; hauing attained hundreds, hee now wisheth for thousands, and comming to thousands he affecteth Millions, and thinketh it now a kind of poverty to haue his riches and treasures numerable. So that hee now scorneth his old desires, and contemneth hundreds if they be offered vnto him as a prey; not for that he is satisfied and needeth no more, but because with his wealth his wishes, and with his wishes his wants are increased; and therefore he despiseth these small cups, because hee thirsteth after great Riuers, and no lesse than whole streames of riches can so much as promise him contentment. Now if it be the onely true riches, not to haue much, but to stand in need of nothing, & to abound in all things which a man desireth; then how great is their poverty, who being vnsatisfied, want so much? how farre are they from true riches whilst are so straitned in their mindes, and haue their hearts like a bottomlesse gulfe full of nothing but want and penury?

Diues est non qui multum habet, sed qui nulla egent. Quid est itaque diuitem esse, nisi abundare, &c. Ambros. ad Simplicianum Epist. lib. 1. Epist. 10.

¶. Sect. 10. That couetous rich men are more in want than the poore.

In which respect the condition of couetous rich men is much more miserable than theirs who are of the poorer sort, seeing their wants being measured according to their desires, are much greater; for these need but little, because they desire not much; whereas they stand in need of abundance, because it is no little will giue them contentment. Now was his estate is very miserable who is tormented with an insatiable thirst, though he haue his Cellers full of drinke; and hee much better in his condition, who as he hath little store, so also hee hath little thirst; so much more miserable are those whose minds is insatiable through this disease of couetousnesse, though hee haue abundance, than such an one as hauing little, is not withstanding contented with that hee hath. Take for example, Achab and Naboth, the one hauing a Kingdome, the other some small possessions. But yet hee who had abundance, and therewithall a Kingdome, is not satisfied with all hee possesseth, but greedily coueteth the poore mans Vineyard on the other side Naboth, hauh but little, yet that little is contenteth him; than he desireth none of the Kings abundance. Now which of these was truly rich, hee that seemed to want, because his poore Neighbour had a Vineyard which he thought worth his desiring; or the other that is satisfied with his owne possessions? whether of the two was poorer, he who wanted no more than he enjoyed, but rested content with his owne: or hee who greedily coueted that which belonged to another? Surely this man was much more poorer in his affection, than the other in his estate and possession. Whereby it appeareth that the insatiable rich man, is much worse than those that are of poore estate; yea, surely herein the very beasts are to be preferred before him; for they when hunger inciteth them hunt after their prey, but when their stomacke is sufficiently filled, their appetite also resteth satisfied, desiring no more till againe hunger prouoketh them. But (as we say) the couetous mans eye is far worse than his belly; for when hee hath enough and too much in his possession hee greedily hunteth after more, and is neuer satisfied so long as hee seeth any thing which is to be desired. To this purpose one of the Ancients speaketh fitly. Couetousnesse (saith he) the more it taketh from others and raketh together, the more poore it is in it owne opinion; it enuieth all men, and is vile to it selfe; it is poore, in abundance of riches; and needie in affection, when it is rich in possession. It hath no meane in raking, because it hath no measure of desiring. It so inflameth the mind, and feedeth its soule with its fire, that it seemeth onely in this to differ from lust, that this lusteth after beautifull persons, and that the heauy earth. It troubleth the Elements ploweth vp the Sea, diggeth the earth, and with variety of wishes wearieth the Heauens, being thankfull neither for faire weather nor for foule; it repiningly extenuateth the yeerely profits, and findeth fault with the fruits of the earth.

Seeing therefore couetousnesse is insatiable; let vs not seeke for sufficiencie and contentment in earthly abundance, imagining that the more we increase in riches, the sooner we shall rest satisfied: for when our desires exceed measure, we cannot attaine vnto contentment by adding to our wealth, but by detracting from our concupiscence; not by increasing our riches, and filling our chests with siluer and gold, but by diminishing our greedy appetite, and emptying our hearts of insatiable couetousnesse. For as well may a man fill a Sieue with water, or a bottomlesse Purse with money, as a couetous heart with sufficiencie of riches. And therefore as his folly were ridiculous, who should endeauour to fill a leaking or bottomlesse vessell in a Ditch or Pond, and not being able so doe it, should carry it to a full River, or the maine Sea; because the reason why it cannot be filled, is not in the quantity of the water, but in the quality of the vessell, for if he would stop the leakes, he might as easily fill it in a standing poole, as in the great Ocean: so the folly of couetous worldlings is no lesse absurd, who when they cannot satisfie their greedy hearts with competent store of riches, couet after more, thinking to giue them contentment when they can wallow in the abundance of their wealth: but all in vaine; for the fault is not in the too little quantity of their riches, but in the vnsatiable greedinesse of their minds, which can neuer be satisfied, And therefore they should not seeke contentment by filling their empty hearts in an Ocean of wealth, but rather by stopping those leakes which are made by couetousnesse, and so would small store of wealth better satisfie them, than the great reuenues of a rich Kingdome. For he is not contented who hath enough, but hee hath enough who is contented, seeing when hee cannot fit his state to his minde, hee fitteth his mind to his estate, & so is satisfied with a little, because he desireth not much. Now as he is truly rich which hath as much as he wanteth or desireth; so he only is to be esteemed poor which wanteth that which he hath not; for if not hauing wealth he neither wanteth nor desireth it, he is rich in his mind, though he be poore in possessions: neither is he to be esteemed poor, whose mind agreeth with his state, but he who though he haue abundance is not satisfied: seeing pouerty consisteth rather in the penury of the mind, than in the absence of riches, and not in hauing little, but in not hauing that which is enough.

Another reason why the heart is not satisfied with these worldly things, is, because they who are possessed of them, cannot find in their hearts to vse them; and though they haue abundance of earthly treasures, yet are they so charmed with these Idols, vpon which they haue set their hearts, that they dare not touch them, or any way conuert them to their benefit: resembling herein the Indian Ants, which (as it is said of them) taking great paines in gathering Gold, doe neuer vse it, but only hide it, so that others can haue no benefit by it: or him who being spent with sicknes, hath his Table furnished with all manner of dainties, but wanteth a stomacke to feed vpon them: wherein greedie auarice hath one folly peculiar vnto it selfe, aboue all other kinds of concupiscence. For whereas other vicious affections moone men to long after their objects for fruition, as the Glutton after dainty meats, that hee may feede vpon them: the Drunkard after pleasant Wines, that hee may drinke them; the ambitious man after preferments, that he may enjoy them; neither doth loue in any other thing make a man abstaine from the vse and fruition of the thing loued; only couetousnesse maketh a man fall into this folly, letting his money lie by him without vse of it (vnlesse it be such a vse as whereby it selfe is increased) and abstaineth to feed on these dainty meates, which aboue all other his soule loueth, because hee hath an ouer great appetite vnto them; as if a man would not therefore put on his clothes, because hee is cold; or drinke, because he is athirst: whereof it commeth to passe that he hath no more contentment by his wealth, nor vse of any thing which hee possesseth for the satisfying of his greedy appetite, than a thirstie man hath of the drinke, which still remayneth vndrawne in the vessell, for the quenching of his thirst.

Now howsoeuer such men may haue all manner of abundance, yet it cannot at all satisfie them, and therefore though they haue full bags and rich chests, yet seeing they haue empty soules and poore hearts, they are falsly tearmed rich; for as the Prophet speaketh, A Niggard shall no more be called liberall, nor the Churle rich: seeing true riches consisteth not in the possession of much, vnles also fruition bee joyned with it, which being wanting, their leather bags, and iron-barred Chests might bee said to bee rich as well as they, if only custody could intitle to the name of rich. Neither can these earthly treasures, Gold, Siluer, and such like, be truly called riches; for (as one saith) wee vnjustly call them riches, which doe not take away pouerty: but euery one that doteth on these things, is by so much increased in the pouerty of concupiscence, by how much these treasures which hee so much affecteth are increased: and how can they bee truely called riches, whose increase increaseth their pouertie that possesse them? And the more they abound, the more heate of concupiscence they bring to their louers, and the lesse satietie? Howsoeuer therefore these Misers abound with store of true Gold and Siluer; yet they are but false riches; seeing they only stretch and inlarge the jawes of greedie auarice, but doe not fill or satisfie them, and rather inflame than quench the heate of couetousnesse. Well therefore was the speech of the Heathen man fitted to the rich Miser: All (saith he) account thee rich, but I affirme that thou art very poore, because not the possession, but the vse justly intitleth riches. If thou art partaker of thy wealth, it doth by the vse become thine own; but if thou reserue thy riches for thine heires, presently from that time they are made other mens. To which purpose another saith, Thou hast indeed the riches of a rich man, but the minde of a Begger; thou art rich to thine heires, and poore to thy selfe.

Yea, in truth these rich Misers are of all others most miserably poore; for whereas all other men want many things, these want all; seeing they want as well that they haue, as that they haue not: for whatsoeuer others haue they want, because they haue it not in possession, and they want also that which themselues possesse, because they haue it not in vse. In which respect they are worse than any Begger; for whereas but some things are wanting to these, all, both which they haue, and haue not, is wanting vnto them. Neither is there in truth any pouertie alike wretched to this wilfull penury of rich Misers, for they thirst in the middest of the waters, and haue empty bellies, when their garners and store-houses are full of Corne: they are cold and haue not the heart to prouide them garments, or hauing them to weare them: they are hungry, and yet dare not for feare of impairing their estate, feed vpon that food which is good and wholesome; so that they wilfully take vpon them that punishment which the poore suffer through necessitie: for these fast when they want meate, they when they haue it; the poore haue not money to vse, the Miser hath it, but will neither vse it himselfe, nor suffer others. They digge Gold out of the veines of the earth, and hide it therein againe; and if but an egge be set before them, they complaine of losse, because a Chicken is killed. In which respect the Miser may not vnfitly bee compared to the Mineral out of which these rich metals are digged; for that keepeth Gold as well as he; that hauing Gold hideth it in the secret veines of the earth, and hath no further vse of it, and so doth he: but herein they differ, that whereas the Mines freely communicate their wealth to those that seeke and labour for it, the couetous man so hideth and gardeth it, that neither himselfe nor others can receiue any profit by it.

Ambros. de Nabuth. cap. 4.

2. Sect. 15. The miserable condition of rich Misers.

Wherein what doe they else shew, but that of all men they are most miserable, foolish, and void of goodnesse? For what greater misery can there be, than to sit vp in water to the chin, and yet die of thirst? To haue all good things in possession, and nothing in fruition and vse? To sell their good wine vnto other men, and themselues to drink sowre vineger, lees and dregs? To goe with an empty belly, that they may the sooner fill their Chests; not that themselues may enjoy that which they haue gathered, but that they may leaue it to their Heires, who will wastefully spend that which they haue wickedly gotten; and consume vpon superfluities, that which they haue spared from necessaries, and (as it were) haue borrowed from their owne bellies. Wherein what are they, but like, such miserable Cookes, who dressing all curious dainties for other men, whereon they will riot and surfet; and yet themselues being pinched with hunger, either cannot or dare not so much as licke their owne fingers? For though these Misers bee hungry, yet they haue no power to take a good meales meate of their owne allowance; only (as one obserueth) they haue good stomacks at another mans Table, when as greedily they stretch out with ouer-much fulnesse, their straitned and empty bowels, that it may serue for a double meale, and ease them of so much charge; though hereby they are distempered with crudities, and the day following, beare the punishment of the former dayes miserable gluttony. Againe, what can bee more miserable, than for a man to toile and labour for his whole life, and to haue no power to enjoy any fruit of his labours? to beare like an Asse a golden burthen all the day, and without any further vse of it, at night to haue it taken away, reseruing nothing to himselfe but a galled conscience? to haue goods, and no good by them? to keepe that money which they haue gotten by painfull labour, with toiling care locking it vp, as if it were a strangers, and (as if it were theft) not daring to touch it, for the benefit of themselues, their children, or friends. As though they had no other end of keeping it, but that others might haue no benefit by it: and yet wretches that they are, they call these possessions their goods, and by sole vertue of this jaylorship, they lay claime to the Title of goodnesse, as though they deserued to bee called good men, because they haue goods in possession, notwithstanding that they doe not at all vse them, for the good either of themselues, or any others: but much more right haue they vnto that Title of Misers, which is justly allotted vnto them, seeing of all other men they are the most miserable. And as they doe by their wretched courses bewray their misery, so also their extreame folly: for whereas wise men propound vnto themselues some end of their labours, which is better than the pains it selfe; they either haue no end at all of all their toyle, or at least such as is sottish and ridiculous; for the end of their gathering riches is to gather them, and therefore gathering for no end but for it selfe, they can make no end of gathering. As though the sole end of their comming into the world were like Harbingers and Purueiours to prouide lodgings and good fare for others, and so to depart without tasting of it: or to play the Bailiffes, who haue nothing to doe, but onely to gather the rents of large reuenues, that others may haue them to spend and enjoy. And this foolish vanity the wise man in his time obserued. There is one alone (saith hee) and there is not a second, which hath neither sonne nor brother, yet is there no end of all his trauell, neither can his eye be satisfied with riches. Neither doth he thinke; for whom doe I trauell, and defraud my soule of pleasure? This also is vanity, and this is an euill trauell. Or if they haue any ends of their care and labour, they are foolish and absurd; for either out of a distrustfull care of Gods prouidence they trust to their owne, scraping abundance together, lest in time to come they might be brought to want and misery; or else because

at their death they would bee accounted rich men who haue left behind them such large possessions. Now what can bee more foolish and ridiculous, than to liue in want for feare of want? to bee presently poore, vpon a bare doubt of pouerty for the time to come? as though a man should hang himselfe for feare of death; or goe naked for feare of wanting clothes? The which folly is more absurd, in that many being inured to these miserly courses in their meane estates, doe hold on and continue in them, when as their wealth is encreased to such abundance, that they could not if they should liue to old age, see any end of it, though in a large proportion they should spend vpon the stocke. Neither is their other end lesse foolish of leauing a great estate behind them. For what can be more absurd for a man to liue poore, to die rich; to take nothing himselfe, that he may leaue all to his heires? and to affect hereby a name, when as being remembred onely for his follie and miserie, he doth by continuing his fame, continue his infamie and reproch?

Finally, as these misers are wretched and full of folly; so are they emptie of all goodnesse, seeing they are neither good to others, nor to themselues; others haue no good by them, seeing they are ready rather to scrape from them by oppression and deceit, than to communicate to their necessities. For whereas they vsually alledge, that they therefore gather, that they may prouide for their posterity, or that they may doe good deeds at their death; it is manifestly false, both because those that haue no children, or neere friends, are as wretchedly couetous as they who haue most; and also because if they gathered riches to communicate them to the good of others, they would (seeing charity beginneth at home) impart them to their owne vse and benefit: if it were simplie their desire by their wealth to doe good after their death, they would also bee ready in some measure to imploy it to these vses in their time of life: if loue of their posterity made them so greedily to heape vp riches, this loue would moue them to impart some share vnto them, when as they might still keepe it in their owne possession. But experience teacheth vs, that these rich misers pinch euen their dearest children of their necessarie allowance which belongeth to their backes and bellies, and which is worst of all, will not afford vnto them good education, because it requireth cost: whereby is manifestly apparent, that the loue of nothing but of their money, and that for its owne sake, without respect of further vse, is the true cause of all their greedy scraping. And to say truth, how can he bee good to others who is naught to himselfe? how can he be a louer of others friend, who is his owne mortall enemie? But the couetous miser (as euen the heathen man could discerne with the eye of nature) though hee bee good to none, yet he is worst of all to himselfe; for hee robbeth his owne soule of necessaries, that he may leaue behind him superfluities; and like an vnnaturall theefe, hee defraudeth himselfe of those rich blessings which God in his bountie hath imparted vnto him. He fareth hardly, and goeth basely, and in all respects maketh vnto himselfe a more short allowance, for all his great care and labour, than any master (vnlesse he were as wretched as he) would afford vnto him. In which respect one concludeth that the miser is not onely a theefe, but also a selfe-murtherer, seeing hee will not allow vnto himselfe necessaries to preserue life. What (saith hee) is a couetous man? a murtherer of himselfe. What is couetousnesse? a liuing poore for feare of pouerty. Wherein the miser doth only this worke of iustice in all his carriage, that he doth not cast away his wealth vpon his vnworthy selfe, but reserueth it safe and vntouched, for those who better deserue to enjoy and spend it. Rightly therefore is this miserableneſse called a wormewood sinne, which bringeth its punishment in the very committing, sauing that it is neither sweete nor wholsome, but a delightfull vexation, a rich beggerie, a superfluous penurie and affected want, which turneth Gods blessings into cursings; his gifts into clogs, and maketh all his benefits heauie burthens. And this commeth to passe by the just judgement of God punishing their immoderate loue of these earthly things; that though they should haue abundance in possession, yet they should haue nothing in fruition, much in keeping and nothing in vse, because he so straineth their hearts and restraineth their liberty, that like the prince in the booke of the Kings they only behold this great plenty with their eyes, but haue not the power to taste of it. And this judgement the wise man obserueth. There is an euill (saith he) which I saw vnder the sunne, and it is much among men. A man to whom God hath giuen riches, and pleasures and honour, and and hee wanteth nothing for his soule of all that is desireth; but God giueth him not power to eate thereof, but a strange man shall eate it vp: this is a vanitie, and an euill sickenesse yea (as hee saith in the verse following) much worse than vntimely birth.

Eccles. 6. 2, 3.

And thus haue I shewed that there is no contentment in worldly riches, both because they are vaine and cannot satisfie, and also because our hearts are vnsatiable, and our auarice so strong and tyrannous that we neither can nor will bee satisfied by them. Now in the last place wee are to examine pleasures, to see whether wee can in them find any satietie or contentment: where-vpon triall wee shall find, that they are as vaine and insufficient for his purpose as either of the other. For like sweete drinkes, they serue not to abate and quench, but to encrease the voluptuous mans thirst; making him after the enjoying of one pleasure, to hunger after another; and after he hath enioyed thousands, to bee as farre from contentment, as when first hee began to couet them; because being vaine they vanish in the fruition, and slip away whilest they are betweene our hands; like a shadow, leauing nothing behind them but an emptie mind and hungrie desire after new varietie. Yea rather the more wee enioy them, the further wee are from contentation; seeing euery delight is vnto vs as a tast of sweetnes, which doth not satisfie but sharpen our licorous appetites & howsoeuer like the water in the smiths forge, they seeme for the present to quench and allay our heate, yet soone after, the flame of our concupiscence increaseth, and burneth much more hotly. So that howsoeuer before wee tasted of these bewitching delights, we were masters of our owne affections, and could moderate our desires: yet after we haue beene allured to enter into pleasur's maze, we find not our comming out so easie as our going in; and when wee haue beene inticed to drinke of these golden, but yet intoxicating cups, wee are presently made drunke with delight; and drunkennesse increasing thirst, maketh vs in the end to grow insatiable. And this emptines and insatiety doth make vs often both to change, and also to reiterate the same pleasures; that they which cannot at once satisfie, may by our continuall feeding on them, at least keepe vs from famishing. For example, what doth dainty meates bring with them, but a vaine delight, which presently vanisheth, either by renued hunger, which againe desireth them, or through their surcharging the stomacke, vpon which follow crude humors and ill digestion, which causeth vs to loath them? So, how vaine is the pleasure of the most delicate drinks, which delight no longer than they are swallowing downe, and do not fully satisfie, but only for the present allay our thirsty appetite? The like may be said of odoriferous smels, which delight then onely whilest they are at the nose; of pleasing sights, which no longer please than they are in the eye; of sweet musicke, which vanisheth and leaueth nothing behind, when the consort ceaseth; of merrie company, and pleasing sports and pastimes, whose delight lasteth no longer, than their present fruition; and in a word, of all other pleasures that the world affordeth, which filling vs full of nothing, but vaine emptinesse, doe make vs like the thirsty grounds to open the mouth, gaping after the pleasing showres of new delights. And of this Salomon himselfe had experience, who though he surfetted of pleasure, yet he was not filled, and when hee had suffered his heart to glut it selfe with variety of delights, yet he remained altogether vnsatisfied, onely in the end by much vse became to loathing satietie, and was vexed in his minde, because he had spent so much good time in the fruition of these base vanities. Eccles. 1.

9. Sect. 17. That worldly pleasures satisfie not, nor giue contentment.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the miserable effects which accompanie the insufficiencie of worldly things, as discontent in all estates, loathing satietie, and an endlesse desire of changing.

FRom which insufficiencie of these worldly things proceed diuers effects, which bring much trouble and disquietnes to the life of man. The first is, that because no man is satisfied with the things hee possesseth, therefore none are contented with their owne state and condition, but seeing onely their owne wants, and not other mens, and by a foolish and selfe-deceiuing sophistrie, comparing themselues with others, not in those things wherein they match or exceed them; but setting the beautie of other mens state, against the blemishes of their owne; their commodities against their owne discommodities, and matching their fulnesse, with that wherein they are most wanting and defectiue; at last they grow to this conclusion, that no man is so miserable as they; the which in truth is not so, or therefore only so, because they thinke so: whereas if in comparing themselues with others, they would obserue due proportion, fitting their owne benefits, with the benefits of others, their owne defects with their wants, and their discommodities and euills, with those which others sustaine; they would be comforted, either because, all things considered, their owne estate is better than other mens; or else because in their miseries, they haue all the world to beare them company. But this discontentednesse, the vsuall companion of insatiety, will better appeare, if we descend to some particulars, and take a briefe view of the seuerall states and conditions of men. And first for men of honourable quality, because honour in selfe is vaine and doth not satisfie them, they are neuer contented with their owne estate, but finding in themselues an hungring emptinesse, and pinching want, and not knowing that it is the disease of their mind, but rather imagining that it is some defect in their outward condition, they grow into dislike of it, and aspire to some higher preferment, thinking that height and happinesse, aduancement and content will come together. Thus the man of meane qualitie thinketh his baſenes an heauie burthen, and aſpireth vnto the reputation of a gentleman, ſuppoſing that there is much more contentment in gentilitie than in yeomanrie; but when hee hath attained vnto it, not finding in his new eſtate, that for which he looked, he reſteth not here, but goeth on in his endleſſe iorney of ambition, and affecteth nobilitie; and being enobled he is neuer the nearer vnto content, becauſe he doth not looke vnto thoſe whom he hath out-gone, but vnto thoſe who are yet aboue him; and therefore is not ſo much contented becauſe hee excelleth the moſt, as he is tormented to ſee any preferred before him. And this maketh him not to ſtay heere, but now hee affecteth Soueraigntie, imagining it a goodly thing to rule, and that there is great contentment in this ſupreme authoritie, vnto which all ſtoope, it ſelfe ſtooping to none; but before the crowne bee well ſetled to his head, he finds that it doth not giue his headach of ambition any eaſe, but onely tormenteth him with the heauie waight, and therefore being not yet ſatisfied, he affects Monarchies; and hauing no higher place vnto which he may clime on earth, he aſpires vnto diuine honours, vſurping both the titles and worſhip which is peculiar vnto God. And thus doe ambitious men tire themſelues in ſeeking content where it is not to bee found, and torment themſelues when they find it not: and hauing placed their happineſſe in honour, they aſpire vnto one preferment after another, thinking when they miſſe of it, that it is onely wanting in that degree vnto which they haue attained, and not in honour it ſelfe.

The like diſcontent is to be found among thoſe who affect riches; for being altogether vnſatisfied with their preſent poſſeſſions, they grow into diſlike of their eſtate, thinking others more happy, becauſe they are more rich; and therefore hauing outſtripped one richer than themſelues, they labour to ouertake another, and hauing alſo out-runne him, they propound vnto themſelues a third; imagining that there is none in worſe eſtate, whileſt there is any better; none poorer, whileſt there is any richer; and that they haue outgone none, ſo long as they ſee any goe before them; as though other mens abundance were their want, and ſo much were detracted from their eſtate, as they ſee others doe exceed them. And thus alſo thoſe who place all their felicitie in wordly pleaſures, are vtterly diſcontented with their ſtate and condition, when they find that thoſe they haue doe not ſatisfie them, becauſe that others goe beyond them in varietie of delights; taking no pleaſure, but rather fretting and enuying, when they ſee their idoll thoſe propitious to others, then themſelues, though they alſo haue in the ſame kind a large meaſure of fauour imparted vnto them. And thus the glutton abounding with good fare, thinketh that he feedeth but groſſly, when hee ſeeth more daintie cates at another mans table: thus the drunkard loatheth his beſt wines, when he meeteth with better in another mans cellar: thus hee who delighteth in muſicke contemneth his owne conſort, as though there were nothing in it but iarring diſcord, when he heareth more melodious harmonie. And in a word, thus all ſorts of voluptuous men diſtaſte their ſeuerall delights, when either being glutted with them, they find ſatietie without ſatisfying; or ſee that others haue any priuiledge and preeminence more than they, in reſpect of the qualitie or varietie of their pleaſure.

9. Sect. 3. That all men in all ages and in all eſtates, are full of diſcontent.

Neither are only theſe worldly things, honours, riches, and pleaſures, accompanied with diſcontent, but all other things in the world bring the ſame diſlike to euery condition and eſtate: and to begin with the beginning of our life; wee ſee that the child is wearie of his childhood, becauſe he feareth the rod, and by ſeuerer diſcipline is reſtrained from his deſired delights; wiſhing that hee were come to ſuch an age as might exempt from theſe feares, and procure his liberty. Being come to youth he runneth himſelfe out of breath, vnder the conduct of his vnbridled paſſions, till at laſt panting for wearines, he deſireth that hee were come to ripe age, when as hee might reſt from theſe vaine courſes, and ſettle himſelfe in ſome profitable calling, vnto which when hee hath attained he is not content, but thinking old age honourable, deſireth that hee might haue a ſhare in that reuerence and reſpect which is due vnto it, in the meane time neuer thinking of the manifold infirmities, griefes and diſcontentments which it bringeth with it. Of which when hee taſteth, they are ſo burthenſome vnto him, that hauing now no other age to change withall, he deſireth to be vnburthened of them euen by death it ſelfe. They like diſcontent is to be obſerued in all other eſtates and conditions: hee that leadeth a ſingle life is wearie of his ſolitarineſſe, and thinketh there is no comfort equall to that ſweet ſocietie of man and wife; being maried, hee waxeth wearie of his yoke, either becauſe hee hath made an ill and vnequall choice, or becauſe hee is impatient of the cares and troubles incident to this eſtate, and now wiſheth againe that hee were at libertie. He that hath no children taketh no pleaſure in his poſſeſſions, becauſe hee wanteth an heire to ſucceede him, and little playfellowes to beare him companie: he that hath children is not contented, either becauſe they are vnruly, or ouer burthenſome, imagining that if he had leſſe companie, hee

should haue better store, and liue in greater plentie; and yet if he be taken at his word he is ready to repent, and to thinke that there is no greater losse, than when by hauing his companie lessened, he saueth of his former charges. The seruant thinketh his life a bondage, and wisheth meanes of liberty that hee might liue at his owne command; and when he is come to be a master, he is discontented much more, in gouerning and prouiding for his family. The people dislike their subjection, and grieuously complaine of their heauie burthens, tributes, taxes, customes and impostes; supposing that all worldly contentment resteth in soueraignty; the prince is no lesse wearie of his toile in ruling, of his troubles, dangers, and continuall care, hauing not only himselfe and priuate familie to looke to, but the whole people and common-wealth which shrowdeth it selfe vnder the wings of his prouidence. He that leadeth a priuate life, though he liketh of his ease, yet he is discontented, because hee wanteth respect, and is not crouched vnto by suters, hauing no authority either to helpe or hurt them: they who are aduanced to publike place commend retiredneſſe, complaining that they are so wholly taken vp with other mens businesses, that they are constrained to neglect their owne; and whilest they labour for forraine intelligence, become ignorant of that which is done in their owne familie. The poore labouring-man is not contented with his condition, seeing after hee hath toiled all the day, and commeth wearie home, hee there findeth but course fare and hard lodging; enuying the rich man his easie life, full tables, and downe-bedding. The rich also, though shame keepeth him from complaining, disliketh of his estate, wishing that hee had lesse wealth so he had better health, and more labour so he had more strength; and could find in his heart to change fare with the poore man, so hee might also change stomackes; and to lie as hard, if also he could sleepe so soundly, and take such quiet rest. The countrie man seeing the plentie and brauerie of citizens, groweth in dislike with his home-spun suit, and houshold prouision, and wisheth rather that he lacked his farme, than that by staying him at home, he should bee thus debarred of citie preferments. The citizens thinke themselues ill seated by reason of bad aires, and dangerous sicknesses that raigne among them, and like better of the countrie mans life, as being more healthy than theirs; and of his estate, as being more certaine, and in lesse danger of ruine and alteration. And finally, in the Citie the artificer is wearie of his great paines and small gettings, and wisheth that hee could change estates with the merchant, who haue more pleasure and greater abundance. The merchant running many dangerous courses, by reason of boysterous tempests, spoyling pirats, and barbarous nations, thinketh them happy that sit quietly, though but poorely, by their owne fire; and if by any casualty their state bee impouerished, they wish that they had beene brought vp in some handy trade, and preferre a mechanicall art aboue a great stocke, and skill in merchandise, seeing that may bee lost, and so this grow vnprofitable, whereas the other neuer faileth, but as a lease for life, bringeth in continuall maintenance. In a word, there is no man that is contented with his estate, but thinketh euery mans better than his owne, not because it is so, but because hee is neerer acquainted with the miseries of his owne condition, and so is better able to declame against them, than with those that are incident vnto other men, euen as contrariwise they extoll in their iudgements any benefits injoyed by others farre aboue their owne, and are ready to admire with rauishing wonder that in anothers possession, which they would thinke scarce worth the owning, if it were in their owne custodie.

Now this commeth to passe, partly because wee are much more sensible in feeling our owne miseries, and partly because by experience wee find the insufficiencie and vanity of those worldly things which our selues enioy, and are apt to thinke others benefits of a better quality. Whereas in truth whatsoeuer is in the world is vaine and sufficeth not; and euery condition hath good and euill, miseries and benefits, in such just proportion tempered the one with the other, that if a man knew all, he could hardly tell which to chuse: and in that this man is contented with his estate, and another is not: the true cause of this difference is not in the outward condition, but in the heart and minde. For all estates bring with them causes enow of discontentment, but one beareth them with wisedome and patience, and in thus bearing lesseneth them; whereas another by impatiencie aggrauateth his burthen, which in it selfe is not so heauie, and by strugling and striuing to shake it off, findeth no ease, but galleth his mind with griefe and sorrow. And as we see those who are of a strong constitution contentedly endure all weathers, whereas he who is weake and vnsound complaineth in winter of cold, & in the summer of heate: so those whose minds are healthy, constant, and strong in patience, are prepared for all estates and conditions; whereas he who is infirme through impatiencie, and subject to the ague fits of passion, with equall discontent afflicteth himselfe with the cold winter of aduersitie, and the hoate summer of a prosperous estate, and both these come to passe passe, not because the one feeleth no waight, but because hee hath strength to beare it; or that the other hath an heauier burthen, but because by reason of his weakenesse, a light loade is sufficient to presse him downe. As therefore the foot fashioneth the shooe, and not the shooe the foote; for a crooked foote, maketh the shooe also crooked; but contrariwise, a straight shooe will not make straight a clubbed and crooked foot: so the state is fashioned by the mind, and not the mind by the state; for if it be quiet and contented, then all outward things bring contentment to it; whereas if it bee impatient, wayward and peeuish, euery feather seemeth an heauie burthen, all kind of occurrents vex and displease; and that which would be anothers paradise and delight, is vnto them an hell and grieuous torment. And hereof it is that men are discontented and complaine, not for the same causes onely, but also for those which are diuers, yea quite contrarie one to another. As for example, one complaineth of his poore and base estate, which maketh him neglected and contemned of all; another that his honours and authority are too burthensome, and that he is sued vnto by too many. One is vexed because he hath too many children; another because hee hath none at all: this man crieth out of his multitude of businesse, and his neighbour is as much troubled, because he is not troubled; and liuing at too much ease, wanteth imployment. One is tormented with iealousie, because hauing a beautifull wife shee is loued of all; another with satiety and loathing, because she is deformed, & affected by no body. And this commeth to passe partly because these worldly things are vaine, and cannot satisfie those that haue them; and partly by reason of the weakenesse and infirmity of mens minds, who bring no more contentment to their estate, than it bringeth to them; but make all things they enioy, which in themselues are vaine and scarce worth the keeping, to become vnto them troublesome burthens, which bring cumber in carying, and ease when they are shaken off. For as the weake and sickly stomacke is made more sicke, and surfetteth with a small quantitie of wholesome food, turning the best meate into noysome humours, whereas that which is strong and healthy is well refreshed, with a great meale of the courcest fare, and conuerteth it to profitable nourishment: so a weak & froward mind is surcharged euen with the delicates of a prosperous estate; whereas an heart which is indued with constancie and patience, is contented, and can well digest the meanest condition, and groweth daily in better liking, whilest it is fed with the bread of affliction, and water of sorrow.

N. this doctrine auoucheth not the opinion.

A. Sell. of the cause why worldlings are so full of discontent.

A second effect of the vanitie and insufficiencie of worldly things is, that in stead of satisfying they bring with them loathing satietie; for howsoeuer whilest men are in pursuit of these vanities, they thinke them of such excellency, that they would account it a great part of their happinesse, if they might enioy them; yet hauing obtained their desire, they are straight glutted with their companie, and now looke vpon that with loathing contempt, which, before they had it, they beheld with rauishing delight. And this commeth to passe, either because they afterwards see things more desireable, and worthy their loue, in the possession of other men; or because they haue these things in excessiue measure, which maketh that which is most sweet to become loathsome; or because their appetite which was sharpned with want, labour in seeking, and difficultie in obtaining, is dulled and taken away by their assiduitie, and easie inioying, without any competitour to sharpen their loue: or finally, because whilest they were in the pursuite of these vanities, they were deceiued with a false conceit of their worth and excellencie; and this opinion is afterwards confuted by their owne experience, which manifesteth their worthlesse baseneſse, and insufficiencie to satisfie and bring contentment. In which respect these worldly vanities are fitly compared to the apples of Sodome, which allure the eye & sharpen the appetite, but if any touch, or set his teeth in them, they fill his mouth with dust, or vanish into smoak; and those which dote vpon them are like vnto those who hauing sicke & weak stomackes, doe long for many things when they heare them but named, and when they are procured with cost, and prepared with labour, they begin to loath them, as soone as they see them, and to waxe sicke as though they had surfetted, before they haue scarce tasted of them. Or like vnto fond louers whose affection being sharpened with competition, and difficulty of obtaining, doe make idols of their mistresses, and admire them as though they were free from all fault and blemish, and full of diuine excellencies: but afterwards inioying them for their wiues, thinke them scarce good enough to be their vnder fellowes, there being now in their conceit many more excellent, and freer from imperfections. And thus the ambitious man groweth out of liking with his obtained honour, which before he had it, was rauished with delight, when he did but thinke of it with some weake and vncertaine hope of inioying it, either because hee seeth another (which selfe-loue maketh him beleeue is of lesse desert) better preferred, or because growing ordinarie and common by possession, it becomes stale and triuiall; or finally, because being vaine, it doth not satisfie and giue contentment, but rather rather sharpeneth the appetite, & inflameth the desire to aspire to an higher place; and a greater honour being but entertained by desire, and nourished with the least hope, maketh the lesser to bee contemned as base and worthlesse. Thus also the couetous man loatheth his owne possessions as good cheape and of small value, and desireth another mans, as being most pretious and worthy esteeme; and those things which he highly prised before he had them, being come into his owne keeping are thought scarce worth the hauing. Thus he taketh little joy in his goodly house and rich furniture, when his eyes haue beene a little glutted with their sight, though whilest they were in purchasing, he thought to find in them a great part of his happinesse: thus his pleasant gardens and orchards bring no more delight than the wilde woods, though with great labour and cost he purposely trimmed them, that they might bee vnto him his paradise and place of joy: and thus he pulleth downe his old barnes, when he thinketh of building bigger, and in his large housholdships thinketh himselfe straitned, as though he were in a prison, when he beholdeth others greater territories. Finally, thus the voluptuous man is straight glutted with the fruition of those pleasures, which before he much desired, the glutton loathing those meats which erewhile he longed after, and being cloyed with those drinkes, which when he was at another mans table, seemed most delicious. Thus he who delights in vaine shewes, sports and pastimes, taketh a monthes paines in preparation, and spares for no cost to make them most delightfull; and though both these set an edge on his appetite, yet he is often wearie of it before it be done, though it bee but of some few houres continuance, and not finding that joy and contentment which hee expected, wisheth that it were past. By which the great vanitie of worldly things, and miserie of worldly men plainly appeareth; for what can be more vaine than they, whose expectation was better than their fruition, and whose worth ceaseth when they are inioyed? what can be more void of excellencie, than that which is only precious when it is absent, and loseth all its value when it commeth to vse, experience spoiling it of all that worth which a false opinion had inriched it with. And consequently, what can be more miserable than a worldly man, who spendeth his whole life in the desire and pursuit of things future, and in loathing things present, and who [illegible] his hopes vpon such vanities which are more abhorrable in their vses, than in their hauing, and being obteined with [illegible] labour, when they [illegible] of all, become con-[illegible]

In which respect it were much better for him to spend his whole life in seeking, than to obtaine that which he could find in his heart to cast away againe, but that he would not seeme to haue lost all his labour; much better were he to be still suing, than euer to injoy, because in the pursuit he is delighted, and (as it were) fatted with his owne opinion; whereas fruition maketh him more leane and comfortlesse than he was before, because experience teacheth him that he hath spent all his sweate in hunting after a feather, and tired himselfe in seeking a vanitie, which being obtained bringeth no pleasure or contentment; and in stead of satisfying causeth loathing satietie.

Thirdly and lastly, from this insufficiencie of worldly things to satisfie and bring contentment, proceedeth an endlesse desire and affectation of change: for though these earthly vanities satisfie not, yet they bring with them cloying satietie, the which being accompanied with loathsome contempt, enforceth the minde which naturally affecteth happinesse, and full contentment (though it be ignorant of the meanes whereby it may be attained) to fixe the desires vpon new objects, to see if it can find that in them, which was wanting in the other, wherein finding as little contentment as before, they leaue also them and affect new, till hauing runne ouer all which they thinke worth the desiring, and hauing tried all things which the world calleth excellent (if at lest they can with all their care and labour attaine vnto them) at length (like those who affect new fashions and strange attires) when they haue tired their inuention, and know not what more to desire, they are faine to take vp the old againe which before they loathed, and after their glutted appetite is a little sharpned with absence and discontinuance, they place vpon it afresh their soone wearied delight, till their renued loathing moueth them vnto a new change. And thus worldly men (like the horse in the mill) tire themselues in trauelling this endlesse circle, ending where they began, and being at the night of death as farre from the iorney end of their desires, as when they began their dayes trauaile: and not hauing fixed their hearts, and grounded their hopes vpon that neuer failing foundation, God all-sufficient and the eternall ioyes of his kingdome, they haue nothing solid and substantiall to rest vpon, but like a feather in the aire they are tossed to and fro with euery winde, seeking rest but finding none. And hauing long tired themselues in vaine, after manifold trials and new conclusions, finding no contentment, at last they resolue to place all their delight in often change, and that which they cannot find in the substance or sufficiencie of worldly things, they looke for in continuall variety; for there is nothing pleasing vnto them which varietie and change refresheth not. Likewise those lying in bed, and not sleeping or taking rest, who being wearied with waking, doe spend the whole night in tumbling and tossing from one side to another, seeking for ease in their often change, which they cannot finde by quiet lying on either side. And as those who are sicke of a burning Feuer when they cannot satisfie their insatiable thirst, doe often change their drinke, one while longing after that which is tart & sharpe, and another while after that which is coole and smell, now affecting that which not long since in their health well pleased them in their Neighbours House, as though it would now also bring the same delight; and soone not finding their thirst quenched by change of drinkes, desire wine or water but all in vaine; for hauing tried all, they complaine that they are all to bitter, that they do not quench their thirst: whereas in truth it is the bitternes of their mouth distasted with choler, the cause of their disease, and not the fault of their drinke, and not because it is vnfit to quench their thirst, but because their burning heate still renning and augmenting it, maketh it vnquenchable: So wee being diseased with the burning heat of concupiscence, thirst after worldly vanities, thinking by them to haue our heat abated; and after wee haue made triall of many, and yet find our thirst nothing quenched, wee long after endlesse variety, neuer calling to minde that it proceedeth from our inward disease, and not from the want of outward things. A notable example whereof we haue in Salomon, who labouring to find contentment in worldly things, & not finding it in any one of them, giueth his heart liberty to run ouer all, making triall of one thing after another, till in the end he was tired with all. Hee sought for it in mirth, and findeth in stead of it madnesse in pleasure, and discouereth nothing but vanity: Then he shifteth from one thing to another, and looketh for it in great workes and stately buildings; where missing of it, hee goeth to seeke it in fruitfull Vineyards, in delightfull Gardens and Orchards, in Fountaines, Springs and pleasant Groues; where not finding it, hee proceedeth in the search, and looketh for it in the multitude of Siluer, Gold, and Princely Treasures; then in delightfull Musick, then in many seruants and great attendance; vnto which we may adde (that which shame made him conceale, but not forget) the embraces of Wiues and Concubines: but hauing tried all these and many other, with [illegible] nothing from his eyes which they desired, nor [illegible] his heart from any [illegible] in all this variety, as [illegible] of all his labour, [illegible] vanity and vexation of spirit.

But this will better appeare, if we doe but a little consider of the speciall instances. For thus the ambitious man affecting Honour, and not being satisfied with that which hee hath attained vnto, is presently glutted with it, labouring after new variety, one while seeking vaine glory, another while preferments; now the fauour of his Prince, and soone after the applause of the common people. Or if he settle his affection vpon any one of these, hee seeketh to refresh his glutted minde with varietie in the degree, climing one step after another, till hee commeth to the highest; where being seated, hee is now further off from contentment than at the beginning, because hee cannot change for the better, nor delight his vnsatisfied minde with wonted varietie. Thus also the couetous man being vnsatisfied with his riches affecteth change, shifting his wearied appetite from one thing to another, till all become tedious and troublesome. For finding no contentment in his old Mannours he desireth new Lordships, being not pleased with one House, hee buildeth another; and not contented with that, hee erecteth a third much more stately; and being maister of many, he findeth contentment in none, which is the cause of his oft shifting from one to another with great cost and labour; but all in vaine is his removing, seeing he still carrieth his disease about him; and therefore is no more eased, than hee who being sicke of an ague, doth often change his bed. And as being weary of his House hee affecteth often change; so also is he no better pleased with his Houshold stuffe, Furniture, Plate and Apparell; and therefore being glutted with the sight of the same thing, herein also hee makes variety the last refuge of his delight. And the like may be said of their Gold, Siluer and Treasures; of which though they be neuer weary in themselues, as being the Idols vpon which they haue fixed their hearts, yet are they discontented with their share and portion, and therefore still affect greater quantities, till they haue more than they can tell how to vse. Beyond all, the voluptuous man finding no contentment in his delights, affecteth variety of pleasures, being most affected with that which hee most seldome doth enjoy, and glutted with those which are in ordinary vse. For they put wine together sod on the same dish with an vnbecoming satiety, and therefore ransack both Sea and Land, Aire and all that belong vnto him, in seeking out variety of meats. And neither not affecting change enough to continue his insatiable [illegible] he [illegible] stayed appetite [illegible] of [illegible] thing many things together, [illegible] disposition [illegible] variety of sauces to [illegible] [illegible] to his [illegible] rather ſharpeneth the appetite, & inflameth the deſire to aſpire to an higher place; and a greater honour being but entertained by deſire, and nouriſhed with the leaſt hope, maketh the leſſer to bee contemned as baſe and worthleſſe. Thus alſo the couetous man loatheth his owne poſſeſſions as good cheape and of ſmall value, and deſireth another mans, as being moſt pretious and worthy eſteeme; and thoſe things which he highly priſed before he had them, being come into his owne keeping are thought ſcarce worth the hauing. Thus he taketh little joy in his goodly houſe and rich furniture, when his eyes haue beene a little glutted with their ſight, though whileſt they were in purchaſing, he thought to find in them a great part of his happineſſe: thus his pleaſant gardens and orchards bring no more delight than the wilde woods, though with great labour and coſt he purpoſely trimmed them, that they might bee vnto him his paradiſe and place of ioy: and thus he pulleth downe his old barnes, when he thinketh of building bigger, and in his large lordſhips thinketh himſelfe ſtraitned, as though he were in a priſon, when he beholdeth others greater territories. Finally, thus the voluptuous man is ſtraight glutted with the fruition of thoſe pleaſures, which before he much deſired, the glutton loathing thoſe meats which erewhile he longed after, and being cloyed with thoſe drinkes, which when he was at another mans table, ſeemed moſt delicious. Thus he who delights in vaine ſhewes, ſports and paſtimes, taketh a monthes paines in preparation, and ſpares for no coſt to make them moſt delightfull; and though both theſe ſet an edge on his appetite, yet he is often wearie of it before it be done, though it bee but of ſome few houres continuance, and not finding that ioy and contentment which hee expected, wiſheth that it were paſt. By which the great vanitie of worldly things, and miſerie of worldly men plainly appeareth; for what can be more vaine than they, whoſe expectation was better than their fruition, and whoſe worth ceaſeth when they are inioyed? what can be more void of excellencie, than that which is only precious when it is abſent, and loſeth all its value when it commeth to vſe, experience ſpoiling it of all that worth which a falſe opinion had inriched it with. And conſequently, what can be more miſerable than a worldly man, who ſpendeth his whole life in the deſire and purſuit of things future, and in loathing things preſent, and who ſetteth his heart vpon ſuch vanities which are more eſteemable in their want, than in their inioying, and being obtained with great care, paines and labour, when they ſhould bee the reward of all, become contemptible trifles, if not troubleſom burthens.

In which reſpect it were much better for him to ſpend his whole life in ſeeking, than to obtaine that which he could find in his heart to caſt away againe, but that he would not ſeeme to haue loſt all his labour; much better were he to be ſtill ſuing, than euer to injoy, becauſe in the purſuit he is delighted, and (as it were) fatted with his owne opinion; whereas fruition maketh him more leane and comfortleſſe than he was before, becauſe experience teacheth him that he hath ſpent all his ſweate in hunting after a feather, and tired himſelfe in ſeeking a vanitie, which being obtained bringeth no pleaſure or contentment; and in ſtead of ſatisfying cauſeth loathing ſatietie.

Thirdly and laſtly, from this inſufficiencie of worldly things to ſatisfie and bring contentment, proceedeth an endleſſe deſire and affectation of change: for though theſe earthly vanities ſatisfie not, yet they bring with them cloying ſatietie, the which being accompanied with loathſome contempt, enforceth the minde which naturally affecteth happineſſe, and full contentment (though it be ignorant of the meanes whereby it may be attained) to fixe the deſires vpon new objects, to ſee if it can find that in them, which was wanting in the other, wherein finding as little contentment as before, they leaue alſo them and affect new, till hauing runne ouer all which they thinke worth the deſiring, and hauing tried all things which the world calleth excellent (if at leſt they can with all their care and labour attaine vnto them) at length (like thoſe who affect new faſhions and ſtrange attires) when they haue tired their inuention, and know not what more to deſire, they are faine to take vp the old againe which before they loathed, and after their glutted appetite is a little ſharpned with abſence and diſcontinuance, they place vpon it afreſh their ſoone wearied delight, till their renued loathing moueth them vnto a new change. And thus worldly men (like the horſe in the mill) tire themſelues in trauelling this endleſſe circle, ending where they began, and being at the night of death as farre from the iorney end of their deſires, as when they began their dayes trauaile: and not hauing fixed their hearts, and grounded their hopes vpon that neuer failing foundation, God all-ſufficient and the eternall ioyes of his kingdome, they haue nothing ſolid and ſubſtantiall to reſt vpon, but like a feather in the aire they are toſſed to and fro with euery winde, ſeeking reſt but finding none, And hauing long tired themſelues in vaine, after manifold trials and new concluſions, finding no contentment, at laſt they reſolue to place all their delight in often change; and that which they cannot find in the ſubſtance or ſufficiencie of worldly things,

He may not twice together feed on the same dish without loathing satiety, and therefore traueth both Sea and Land, himselfe and all that belong vnto him, in seeking out variety of meats. And nature not affording change enough to continue his instable delight, hee refresheth his cloyed appetite by the helpe of art, compounding many things together, because being single they cannot please, & adding as great variety of sawces to meats, to giue contentment to his curious palate. to spend all this cost and labour in attaining vnto that delight, which hunger alone without their helpe would much more plentifully bring vnto him. And thus also they find no delight in their sweetest Musicke, if still they should heare the same Songs, and not haue continuall change of harmonie; nor in beholding the same shewes & sights, though at the first neuer so pleasing and delightfull; nor in their games, sports and pastimes, but often change from one to another, sometime affecting Chamber delights, and sometime more manly sports in the open fields; and neuer delighting long in any, because all are vaine, but affecting continuall variety, because the best of them not satisfying, within a while bringeth satiety and loathing.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the excellencie of true contentment, and the meanes whereby we may attaine vnto it.

1. Sect. 1. That contentment is to be sought, not in the world, but in Gods spirituall graces.

And thus haue I shewed that worldly things cannot satisfie the minde of man, or bring vnto him true contentment; as also the euill and troublesome effects, which proceed from this insufficiency in them, and infatiety of the minde. Which as it should make vs to contemne these earthly vanities, as being not able to bring any tranquillitie or sound comfort; so should it moue vs to seeke for this contentment, without which the life of man is miserable, not in these outward things which afford it not; but inwardly in our owne minds, by purging and purifying them from worldly concupiscence, and by fixing our hearts and affections vpon Gods spirituall graces and heauenly ioyes, the one whereof we may haue in possession, and the other in hope; without which all worldly things cannot satisfie; with which though wee bee abandoned of all earthly vanities, wee may haue tranquillity of mind, and true contentment. For first if we haue the Spirit of God, and his sanctifying graces dwelling in vs, we shall be filled and satisfied: for as our Sauiour Christ himselfe hath promised, Whosoeuer drinketh of this spirituall water which he shall giue him, shall neuer be more athirst, for it shall be to him as a well of water springing vpto euerlasting life. And he that beleeueth in him, out of his belly shall flow riuers of the water of life. And if we would know what this Well and Riuer of the waters of life is, which thus filleth and satisfieth vs, the Apostle telleth vs in the next words, that it is the Spirit of God which hee giueth to all that beleeue in Christ. So the Psalmist pronounceth him blessed whom God chuseth, and causeth to come vnto him, because he shal dwel in his courts, & be satisfied with the pleasures of his house, euen of his holy Temple. And the Apostle maketh this the end of knowing the loue of Christ which passeth all knowledge, that wee may be filled with all the fulnesse of God. For if once we haue the Spirit of God, a liuely faith, sincere loue, assured hope, and the rest of his sanctifying graces dwelling in vs, then are we thereby perswaded of the remission of our sinnes, our reconciliation with God, our adoption, whereby we become not onely sonnes, but also heires of all his promises, then are wee assured of his fatherly prouidence still watching ouer vs, which turneth all things by the wise and mighty working thereof to our good, especially to the furthering of our eternall saluation. And this maketh vs to resigne our selues wholly ouer to be gouerned by his will, as knowing much better than our selues what is fit for vs; and to be not onely contented, but also to rejoyce, not in the state of prosperity alone, but euen in our affliction and tribulation, as the Apostle speaketh. An example wherof we haue in himselfe, who had attained vnto such a measure of this spirituall contentation, that it was able to beare him out, in all outward estates and conditions. I haue learned (saith he) in whatsoeuer state I am to be content, and I can be abased, and I can abound; euery where in all things I am instructed, both to be full and to be hungrie, and to abound, and to haue want: I am able to do all things through the helpe of Christ that strengtheneth me. And if wee haue this spirituall contentment in our hearts, then the Lord will not let vs want this contentment, which the Apostle had in respect of outward things: for so he saith, that if his people would haue hearkened vnto his voice, and walked in his wayes, then would he haue fed them with the fat of wheate, and with hony out of the rocke would he haue sufficed them. And the Wiseman telleth vs, that it is the blessing of God onely that maketh rich, and also giueth with riches comfort and contentation: the blessing of the Lord (saith hee) maketh rich, and he doth adde no sorrowes with it. Which blessing they alone haue sure interest in who are indued with Gods grace and holy Spirit: for well may those who are ruled with carnal concupiscence be rich in their outward estate, but they can neuer be rich in their mind with inward content; for the wicked (as the the Prophet saith) are like the raging Sea that cannot rest, whose waters cast vp mire and dirt; and the voice of God hath plainly said it, that there is no peace vnto them. But as for those in whose heart the peace of Gods holy Spirit dwelleth, they haue these outward things with content, or content without them; the Lord supplying their externall defects with a sufficient measure of patience, comfort and tranquillitie of minde, and and liuing godlines: he also maketh vs content with that wee haue, whether it bee much of little, something or nothing.

The which in ward contentation of mind, grounding it selfe vpon Gods prouidence and promises, is in it owne nature most excellent, and being compared is much to be preferred before any contentment, which the confluence of all worldly benefits can bring vnto vs; for notwithstanding all these we may (as hath beene shewed) be inwardly poore; in the middest of all our outward abundance; but this spirituall contentment alone maketh rich: for as the Apostle saith, Godlinesse is great riches with contentation; and why so? because (as before he told vs) it is profitable for all things; hauing the promises of this life, and the life to come: So that contentment which is grounded vpon outward things, is momentany and of short continuance, lasting no longer than they last; for take away riches, pleasures, and preferments, which are the causes of this contentment, and the contentment it selfe must needs faile: whereas this inward spirituall contentment is alwayes durable and most constant, seeing it wholly resteth vpon Gods loue, holy will, and gracious prouidence, and therefore cannot faile, or be taken away by any worldly accident, because it is not grounded vpon any worldly thing: and though all outward props should be pulled away, yet would it stand vpright, because it resteth vpon none of them. Finally, worldly content is vaine and imperfect, not fully satisfying the heart of man; but that which is spirituall is full in its degree, though not without infirmities, and doth satisfie vs, not only for a fit, but euen for euer. For as the Prophet speaketh, The Lord shall guide vs continually, and satisfie our soules in droughts, and make fat our bones; and wee shall be like a watered Garden, and like a spring of water whose waters faile not. In which respect this spirituall contentment is much more excellent, than any which can bee found in worldly things; euen as it is much better to haue enough, than to haue much; for he that hath much, if he want this spirituall contentment, still coueteth more in his greatest abundance, and he that coueteth, still wanteth; but he who resting on God is inwardly content hath enough, because hee desireth no more, and though his state bee small, yet it putteth an end to his concupiscence, which all worldly things cannot doe. For though we haue too much, yet if wee be not moderated with content, we thinke wee haue not enough; and though we haue much more than we desired, yet our concupiscence increasing with our comings in, wee are readie to desire more. Now as that which is enough, how meane a pittance soeuer it be, is not to bee esteemed little, so that is not to be esteemed much, how great soeuer, which is not enough.

But the excellencie of this spirituall contentment may hereby further appeare, in that whosoeuer hath it, hath a medicine for all miseries: for it is that which easeth the burthen of all afflictions, and maketh them light and easie: it turneth our pouertie into the greatest riches, supplying all outward wants with inward comforts; and euen whilest wee are Owners of nothing, it maketh vs Lords of all things; whilest wee seeme poore, it causeth vs that wee be not poore indeed, but only in appearance, seeing thereby we haue a secret riches that the world doth not take notice of, which giueth vs enough; and inableth vs to helpe others. For so the Apostle saith of himselfe, and of other of the faithfull, that they were not simply poore, but as it were poore, making many rich; as hauing nothing, & yet possessing all things: and of such the Wiseman speaketh; There is (saith he) that maketh himselfe rich and hath nothing, and that maketh himselfe poore, hauing great riches. Now this way of inriching a man selfe in the middest of pouerty is by contentation, as hee afterwards expoundeth it: The righteous (saith he) eateth to the contentation of his mind, but the belly of the wicked shall want. The reason hereof is, because a contented mind borroweth whatsoeuer it wanteth, of it selfe; for hauing little it desireth no more, desiring nothing, it wanteth nothing, and he that wanteth nothing, is of all others most rich. Againe, if wee be sicke, this content is our best Physician, which both mitigates our paine, and giues vs strength also to beare it; without which euery one is intolerably sicke in the time of health. Finally, if wee bee oppressed with cares, this content will free vs from them, by causing vs to cast them vpon the Lord, vpon whom we wholy rest, being assured of his power to helpe vs, and of his will also, by his gracious promises. So the Psalmist saith, Cast thy burthen vpon the Lord, and he shall helpe thee: and the Apostle Peter willeth vs to cast all our care on God, for he careth for vs: Whereas he that wanteth this spirituall contentment in God, is continually tormented with carking care in the middest of all his abundance; for his wealth, though neuer so plentifull, is vnto him as a great standing poole which though it haue store of water in it, is subject to drying vp: whereas the contented mans estate, though neuer so smal, is exempted from that feare; seeing it is as a liuing spring, issuing out from God the fountaine of all goodnesse, which though it bee little in quantitie, yet can neuer be quiteery, because it hath a continuall supply whereby it is fed. No marueil therefore if hee who is richest, is still turmoyled with carking care, seeing resting vpon his owne prouison hee hath good cause to feare, lest by some great drought of affliction, he may haue his owne ponds of prouision dried vp. Now what doth he but continually want, who is in continuall feare of wanting? In a word, this inward contentment maketh vs rich without riches, whole without health, warme without clothes, and merry in our greatest causes of heauinesse.

9. Sect. 4. That contentment is to bee sought, not in outward things, but in the heart and minde.

On the otherside, though wee should haue all things, and want this contentment, it were as good as nothing, seeing this contrariwise turneth peace into trouble, riches into pouerty, liberty into seruitude, health into sicknesse; yea, were sufficient to make a Hell of Heauen, if it were admitted into it, there being no happinesse where it inhabiteth, no want of any misery to those that haue it. For he is vnhappy, who doth not thinke himselfe happy; he is not rich, who thinketh himselfe poore, and therefore desireth more, although he possesse abundance, because his vnsatiable mind swalloweth vp his wealth; hee is not Honorable, though he were Monarch of the whole World, who thinking himselfe base & contemptible, is discontented in his greatest aduancement. And therfore seeing this contentation is such a precious jewel, that with it no estate, without it all estates are miserable: let vs labour to attaine vnto it, and not seeke contentment in outward things, but in our owne minds, for all the world and worldly things cannot bring it to our hearts, vnles we first bring contentment vnto them. For as our clothes cannot giue warmth to our bodies, vnles our bodies first giue it vnto them: wherof it is that a dead carcase which hath lost its natural heat, cannot haue it restored, though all the clothes in the world were laid vpon it: so neither can worldly things heat the Heart with comfort and contentment, vnlesse this spiritual warmth be first from the mind conueighed vnto them, and wher ethis vitall heat is quite wanting, it is not the Monarchy of the whole world that wil reuiue it. Let vs not therefore seek for contentment abroad, seeing wee may haue it so neere home, not in earthly things, but in our owne hearts, seeing the whole World can neither giue nor yet take it from vs, which when we haue, misery it selfe cannot make vs miserable. Wee may haue (if we will) sufficient in our owne store; and why then should wee depend vpon others, and liue by borrowing, whereby wee are brought into a wilfull seruitude? our own may suffice vs, if our mind suffice it selfe: and wee may abound in all plenty, if wee be not causes of our owne pouerty. For let vs but inrich our minds with content, and we may well scorne the Worlds riches; seeing the smallest pittance will be sufficient; & enough (as we say) is as good as a feast. Wee see that sound and healthy bodies, though they feed on the coursest fare, are strong, fat and in good liking; whereas those that are diseased, are leane and feeble, though they sit at full Tables, and feed only vpon the daintiest food: and therefore no man desireth sicknes, that hee may still feed on delicacies, but would rather content himselfe with the simplest Commons, so he might haue health to beare him company: so when our minds are in health, hauing in them that vitall heat of comfort and content in God, we are so strong and vigorous, that in the meanest condition wee are repleniſhed with joy, and though men should take all wee haue from vs, yet whether they will or no, they must leaue our chiefe treasure, content, behind them. But if wee be sicke of worldly concupiscence, nothing will either please or ease vs; and all our delicates will be but lothsome, if they be not serued in with contentation. Satan could take away Iobs goods but not his comfort, Iob 1.21. because his content was not in His outward estate, but in his heart, and hauing no commission to ransacke that, he could not ouercome him in the spirituall fight, seeing though all his riches were gone, his heart supplied wealth enough to maintaine the warre. And though hauing stripped him of all, he should haue had leaue to haue brought him out to execution, yet his chiefe comforter content, would haue accompanied him euen vnto death, seeing it was grounded vpon Iob 13.16. his affiance and hope in God, which death it selfe could not take from him. So though the Amalekites did spoile Dauid at once both of his wiues and wealth, yet his contentment was not taken from him, when all outward things failed, because it was not placed in them but in his heart, and in his God; and therefore when for lesse losses his company were so inraged through impatiency, that they were ready to stone him (like fooles and mad men striking those who are next vnto them) yet affliction being added to affliction, it is said that Dauid comforted himselfe in the Lord his God. But contrariwise wee see Ahab so weakened with his disease of couetousnesse, that hee surfeiteth with the very sight of Naboths Vineyard; and wanting inward content, a whole Kingdome could not satisfie him, nor raise or ease his dejected mind, which but an opinion of want had ouerthrowne.

Would wee therefore haue such contentment as is vnapproachable in the assault of any misery, and (as it were) out of the gunshot of any danger? Let vs seat it chiefly in Heauen vnder the protection of Gods prouidence, and so much of it as remaineth with vs, let vs place it in the castle of our hearts, which as long as life lasteth none can surprize and spoile; and not in outward things which easily are stolne away and it with them. For example, would we haue sufficiencie of Honours and worldly glory? why then we must not with that great Enemy of the Romane Monarchie, thinke of conquering one Nation after another, that so satisfying fying our ambition, we may in the end find rest, and spend the remainder of our dayes in pleasure and delights: for Honours are vain, and doe not satisfie, and the minde is large, and naturally vnsatiable; and therefore here can be no fulnesse and content, for sooner may there want Kingdomes to ouercome, than a heart to couet them, as wee see in the example of the Grecian Monarch. But this sufficiency must be looked for in the minde and heart, not by satisfying, but by moderating & ouer-ruling them, and not by fitting our estate to our desires; (for they being endlesse, there would be no end of aspiring) but our desires to our estate, being content with that degree of Honour which God by lawfull meanes doth call vs vnto; counting it our chiefe Honour to contemne those Honours, which on ill and vnlawfull conditions are offered vnto vs; and that wee are then truly great, when as we can despise wicked greatnesse.

For seeing the excellency both of Honours themselues, and of their degree and quantity, consisteth chiefly in mens mindes and opinions, and not in any absolute goodnesse that is in themselues; therefore he hath enough of them indeed, who hath enough in his owne opinion; and though hee bee but meanly aduanced, yet if his estate giue contentment to his mind, or rather his minde to it, hee standeth not in need of more preferments, because hee hath as much as hee desireth. Whereas if the concupiscence bee not ouer-ruled with reason and religion, the more Honours we haue, the more ambition also; and consequently the lesse content. For seeing all desiring and aspiring commeth from opinion of want, and he that euer wanteth can neuer be satisfied; therefore it mattereth not how great our preferments are in themselues, if we thinke them little vnto vs; seeing he who thinketh he hath too little, still affecteth more, and can neuer be content till his owne heart telleth him, that hee hath enough. If therefore we would haue contentment in Honours, we must not labour to attaine vnto it by multiplying of preferments, but by moderating our ambion, setting before vs the example of the Prophet Dauid, who being by God himselfe anointed King, did not ambitiously aspire to take possession of the Royall Throne, by cutting off Saul, though he were rejected by God, but waited till the Lord himselfe did make him a way, by giuing vnto him lawful means. And when hee was highest in his estate hee was not haughty in his heart, but was as humble as a weaned child, whilest he wielded the Scepter, and held in his hand soueraigne power, whereby hauing his minde farre vnder his condition, though through his sonnes ambition he lost his Kingdome, yet not his content, but was willing to accept of any estate which the Lord would assigne vnto him. Here am I (saith he) let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes. 2. Sam. 15. 26. And this was that lesson which our Sauiour taught his Disciples, when as they ambitiously stroue one with another who should be greatest; not to satisfie their ambition by supplanting one another, or attaining vnto preferments, but to subdue their pride, and moderate their concupiscence, becomming as meeke and humble as those little children which hee set before them. Mat. 18. 3, 4.

Q. Sect. 6. If we would haue contentment in riches, wee must lay aside couetousnesse.

And thus also must we looke for sufficiency of riches, not in our outward estate, but in our mind; not by adding to our wealth, but by diminishing our concupiscence: for though the World may thinke it a strange paradoxe, yet it is an vndoubted Trueth, that a man is made truly rich, not by multiplication, but by substraction; not by increasing his riches, but by abating his immoderate desires. For seeing the riches of the whole World are finite, and the minde of man in some sort infinite and vnsatiable; therefore there can be no fulnesse or sufficiency by fitting riches to our minds, which is impossible; but by limiting and circumscribing our desires and concupiscence, making them so little, as that they may be satisfied, seeing the other can neuer be so great, as to fill and satisfie them in their full largenesse. And if wee thus confine our vnlimited desires with true content, we shall attaine vnto greater and better riches, than the whole World can yeeld, for that may giue vs much, but not enough, and where there is not enough there is want, and hee that wanteth is still poore, seeing penury and pouerty goe together; but content bringeth sufficiency to the meanest estate, and he that hath sufficiency wanteth nothing, and hee who wanteth nothing is aboue all others truly rich. And thus the Apostle preseribeth a way how a Christian may be rich, and neuer need to seeke helpe from the earthly Mammon: Godlinesse (saith he) is great riches, with contentation. 1. Tim. 6. 6. So that a man may be rich without riches, when godlinesse and contentation doe meet together. And to the same purpose one of the Ancients well defineth riches: Those (saith he) are true and neuer wasting riches, to desire that onely which is necessary for vse, and well to dispose of those things which are thus to be vsed: for as an ill man said well, If we liue according to nature, we shall neuer be poore, if according to opinion, wee shall neuer bee rich; nature desiring but a little, and opinion being insatiable. Hee therefore who is indued with Gods spirituall graces, godlinesse, and contentation, is truly rich, though his outward estate, be neuer so meane, and of him that may be truly said, which the Spirit speaketh to the Angell of the Church of Smyrna;

Chrysost. in Gen. 16. Hom. 37.

Apoc. 3.18. Solum illum Deus diuitem nouit, qui sit diues æternitati, &c. Ambros. ad Simplic. Epist. lib. 3. Epist. 10.

na; I know thy pouerty, but thou art rich. For he onely is rich in Gods estimate, who is rich vnto eternity, laying vp in store the fruits, not of earthly abundance but of vertue: he which hath such peace and tranquillity of mind, that he desireth nothing, not is tossed with the waues of concupiscence, neither loathing his old store, nor seeking new, by perpetuall desiring, making himselfe poore in abundance of wealth. The onely way therfore to attaine sufficiency of riches, is to haue in all estates a contented mind; for thus we may be rich in the middest of pouerty, seeing he is rich who hath enough, and he hath enough whose estate agreeth with his mind; neither is hee poore who hath little, but he who not being sufficed desireth more. Whereas if we want this contentment, though we haue neuer so great store of wealth, yet we remaine poore; neither can it by satisfying our minds make vs happy, but onely change our misery, making vs now want in plenty, who before wanted through penury. And this commeth to passe because our minds continuing sick and diseased with discontent, which ariseth from their insatiety, doe make riches as troublesome, and more burthensome vnto vs than our pouerty. For as he who is sick of the Dropsie is alike tormented with vnsatiable thirst, whether hee drinke in siluer Plate, or in earthen Pots; and hee who is sicke of a Feuer is alike ill at ease, when he lyeth in a Bed of Iuory, and when he lyeth in a Bed of Wood; because where-soeuer he doth lie his disease followeth him: so if our minds be sicke of couetousnesse, it mattereth not whether we haue much or little, seeing these outward things cannot cure the inward diseases of the mind; nor whether we be poore or wealthy, seeing our concupiscence still accompanieth vs.

Non qui parum habet, sed qui plus cupit pauper est, Senec.

9. Sect. 7. That contentment in pleasure is had, not by multiplying them, but by restraining our appetites.

Finally, if wee would haue sufficiency of pleasure, it is not to bee found in outward things, which only satiate and neuer satisfie, but in the inward contentation of the minde, which wee may easily attaine vnto, if wee change our carnall delights into spirituall rejoycing in God, in the fruition of his spirituall graces, and in our assurance of his heauenly joyes. For this wil make our hearts so inwardly cheerefull, that wee shall take pleasure in all outward things, not onely such as the world delighteth in, but also in those which are tedious and troublesome vnto them: for this inward pleasure will turne our labours into recreations, and our sorrowes into joy, making vs to be merry and rejoyce, not onely in worldly prosperity, but also in tribulation, as the Apostle teacheth vs, both by his a doctrine and b example: and this is that joy, which, as our Sauiour Christ saith, is c full, and therefore satisfieth vs, and permanent, and therefore can neuer be taken from vs. But if besides this spirituall joy, we would be satisfied with worldly pleasures, wee must not looke for this sufficiency in outward things, but in our minds, not by multiplying our delights, but by restraining our appetites. For otherwise well may we be glutted, but neuer contented with worldly pleasures, like the arch-Epicure himselfe, who confessed that loathing costly delicates, he contented himselfe to feed on bread and water, not because he was weary of his dainty cates, so much as of the discommodities which he felt when he had surfeited on them. And thus the diuine Heathen bridled his voluptuous concupiscence, by accustoming it to want that which it most desired, when as being athirst, he would often draw water out of his Well, and powre it out againe without drinking, vntill hee had so mastered himselfe, that hee could quench his thirst with a moderate and wel-ruled appetite: and if wee would thus limit our desires, and curbe in our vnsatiable voluptuousnesse, if we would liue to nature, and not to lust, and be ruled by reason, and not opinion, then would a few pleasures satisfie vs, and being satisfied wee should want nothing.

Epicurus ... Stobæus ... Serm. 17.

Plato apud Stobæum ... Serm. 17.

And thus haue I shewed that the only meanes of attaining vnto sufficiency of outward things, is by inward contentment. Now it remayneth that I also shew how this contentation may be obtained, or else the difficulty were but onely changed, and not removed; as if the Physician should tell vs that such a potion would cure vs, but neuer teach vs how to make it, or where to haue it. The first and principall meanes of attaining vnto contentation, is wholly to resigne our selues ouer to the good will and pleasure of God, submitting our wils vnto his will, and saying with our Sauiour Christ, not my will, but thine be done: the which howsoeuer it be an hard lesson to flesh and bloud, yet may we easily learne it, if we know, and knowing beleeue, first, that the Lord vpon whom we wholly rely is infinite in wisdome, and therefore knoweth much better what is good and profitable for vs, especially for the eternall saluing of our soules, than we our selues. For if the child taketh no care for himselfe, but resteth contented with that prouision and allowance which his louing Father allotteth to him, because hee knoweth that his fathers discretion exceedeth his; and if being sick, we be content to receiue vpon the Physicians word, not only those things which we affect, but euen bitter Pils and vnpleasing Potions, which we loath and abhorre, because we know, his skill exceeding ours, he is much better able to direct vs for the recouery of our health: then how much rather should wee lay aside care, and rely vpon the allowance of our heauenly Father? How much rather should wee trust this spirituall Phy-a Rom. 5.3. b Acts 16.25. 2. Cor. 7.4. c John 15.11.

Phyſition, whoſe skill and faithfulneſſe neuer failed? Wee in our fooliſh appetite deſire worldly honours, but he in his wiſedome denieth them, becauſe hee knoweth they are but windy meats, which would not nourish our ſoules, but puffe vs vp with pride. Wee affect worldly riches, but hee withholdeth them, becauſe hee well ſeeth they would be a meanes to make vs poore in grace, and as vnfit to enter into the ſtraite and low gate of Heauen, as the Camell into the needles eye. We dote vpon carnall pleaſures, but he withholdeth them from vs, becauſe hee knoweth that our licorous and greedy appetites would eaſily ſurfet of them, and ſo loſe our ſpiritual health and ſtrength, if not our bodily alſo: & therefore why ſhould we not bee contented to want theſe things, which if they would not bring more hurt than good, more loſſe than profit, our heauenly Father, and moſt cunning Phyſition would neuer haue denied them vnto vs. And this argument our Sauiour Chriſt vſeth to remoue carking care, and worke contentation, becauſe our heauenly Father knoweth better than our ſelues of what wee ſtand in need. Secondly, let vs conſider, that as he beſt knoweth what is fit for vs, ſo hee is omnipotent, and therefore moſt able to ſupplie it; and as hee can giue riches without contentment, ſo alſo is hee alike able to giue content without riches; for it is he himſelfe rather than his gifts, that doth ſatiate the deſirous ſoule, and replenisheth the ſorrowfull ſoule with ioy, as the Prophet ſpeaketh. And theſe two things knowne and remembred, may make vs reſt with content vpon his abilitie to doe vs good; for if hee knoweth what is beſt for vs, and hath power alſo to giue it, who can doubt of his ſufficiencie? But though hee be God all-ſufficient, and therefore able to prouide for vs, yet how may wee reſt aſſured that he will doe it? Surely this is no leſſe certaine than the other; firſt, becauſe his loue towards vs is infinite, as being our gracious Father in Chriſt, who hath loued vs ſo dearely, that he hath giuen vnto vs & for vs, his onely beloued Sonne, and that to ſuffer for vs death, euen that bitter and ſhamefull death of the croſſe, that he might worke the worke of our redemption; and thus he loued vs, not when wee were friends and children, but ſtrangers and enemies. From whence wee may conclude with the Apoſtle, that hee who hath giuen vnto vs his Sonne, when wee were in the ſtate of enmity, cannot poſſibly deny any thing which is good for vs to receiue, ſeeing wee are now reconciled and become his friends. Secondly, his will is manifeſted by his manifold and gracious promiſes, whereby hee hath vndertaken to miniſter vnto vs all things that are good, ſo the Pſalmiſt ſaith, that if wee feare the Lord, there is nothing that is good ſhall be wanting vnto vs; and that the Lord our God is our ſunne and ſhield, who giueth grace and glory, and withholdeth no good thing from them that walke vprightly. Our Sauiour likewiſe hath promiſed vs, that if wee firſt ſeeke the kingdome of God and his righteouſneſſe, all outward things alſo ſhall be miniſtred vnto vs. And the Apoſtle telleth vs that wee ought to be content with thoſe things which wee haue, becauſe the Lord hath promiſed that he will not faile vs, neither forſake vs. If he had promiſed his gifts and not himſelfe, there might be cauſe of diſcontent, when they are wanting; as for example, if he had promiſed only honours, riches, and pleaſures of the world, and ſaid that theſe would neuer faile, wee ſhould haue had little comfort or content in our diſgrace, pouerty and bitter griefes, becauſe all theſe things haue left vs; but when hee promiſeth vs himſelfe, that hee will neuer forſake vs, we can neuer haue juſt cauſe of diſcontent; becauſe what is wanting in our outward eſtate, he is ready to ſupply by his inward graces, and able to make our little ſufficient, as well as plentie, and euen our nothing as good as all things.

Matth. 6 33.

Hebr. 13. 5.

Seeing then our God in whom we truſt, is ſo infinit in wiſdome and power, ſo infinit alſo in his loue towards vs, and no leſſe gracious in his promiſes, than true in performance, as being truth it ſelfe, who cannot deceiue, and his words, Yea and Amen: what foule ſhame were it for vs who profeſſe Chriſtianitie, and by often inſtruction haue attained to the knowledge of theſe principles; not to rely our ſelues wholly vpon him with full content, ſubmitting our wills vnto his will, and liking of that which beſt pleaſeth him, ſeeing the very heathens, who were ignorant of this truth, and deſtitute of all theſe hopes & comforts, could yet reſigne themſelues ouer to be ruled at the pleaſure of their diuine powers. So one of them ſaith, that that ought to pleaſe man, whatſoeuer pleaſeth God: and againe, It is neceſſarie that euery man that is good, ſhould be of great piety towards God, and conſequently that hee ſuffer with a patient minde whatſoeuer happeneth vnto him, knowing that it happeneth by diuine prouidence which gouerneth all things. Neither in truth can there bee a more effectuall argument, to moue vs vnto contentation of mind, and to beare whatſoeuer befalleth vs with patience and comfort, than to conſider, that God, who is in himſelfe infinite in wiſdome and knowledge, and vnto vs moſt gracious and mercifull, doth ſo order and gouerne all things with his prouidence, that not ſo much as a ſparrow can light on the ground, or an haire fall from our head, but as they are guided by it. Whereof it is that our Sauiour Christ perswading vs to lay aside carking care, and to rest wholly vpon God with contentation of mind, doth chiefly insist vpon this reason, as being most powerfull and effectuall. For if there be no doubt to be made either of Gods ability, or of his loue; and if we certainely know that by his wise, powerfull and most gracious prouidence, he appointeth, directeth and gouerneth all things whatsoeuer which happen vnto vs, or any way concerne vs: then must wee also necessarily conclude, that all that befalleth vs is for the best; and that the calling, state & condition wherein we liue, though in it selfe it may seeme euill & full of miserie, and were in truth so as it seemeth vnto other men, yet vnto vs it is of all others most good and profitable, seeing it is appointed and allotted vnto vs by God, whose infinite wisedome, power, truth, and loue would haue disposed otherwise of vs, had he not knowne this estate most fitting for vs; and would not haue denied vnto vs any thing which our hearts desire, but that hee knoweth that they would doe vs more hurt than good, and hinder, rather than further the eternall saluation of our soules. So the Psalmist telleth vs, that those who feare the Lord shall want nothing; the which hee limiteth and restraineth in the next verse because we are ready to make our concupiscence, and not reason and truth, the measure of our wants, telling vs that they shall not want any thing which is good; for otherwise, if God should bestow vpon vs those things which he knoweth would be hurtfull vnto vs, though they be good in their owne nature, they would bee euill vnto vs, and through our abuse, of benefits become curses. And therefore whatsoeuer our condition or portion is, wee may safely conclude, that it is best for vs, and say with the Prophet Dauid, the lines are fallen vnto me in pleasant places, yea I haue a goodly heritage; praising the Lord for that wee haue, and not murmuring for that we haue not. For if wee know that for the care and loue which God beareth vs, hee hath giuen vnto vs that we haue; let vs know also that in the same care and loue hee hath measured vnto vs our proportion, which should make vs rejoyce in those things which wee haue receiued, and not breake out into impatience, because something wee desire is withheld from vs. Yea seeing the Lord keepeth nothing from vs, but such things as he knoweth would be tentations vnto sinne, let vs glorie in these wants, and giue thankes to God, that wee haue not more gifts than grace to vse them, nor receiued a burthen aboue our strength.

Psal. 34. 9. 10.

Psal. 16. 6. Si nolit quod propter eum quem debet habet Deus, bona largiturus, illud quoque intelligas quod propter eandem curam mensuram tribuit. Chrysost. in 1. Cor. 12. Homil. 29.

9. Sect. 10. The reasons why the Lord

Yea will some say, but I see others whom God loueth abound in honours, riches and delights, who notwithstanding serue God faithfully, and imploy these gifts which they haue receiued, to the glory of him from whom they haue receiued them; and why might not I also enjoying them bee bettered & not hurt by them as well as they? I answere, that all are not of the like nature and temper, but as wee say so many men, so many minds: by reason whereof it commeth to passe, that ones food is anothers poyson, one mans raysing is anothers ruine, and that which is most profitable for this man, is for another most pernicious. There is no wise physition giueth the same physicke to all patients, or in the same proportion; but hee fitteth it in quantitie and quality to euery ones neede, giuing one pils to purge him, another cordials to restore him; one must be launched, another must bee healed; one must haue sauces to quicken his appetite, another must fast & be cured by abstinence. Neither is there any wise housholder that particularly knowing the condition of his family, will prouide for, and feed all with like food, or with equall quantity; for one loueth that which another loatheth, and this man riseth hungrie with that allowance which would cause another to surfet with excesse. And doest thou deny vnto God that liberty of disposing vnto euery one that which best beseemeth them, when as thou allowest it vnto men? Shall the physition order his patients as he pleaseth, who often faileth in skill, and sometime in faithfulnesse; and shall not the Lord be allowed to purge or restore, wound or bind vp, cautherize or heale, as hee knoweth most fitting for his seuerall patients, seeing hee can neither erre in knowledge, nor faile in loue? Shall the housholder haue leaue to dispose of his owne goods in his owne family, who notwithstanding may be short in discretion, or partiall in affection; and must the Lord bee stinted, so as he may not giue according to his pleasure that allowance to euery one which hee knoweth most requisite, seeing his wisdome is infinite and his loue incomprehensible, respecting the person of none, but doing good to all, as their state and condition doth require? We find by experience that one man is bettered by liberty, another by restraint. One being of an ingenuous nature, is made better by benefits, another of a more seruile disposition becommeth worse, and is onely mended with threats and punishments: vpon the one kindnesse worketh, vpon the other feare. This man is fit for imployment when hee hath well fed, another is so drowsie that hee is good for nothing but to sleepe. Now who is most fit to iudge of thy nature and disposition, and accordingly to allot vnto thee the most fitting proportion? Thou, who being blinded with pride and selfeloue ouerweenest thy gifts, and thinkest thou couldcouldest well beare a saile, which in truth would ouer-turne thee; or God, who hauing made thee of nothing searcheth the heart and reines, and plainely seeth all thy secret thoughts and hidden imaginations, notwithstanding all those vailes which selfe-loue hath cast ouer them? Thou desirest honours, but God knoweth that pride lurking in thy heart, would if thou haddest them, make thee insolent and the more ambitious; thou wouldest wallow in worldly delights, but God knoweth that thou wouldest dote so much vpon them, that thou wouldest neglect the ioyes of heauen; thou wishest to be rich in goods, but God knoweth they would make thee poore in godlinesse: thou desirest health and strength, but God seeth they would make thy soule sicke and weake, causing thee to bee the more secure, and to put the day of repentance farre from thee. And therefore the Lord giueth thee contempt for honour to make thee humble, and fit by stooping to enter into the gates of heauen; he giueth thee miseries for delights, that being wearied from the world thou maiest hunger after his eternall ioyes: instead of riches, he giueth thee pouerty, that thy heart being empty of worldly vanities, may be filled with his graces; and for health he giueth thee sicknesse, that thou maiest daily cast vp thine accounts, and be alwayes ready when hee calleth for thee to giue a reckoning of thy stewardship.

Yea but the Lord if he would, might haue made mee honourable and humble, rich and gracious too, he might haue giuen mee abundance of his gifts, and a mind also to vse them well; and seeing others haue both, why haue not I as well as they? But who art thou O man who disputest with God! should the pot say to the potter, why hast thou made me thus? Though there were no other reason why thou hast not receiued these double gifts of prosperity and grace, but Gods sole will, it were sufficient to satisfie vs, seeing they are his free and vndeserued gifts, which he may iustly bestow where he pleaseth. For may he not doe with his owne what hee will? or is our eye euill because he is good? Is it not enough for vs to be seruants of his family, vnlesse wee bee stewards and chiefe officers? should we not rather be thankfull for receiuing many benefits, than repine because wee haue not receiued all? doth it not suffice vs that wee are made partakers of his chiefe iewels, & are adopted sonnes and heires of our eternall patrimonie, vnlesse wee haue also seruants wages, and a large share in earthly trifles? and can wee not bee content that the Lord hath giuen vs leaue to goe to heauen, if wee may not also chuse our way? But consider further that thou art not scanted of any thing thou desirest, because the Lord is niggardly in his gifts; for his bounty was such, that had it not beene our owne fault, wee might haue beene partakers of all: for in our first creation hee gaue vs grace and glory, vertue and happinesse, abundance of his blessings, and holy wisdome and pure affections wherby we were enabled rightly to vse them. But by our fall in the loines of our first parents, we brought our selues into the state of corruption, whereby we lost all right both to spirituall graces and worldly blessings; and are we not well though for a while wee haue not both, if the better part be restored vnto vs? By our sinne wee haue so disordered Gods blessings, and diuided his gifts, that very seldome his spirituall graces and temporall benefits will rest together, vnlesse by the supernaturall and admirable worke of his holy spirit they bee reconciled: and would wee daily haue God to doe miracles by ioyning the height of prosperity, and the height of grace, and (as it were) heauen and earth in the same subiect? Againe, consider that in this state of corruption, for the preseruing of humane society, it is necessarie that there should bee some of meane quality, as well as honourable, poore as rich, weake as well as strong: and why should any thinke that the condition wherein God hath placed him, is not as fit for him as for another? for wherein hath he deserued better at Gods hands that hee should preferre him? or what hath hee that hee hath not receiued? or why should any desire all, when as vpon examination hee shall find that hee deserueth nothing? Furthermore, if it pleaseth the Lord, the more to manifest the glory of his wisedome and power, to cast vs first downe whom hee meaneth to aduance; to make contemptible, whom hee purposeth to make glorious; to afflict with pouerty and miserie, whom hee intendeth to inrich with eternall happinesse, and to bring vs to heauen (as it were) by hell gates; why should wee not willingly follow him euen in the foulest way that will bring vs to the faire iourneies end of ioy and blessednesse? Finally, let vs remember that the world was not made for our paradise, where we should haue all ioy without sorrow, and good without the mixture of any euill; but for our pilgrimage, where for sinne wee should be afflicted, tried and proued, that so through Gods free mercy being found fit, we might bee receiued into our heauenly countrie, and there injoy our happinesse and felicity, without the disturbance of any miserie. Lastly, let vs consider, that God in his kingdome hath seuerall rewards, though the same blessednesse, and (as it were) crownes of glory, of diuers makings. Hee hath one reward and crowne for the patient poore, and another for the bountifull rich; one for them who are humbly honourable, and another for them who are courageous in contempt; one for them who doe well, and another for those that suffer for well doing; measuring his rewards according to the measure of his gifts and graces: why therefore should wee not desire to haue all fitted? Why should wee not bee content with any so wee may be sure of one? why should we not with patience and cheerefulnesse suffer here want, that there wee may haue fulnesse; miserie that we may find ioy; pouerty that we may be inriched with those treasures; and ignominie and contempt, that we may receiue this crowne of glory. And this argument of comfort and contentation our Saviour Christ vseth: for hauing perswaded his disciples to relie on Gods prouidence without carking care, and promised that if they would seeke first Gods kingdome and righteousnesse, they should haue also worldly necessaries supplied vnto them; because they were like to haue some small discouragement by their short allowance of those desired benefits, he willeth them not to feare for all this, because it was their fathers pleasure to giue them a kingdome.

Luk. 12. 32.

9. Sect. 12. The second meanes of contentment is to leade a godly life. 1. Tim. 6. 6.

The next meanes to attaine vnto contentation, is to liue an holy and Christian life, walking in the wayes of Gods Commandements in sincerity and vprightnesse of heart; for first godlinesse must enrich vs, before we can bee content with that wee haue: first God must dwell with vs by his spirit, before wee can bee content to forbeare the worlds company. Our hearts must be filled with better things, before we can be willing to part with worse; they must be inriched with heauenly treasures, before wee will leaue immoderate seeking of earthly trash; they must be indued with knowledge, faith, affiance, hope, loue and the rest of Gods sanctifying graces, before they can lightly esteeme of honours, riches, and earthly delights: for hauing a naturall appetite and hungring desires, either they must be filled and satisfied with that which is good, or else they will with vnsatiable longing effect and couet worldly vanities; like the stomacke, which vnlesse it bee sufficed with wholesome food, will suck in the wind, though being full of it, it is not satisfied, but rather tormented. Againe, if we haue any true contentment wee must haue it in the Lord, as hath beene shewed; but there is no contentment to bee had in God without godlinesse: for howsoeuer the Lord be infinite in wisedome, power, goodnesse, loue, and truth, yet we cannot comfortably apply any of all this to our selues, for our vse and benefit, neither in truth doe they at all appertaine vnto vs, vnlesse wee performe such conditions, as God requireth, louing, feasing, trusting in, & seruing him in simplicity, sincerity, & vprightnesse of heart; seeing the Lord hath limited the promises of all his mercies to such as obserue them. So the Psalmist saith, that nothing shall bee wanting which is good to those who seeke the Lord and feare him; that if we delight in the Lord hee will giue vs our hearts desire; that the Lord will bee a sunne and shield, giue grace and glory, and withhold no good thing from them that walke vprightly. So the wise man telleth vs it is the good conscience which makes a continuall feast; and that it is the feare of the Lord, which being put into the skale with a little, waigheth downe in worth and waight all worldly riches and abundance. Finally, our Saviour Christ telleth vs, that we shall haue from God a supplie of all earthly necessaries; but it is vpon the condition, that we first seeke his kingdome and righteousnesse. Those therefore who performe these duties which God requireth, may with comfort and contentation of minde rest securely vpon his prouidence and promises, because they haue assured interest and title vnto them; and they may ioyfully submit their wills vnto his, taking all he sendeth in good part, seeing his mercies are sweet, and his chastisements wholesome, and all whatsoeuer being foreseene and directed by his wisedome, ruled by his prouidence, and applied vnto vs in loue, must needs turne to our good, and further our saluation. Whereas contrariwise those who liue in their sinnes, and haue no desire to serue the Lord, can neuer haue this true contentation, because in the storme of troubles, they want this hauen to flee vnto, and in their wants cannot with comfort & assurance flee vnto God for helpe, seeing they conceiue of him as of a just iudge, who will take vengeance on them for their sinnes, and not as of a mercifull father, who will supply all their wants, seeing they liue not like his children, but like his enemies.

Psal. 34. 9. and 37. 4. and 84. 11.

Pro. 15. 15.

Mat. 6. 33.

Lastly, if wee would haue contentation in all estates, wee must as well haue an eye vpon those things which through Gods mercy we enioy, as vpon those things which we want; & thinke as well what we deserue, as what wee desire. For if we would consider that in our greatest wants we inioy innumerable blessings of God, whereas our sins haue deserued, that they should all be taken from vs, & his iudgements & punishments inflicted, as a fit wages for our sinfull seruice; then would we not be discontented for that wee haue not, but contented with that we haue, nor repine for wanting some things, but reioyce that the Lord vouchsafeth vs any thing. Againe, if wee would but consider how many benefits wee inioy which others want, who are much more wor-

9. Sect. 13. The third meanes to obtaine contentation is a well ordered wants.

worthies, if wee would looke how many come behind vs in rewards, that goe farre before vs in desert; we would not through discontent make our selues miserable, because we cannot bee so happy as we desire; wee would not fret because some goe before vs, but reioyce that wee are preferred before so many; nor repiningly thinke Gods liberalitie scant and streit, because we haue not all, but rather admire and thankfully extoll his infinit bounty, that hee vouchsafeth vnto vs any thing, who haue deserued nothing. Whereas if our finger be alwayes vpon our sores, and our eye vpon our wants, neuer thinking what wee haue, but what we desire; if we alwayes looke vpon those who go before vs, & neuer cast backe our eye vpon those that follow vs; if we compare our wants with others plentie, and our miseries with their ioyes; neuer looking at that wherein they also are defectiue, nor vpon those euils, wherein they haue their share; then can we neuer want sorrow and discontent, because we are our own tormenters, nor liue at ease with comfort and quietnesse, seeing we picke quarrels against our owne peace, and whip our selues with rods of our owne making.

And thus haue I shewed that our contentment is to be found in spirituall and not in worldly things: but so as much as we cannot here haue full contentment, because wee are not full of grace, nor be throughly satisfied with spirituall things, because they are imperfect, and our desires also worldly and carnall; let vs aboue all things labour to attaine vnto heauenly happinesse, and to bee partakers of those eternall ioyes which will fully satisfie without all loathing satietie, seeing by the infinit wisdome and power of God they are of such a nature, that their fulnesse is accompanied with a continuall appetite, so as they doe at the same time satisfie and inflame desire, prouoke and quench the thirst, and so inlarge the heart perpetually, as that they also fill and content it. And whereas the worlds pleasures like chil-blanes in the feete, doe itch and ake both together, and like the itch make vs lose that pleasure by smarting, which we tooke in scratching; these heauenly ioyes bring fulnesse and perpetuity of content, without the mixture of any trouble: so the Psalmist telleth vs, that in Gods presence is fulnesse of ioy, and at his right hand there are pleasures for euermore; that wee shall be satisfied with the fatnesse of Gods house, and that God will giue vs drinke out of the riuers of his pleasures. For God shall be vnto vs all in all, and beholding his face in righteousnes we shall be satisfied with his image, as the Scripture teacheth vs: for what can suffice if God satisfie not, seeing he is infinite in all goodnes, loue, louelines, beautie, wisdome and all perfections? And therefore if we be once certaine of these ioyes, though it be but by the assurance of faith and hope, we shall not mourne with discontent in the absence of worldly vanities, seeing we shall want them no more, if once this diuine brightnesse hath illuminated our hearts, than wee want the candle light when the Sunne shineth. Now if wee would attaine vnto this assurance of these heauenly ioyes, wee must make Christ our way, for none climeth thither but by this [a] ladder, and by a liuely faith bee ingrafted into him, that so in him being reconciled, iustified and adopted, we may being [b] sons, be also heires of euerlasting happinesse. As also wee must shew the fruits of our faith in sanctification of life, seeing the Scriptures plainely teach vs, that if wee bee not [c] sanctified, we are not iustified, and if we be not iustified, we shall neuer bee saued, that without [d] holinesse we shall neuer see God, that [e] nothing vncleane shall enter in thither, and that vnlesse we be [f] regenerate and borne againe, wee can neuer enter into the kingdome of heauen. And therefore if we would bee Citizens of the kingdome of glory, wee must first passe thorow the suburbs of grace; wee must doe God seruice, if we expect to receiue [g] wages; and [h] ouercome the spirituall enemies of our saluation, before wee can receiue the crowne of righteousnesse, and triumph as conquerers in euerlasting glorie.

CHAP. XX.

Of the vnprofitablenesse of worldly vanities, in comparison of Gods spirituall graces and heauenly ioyes.

THE next argument which in my generall diuision I propounded to perswade all to a just contempt of worldly things, in comparison of spirituall grace and eternall glorie, is their vnprofitablenes. The which also is a necessarie consequent of their vanitie: for because they are vaine and worthlesse, therefore they cannot greatly profit those that haue them; whereof it is that the Wise man, hauing shewed that all is vanitie, presently inferreth, that there is no profit vnder the Sunne. And holy Samuel exhorteth the people to serue the Lord with all their hearts, and not to turne after vaine things, which could not profit nor deliuer them, because they were but vanitie. And our Sauiour Christ telleth vs, that it will not at all profit a man, though he gaine the whole world, if hee lose his soule, as hee surely doth, who more esteemeth gold than godlinesse, and setteth his heart more vpon these earthly vanities, than vpon God him-himselfe, and the eternall ioyes of his kingdome. So that these worldly things are like vnto glittering tinsels, which make a glorious shew, yet being vaine and worthlesse, serue to no good vse, but make those that weare them the prouder only, and not the warmer, as equally letting in the outward wind that cooleth them, and in the inward wind of vaine glorie, whereby they are swelled and puffed vp. Or like vnto cloathes full of massie gold, which adorne vs vnto others, but loade vs in our owne sense; for howsoeuer worldly vanities make a goodly shew to those who neuer had them, yet their owners find them vaine and vnprofitable, as being in their greatest need, rather combersome burthens, than sound comforts.

9. Sect. 2. That worldly honors are vnprofitable.

But this will better appeare in the speciall examples of honors, riches, and carnal pleasures. For what profit is there in vaine-glory, the praise of men, and worldly preferments, if wee ambitiously affect them, and set our hearts too much vpon them, seeing they doe not so much extoll and magnifie vs before men, as they abase and vilifie vs in the sight of God? And what will it profit vs to bee praysed of men, when God and our owne consciences shall condemne vs, either because wee haue compassed these honours by euill meanes, or sinne in their fruition, by preferring them in our hearts before God and godlinesse? What will it auaile vs, when running ill in the spirituall race wee haue the applause of the standers by; if the Iudge himselfe censure vs as vnworthy to receiue the garland? It is not these waxen wings of men prayses, which are ready to wind euery way with the heate of their affections, and melt and vanish when the scorching Sunne of affliction ariseth, that will carrie vs to heauen; neither is it their disprayses that can hinder vs in our ascent, if wee bee supported with the wings of faith and a good conscience, much lesse pull vs downe againe, when we are once seated on the throne of glorie. And therefore foolish is our course, if wee take more paines to seeme good in shew, than to bee so in truth; to haue the commendations of men, than the testimonie of a good conscience; and be more carefull to be applauded of those, who must stand at the same barre, than to bee approued of our Iudge, by whom one day we shall be justified or condemned.

Nec laudes hominum te leuant in calum, nec vituperationes inde te deponunt. Ille videat qui coronat, ille sit testis à quo iudice coronaris. August. in epist. Ioan. Tract. 6. Tom. 9.

9. Sect. 3. That there is no profit in worldly riches. Luke 12. 15. Matth. 4. 4.

Neither is there more profit in worldly riches, seeing as our Sauiour Christ telleth vs, though a man haue abundance, yet his life standeth not in his riches, because as elsewhere hee speaketh, man liueth not by bread onely, but by euery word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God. And though a man haue neuer so great store, yet he hath few priuiledges aboue him, who hath onely necessaries, or some small competencie: for as the Wise man saith, When goods increase, they are increased that eate them, and what commeth to their owners, but the beholding of them with their eyes? In which respect men abounding with worldly wealth, haue that benefit by their riches, that stewards haue in a great family, by the great summes which are committed to their disposing, whereby (at least if they be faithfull) they onely haue their care and paines increased whilest they make prouision for so many mouthes and bellies; and the greater and more difficult reckoning to make, when their masters call them to yeeld their accounts. For what are rich men but Gods stewards, who haue their abundance committed vnto them, not to spend their superfluity in riot and excesse, but to maintaine and relieue their fellow seruants? And what in this regard doe their great receipts profit them, seeing of all, they haue but meate for their bellies, and clothing for their backes, and of the rest must be accountant to our great Lord and Master how they haue bestowed it, when at the great day of his appearing hee shall call them to a reckoning. Yea but being stewards they may allow to themselues a double portion; and all things comming through their hands, they haue more liberall maintenance, and a greater share in those rich talents which are committed to their disposing. For example, they haue the priuiledge of full tables and daintie diet, of costly apparell, and soft beds; whereas the poorer sort haue scant and course fare, meane clothes, and hard lodging. To which I answere, that these benefits are exceeded by the inconueniences which doe accompanie them; and though they were not, yet in the very fruition of these things, wherein they glory most, they haue little priuiledge aboue them who are scanted of them; seeing howsoeuer they much exceed them in their store, yet neither in profit nor delight. For the pleasure of eating and drinking, consisteth not so much in the daintinesse of our fare, as in the disposition of those who sit at the table, seeing he who bringeth with him an hungrie appetite and good stomacke, feedeth on his course fare with more delight, than he who is glutted with often surfetting on his most costly cates, although his stomacke bee whetted with great variety of meates, and innumerable sorts of alluring sauces. But herein the poore haue priuiledge aboue the rich, because their labour prouoketh their appetite, which is satisfied at their meales without surfetting, either because by reason of the scantnesse of their prouision they cannot, or in respect of the coursenesse of their fare they will not exceed due measure: whereas the rich hauing their stomackes cloyed with in-insobriety and intemperance, into which they haue fallen, whilest their bewitching dainties, and variety of dishes haue allured them, by pleasing their palate to oppresse their stomaches, and wanting the meanes of labour and exercise to recouer them; they haue still their hunger preuented with their prouision, and so comming to their meales with cloyed appetites, they rather loath then delight in their daintiest fare, and not knowing whether it were best to eate any thing or nothing of all their delicates, they inwardly fret that hauing so good meate, they haue no better stomackes; and repent of their last meales gluttonie, not because they hate their sinne, but because they haue lost their appetite; and now are deprived of all their pleasure, because they had then too much. Neither haue they any great benefit by their brauery aboue those that goe in plaine habits, seeing these no lesse than they attaine vnto the maine ends of apparell, which are to keepe vs warme and to hide our shame; whereas they by their superfluity gaine but more care and trouble, and by displaying these ensignes of pride, expose themselues to the skorne of their superiours, and to the enuie of those who are of meaner condition and estate. Finally, they haue no great priuiledge aboue the poore in respect of their soft beds, rich couerings, and costly canopies: for whereas the chiefe vse of a bed is to sleepe in it, and take our rest; the rich doe lest of all attaine vnto it, though their lodging bee neuer so easie and gorgeous; partly because their fulnesse and excesse are as great hinderances to rest, as hunger and want; and partly because their heads are troubled about their riches, whilest they are thinking either of getting more, or of keeping and disposing that they haue; whereas poore men which lie harder, doe sleepe much more soundly, after their sober meales, and dayes labour. And this the wise Salomon obserued: The sleepe (saith he) of him that trauelleth is sweet, whether he eate little or much, but the satiety of the rich will not suffer him to sleepe. By all which it appeareth that riches doe not greatly profit vs, no not so much as in respect of worldly benefits. Yea (as one saith) it is well with vs if wee doe not receiue hurt by their fellowship; it sufficeth that we be not made worse by them, seeing they cannot make vs better. It is true indeede that they who abound in wealth haue fit opportunity and meanes of doing the workes of mercy and of comforting and doing good vnto many, but this priuiledge they haue aboue the poore, onely in manifesting the bounty and goodnesse of their minde vnto men, for both are alike and equally accepted in the sight of God, the rich man who doth good deeds both with heart and hand, and the poore man, who wanting ability, is onely bountifull in his affection, and willing desire.

9. Sect. 4. That riches are most vnprofitable to sordidous Misers.

Now if this be true of those rich men, who by their vse of riches haue these vsuall comforts which they afford; then how much more is it verified of sordidous Misers, who howsoeuer they abound with all manner of wealth, yet their riches are altogether vnprofitable vnto them? For whilest they think of gathering and scraping more and more, they forget to enjoy that they haue, and so of Masters become only Iaylors and keepers of their wealth, hauing no vse of it themselues, nor letting others vse it; whereby it commeth to passe, that of all they haue they haue nothing, and yet are tormented with the want of all which they haue not. So that these are like him who was possessed with that vnruly Deuill, or rather Legion of wicked spirits, for this Deuill of sordidous couetousnesse, will not suffer them to dwell in their Houses, because they would not lose the hire; nor to eate meat, or weare their clothes, because they require cost, and hinder their bags from filling; but causeth them in franticke manner to breake all bonds of common honestly, to toile and trauell by sea and land, to runne a thousand desperate courses, and to wound their heads with cares, and their hearts with griefe, whilest they are drawne on with hope to encrease their wealth; and when with all this care and danger they haue attained to their desires, they haue no vse or benefit of all that which with so great paine and perill they haue scraped together. Like vnto them who being athirst, spend all their time in drawing water, and in filling their Cesternes, but yet haue no power to drinke, though all their vessels doe ouerflow. Wherein they commit that miserable folly which the rich foole in the Gospell fell into, who though he had abundance of all things, yet neuer thought of enjoying any thing till hee was ready to leaue all, bidding then his soule to liue at ease, to eate, drinke, and take its pleasure, when as in the very same night it was taken from him. And this folly the sonne of Syrach obserued. Some man (saith he) toyleth by his care and niggardship, and this is the portion of his wages. But when he saith I haue gotten rest, and now will eat continually of my goods; he considereth not that the time draweth neere that he must leaue all these things vnto other men, and die himselfe. Whereby it appeareth that abundance of wealth bringeth no true profit vnto these misers, because they defraud their own soules, not suffring thē to enjoy any thing they possesse. And as Moses onely saw the land of Canaan, but for his sinne was not permitted to haue any share or portion in it: so they haue for their miserable couetousnesse this punishment by God inflicted on them, that they shall onely see their goods with their eyes, but neuer enjoy them for their comfort: and that they shall toyle and moyle for their successor, oftentimes they not knowing who he shall bee, and receiue no manner of benefit by their owne labours, but as Pipes keepe none of the water to themselues that runneth through them, but conuey all to their Cisternes; so they are not able to retaine any of the goods which they possesse, for their owne benefit and comfort, but onely serue as Ouer-seers to conuey them to their heires; who for the reward of all their painfull labour, doe whilest they liue grudge them their liues, as they grudge themselues all the comforts of life; and doe not so much loue them because they shall hereafter receiue much by their care and prouision, as loathe and hate them, because already they haue not receiued it; they standing in their way, and keeping from them that which they so much couet. And after their death commonly spend in riot and excesse, that which they haue gotten with miserable niggardlines, seldome remembring their Benefactors, vnlesse it bee to flout their folly, and inuey against their sordidous auarice, the which they so much hate and abhorre, hauing seene the wretched fruits of it in their Progenitours, that vsually they runne into the contrary extreame, and become as prodigall as they were niggardly, and so within a while haue not that in possession, which the other had not in vse. So the Sonne of Syrach saith, that hee who gathereth and scrapeth by defrauding his owne soule, he gathereth for others, and they shall make good cheere with his goods. By all which it is euident that Misers may get much wealth, but no gaine or profit; great store of riches, but no goods. For that onely is good vnto vs, whereof we haue not the possession alone, but the vse and fruition also, whereas, like their bags, they haue onely the keeping of their money, and haue no good, but great hurt by it, whilest (like them) they are worne out with care and labour, in getting and keeping it, and haue no comfort by enjoying it. And thus by this their miserableneſse, they make Gods gifts to be no benefits, and turne his blessings into heauy burthens. So the Sonne of Syrach saith, that riches are not good to a Niggard, and what should an enuious man doe with money? For that is only good and to bee esteemed Gods blessing, whereby we receiue good, and haue it in vse and fruition, as well as in custody and possession: for so the Psalmist saith, When thou eatest the labours of thine hands, thou shalt be blessed, and it shall be well with thee. And the Preacher teacheth vs, that there is no benefit to man in all he enioyeth, but that he eat and drinke, and delight his soule with the profit of his labour, and that we haue this of the hand of God. And againe, I know that there is nothing good in them, but to reioyce and to doe good in his life, and also that euery man eateth & drinketh, & seeth the commodity of all his labour; this is the gift of God. Whereby he implyeth, that it is a gift and no gift, or a gift, & no benefit, when God bestoweth goods, and not grace to vse them for good purposes, both by reioycing in their fruition, and by imploying part of them to charitable and pious vses. Yea, rather the possession of riches without the vse hurteth the Owners, and not profiteth them, as being vnto them heauy burthens, and causes of the incurable disease of greedy couetousneſse. So the Wise man saith, There is an euill sickneſse that I haue seene vnder the Sunne, to wit, riches reserued to the Owners thereof for their euill, and these riches perish by euill trauaile, and he begetteth a sonne, and in his hand is nothing, as he came forth of his mothers belly, he shall return naked to goe as he came, and shall beare away nothing of his labour, which he hath caused to passe by his hand? And this also is an euill sickneſse, that in all points as he came, so shall he goe, and what profit hath he, that he hath trauailed for the wind. Also all his dayes he eateth in darkneſse with much griefe, and in his sorrow and anger. Behold then what I haue seene good, that it is comely to eat and to drinke, and to take pleasure in all his labour, wherein he trauaileth vnder the Sunne, the whole number of the dayes of his life which God giueth him; for this is his portion. Also to euery man to whom God hath giuen riches and treasures, and giueth him power to eat thereof, and to take his part, and enjoy his labour, this is the gift of God. As though he should say, this, and no other so far as for riches without vse, they are so farre from deseruing the name of blessings and benefits, that they are to be reputed curses and heauy judgements. So Iob saith of the wicked man, that in lieu of his sinne hee shall haue this punishment laid vpon him, that though he should heape vp siluer as the dust, and prepare rayment as the clay: He may prepare it, but the iust shall put it on, and the innocent shall diuide the siluer. And the Wise man teacheth vs, that to a man that is good in Gods sight, he giueth wisdome, knowledge, and ioy, but to the sinner he giueth paine to gather and to heap, to giue to him that is good before God; this also is vanity and vexation of spirit. And else-where, hee that loueth siluer shall not bee satisfied with siluer, and hee that loueth riches shall bee without the fruit thereof. Yea, so heauily doth this judgement of God sit vpon them, that afterwards he preferreth an vntimely & abortiue birth, before such a miserable & wretched life. And the Sonne of Syrach saith, that there is nothing worse than when one enuieth himselfe, and that this is the reward of his wickednesse.

And thus it appeareth that riches are vn-pro-

profitable to those who set their hearts vpon them: the like also may bee said of carnall pleasures, which if they bee ouer highly valued, and too much affected, doe vs no good, but are as vnprofitable as either of the other. And this the wise Salomon teacheth vs by his owne experience, for hauing sought to please himselfe with all manner of delights, and denied no joy to his heart which it could desire, concludeth at last that hee could finde no profit in any of them, but vanitie and vexation of spirit. If therefore hee who had all the delights which a great Kingdome, a peaceable and prosperous raigne, and abundance of all worldly Blessings, were able to yeeld vnto him, could not after hee had tried many conclusions, to giue his heart joy and pleasure, find any profit in any of them: how vnprofitable are our delights like to prooue, who want these plentifull meanes wherein hee abounded, and haue all our comforts crossed with many miseries, from which hee was priuiledged? But if wee would further consider, that that alone is to bee esteemed truely profitable, which doth profit vs in our place and calling, and aduanceth the maine ends at which wee ayme, wee should plainely perceiue how little profit there is in pleasure: for wee are called to the state of Christianity, to be the seruants and children of God, and the mayne end which wee propound in all our doings and proceedings, is to glorifie God in our owne saluation, to finish our course with joy, and to passe the time of our pilgrimage so in GODS feare, as that in the end of our liues wee may arriue at our heauenly Countrey, and inherit those eternall joyes.

But, alas, how little doe worldly pleasures (especially when they are too much esteemed and affected) in these respects profit vs? How slenderly doe they aduance these ends and further vs in this way? Yea, rather how much doe they endamage vs, and either slacken our pace or quite hinder vs in this spirituall race? Whilest being so besotted on these earthly delights, wee neuer thinke of our heauenly joyes, or spend that precious time in vaine sports, wherein wee should labour to furnish our hearts with Gods spirituall and sauing graces, and attaine vnto certaine assurance that we haue our part and interest in that eternall happinesse; or finally, whilest being pampered with these worldly pleasures, wee are made so pursie and short winded, that wee can take no paines in running this spirituall race, but either sit downe in the mid-way for want of spirituall strength, or being vtterly discouraged and out of hope of euer comming to the Goale and obtaining the Garlands, returne backe againe to the World that wee may take our fill of pleasures, and glut our selues with carnall delights.

But concerning the hurt which we take by worldly things abused through our corruption, I shall haue occasion to speake more hereafter; heere onely I aim to shew that they are vnprofitable: which that we may more cleerely vnderstand; let vs further consider, that howsoeuer they may somewhat helpe vs in some small trifles, and in attaining vnto our ends in some base and slight things; yet they are altogether vnprofitable in furthering our mayne ends at which wee should ayme, as neither deriuing vnto vs any great and desirable good, nor yet freeing or helping vs in our greatest difficulties, and most heauy and dangerous euils. For first, these outward things doe not impart vnto vs any essentiall goodnes, or by hauing them, make vs better than those that want them; they do not make vs more esteemable in Gods sight, for hee accepteth not the persons of Princes, and regardeth not the rich more than the poore, for they be all the worke of his hands: neither doth hee measure mens goodnesse by their goods, but by their godlinesse; for better (saith the Wise man) is the poore that walketh in his vprightnesse, than he that perverteth his wayes, though hee be rich. They doe not make vs better in our selues, for seeing they are not any way essentiall vnto vs, but outward accidents, wee haue nothing added to our perfection, when wee haue them, nor any thing diminished, when wee want them. That which truely maketh vs better, bettereth our being, and addeth some perfection to our essence; now whereas we haue a double being, one by generation as men, another by regeneration as Christians, the excellency of the former consisteth in the perfection of reason, and of the latter, in true godlinesse; and therefore seeing these outward things neither make vs more reasonable, nor yet more godly and religious, they doe not at all make vs better, our goodnes consisting in those things which they further not. If therefore we excell in the vse of reason, and in the knowledge and practice of true Religion, our goodnesse is not impaired when all these faile vs; but if we be defectiue in them, and be either foolish men, or lame and bastardly Christians, these outward ornaments will be but like gay Hangings on rotten and broken wals, which commend vs to the sight and view of others, but doe not better vs in our selues, by stopping our breaches, and repairing our ruines. And as those who are sicke of the dropsie, seeme fat and in good liking to those who are farre off; whereas it plainely appeareth to those who looke vpon them neerer hand, that their beauty proceedeth not from the good habi-tude of their bodies, but from their fulneſſe of humours, which is the true cauſe of their diſeaſe: ſo thoſe who abound with theſe outward things, may ſeeme better and more happy than others, to thoſe that view them at the firſt ſight; but thoſe who better conſider of them, eaſily find that it is but a diſeaſed beauty which commendeth them, and that they are not in truth bettered by all theſe things, but rather the diſeaſes and ſpirituall ſickneſſes of their ſoules increaſed, and made more deſperate and vncurable. Let vs not therefore account our ſelues bettered by theſe outward things, for then our goods and goodneſſe will both at once faile vs, but by thoſe things in which our excellencie conſiſteth, and which being in vs, and peculiar to our ſelues, doe make vs juſtly to be preferred before all other creatures. Wee know that a Player is not better than his fellowes, becauſe he acteth a Kings part, ſeeing all his excellencie is in his outward habit, and nothing in his perſon, and if another acteth his part better, he is preferred farre before him, though hee ſuſtaine the meaneſt and baſeſt perſonage, becauſe his worth is meaſured, not by his gay clothes, but by his excellency in his owne faculty and profeſſion. A Surgeon is not commended becauſe hee goeth in braue apparell, but for his great skill in curing wounds; and the Scholler is not magnified for his faire Houſe, or full Cheſts, but for his excellency in all manner of knowledge and learning: neither is the Pilot praiſed, becauſe hee hath a faire ſhip gilt with Gold and well rigged, but for his ſkill in nauigation, & care in vſing al his knowledge for the good of the paſſengers. And thus alſo it is in other creatures, for the vine is not praiſed for its faire leaues ſtraight body, & good timber; but for its fruitfulneſſe in bearing good and pleaſant Grapes: neither is the Horſe bettered by his rich Saddle, and golden Trappings, ſeeing his goodneſſe conſiſteth not in theſe things which may at night be taken from him, but in his ſhape, ſtrength, ſoundneſſe, good pace, and ſure trauelling. And ſo the excellency and goodneſſe of a Chriſtian conſiſteth not in theſe outward things, as Honours, Riches, Pleaſures, but in the fruits of godlineſſe, which hee oftentimes beareth better, and in greater abundance when as hee is pruned, and theſe outward ſuperfluities taken away; not in his gay habit & rich Furniture, but in his ſwiftneſſe and ſureneſſe in running the ſpirituall race, which hee commonly beſt performeth when hee is lightened and vnloaded of this worldly brauery. If theſe earthly things would ſerue to enrich our ſoules with Gods ſpirituall graces, if they would purchaſe Chriſt, and procure for vs the rich robes of his righteouſneſſe; if they would further vs, and make vs more courageous and conſtant in the profeſſion of Gods Truth, and in the practice of all Chriſtian duties; then were they indeed much to be eſteemed, as being truly profitable; but the baſe as well as the Honourable, haue their part in the glad tydings of the Goſpell; and the poore as well as the rich; for Chriſt is gotten and applied by faith, and not with wealth, and his graces after which our ſoules thirſt, are bought without money, as the Prophet ſpeaketh; and therefore the Apoſtle Peter in the abundance of ſpirituall graces, wanting theſe outward things, profeſſeth, that he had neither Gold nor Siluer. Neither doe they inable vs to make our Chriſtian profeſſion in the time of danger, or imbolden vs to ſuffer for the teſtimony of the truth, nay, rather wee are moſt cowardly in performing theſe duties, when we moſt abound with theſe earthly vanities; and when Honour and Riches are ſilent for feare of loſſe, pouerty and meanneſſe make a bold profeſſion: Whileſt Nicodemus a great Ruler ſtealeth to Chriſt by night, the poore fiſhermen follow him at noone day. And hereof it is that when the moſt bold profeſſion was to be made, and the greateſt perſecutions to be ſuffered for the name of Chriſt, not onely the immoderate louing and deſiring, but euen the poſſeſſing of theſe wordly things, more than for neceſſarie vſe was forbidden, becauſe Chriſt knew well enough, that their poſſeſſion procured loue vnto them, and their loue wrought a feare of being bereaued of the things beloued, and this feare made them cowardly and backward in doing or ſuffering any great thing for Chriſt and the Goſpell.

And thus it generally appeareth, that theſe worldly things doe not better vs in that which is beſt and moſt deſireable; the which alſo might be eaſily ſhewed in the ſpeciall inſtances of Honours, Riches and carnall pleaſures. For theſe worldly Honours being things outward and accidentall, do no more better the perſons of thoſe that haue them, nor make them more eminent and high, in true worth and ſelfe-excellencie, than it increaſeth a mans ſtature when hee ſheweth himſelfe in the top of a Tree; and therefore as he were ridiculous, who being a Dwarfe, ſhould boaſt of his talneſſe, becauſe he hath gotten an high ſtanding: ſo no leſſe abſurd were he to be eſteemed, who being aduanced vnto eminent place of Honour and Dignitie, ſhould thinke himſelfe bettered by this outward addition, being otherwiſe deſtitute of vertue, worth, and ſelfe-excellency, the eſſentiall parts of true Nobility. For without theſe he is bettered only in place, and not in perſon; and hauing aſpired to that height, not by vertue and deſert, but by the vanity and proud ambition of his heart, his highneſſe of place may rather be aſcribed to his vaine lightneſſe, than to his ſolid goodneſſe, euen as the Chaffe lyeth higher than the Wheate, Nemo veretur qui argentum non habet; non quæritur Chriſtus argento ſed fide, Amb. de fide reſurrect. Ser. 1. Tom. 3.

Wheate, becauſe it is lighter, and not becauſe it is better. Neither are wee made better by worldly riches in thoſe repects wherein wee are chiefly good, becauſe theſe are inward and ſpirituall, and thoſe externall and accidentall; in regard whereof one truly ſaith; that thoſe who not hauing in them any good parts or ſelfe excellency, doe meaſure their goodneſſe by their goods, are like vnto a penny Purſe full of money, which hath all its worth from that which it containeth; and therefore is contemned as a thing of no value when it is emptied of the Siluer. And in the ſame reſpect they are not vnfitly compared to the ſheepe with the Golden Fleece, for when the skinne was much ſought after by all the Gallants of Greece, the body in the meane time was contemned, and reſpected of none. Neither in truth doth this outward wealth make vs better, and more eſteemable before either God or good men; if they be ſeuered from the chiefe riches, ſpirituall grace, and true godlineſſe. For Iob telleth vs that God reſpecteth the rich no more than the poore, and that hee regardeth not our riches and our Gold. The Pſalmiſt ſaith, that a ſmall thing to the iuſt man, is better than great riches to the wicked and mighty: and the Wiſe man teacheth vs, that the poore is better who walketh in his vprightneſſe, than hee that peruerteth his wayes, though hee be rich; and preferreth a poore and wiſe childe, before an old and fooliſh King that will no more be admoniſhed. And as God doth not regard any for their wealth; ſo neither doe the godly value any according to their Gold, but according to their goodneſſe: for as one ſaith, it is not meet to deſpiſe the poore man that hath vnderſtanding, neither is it conuenient to magnifie the rich, that is a wicked man. So that riches are ſo farre from being able to make vs glorious in Heauen, that they haue no ſufficiency in them to make vs Honourable on earth; ſo farre from commending vs vnto God, that they doe not aduance our worth and eſteeme in the iudgement of godly men. And therefore the Apoſtle Iames taxeth and reproueth theſe, who reſpected the perſons of rich Worldlings more than poore Chriſtians, or one exceeding in wealth, before another ſurpaſſing him in godlineſſe; ſaying to the one becauſe he hath gold Ring and gay Apparell, ſit thou heere in a good place; and to the other becauſe hee is in meane attire, ſtand thou there, or ſit heere vnder my footſtoole, becauſe hauing no skill in Chriſtian Heraldry they tooke vpon them to diſpoſe of places, ſeating him in a lower place who is of better deſcent, of a more Noble Houſe, better ſtiled, and better mannered, euen a childe of God, and heire of Heauen, becauſe of his plaine habite; and aduancing another of baſe quality, the childe of the Deuill, and ſlaue of ſinne, becauſe hee is cloathed in rich Apparell. And ſurely this errour muſt needes bee foule: for if riches will not giue vs precedence before thoſe who are Honourable in the World; if they will not purchaſe true Nobility, nor place vs in the ſeate of true Honour; or if they doe, yet this Honour is eſteemed baſe, as being tied to their wealth, rather than to their perſons (for if euery one account is baſe to haue all his eſteeme for his ſeruants ſake; it is much more baſe to bee eſteemed onely for his money ſake, which is of leſſe excellency) then how much leſſe can this riches intitle vs to the true Nobility of a Chriſtian, which chiefly conſiſteth in vertues and true Godlineſſe, which are free gifts of Gods rich Grace, and neuer to be bought for any money? Finally, wee are not bettered by worldly pleaſures in thoſe mayne things wherein the goodneſſe of a Chriſtian chiefly conſiſteth, wee are not furthered by them in our courſe of Godlineſſe, nor made more zealous in Gods ſeruice; wee are not by them weaned from, but rather wedded vnto the World, nor helped forward, but rather hindered in attaining vnto our heauenly joyes. Yea, ſo farre are they from bettering vs in the beſt things, and aduancing vs to the fruition of ſpirituall Grace, and eternall Glory, that they doe not better vs in Worldly things: for they do not prolong life but ſhorten it; nor preſerue health but impaire it; nor make vs Honourable, but diſgrace vs; nor enrich our eſtate, but rather impaire and begger it: how vnprofitable and contemptible therefore are theſe vanities, which neither make vs better to God nor to the World; neither more honeſt in our ſelues, nor more honourable in others eſtimation?

CHAP. XXI.

That worldly things profit not to the attaining of thoſe things which are chiefly good, nor to the auoiding of our greateſt euils.

1. Sect. 1. That worldly things helpe not to inrich our minds with vertue and Gods ſauing graces.

BVt let vs deſcend to ſome particulars, and we ſhall eaſily ſee, that theſe Worldly things neither help vs to the attaining of thoſe things which are vnto vs chiefly good, nor to the auoiding of our greateſt euils. They doe not inrich our minds with true vertue, and Gods ſauing graces, they doe not make vs more humble, mercifull, patient, zealous, nor any other way religious: yea, rather doth not common experience teach vs, that worldly proſperity is a ſtep-mother to vertue, thoſe being moſt deſtitute of it, who moſt abound in worldly things; and they moſt rich in ſpirituall grace, who are moſt wanting in them? Doe wee not continually ſee with out owne eyes, that it is not thoſe who are aduanced to the higheſt Honours, nor thoſe who abound in wealth, and wallow themſelues in Worldly delights, that frequent the ſchoole of Vertue and Godlineſſe, the Church and Houſe of God; or if they doe, are ſo apt to learne ſpirituall inſtruction, and to profit in the knowledge of Gods ſauing Truth; but thoſe who are of meane condition, poore eſtate, and afflicted with Worldly croſſes? So as it may be truly ſaid, that thoſe who goe on foot, yea, thoſe who are old and decrepite, ſicke, lame, and blinde, doe make more diligent ſpeed, and go much faſter to the Church of God, the ſpirituall market-place of our ſoules, wherein they are furniſhed with all Vertues and ſauing Graces; than thoſe who ride on their foot-clothes, and are ſwiftly hurried in their gilded Coaches; or they who haue beſt health, moſt ſtrength, and the greateſt ſhare in all manner of worldly happineſſe. And therefore as ſobriety and abſtinence preſerue our bodily health, and helpe to free vs from thoſe diſeaſes which come of fulneſſe and repletion; ſo the want or ſparing vſe of theſe Worldly things preſerues the health of our ſoules, making them ſtrong and vigorous in grace and vertue; whereas the glutting ſatiety of earthly vanities corrupts the minde, abates our ſpirituall ſtrength, and fils vs full of the corrupt humours of vice and ſinne.

Q. Sect. 2. That worldly things doe not make vs more fruitfull in good workes.

And as they doe not helpe to ſowe in vs inwardly the ſeeds of Grace, ſo neither doe they cauſe vs to bring forth outwardly the fruits of Godlineſſe. For howſoeuer the ambitious man hath attained vnto Honours and Preferments, whereby hee is enabled to defend the weake and to ſhelter the poore vnder the ſhadow of his protection: yet either is his mind ſo wholly taken vp with his purpoſes and plots of riſing, that he hath no leaſure to thinke of the poore, or ſcorneth to haue his thoughts fixed on ſuch meane ſubiects; or finding ſome ſtrong oppoſition, dare not bee ſeene in the poore mans cauſe, leſt croſſing his Compeeres in their will, they ſhould croſſe him in his next preferment; or finally, ſo ſpendeth his whole eſtate in bribes, and wearieth all his friends in his own ſuits, for his further aduancement, that hee hath neither will, leaſure, nor meanes to do good vnto any in diſtreſſe, nor to releeue the neceſſities of thoſe that are afflicted. So likewiſe they who ſet their hearts vpon pleaſures, though they abound in ſuperfluitie, yet are they moſt poore in Charity, and in the workes of mercy; for as they exceed in wealth, ſo alſo in riot and exceſſe, and all they can make together is little enough to miniſter to their voluptuouſneſſe, and to conſume in pleaſures. Yea, ſo wholly are they ſet on their delights, that they had rather ſpend many pounds in Feaſts and Banqueting, in Maskes and Shewes, Sports and Paſtimes, than to giue a few ſhillings towards the reliefe of a poore Chriſtian; & can more willingly finde in their hearts, that many ſhould periſh for want of food, than to abate the leaſt part of their pleaſure, or deny vnto their neuer ſatisfied ſoules any one delight. Finally, if a man ſet his heart vpon the earthly Mammon, though he abound in wealth, yet is hee ſure to bee moſt poore in good workes, though hee flow in the plenty of meanes, whereby he is inabled to do good, and to exerciſe his bounty in the workes of mercy, yet are his fruits and good workes at the loweſt ebbe, becauſe his couetous minde ſtill maketh him beleeue that hee hath neuer enough for his owne ſtore. And by reaſon of this vnſatiable greedineſſe, theſe rich Miſers are euer ready, like Spunges, to ſuck vp any gaine and profit, but when they haue it, will part with none, vnleſſe they be preſſed, and (as it were) cruſhed with violence or importunity. Though Nabal was exceeding rich, and able to feaſt his followers like a King; yet it was neither the deſert, nor humble ſuite of Dauid that could obtaine at his hands the leaſt pittance of his abounding plenty. Though the rich man in the Goſpell tooke care enough, and more than hee needed, to fill his Barnes, yet ſo careleſſe was he in doing good, that when his Barnes were ouer full, he rather reſolued to inlarge them to his great coſt and trouble, than he would part with any of his ſtore in doing the workes of mercy, and releeuing thoſe who ſtood in need: and though Dines went in Purple and fine Linnen, and fared deliciouſly euery day, yet could he not ſpare the very crummes that fell from his Table, to keepe poore Lazarus from periſhing with hunger. So that (as the Sonne of Syrach ſpeaketh) If the couetous man doth any good, he doth it, not knowing thereof, and againſt his will: and rather than hee will part with his wealth to any good vſes, hee will part with his ſoule, and vtterly abandon the meanes of his owne ſaluation; as wee may ſee in the example of the rich young man in the Goſpell, who heard Chriſt with ſome patience till hee told him of parting with his goods towards the reliefe of the poore, but then he goeth away ſorrowfull, becauſe hee could not ſaue his ſoule, and reſerue his Mammon too, and deſireth no further to haue part in Chriſt, or in his heauenly inſtructions. And this commeth to paſſe, becauſe riches do naturally inflame the hearts of couetous men towards them; and loue making them loth to part with the thing loued, cauſes them rather to reſerue their wealth with the hazard of their ſoules, than they will aſcertaine themſelues of the leaſt loſſe, by feeding the hungry, and ſupplying supplying the neceſſities of thoſe that want. In regard whereof theſe couetous wretches may be fitly likened to the mine all mountaines, which are full of gold and ſiluer, but barren and vnfruitfull; for ſo barren hee is in good works, that (as one ſaith) he neuer doth well but when he dieth, ſeeing then he hath an end of his vnſatiable couetouſneſſe, and ſetteth at libertie thoſe riches for the good of others, which were long enthralled in a wretched bondage. For whileſt he liueth hee will part with nothing which he poſſeſſeth, but rather than the poore ſhall ſhare with him in any part of his ſuperfluitie, hee will ſpend it on his backe in exceſſiue brauerie, on his horſe in rich furniture, yea vpon his ſenſeleſſe walles, and the very flower whereon he treadeth.

Furthermore, theſe worldly things doe not make thoſe merrie and cherefull, who moſt abound with them, if their hearts and affections bee ſeated on them; he that doteth vpon honours, doth not ſo much joy in twentie gotten preferments, as he doth fret at one miſſed, nor reioyceth in that he is aduanced before many, but is vexed becauſe he ſeeth any preferred before him; neither is he ſo much cheared in his mind, becauſe he hath the reuerence and obeyſance of cap and knee, from almoſt all men, as he is tormented if any one man wilfully denieth him that dutie and obſeruance which hee expecteth, his proud heart making him beleeue that his worth well deſerueth it. So when Haman being ſurfetted with ioy, in regard of the Kings eſpeciall fauour, came forth and ſaw Mordecai neglect him, in the middeſt of his iollitie and gladneſſe, he was filled with indignation, and like a forlorne man, full of diſcontent, he retireth himſelfe home, and telleth his wife and friends of all his riches, glory, and ſpeciall fauours, which he had receiued both from the King and Queene; but concludeth that all the honour which he had from all beſides Mordecai did him no good, becauſe hee alone did not reſpect and reuerence him. So what pleaſure and delight hath he, who abounding in riches, doth ſet his heart vpon them, more than the poore man, who hath but a ſmall competencie, and onely neceſſaries to releeue him? Yea doth not this man ſleepe more ſoundly, feed more ſauourly and with greater delight; looke more cheerefully, and reioyce more heartily than hee who is ouer-burthened with his abundance? For whileſt hee ſecurely enjoyeth that he hath, and contenteth himſelfe if he haue but neceſſaries to ſuſtaine nature, the other is not ſo much delighted with that he hath, as hee is vexed becauſe he hath no more; nor rejoyceth ſo much in that hee is rich, as he grieueth to ſee any richer. And this maketh him to beate his braines, and oppreſſe his mind, and ſpend his ſtrength with worldly cares, and with multitude of buſineſſe, either that hee may get more, or at leſt ſafely keepe that hee already hath. And when in his great ſtate any thing miſcarieth, or he by any caſualtie ſuſtaineth ſome triſling loſſe, he eateth out his heart with griefe, and is more fretted and vexed by loſing that little, than hee is cheared and delighted with all the reſt which he ſtill inioyeth. In a word if a mans heart be ſet vpon couetouſneſſe, he taketh comfort and pleaſure in nothing which doth not bring vnto him ſome profit, nor in theſe things neither, if (as they ſeldome doe) they doe not in gaine anſwere his expectation; hee taketh no pleaſure in beholding the Heauens, becauſe they ſend not downe ſiluer ſhowers; the ſunne in his chiefe glory delighteth him not, becauſe it doth not ſhine with golden beames: yea he hath no comfort and joy in God himſelfe, no further than he expecteth from him gaine and profit. Contrariwiſe, hee ſpendeth his dayes in murmuring and repining, alwayes caring and fearing, and neuer being at reſt: if there bee faire weather, he ſtraight complaineth of drought; if a little foule come, he ſaith all will be drowned and rotted; hee is alike diſcontented with great plenty, and with great dearth; the one becauſe he enuieth his neighbour, the other becauſe hee feareth to want himſelfe. And faine would hee, if he could tell how, haue plentie in his owne fields, and ſcarcity in other mens; ſuperfluitie at home, and dearth abroade, that hee might ſell his corne at the dearer rate. In reſpect of all which cares, feares, and griefes: the couetous mans life though he beneuer ſo rich, is compared to a funerall feaſt, which hath abundance of all things ſauing mirth and comfort. An example whereof we haue in Ahab, who though he poſſeſſed a kingdome, yet becauſe he deſired, and could not haue Nabaths vineyard, was ſo farre from reioycing in all that he had, that hee was euen ſicke with griefe, caſting himſelfe on his bed, and refuſing his food, as though hee had loſt all, whereas he onely wanted that which he neuer had. So that it is not a kingdome of wealth that will purchaſe to a couetous man a dram of pleaſure, it being ſo ordered by Gods wiſe and gracious prouidence, that pleaſures ſhould not bee purchaſed with gold and ſiluer (for then rich men would haue ingroſſed them into their owne hands to ſell them againe at dearer rates) but rather he would haue them bought with the coine of labour and neceſſitie, that the poore might haue a larger ſhare in them than they who abound in wealth, and contrariwiſe hath joyned griefe, care and cumberſome trouble with riches and abundance, that no man ſhould immoderately deſire them. So the

6. Sect. 4. That worldly pleaſures are void of true pleaſure and ſound delight.

Finally, euen the pleaſures of the world are void of all pleaſure and ſound delight; for ſeeing they chiefly conſiſt in thoſe things which delight the fleſh, and ſatisfie the carnall appetite, ſ they are ſeldome vſed without ſinne, which in thoſe whoſe conſciences are not quite ſeared, hath ſuch a ſting accompanying it, that it marreth all their mirth, leauing after a ſhort and vaniſhing pleaſure (which a little while delighteth the eye, eare, and palat, or at vtmoſt reacheth no further than the throate,) much trouble and anguiſh of minde. For what is worldly pleaſure, but as one calleth it, vnpuniſhed wickedneſſe, which conſiſteth chiefly in reuelling and riot, in fornication and vncleaneſſe, in vaine ſights and ſhewes, in gluttonie and drunkenneſſe; and this is the worlds delight, if impunitie alſo bee ioyned with it? Now ſeeing euery one of vs hath a Law without vs, forbidding and condemning ſinne; and a conſcience within vs accuſing vs as tranſgreſſors, and applying vnto vs thoſe threatnings of heauie iudgements which the Law denounceth againſt ſinners; therefore it is not poſſible for worldly men to take any ſound and ſolid ioy and comfort in theſe ſinfull delights; but when they ſeeme moſt iocund and pleaſant, they reioyce (as the Apoſtle ſpeaketh) onely in the face, and not in the heart. And as the Wiſe man ſaith, their laughter is madnes like to the laughter of phrantick men, which is onely from the teeth outward, and not naturall and kindly; or vnto thoſe who are tickled, which laugh in their torment, as though they were rauiſhed with ioy, when as inwardly they are vexed, and not delighted. And as the mourning and ſorrow of the faithfull is not to bee reputed any extreame and bitter griefe, becauſe it is mixed with ſo much ioy and comfort; and therefore the Apoſtle maketh it but a ſeeming ſorrow: where he ſaith, As ſorrowing, and yet alwayes reioycing: ſo contrariwiſe wicked worldlings haue no true ioy in their worldly pleaſures, which is proper and peculiar vnto faithfull men, in their honeſt delights, which are warranted by the word, and approued by their owne conſcience, but onely a counterfait ſemblance thereof; ſo that it may as truly bee ſaid of them, as reioycing, and yet alwayes ſorrowing: for they that laugh when they doe euill, they laugh, but they reioyce not; and (as one ſaith) there is no truer miſerie, than this falſe ioy. Now if any worldlings boaſt that they ſecurely injoy their delights, without any ſuch pangs and terrours, it is a manifeſt argument that they haue a ſeared conſcience and hard heart, and are giuen ouer of God to a reprobate minde, and to commit ſinne with greedineſſe, till Gods wrath from heauen be reuealed againſt them? And conſequently they of all other are moſt ſharpely puniſhed, when as they haue no ſenſe of their puniſhment, and are moſt ſeuerely beaten when as they brag that they doe not ſmart.

Laſtly, whereas it is one of the chiefe comforts in this life to bee in the loue and fauour of God and men, outward proſperity and abundance of theſe earthly things, aſſureth vs of neither of them: for it is not a ſigne that we are choſen of Chriſt, that the world loueth vs, ſeeing it loueth onely his owne, and hateth thoſe who follow Chriſt. It is not a ſigne of our adoption when wee flouriſh in proſperitie, ſeeing the Lord chaſtizeth all thoſe whom he loueth, and they are baſtards and not ſonnes whom he correcteth not; whereas contrariwiſe wicked men doe moſt flouriſh in proſperity, as before I haue ſhewed. It is no good ſigne that wee are in the way to heauen when we haue all wee can wiſh, and find all things about vs pleaſant and comfortable, ſeeing the Scriptures teach vs, that thoſe muſt firſt bee conformable vnto Chriſt in ſufferings, who afterwards muſt bee conformable vnto him in glory, that the way to eternall happineſſe is afflicted and ſtraite, and that by manifold tribulations wee muſt enter into the kingdome of heauen. Againe, this ſtate of proſperity aſſureth vs not of the fauour of men; yea rather it maketh vs vtterly vncertaine who are our friends, and who are not. For they who flouriſh in the world haue many friends in ſhew, and few in truth, ſeeing they are friends to their proſperity, and not to themſelues, they honour their places and not their perſons; it is the idoll of wealth which the route adoreth, and not the aſſe that beareth it; it is the honie of profit which theſe hungrie flies haunt and not the pot that keepeth it; which being cleane waſhed, and the honie put into another veſſell, they ſtraight leaue that, and as cagerly follow this. It is not the man but mirth which is affected; and ſo long as they banquet, feaſt, and ſport together, they make great loue and friendſhip one to another; but let the bond of pleaſure be once broken, by want, or ſickneſſe, and theſe friends are ſtraightway ſcattered. And yet are men ſo blinded with ſelfe-loue, that being in proſperity, they thinke they haue ſo many friends as they haue flatterers; and howſoeuer their owne hearts tell them, that they themſelues fawne vpon many whom they doe not affect, and bow vnto a number whom they doe not inwardly honour, and keepe company with diuers, not for any great loue to their perſons, but becauſe they are fit inſtruments of their pleaſure and delight, light; yet such an opinion they haue of their owne worth, that they doe not once imagine that others pay them with their owne coine, but verily thinke that they are in good sadnesse, though themselues iest, and that all the honour and respect, loue and friendship which other men shew vnto them, is simple and from the heart, though they know that themselues make as faire a shew, and yet doe but counterfait and dissemble.

And thus it appeareth that these worldly things doe not profit, in helping vs to attaine vnto those things which are most esteemeable. But besides they are alike vnprofitable for the freeing of vs from the greatest euils, and succouring and deliuering vs in our greatest extremities. So the Prophet Samuel calleth them vaine things which cannot profit vs, nor deliuer vs, because they are but vanitie. For first, they doe not free vs from dangers, nor deliuer vs when wee are fallen into them; onely in the time of securitie and peace, they promise vs immunitie and freedome from perils, and in the time of danger they allure vs to relie vpon them; but when we come into our greatest extremities, they proue but reeds and broken staues, which doe not support vs, but rather wound our hearts with griefe, when as we see our selues forsaken of those things in time of neede, wherein wee placed our chiefe confidence. And as those who hauing fallen into the water, and are in danger of drowning, doe as they are falling, or whilest they are floating on the water, catch hold on that which is next at hand, neuer considering whether it bee sufficient to stay and hold them vp; and so their support prouing weake and rotten, faileth and falleth with them: so worldly men being ready to fall into the pit of danger, doe suddenly catch hold of the weake and brittle staies of earthly things, because they are neere them and subiect to their sense and sight: but they faile in their greatest extremitie, and notwithstanding any helpe which they will or can afford, they may well bee drowned in a sea of dangers, and perish whilest they hold those too weake staies betweene their hands. And as they doe not at all helpe vs themselues, so doe they disappoint and vtterly depriue vs of our chiefe hope and helpe which wee should haue in God; partly whilest trusting vnto them for deliuerance, we either not at all, or but in formall and faint manner haue our recourse vnto him, and craue his helpe, and partly because they haue made vs so to offend and displease God, that hee will not helpe vs. For when wee haue in the time of our peace and prosperitie giuen our hearts, which is Gods proper due, vnto these earthly idols, and haue loued and trusted in these creatures more than in the Creator, neuer leauing them, or leaning towards him, till we haue plainely found their insufficiencie and our owne error; then though we call vpon God he will not heare vs, though we flie vnto him hee will not helpe vs, but will in the time of our aduersitie leaue vs vnto those idols for succour and deliuerance, vpon which in the time of our prosperitie wee rested and relied; and suffer vs to fall in our owne ruine, which wee haue brought vpon our selues by our vaine confidence. Thus the Wise man telleth vs, that he who trusteth in his riches shall fall; and Iob coucheth both these together, shewing that neither will the worldling pray, nor the Lord heare him in the time of trouble. What hope (saith he) hath the hypocrite when hee he hath heaped vp riches, if God take away his soule? will God heare his crie when trouble commeth vpon him? will hee set his delight vpon the Almightie? will he call vpon God at all times? So that (as one saith) in respect of immunitie from dangers, they may sleepe more securely who are rich in their consciences, than they who are rich in these earthly vanities; for the all-sufficient God being the staffe of their stay, vpholdeth and supporteth them in the day of danger; but these who put their trust in these worldly things, may truly say with the wicked, We haue made falshood our refuge, and vnder vanitie are we hid. For the Lord wil bring vpon them the euils which they feared not, and in their greatest extremitie, he will make the cords of their confidence as weake as a rotten threed, exposing them to the laughter and scorne of all the godly, because they hauing left the Lord, their sure and sufficient hold, and rested vpon these broken reeds for helpe, haue caught a downe-fall through their owne folly. So the Psalmist saith, that when God shall execute iudgement in the destruction of these wicked worldlings, the righteous shall see it and feare, and shall laugh at them, saying, behold the man that tooke not God for his strength, but trusted in the multitude of his riches, and strengthned himselfe in his substance: but I (saith he) shall bee like a greene oliue tree in the house of God, for I haue trusted in the mercie of God for euer and euer.

Furthermore, the abundance of these earthly things doth not cure the body of sicknesses and diseases, which not being remoued make all the worlds comforts meerely vncomfortable. It is not worldly preferments, nor the praises of men, nor the highest seate, that will cure the gout, apoplexie, consumption and the rest; it is not the cap and the knee, which will preserue them to whom these courtesies are done, from stooping vnto sicknesse. It is not the honorable garter that will cure the gout,

1. Tim. 6. 10.

Apostle saith, that the desire of money is the roote of all euill, which while some haue lusted after, they erred from the faith, and pierced themselues thorow with many sorrowes.

§. Sect. 4. That worldly pleasures are void of true pleasure and sound delight.

Finally, euen the pleasures of the world are void of all pleasure and sound delight; for seeing they chiefly consist in those things which delight the flesh, and satisfie the carnall appetite, (they are seldome vsed without sinne, which in those whose consciences are not quite seared, hath such a sting accompanying it, that it marreth all their mirth, leauing after a short and vanishing pleasure (which a little while delighteth the eye, eare, and palat, or at vtmost reacheth no further than the throate,) much trouble and anguish of minde. For what is worldly pleasure, but as one calleth it, vnpunished wickednesse, which consisteth chiefly in reuelling and riot, in fornication and vncleanesse, in vaine sights and shewes, in gluttonie and drunkennesse; and this is the worlds delight, if impunitie also bee ioyned with it? Now seeing euery one of vs hath a Law without vs, forbidding and condemning sinne; and a conscience within vs accusing vs as transgressors, and applying vnto vs those threatnings of heauie iudgements which the Law denounceth against sinners; therefore it is not possible for worldly men to take any sound and solid ioy and comfort in these sinfull delights; but when they seeme most iocund and pleasant, they reioyce (as the Apostle speaketh) onely in the face, and not in the heart. And as the Wise man saith, their laughter is madnes; like to the laughter of phrantick men, which is onely from the teeth outward, and not naturall and kindly; or vnto those who are tickled, which laugh in their torment, as though they were rauished with ioy, when as inwardly they are vexed, and not delighted. And as the mourning and sorrow of the faithfull is not to bee reputed any extreame and bitter griefe, because it is mixed with so much ioy and comfort; and therefore the Apostle maketh it but a seeming sorrow: where he saith, as sorrowing, and yet alwayes reioycing: so contrariwise wicked worldlings haue no true ioy in their worldly pleasures, which is proper and peculiar vnto faithfull men, in their honest delights, which are warranted by the word, and approued by their owne conscience, but onely a counterfait semblance thereof; so that it may as truly bee said of them, as reioycing, and yet alwayes sorrowing: for they that laugh when they doe euill, they laugh, but they reioyce not; and (as one saith) there is no truer miserie, than this false joy. Now if any worldlings boast that they securely injoy their delights, without any such pangs and terrours, it is a manifest argument that they haue a seared conscience and hard heart, and are giuen ouer of God to a reprobate minde, and so runne headlong with greedinesse, till Gods wrath from heauen be reuealed against them: And consequently they of all other are most sharpely punished, when as they haue no sense of their punishment, and are most seuerely beaten when as they beg that they doe not smart.

Lastly, whereas it is one of the chiefe comforts in this life to bee in the loue and fauour of God and men, outward prosperity and abundance of these earthly things, assureth vs of neither of them: for it is not a signe that we are chosen of Christ, that the world loueth vs, seeing it loueth onely his owne, and hateth those who follow Christ. It is not a signe of our adoption when wee flourish in prosperitie, seeing the Lord chastizeth all those whom he loueth, and they are bastards and not sonnes whom he correcteth not; whereas contrariwise wicked men doe most flourish in prosperity, as before I haue shewed. It is no good signe that wee are in the way to heauen when we haue all wee can wish, and find all things about vs pleasant and comfortable, seeing the Scriptures teach vs, that those must first bee conformable vnto Christ in sufferings, who afterwards must bee conformable vnto him in glory, that the way to eternall happinesse is afflicted and straite, and that by manifold tribulations wee must enter into the kingdome of heauen. Againe, this state of prosperity assureth vs not of the fauour of men; yea rather it maketh vs vtterly vncertaine who are our friends, and who are not. For they who flourish in the world haue many friends in shew, and few in truth, seeing they are friends to their prosperity, and not to themselues, they honour their places and not their persons; it is the idoll of wealth which the route adoreth, and not the asse that beareth it; it is the honie of profit which these hungrie flies haunt and not the pot that keepeth it; which being cleane washed, and the honie put into another vessell, they straight leaue that, and as eagerly follow this. It is not the man but mirth which is affected; and so long as they banquet, feast, and sport together, they make great loue and friendship one to another; but let the bond of pleasure be once broken, by want, or sicknesse, and these friends are straightway scattered. And yet are men so blinded with selfe-loue, that being in prosperity, they thinke they haue so many friends as they haue flatterers; and howsoeuer their owne hearts tell them, that they themselues fawne vpon many whom they doe not affect, and bow vnto a number whom they doe not inwardly honour, and keepe company with diuers, not for any great loue to their persons, but because they are fit instruments of their pleasure and delight, light: yet such an opinion they haue of their owne worth, that they doe not esteeme their owne saluation worthy their owne paines, but really thinke that they are worthy of heauen, though themselues iest, and doe all the honour and respect, loue and friendship which other men shew vnto them, is simple and from the heart, though they know that themselues make as faire a shew, and yet doe but counterfait and dissemble.

And thus it appeareth that these worldly things doe not profit, in helping vs to attaine vnto those things which are most aduantageable. But besides they are alike vnprofitable for the freeing of vs from the greatest euils, and succouring and deliuering vs in our greatest extremities. So the Prophet Isaiah calleth them vaine things which cannot profit vs, nor deliuer vs, because they are but vanitie. For first, they doe not free vs from dangers, nor deliuer vs when wee are fallen into them; onely in the time of securitie and peace, they promise vs immunitie and freedome from perils, and in the time of danger they allure vs to relie vpon them; but when we come into our greatest extremities, they proue but reeds and broken staues, which doe not support vs, but rather wound our hearts with griefe, when as we see our selues forsaken of those things in time of neede, wherein wee placed our chiefe confidence. Worldly things do not cure the body of sicknesses and diseases.

Furthermore, the abundance of these earthly things doth not cure the body of sicknesses and diseases, which not being remoued make all the worlds comforts meerely vncomfortable. It is not worldly preferments, nor the praises of men, nor the highest seate, that will cure the gout, apoplexie, consumption and the rest; it is not the cap and the knee, which will preserue them to whom these courtesies are done, from stooping vnto sicknesse. It is not the honorable garter that will cure the gout, gout, or the chaire of eſtate that will helpe the ſtone and collicke, nor the crowne it ſelfe that will eaſe the head ach. Neither are riches more profitable for theſe purpoſes; for though a man haue goodly houſes, rich furniture, great reuenewes, and abundance of gold and ſiluer; yet all will not preuent the leaſt ſickneſſe before it commeth, nor free him of it when is hath ſeazed on him. Yea rather they are cauſes of weakning the ſtrength and impairing the health: for who ſeeth not by continuall experience that the poore doe much excell the rich; countrymen, citizens; and ſeruants their maſters in health and ſtrength, being much more able to indure hunger and thirſt, heate and cold, watching and painfull labour; and to continue in theſe laborious imployments without any great wearines, and with much chearefulneſſe, which in an inſtant would quite tire the other? And this commeth to paſſe, firſt, becauſe riches doe make men wanton and effeminate, whileſt they ouer-tenderly looke to their body, not ſuffering it to indure any hardnes, but inuiring it to warmth, daintines, and eaſe, which in a while cuſtome maketh ſo neceſſarie, that they cannot want any thing which they haue before vſed without impairing of their health. Secondly, becauſe either in getting, keeping, or diſpoſing their riches, or elſe by all theſe ioyned together, their heads are filled with cares, which will not let them ſleepe, nor take their reſt, without which health cannot long continue. So the Wiſe man ſaith, that the abundance of the rich will not ſuffer them to ſleepe, whereas the labouring man ſleepeth ſoundly, whether it bee much or little that he eateth. And the Sonne of Syrach telleth vs, that waking after riches doth pine away the bodie, and the care thereof driueth away ſleepe: This waking care breaketh the ſleepe, as a great ſickneſſe breaketh it. Thirdly, they impaire the health, as they miniſter food to voluptuouſnes whereon it ſurfetteth. In regard whereof one demandeth what we gaine by our riches, but drunkenneſſe, gluttonie, and abſurd pleaſures of all ſorts, which doe more hurt and torment vs, than moſt cruell maſters their ſlaues and bondmen. Laſtly, they prepare the ſeeds for all ſickneſſes and diſeaſes through their idleneſſe; for making it not onely a matter of eaſe, but of honour and ſtate, to abſtaine from all labour themſelues, and to doe all their buſineſſe by their ſeruants and deputies, they loſe that needfull exerciſe which preſerueth health, and for want of ſtirring, ſuffer hurtfull humours to increaſe and abound in them: neither haue they that ſtomacke and appetite to their meate, which they that labour haue, but come to their full tables, with fuller bellies and cloyed appetites, and ſo either eate nothing, or that which is worſe, againſt their ſtomackes. And whereas they who take paines neede no other ſauce but ſalt and hunger to ſharpen their appetite, becauſe exerciſe helpeth their digeſtion, and renueth their hunger, which giueth a good reliſh to their courſeſt fare, and maketh it wholeſome nouriſhment for their bodies: contrariwiſe, they who ſpend their time in ſloth and idleneſſe, wanting this helpe for their concoction, come to the table, hauing their ſtomackes full of the laſt meales crudities, which maketh them to loath their greateſt dainties, and ſo either to faſt, or to repleniſh and cram their bellies with renued glutonie. And as this abundance being vſually abuſed doth impaire health, ſo being ſicke, it commonly doth not helpe vs, but hinder our recouerie: and whereas the poorer ſort are much leſſe prone vnto ſickneſſe, or being ſicke, commonly need not the Phyſitions helpe, hauing onely ſome kitchin phyſicke, and knowne remedies, which being helped with the ſtrength of of their nature, doe eaſily reſtore them to their health; the richer ſort doe more eaſily, and often fall into diſeaſes, of which through their effeminate weakneſſe, and want of naturall ſtrength they cannot recouer; and therefore are faine to flie to the Phyſition vpon euery ſlight occaſion, from many of which they receiue ſo much the ſlower helpe, by how much the greater ſtore of money they haue to beſtow vpon them; and if they be not men of the better conſcience, all the good their wealth doth, is to betray them vnto further torment, and to make their liues to become a prey. By all which it appeareth that riches doe neither preſerue health, nor cure diſeaſes; yea rather it may bee truely ſaid, that the halls of the rich are the chiefe harborowes where diſeaſes inhabit. For as wormes ſooneſt breed in ſofteſt woods; and cankers moſt commonly gall and fret the goaleſt trees, which are tulleſt of ſap: ſo ſickneſſes moſt eaſily ſeaſe vpon ſuch bodies as are made moſt ſoft and effeminate with eaſe, wantonneſſe, and luxurious abundance; they hauing all diſeaſes incident to others, common vnto them, and certaine kinds of ſickneſſes proper and peculiar to themſelues, with which a man ſhall ſeldome heare that any poore man is troubled, as gouts, palſies, apoplexies and ſuch like, which are commonly the fruits of too great eaſe and plenty.

The like alſo may bee ſaid of wordly pleaſures, which being immoderatly loued, and exceſſiuely vſed, may well for the time delight the ſicke, but can neuer cure the ſickneſſe. Yea rather if wee aske the Phyſitions they will tell vs, that as temperance and abſtinence from theſe volupteous pleaſures sures is a speciall meanes both to preserue and recouer health; so the ouermuch vse of them is the chiefe cause of all sicknesses and diseases, and a notable hinderance vnto the recouerie of our health, when by any other accident it is impaired. For as one saith, hee that inureth a weake and sickly body to excesse of voluptuous pleasures; is like vnto him who launceth a leaking and rotten ship into the maine, for they doe not cure his maladies, but making open passages to let in a whole flood of more desperate diseases, they doe in the end wracke and sincke him. Hence it is that the Grecians (as one well obserued) called the intemperate, and they who wanted health by the same name, onely with the difference of one letter, to note the great affinity that is betweene sicknesse and intemperance. The which as it is true of the immoderate vse of all kinds of pleasures, so especially of those which consist in eating and drinking: for howsoeuer the sober and moderate vse of meats and drinks is a meanes ordained of God to preserue and recouer health and strength, and to affect vs also with honest delights; yet when men set their hearts vpon these pleasures, and place a kind of happinesse in abundant and daintie fare, they impaire their health, and bring vpon themselues innumerable dangerous and desperate diseases; for filling their stomackes with crude and indigested humours, and their heads with fumes: they within a while are vexed with megrims, palsies, consumptions, agues, goues, and what not? So that dearely doe they buy that short pleasure which they take in eating and drinking, which at the furthest extendeth but to the throate, whilest their diuers kinds of disagreeing meates being put into the same bellie, doe conflict one with another, and so ouerburthen and vexe the distended stomacke with their intestine dissension, that they occasion these voluptuous epicures to complaine of the last meales plentie, or of the vnwholesomnesse or ill cooking of some dish the next day; whereas they might more iustly complaine of their owne gluttony and intemperance, which present discommoditie is commonly attended vpon with grieuous and tedious diseases, as I haue shewed. In regard whereof the Grecians fitly call gluttony the throat, or belly frensie; for what greater madnesse can bee imagined, than for a short and brutish pleasure to lose the comfort of continuall health, and to sustaine the torments of tedious sicknesses? Yea in truth these gluttonous epicures vnwittingly deprive themselues of their maine end, which is their pleasure: for as temperate diet and meane fare is the mother, not onely of health, but also of delight; so contrariwise excesse and satiety, as it is the cause of many diseases, so also of loathsome dislike; for where there is fulnesse there is no appetite; and where appetite wanteth, there can bee no pleasure in eating and drinking. But these voluptuous pleasures which consist in meats and drinks, as they commonly deprive men of health and delight; so also of life it selfe, whilest their epicurisme and gluttony maketh way for diseases, and diseases for death. The which doth not alone seldome fall out by some rare-happening accident, but so frequently and daily, that wise obseruers haue not doubted to affirme, that many more haue died through gluttonie, than by the sword. So the sonne of Syrach saith, that by surfet many haue perished, but hee that dieteth himselfe prolongeth his life. With whom another agreeing saith, that gluttonie hath killed many, but spare diet none: wine hath hurt innumerable men, but abstemious sobriety no man; many haue lost their liues, or at least haue receiued their deaths wound euen at their banquets, defiling their tables with their owne blood; but not any haue miscaried with temperate diet. Yea howsoeuer famine is much more feared, yet in truth feasting is much more dangerous, both because innumerable numbers more perish by gluttonie than by want, and also because it bringeth them to their iourneyes end by a much more foule and tedious way: for whereas famine riddeth men out of their paine in a few dayes, this putrifieth and rotteth them (as it were) inch meale, and by tedious consumptions, and lingring torments, bringeth them at last to terrible, but yet often wished deathes. Neuertheless such is the follie of the most that they flee famine because of its fearefull visage, though few perish by it, and that by a more easie, or at least much more speedy death, and hug gluttonie in their bosomes, because a short pleasure accompanieth it, though it bring innumerable multitudes to much more foule and loathsome destruction.

And thus you see that these worldly things little auaile vs when wee lie vpon our sicke beds. But though they could profit vs, for the curing of some ordinarie and naturall diseases, by procuring vs physicke and better diet, yet how vnable are they to keepe backe old age, which is the next forerunner of death? For whilest these voluptuous pleasures, like strangers or enemies deuoure a mans strength, gray heires are heere and there vpon him, and he knoweth it not; as the Prophet speaketh in another matter. But though they could also stay the course of time, and we could by their helpe renew our age like the Eagle: yet what will they profit vs in the day of Gods wrath, when hee commeth in visitation to take venvengeance, on vs for our sinnes? Surely then shall the rich man cast his siluer into the streets, and his gold shall bee farre off; his siluer and gold cannot deliuer him in the day of the wrath of the Lord: So the Wise man saith, that riches auaile not in the day of wrath, but righteousnesse deliuereth from death; and therefore the Sonne of Syrach exhorteth vs, not to trust in our riches, nor to say that we haue enough for our life: for they shall not helpe in the time of vengeance and indignation. Finally, howsoeuer these worldly vanities do in the time of peace and security, like the ice beare vs vp, yet when the hot sunne of Gods wrath ariseth they shall melt away, and leaue vs to sincke in our greatest extremities: yea these earthly things shall in the day of Gods visitation, bee as fuell to his wrath, and make it burne more hot against those who haue abused them vnto sinne. The greater honours that men haue, the greater shall bee their ignominie and confusion of face at this day, if they haue not vsed them for the aduancing of Gods glory, and for the countenancing and maintaining of vertue and religion, as also for the discountenancing and suppressing of sinne and wickednesse. The greater wealth they haue, the greater shall be their plagues, if when God commeth to visit, it shall be found that they haue not by these rich talents honoured their Lord and Master, and comforted and relieued their fellow seruants, but haue consumed them on their owne lusts in riot and excesse. The more they haue abounded in voluptuous pleasures, the more shall they abound in paines; if in their mirth they haue kept no meane, and haue not onely recreated and refreshed themselues, but euen surfetted in these carnall delights, feeding (like the rich glutton) deliciously, and going richly apparelled euery day; and as the Prophet speaketh, drinking wine in bowles, delighting themselues with their sweete musicke, and stretching themselues on their iuorie beds, but in the meane time neuer remembring the afflictions of Ioseph, nor relieuing poore Lazarus with the crums of their table.

But let it bee supposed that these earthly vanities could preserue vs in safety our whole life; say they were armour of proufe to beate backe the gunshot of all euils whilest wee remaine in this worldly warfare; yet what will they profit vs when the houre of death approcheth? How vaine and insufficient shall wee then find them, to shield vs from this last mortall stroake, yea to purchase a reprieue euen vnto the next morning? For as they were no helpes to our birth and being, so they shall be no impedyments to our death and ending. How truly may wee then say to them, after that wee haue our whole life relied on their helpe, as Iob to his friends; Miserable comforters are you all; seeing when we most need refreshing, they will not afford vnto vs any consolation: not vnfitly in this respect compared to the brookes of Arabia, which are most drie when the passengers stand in most need of water. For when we are tormented with the pangs of death, and are terrified with the threatnings of the Law, and vexed with the inward accusations of our owne consciences, and affrighted with the apprehension of Gods deserued wrath, and assaulted with the subtile and strong tentations of our spirituall enemies; and besides our owne griefes, see our friends weeping and lamenting about vs, as being loath to part, and yet vnable to stay vs; when these (I say) and many other vnauoidable euils haue beset vs; what will it auaile vs, that we haue led our whole life in flourishing prosperity, and abounded in all which our hearts could desire: seeing now they can minister vnto vs no helpe, in this our last and greatest extremitie, but leaue and forsake vs when we stand in most neede of consolation? What comfort shall wee then find, that wee haue sate in the seat of honour, and beene aduanced to the chiefe preferments, and haue for small or no deserts beene famous and glorious in the eares and eyes of men? Seeing, as the Psalmist saith, these mortall gods must die as a man, and these Princes shall fall like others, and when the glorie of their house is most increased, they shall take nothing away when they die, neither shall their pompe descend after them, but these honorable personages shall bee like to the beasts that perish. And though they haue shined in glorious brightnesse, whilest the lampe of life lasted, yet if their light be not still nourished with the remembrance of their vertues, graces, and good deseruings, it shall then goe out and vanish away in smoake and stincke. What will it profit vs that we haue multiplied our treasures as the sands of the sea, seeing these golden rayes shall then set, and bring no comfort vnto vs in the night of death? How true then shall we find our Sauiour Christ, saying, that our life consisteth not in our riches and abundance? How easily then shall we subscribe to the saying of the Wise man, The treasures of vnrighteousnesse profit nothing; but righteousnesse deliuereth from death? Then shall wee finde the Prophets similitude fitted vnto vs: As the Partridge gathereth the young which shee hath not brought forth: so hee that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leaue them in the middest of his dayes, and at his end shall bee a foole. What will it auaile vs that we haue all our barnes full, when as the same night our soules shall be taken from vs? to leaue rich rich Cheests behind vs, & to take with vs soules quite empty of all grace and goodnesse? to be-queath much riches to the World, and to carry no good workes with vs to the seat of iudgment? What good will our wealth doe vnto vs, which in all our liues we haue so dearely loued, as though it were this golden Ladder which would mount vs vp into Heauen; seeing see this fearefull houre, Peters curse will accompany it; Thy money perish with thee; because wee thought our heauenly inheritance could bee bought with this earthly trash? Finally, what comfort shall we then take in our worldly delights, seeing like a Cloud they are vanished away, and haue left nothing behind them but griefe and heauinesse? What pleasure shall wee then take in merry company, when as now none but our mourning friends stand about vs? Or in our former feasting, and delight in eating and drinking, when as our taste failing vs, wee can find no sweetnesse in our best dainties? Or what now helpeth it vs to haue often heard melodious Musicke, to haue seene many delightfull shewes, and to haue spent much of our time in vain sports and pastimes, when as being all passed away like a dreame in the night, nothing tarrieth with vs but paine, feare and anguish of minde? In a word, after we haue long tired our selues in hunting after these worldly vanities, we shal then conclude that wee haue spent our strength in vaine, and in our hands haue found nothing: for then all these things being taken from vs, wee shall goe out of the World as naked and bare as we came into it, hauing nothing of all which wee possessed, but a poore sheet to couer vs. And as the Milstone which curneth about all day, grinding Corne for others, and not for it selfe, doth at night stand in the same place where it was in the morning, and after that great plenty of graine hath passed by it, is emptied of all, hauing no good by the bargaine, but to weare it selfe out for the profit of others: so worldly men in attaining vnto earthly vanities toyle themselues the whole day of this life, & when the night of death approcheth, they are in the same case that they were in when they began, & hauing now only their labour for their paines, they retaine nothing of all that which hath passed through their hands but are constrained to leaue them to the World, from whom they first had them.

Now consider further, that by reason of this relinquishing all which they so well loue, they shall not only at their departure bring no comfort, but much griefe and bitternesse. For seeing in the whole course of their life, they haue set their affections chiefly vpon them, therefore when they are constrained to leaue them, they sustaine no lesse sorrow, than if their hearts were pulled out of their bodies; and as impatiently beare this seperation between themselues and their Idols, as the ensuing separation betweene their soules and their bodies. Thus will the paines of death be doubled to ambitious men (who hauing spent their whole liues in making themselues knowne vnto others, doe die vnknowne to themselues) when as all their preferments forsake them which they loued, as well as their liues, and much better than their soules. Thus the rich man griueth to part with his riches, more than to part with his life, and is tormented as much that another must haue them, as that hee must leaue them. And thus the voluptuous man sorroweth because he must now leaue all his pleasant company, good fare, and delightfull sports and pastimes, which all his life he hath loued much better than his owne soule. Now the reason of this their double death, and extreame sorrow: is first, because they part with these things which their soule loueth, hauing no hope of obtaining better things after this life. For whereas (as the Wiseman speaketh) the righteous hath his chiefe hope euen in his death: contrariwise, when a wicked man dieth his hope perisheth, and the hope of the vnjust shall perish. And what hope (saith Iob) hath the Hypocrite, when he hath heaped vp riches, if God take away his soule? No maruell therefore if they sorrowfully part with their false Idols, when as they haue no hope of enjoying the true God; and leaue with griefe worldly vanities, when they haue no assurance of heauenly joyes. Secondly, this parting with the world and worldly things, shall be at that day most bitter and grieuous, because when they forsake them, they shall leaue that sinne behind them, which hath beene occasioned by them, either in their getting, keeping, or disposing them. For being stripped of all these things, nothing shall be left vnto them but the gaules of an euill conscience, which in sense of smart shall then cry out vpon them, because they haue aspired vnto Honours by Machiauellian policies, or haue not vsed their credit and authority, for the aduancing of vertue and suppressing of sinne; and haue made themselues rich with deceit and oppression, or haue not communicated their wealth to the reliefe of the poore, and the furthering of pious and charitable actions; and haue wallowed in carnall pleasures, vtterly neglecting the meanes of attaining vnto the joyes of Heauen. And thus sinne shall accompany them when all things else shall leaue them. And as Zophar speaketh, The wicked mans bones are full of the sinnes of his youth, and they shall lie downe with him in the dust: with all which troubles, how miserably is the soule of the wretched Wordling troubled and tormented, when as hee shall vnderstand that in treasuring ting vp these earthly vanities, hee hath also treasured vp vengeance against this day of the declaration of Gods wrath; and that through that narrow way which hee must passe there is roome enough for his sinnes to goe with him, but no passage for these things which by his sinnes he hath compassed? For Death like an inexorable Porter standing at the doore, will not suffer any of these worldly things to goe with him, but being the Worlds, to the World hee must leaue them. O how true then will hee finde the saying of our Sauiour, What will it profit a man to gain the whole world, and to lose his owne soule? How much would hee giue at this day for a good conscience, and to haue peace made betweene God and it? How will he condemne his owne folly for consuming his life and strength in seeking these worldly vanities which now must leaue him, neglecting those heauenly joyes which being once obtained, would neuer haue forsaken him? How much now doth he prefer a dram of grace before an earthly Kindome, and a few good workes, before a world of riches? Finally, willingly now would he, if he might, exchange all his glory, wealth and carnall delights, with the scorne, pouerty, and afflictions of the most contemned Christian, so that also hee might share with him in his hopes, and partake with him in those heauenly joyes.

9. Sect. 12. That worldly things profit not after our separation.

But though these earthly vanities could profit vs at our last departure, by sweetning death, and making its sting lesse grieuous, yet what good will they doe vs after our separation? Seeing now there is no difference betweene the rich and the poore, the King and the Begger; betweene him who languished in misery and trouble, and another which hath spent his life in pleasures and pastimes? For as nature putteth no difference between the one & the other in their birth; so neither doth it distinguish between the after their death: al haue the like ingresse & egresse when they enter into, and leaue the World; alike in the wombe, & alike in the Graue. For open the earth, and see if thou canst discerne the rich from the poore, or the Noble from the base; saue that only there is this difference, that more perisheth with the one than with the other; the rich hauing a fairer Tombe and finer Sheete, or more sweete Odours wherewith he is embalmed; all which are losses to the liuing, and not helpes to the dead, seeing these good things are bereaued of their grace and sweetnesse, but doe not inrich the dead Corps with their vertue and excellencie. Yea, if in this life wee haue set our hearts vpon these vanities, esteeming and louing them better than God himselfe, his spirituall Graces and heauenly joyes; if vnrepented sinne haue accompanied them, either in their getting or fruition, then how vnprofitable shall wee find them after death, yea, how hurtfull and pernicious to our wretched soules? For what will it auaile vs to be extolled where wee are not, and to bee condemned where wee are? to haue with Dives rich friends on earth, which haue the command of whole Riuers, and to bee our selues in Hell fire, not being able to obtaine a small drop of water with earnest intreaty? to haue left many delights behind vs, and to haue nothing but torments with vs? O how many Worlds would a man in this case giue for the redemption of his soule out of these hellish torrures, which he hath plunged himselfe into for the obtaining, for a small moment of time (as it were) a little handfull of these earthly vanities? How much doth hee now loath those things which before hee so much loued, seeing by wofull experience hee findeth that they haue depriued him of those true and eternall joyes, and haue beene the occasions of his fearefull condemnation?

Finally, though worldly vanities should accompany vs to the graue, yet what will they profit vs at the day of judgement? for then we shall be examined, not how we haue flourished in the World, but how faithfully we haue serued God. Neither will the Lord our Iudge then consider how honourable we haue beene amongst men, but how much we haue honoured him, who hath caused vs to be thus honoured; nor what great Offices we haue borne, but how wee haue discharged them; nor respect vs according to our earthly preferments, but according to the measure of that glory which by them wee haue deriued to him, and of that good which we haue done to his Church, and the poore members of Iesus Christ, with that credit and authority wherewith God endowed vs. Then the Lord will not regard how many prayses we haue had amongst men, but how praise worthy we haue beene in his sight; not how they haue magnified vs, but how we haue magnified his glorious name; nor how many Caps and Knees we haue had from our inferiours, but how oft and zealously we haue humbled our soules, and bowed the knees of our hearts in praying vnto him for his mercies wanting; and in prayising him for his benefits receiued. Then will not our Iudge respect vs for our riches which wee had in the World, (for he will not receiue bribes, neither shall we then haue any thing to giue) but those at this day shall haue his fauour, who haue abounded in the spirituall riches of his sanctifying Graces. He will not regard how rich we haue beene in Lands, but in holinesse of life, not in our Chests, but in our Consciences; hee will not esteeme vs for our wealth, but for our good workes; nor yet because wee in this life had abundance, but because wee did liberally bestow it in the workes of Charity and Mercy, and spared for no cost to further all pious and religious actions; v-

sing like faithfull Stewards these rich talents vnto the glory of our Master, and the good of our fellow seruants. Neither shall those who heere hunted after worldly gaine be respected, because they seized on their prey, but he that hath followed after righteousnesse and mercy, shall find life, righteousnesse and glorie; as the Wise man speaketh. Finally, the pleasures of this life will then little profit vs, neither will it availe vs that wee haue had much joy in the World, but joy in the Holy Ghost; not that wee haue abounded in worldly delights, but that our soules haue delighted themselues in the Lord, and rejoyced in him, not onely in prosperity, but also in affliction and tribulation. Yea, contrariwise we shall find at this day that these worldly things shall but increase our bils of account, seeing wee shall be called to a reckoning how wee haue gotten, kept and disposed them; which accounts if we cannot make euen, either by shewing how wee haue imployed the talents receiued, or by laying before the eyes of our Iudge our acquittance and generall pardon bought with Christs precious bloud, and sealed vnto vs by his holy Spirit, wee shall be cast into the prison of outer darkenesse, there to remaine vntill wee haue paid the vtmost farthing. So that at this day those shall be our burthens, which were heere our honours; all our riches shall then be turned into debts which we must satisfie by our selues or by our Sauiour, shewing how wee haue laid them out in the seruice of our Master, hauing his Word for our warrant, or where wee are short in our reckoning pleading Christs payment. And for all our passed pleasures we shall, as the Wise man telleth vs, be brought vnto judgement. Then shall all that Honour which wee haue receiued of men, and haue not returned vnto God, be imputed vnto vs as stealth and sacriledge. Then shall our riches which we haue hoorded vp, and not imployed in the seruice of our Master, & reliefe of our fellow seruants, be accounted as stolne goods, and the rust of our siluer and gold shal be a witnesse against vs. Then shall all our pleasures but aggrauate our paines; if we haue not by them as by honest recreations, beene better fitted for Gods seruice, but haue vsed them immoderately, spending a great part of our life in sports and pastimes. O then what will it availe vs to haue beene praysed of men, God and our our owne consciences not approuing vs; seeing wee shall not now be defended of men when God shall judge, nor deliuered by them, when he shall condemne vs? What will it profit vs to haue beene rich in the World, when as being stripped of all, wee shall haue nothing left but our sinnes and scares which they haue made in our consciences in getting or vsing them? Finally, what good shall our passed pleasures then bring vnto vs, when as hauing abandoned and left vs, nothing remayneth of them but pollution and filthinesse of soule, and the just wrath of God, whom wee haue displeased by pleasing our selues with these wicked delights? or in a word, What will it profit vs to haue gained the whole world, and to haue lost our owne soules? Mark 8.36.

Seeing therefore these worldly things profit vs not, either as meanes to procure our chiefe good, or to free vs from our greatest euils. Seeing they doe not inwardly inrich vs with vertue and sauing grace, nor outwardly by good workes; seeing they doe not bring vnto vs true delight and comfort, and neither assure vs of the loue of God, nor fauour of men. Seeing they doe not free vs from dangers, nor cure our bodily diseases; nor yet preserue vs in the day of vengeance from Gods deserued plagues; nor minister vnto vs any true comfort or helpe at the houre of death, after death, or at the day of judgement: therefore let vs not any more ouer-ualue these vnprofitable trifles, nor set our hearts and affections too much vpon them; but rather let vs esteeme, affect and seeke after Gods spirituall Graces, and heauenly joyes, as being alone truely profitable, and nothing else in the World without them.

Let vs delight our selues in hearing and meditating in Gods Word, & vpon our own experience we shall conclude with the Prophet Dauid that the Law of Gods mouth is better vnto vs, than thousands of gold and siluer. Let vs labour to inrich our hearts with godlinesse, which as the Apostle saith, is the greatest gaine with contentation: for it is profitable for all things, as hauing the promises of this life and of the life to come; the former to sustaine and comfort vs for a time, because God promiseth vs his helpe; the latter to satisfie vs for euer, because hee promiseth vs himselfe. And if the profit of these spirituall graces doe not fully content vs, by reason of their imperfections and our owne corruptions, let vs labour to attaine vnto assurance of heauenly happines, where we shall be perfect both in grace and glory. Let vs affect those eternall Honours which are accompanied with all good, and freed from all euill. Let vs lay vp our treasures there where neither theeues can steale them, nor fire consume them; let vs labour after those euerlasting joyes which wil fill vs with pleasure, and more profit vs than the worlds Monarchy. Which if wee once possesse, though it be but in assurance of faith, we wil easily in comparison thereof, not only contemne these earthly vanities as base and vnprofitable, but also abhorre them as losse and disaduantage, when they are the Deuils wages, hiring vs by sinning to hazard this happinesse, or his alluring baites to weane our hearts and affections from these heauenly excellencies.

CHAP. XXII.

HAVE shewed the vanity and vnprofitablenesse of these worldly things, which were sufficient to weane our hearts from them, though there were no other reasons: for who would affect these worthlesse vanities, which neither satisfie, nor profit those that haue them? But though it should be granted, that they were not thus vaine, but in their owne nature of some worth; say that in themselues they were profitable, and therefore to be desired; yet let vs further know, that they are so mingled with miseries, and so distasted with the bitternesse of adherent euils, as that there is no reason why wee should much esteeme them, or set our hearts vpon them. For let vs put into the one Scale, those things that wee thinke worthy the name of good, which is to be desired; and into the other, the miseries, euils, inconueniences, and discontentments which alwayes doe accompany them; and wee shall finde that there is no proportion, betweene the huge heape of the one, and the little graine of the other; betweene the ocean of misery, and small drop of true delight and happinesse. It is true that this notable Hypocrite the World is alwayes ready to deceiue vs, by promising vnto vs excellent benefits, and things sincerely good, without the mixture of any euill; but when it commeth to performance, behold it tempereth a dram of Hony with a pound of Gall; it promiseth all good, but it payeth vs with euill, or at least mixeth it with so little good, that it serueth but to giue vs a more quicke taste and true relish of those euils which accompany it. It promiseth life and payeth death; it proffereth joy, but behold it giueth sorrow; and commonly if we haue but one good meale of delight and comfort, we must walke in the strength thereof many dayes, and hauing nothing to feed vpon but trouble and discontent, lose all that former pleasure many times ouer, with griefes and crosses, before our comforts be againe renued. And thus doth the World, like a stately built Sepulchre, make vnto vs outwardly a goodly shew, though there bee nothing within but rottennesse and putrefaction; and like a subtile Merchant, it offereth vs a good sample of bad wares, and outwardly presenteth to our view the best end of the fleece, whereas the inmost and middle parts are course and slight; and placeth the purest and choicest commodities in the vpper part of the vessell, whereas in the middle and the bottome, it is mixt, counterfeit, and purposely falsified to deceiue vs. Neither in truth is it more apt to deceiue, than we to be deceiued; for as those who are borne in a Mill are so well acquainted with noise, that it little disquieteth them; and as they who are bred and brought vp in a prison, are not much troubled with their restraint, nor offended with their little light, nor grieued to carry their Giues and Bolts; yea, contrariwise, when their irons are but a little lightned, they are comforted and refreshed, as though they were set at liberty, and thinke a little bettering of their scant and hungry meales, a great Feast and dainty Banquet: whereas those who haue beene brought vp in great plentie and full libertie, sorrow at the others joyes, and are tormented with griefe, in the middest of their wretched comforts. So because wee are from the first moment of our birth brought vp and inured to this noise of miseries; because wee had our first being, and breeding in this wretched prison of the World, we are ready to loue and rejoyce in our little inlarged imprisonment, as though we had attained vnto perfect liberty, and to account our least miseries our greatest happinesse. Whereas if either without first Parents we had euer tasted of the joyes of Paradise, or had but only in Vision with the blessed Apostle, the least glimpse of our heauenly glory, the Worlds greatest liberty would appeare to bee a thraldome, and his most delicious sweets would be as bitter as gall, and as loathsome to our taste as the infusion of Wormewood, yea, in truth as the Chymicall extraction of Colyquintida.

But the miseries of the World and worldly things may be more cleerely shewed, by considering the testimonies of those who haue spoken vpon their own experience, and as they haue beene guided by Gods Spirit, which can neither deceiue nor be deceiued; as also by insisting in some speciall instances of these miseries, wherewith all men generally are acquainted. The holy Patriarch Iacob speaking as he had found by lamentable experience, telleth Pharaoh, that the dayes of his life had beene few and euil: and this Iob inlargeth to all the sonnes of men, saying, that man who is borne of a woman, is of short continuance and full of trouble: yea, the Wise man himselfe who had taken the deepest draught in the golden Cup of the Worlds prosperitie, euen after he had glutted himself with voluptuous pleasures, concludeth that all is not only vanity, but also vexation of spirit, & that all mans dayes are sorrowes, & his trauaile grief, so that his heart can take no rest, no not in the night, which time is purposely destinated to rest and quietnesse: and elsewhere he affirmeth, that the misery of man is great vpon him. With which heauenly penly Oracles of diuine Truth, agree the manifold testimonies of the wiser sort of men. The Sonne of Syrach saith, that great trauaile is created for all men, and an heauy yoke for the sonnes of Adam, from the day that they goe out of their mothers wombe, till the day that they returne to the mother of all things: Namely, their thoughts, and feare of heart, and the imagination of the things they wait for, and the day of death. From him that sitteth vpon the glorious throne vnto him that is humbled in the earth and ashes. From him that is clothed with blew silke and weareth a Crowne, euen vnto him that is clothed in simple Linnen: wrath and enuy, trouble and vnquietnesse, feare of death, rigour, strife, &c. With him agreeth another, who was herein more wise and learned, because he saw and acknowledged his owne ignorance; O Lord my God (saith hee) this life present is full of labour and tribulation, as being led with bitter mourning, and lost with brutish teares; yea, so great is the affliction of this wretched life, that it deserueth to be called rather a death, than life; or some thing else, which is worse than death; seeing scarce any man passeth a day thereof, without cumbersome crosses, and cause of griefe. Behold (saith another) the World in passing by troubleth vs, and yet we loue it; it deceiueth vs, and we account it faithfull; it killeth vs, and yet as life it is sought it is affected and desired, it winded from vs, and wee embrace it. O defiling World, how wouldest thou rauish thy Louers with delight, if thou diddest flourish? but flourish thou doest not; seeing thou hast no sincere ioy, or stable constancy, but thy honey and sweetnesse hath his bitternesse, false delights, certaine griefe, vncertaine gladnesse, hard labour, fearefull rest, replenished miseries, and an empty hope of happinesse. And elsewhere, This present life is fraile & miserable, vncertaine, deceiuing, and vnstable: we are borne in paine and sorrow, we are nourished in misery & difficulty, we liue in labour and die in griefe; and in the end (which is most to be lamented) if we depart impenitent, we plunge our soules into the paines of hell. But this misery of mans life will better appeare, if we consider it in the parts thereof, which are chiefly two, sinne and punishment; of the former, we are borne in our first conception, so wholly defiled with that corruption of nature which hath beene deriued vnto vs from our first Parents, that we are not only dead in sinne, but dead to grace and all goodnesse, vnable so much as to moue in the way of righteousnesse which leadeth vnto life, although we runne with headlong hast in the way of wickednesse, which bringeth those vnto destruction that continue therein. And from this fountaine of originall sinne, flow the pernicious streames of actuall transgressions, whereby we breake continually, through the whole course of our life, all the Commandements of Almighty God, omitting the duties which he hath commanded and committing the sins which he hath forbidden. In which misery of sinne we are wholly plunged before we are called and conuerted vnto God, committing all manner of wickednesse with full swinge and consent of will, delighting our selues and rejoycing in our rebellion; by reason whereof we are naturally strangers and enemies vnto God, subiect to his wrath, to the curse of the Law, and to all those fearefull plagues and punishments, which therein are denounced against Transgressours, the slaues of sinne and Satan, and heires of eternall death. Yea, and after wee are conuerted vnto God, the flesh continually lusteth against the Spirit, and the corruptions of nature remayne so strong in vs, that wee cannot doe the good wee would, but the euill which wee would not doe, that doe we. And as we are by this Law of our members rebelling against the Law of our minde, daily led captiue vnto sinne; so are we thereby in such sort disabled, that we cannot, to the day of our death, offer vnto God any one pure and perfect duty, without the filthy spots and staines of our corruption. Now what a misery is this, that we who were created Gods glorious creatures, according to his owne Image, to the end that we should serue him in holinesse of life, should, as though wee had forgotten the end wherefore we came into the World, neglect all duty to our Creatour, and become voluntary slaues to sinne and Satan, ready to doe his will; though wee haue nothing for our wages but eternall death? Yea, euen after we are called and reconciled vnto God, how great is our misery whilest wee continue in this life, seeing we are daily intangled in the snares of sinne, and haue our best actions so imperfect and stained with our corruptions, that if the Lord should examine them according to his righteous iudgment, they would deserue a curse rather than a blessing, and punishment rather than a reward? What a misery is this, that after we haue with Iacob preuailed with God, we should halt of our corruptions to the day of death; and after we haue broken out of the prison of Satans bondage, and shaken off the chaines of his subiection, all our ioynts should be so stiffe and benummed, that we should to the very end of life, lamely performe all holy duties, and halt like wretched cripples in the wayes of God? Finally, that the more time is added to our dayes, the more we should adde to the heap of our sins, and prouoke our good God to just displeasure, who hath so tenderly loued vs, that hee gaue his owne deare Sonne to death for the purchasing of our redemption?

And this is the chiefe part of all our misery, as being that cursed fountain from which all the rest spring and flow; for by reason here-of all the creatures in the World are made subject to corruption, and being made for blessings, they are turned into punishments; and though outwardly they seeme excellent and desirable, yet this hidden poyson of sinne secretly lurking in them, maketh vs to cast them vp with griefe, when with great pleasure wee haue swallowed them downe. So that euen those things which wee chiefly affect are full of wretchednesse, besides those innumerable miseries joyned with them, which all taking notice of, doe abhorre and shun. And though the things we desire were freed from outward and accidentall euils; yet themselues bring with them misery enough to make them justly loathsome to all that judiciously taste and relish them. For the chiefe goodnesse of these worldly things which we desire, consisteth not in any absolute excellency that is in themselues, but onely as they are present helpes to free vs for the time from the euils which we feare; and no other worth or esteeme haue they but as they come commended by some vrgent necessity: thus wee desire riches, not so much for any excellency wee see in them, as because wee feare and shun pouerty: thus Honours are esteemed, because wee feare disgrace; thus meate hath onely so much goodnesse in it, as men haue hunger that feed vpon it, and drinke hath its worth from thirst; thus Summer is commended vnto vs by Winter, warmth by our colde, and the coole aire by intemperate heate. In a word, nothing in the World is esteemed good, but onely so far forth as it bringeth letters of commendations from necessity, and serueth as a present means to free vs from euill, and to make vs lesse miserable. And if wanting the prayse which need imparteth vnto it, it offer it selfe vnto vs, it is vnwelcome, and we forthwith loath and dislike it. If meate come before hunger haue made way for it in our desires, who is not glutted with the sight of it? If drinke be not commended by thirst, who regardeth it? If we haue more clothes laid on vs when we are hot enough, we esteeme it a burthen and not a benefit: If abundance of wealth were offered vnto vs, not hauing before any want of it, and consequently no desire, we would not much value it. Finally, so much worth and esteeme these worldly things haue, as wee haue first want and misery. So that in truth he who hath most need, and is most wretched, he hath most joy and comfort by these earthly vanities when he hath liberty to enjoy them; he who is most hungry hath also most pleasure by meate; he that is diuillest, hath most delight in drinke; and we must first want in state, or at least in minde, before riches haue any great welcome. Yea, pleasure it selfe hath no sweet relish till our appetite be sharpened by the sharpe sawce of misery and affliction, neither would any man thinke himselfe more happy for the accesse of worldly things, vnlesse it were for former feit, or future feared vnhappinesse.

In which respect our life is most fitly compared to a continuall disease: for when wee begin to liue, we begin to be sicke; and these worldly things which wee so much esteeme, are but Medicines for our Maladies, and playsters for our sores, which do not perfectly cure vs, but onely giue vs some present ease. For in truth the diseases are naturall, hereditary, rooted in our first principles, and hauing setled themselues in our bones and marrow they are incurable. And therefore as that is esteemed the best Medicine for the Gout which remoueth the fit, and that the best salue which keepeth the incurable vlcer cleane and sweet: so those are esteemed best among worldly things, that for the present serue as Medicines to ease our naturall miseries, which it is altogether impossible fully to heale and cure. This will better appeare if we consider of some speciall instances; for what is hunger but a disease, which will consume a man in a few dayes, like that called the Wolfe, which if it be not fed with outward things, feedeth vpon the body till it haue destroyed it? And what is meate but the Medicine of that sicknesse, which because it cannot perfectly cure it, therefore it is continually applyed to remoue the fit, and to asswage the present paine? What is thirst but a sicknesse, which would soone dispatch vs, vnlesse drinke as a Physicall potion did for the instant serue for a remedy? So what is watching but a naturall disease? and what is sleepe but the Medicine, that for the time helpeth it? What is queasinesse but the soules Feuer? And what riches, but as a Medicine which sometime easeth the fit for the present, though afterwards it bee more raging? What ambition, but the hearts Tympany? And what Honours, but an instant refreshing, which for a while allayeth the griefe, though it rather increaseth than abateth the swelling? What is voluptuousnesse, but as the Wise man calleth it a mercy madnesse, which hath some present comfort, by pleasures and delights? What is labour, but a sicknesse, which rest easeth? What standing, but an infirmitie, which sitting mitigateth? And this also long vsed becommeth of a Medicine a disease, which another kind of disposition or posture of the body doth for the time refresh? All which though custome make them so familiar, that we doe not take any serious regard of them, yet if wee could possibly be freed from them but one yeare, and liue without hunger, thirst, cold, heate, labour, concupiscence, we would account them as troublesome diseases, if againe they should seaze vpon vs. And

9. Sect. 5. That mans life is a continuall disease, and worldly things, medicines to cure it. Nasci hic in corpore morbi incipere aegrotare est, inquit Plato. Ennius.

And thus man first made miserable by sin, doth but shew his wretchednesse whileſt hee frolickes it out in the fruition of those things wherein he chiefly delighteth; and being sicke of innumerable maladies, hee is perfectly cured of none; but onely is eased for the time by often changing his miseries with one another, hungring and eating, and after eating, againe hungring; interchanging waking with sleeping, and sleeping with waking, like a sicke man turning from side to side, to find some short repriuall of his paine; or as if one should leape out of the scorching heat, into the chilling cold, and often interchange the one for the other, accounting both his refreshing, whereas in truth they are both his torment. For so is man naturally besotted on these earthly trifles, if he be ignorant of true happinesse, and hath not fixed his heart on God and heauenly things, that he laboureth to haue them in abundance, which he hath no sooner attained vnto, but hee hath also the vsuall companion thereof, glutting satietie and loathsome wearines; and no sooner is he thus cloyed, but presently hee seeketh to refresh his dulled appetite with varietie and change; one while desiring motion, and another while rest, now affecting mirth, and soone after solemne grauitie; in the night wishing for day, and in the day for night, in heate for cold, and in cold for heate; eating and fasting, waking and sleeping, dressing and vndressing, sitting and standing, walking and lying, with such often iteration, as might well cause a loathing satietie, when as he is alwayes in the same motion, like the horse in the mill, and (as the Wise man speaketh) seeth no new thing vnder the Sun.

But besides these inherent euils which make these worldly vanities so much desired, in themselues distastefull, they are conioyned and mingled with innumerable other miseries which adhere vnto them; the which so far exceed in number, quantitie & quality, all the earthly delights & comforts which we enjoy, as the brambles the roses, or the field weeds the garden flowers. For who seeth not, yea who cannot speake vpon his owne feeling experience, that no day passeth without a number of miseries attending on it, whileſt either the euils wee feare do fall vpon vs, or the good things we hoped for faile vs, and deceiue our expectation, or the comforts which we presently enioy are either indeed lost, or at least wee in some danger, and feare of losing them? In which respect the miseries of this life may fitly bee compared to Iobs messengers, of which one had no sooner made an end of speaking, but another presently beginneth his tale; or like vnto the billowes of the sea, which without intermission come tumbling one in the necke of another, giuing vnto vs scarce time of breathing, till wee rest in the hauen of death. It is true that some of these miseries doe one so much exceed another, that the lesse is swallowed vp of the greater, like the riuers by the sea, and is not discerned, though if it came alone, it would force complaining: and so predominant are some griefes, that the lesser appeare no more, than the Starrs when the Sunne shineth, not that they are taken away but because the greater working a more vnhement impression, maketh vs insensible of the lesse. Yea so are we for our sinnes iustly scanted of things truly good, that to make some little equalitie to our owne comfort, wee are faine to fill vp the number by putting into the ranke of good things, those which wee thinke least euill, and things truely desireable failing vs, to make choice of such as are least worthie to bee refused. Herein behauing our selues like vnto politike Commanders, who seeing the armie of their enemies farre to exceed their owne partie in strength and number, haue, to fill vp places, and to increase their multitude, made shew of women in stead of men, and set vp a farre off on stakes puppets and skarecrowes for fighting souldiers, to dishearten the enemie, and encourage their owne followers. So wee being incountred with innumerable euils, and hauing few things truly good to refresh and cheare vs against their assaults, are faine to make choice of shadowes in stead of substances, and to make many things good onely by reputation and imaginarie esteeme, which a sound and vnpartiall iudgement scarce thinketh tolerable euils. Now if we further consider, that as our miseries doe infinitly in number exceed our comfort; so also one of them is sufficient to infuse such bitternes into a multitude of our most desired delights, that we cannot relish their sweetnesse; that one ounce of this gall of miserie, maketh loathsome a whole pound of our sugred ioyes, and that a small dram of this Colyquintida, is enough to distaste a whole a pot of pottage, making it to sauour of death; then how little sweetnes of comfort must wee needs haue, when as the part which wee loath and abhorre, so innumerable degrees exceedeth that which we like and loue? For who seeth not that one tooth aking doth more vex vs, than the health of all the rest of the body can delight vs? that wee are more tormented with a small losse, than comforted with great possessions? that when but one friend of many is taken away, wee haue more true griefe by him which is lost, than ioy and contentment in all the rest? that wee are more disquieted with one disgrace, than delighted with many honours? and that wee are not so much pleased in the fruition of many things loued and desired, as wee are displeased when we are cut short of our hopes, or are troubled and cumbred with some euill which we loath and hate? And the reason is, because miseries doe make a much deeper impression in vs than our comforts, partly because they being in this vale of teares, (as it were) in their own place and element, haue more vigour and strength in them, one increasing the force of another; as diuers sticks in the same fire, and retaine their owne nature without alteration; whereas good things are more weake and feeble in this place of banishment, as being not proper to them, and lose much of their puritie and vertue, through the mixture and tainture of adhering euils: and partly, because by reason of our vnthankfulnesse, we are alwayes readie to extenuate Gods blessings, and neuer almost thinke of them, but when they are taken from vs; and contrariwise, if wee haue the least sparke of euill, we are apt and willing to blow vpon it with the flame of our impatiencie, vntill wee haue made it a great fire, which inflameth and consumeth our hearts with griefe and anguish.

But let vs descend to some particulars, and for orders sake distinguish the miseries of mans life into some kinds; not that it is my purpose to speake largely of all, seeing they are so many and innumerable, that it would require a mans whole life to make but a bare catalogue or relation them: but onely so many of them briefly, as may serue to weane our hearts from the world which aboundeth with such miseries; and to fixe them on God his spirituall graces and heauenly happinesse, which bring vs sincere ioy, without the mixture of any euils. The miseries then of mans life either respect him generally, or his seuerall ages and estates. The generall miseries vnto which mans life is subject, are either those which are his owne directly, or else his friends, which are his by sympathie, compassion & fellow feeling. Concerning the former, if we doe but take a slight view of those miseries to which our fraile life is subject, wee shall find that euen a large world of wretchednesse, doth ouerwhelme this little world of man, and that whether wee respect his state or person. For first, vnto how many miseries is man subject about his state, whilest he seeketh to preserue and maintaine, or to aduance and better it? with what painefull labours doth hee spend his strength in the workes of his calling, that he may prouide sufficient for himselfe and his charge, which dependeth vpon him? what cares, what watching, running, riding, buying, selling, plowing, sowing, reaping, and turmoiling to get a poore liuing? And this miserie Eliphaz pointeth at; (Miserie (saith hee) commeth not from the dust, neither doth affliction spring out of the earth; but man is borne vnto trauaile, as the sparkes flie vpward. With all which labours when as hee hath worne out both bodie and mind, oftentimes for want of Gods blessings he hath no successe, and hath just cause to complaine, that hee hath spent his strength in vaine, seeing with all his industrie and labour hee cannot attaine vnto the things which hee laboureth for; but notwithstanding all his diligence pineth with want, or hauing found that he sought for, how is he troubled in the possession, how grieued with his losses, whilest God blowing vpon that hee hath, notwithstanding all his care and labour, it vanisheth like smoake, leauing him in pouertie, who ere whiles was rich, and in contempt and disgrace, who not long since was respected and esteemed of all? Againe, how innumerable are our wants aboue all other creatures in the world, and what care and paines is required to make a supplie, and to furnish vs with necessaries and sufficiencie? what adoe to prouide vs nourishment, what catering and cooking, boiling, roasting, baking, saucing? and when it is set before vs how ignorant are we of the measure of our owne bellies, how hardly doe wee keepe a meane in our diet, feeding sufficiently without surfetting? What care and cost is required to furnish vs with apparell, housing, lodging, bedding, and other furniture? What dieting and watching ouer our appetite that it doe not make vs ouer greedily to feed vpon that which wee too fondly affect, and so impaire our health? and being lost, what physicke, medicines, bitter pilles, and loathsome potions, cauterizing, cutting, lancing, and plastering are wee faine to vse that we may recouer it? Whereas the brutish creatures either want not these things, or easily supply their neede without care or labour. What lands and possessions are needfull for mans vse? what purchases, writings, conueiances, suits in Law, troubles and contentions, to hold that he hath, and secure his right? It were infinite to particularise those things which man wanteth, all which are necessarie vnto him, either in truth, or in his owne opinion, that his life without them cannot bee comfortable; and looke how much of them is lacking, and so much is detracted from his happinesse, and added to his miserie.

Let vs adde to the miseries of state, the miseries of persons, and that both body and soule. The body of man is continually subject to many miseries; as hunger, thirst, heat, cold, watching and wearines; and that which is more cumbersome and grieuous than all the rest, vnto innumerable sorts of sicknesses and diseases. For how many maladies are peculiarly incident to euery time of the yeere; as spring, summer, au-autumne, and winter, to euery countrie and region, sex and age? how many diseases which ouerthrow the health of the whole body, as plagues, feuers, agues, consumptions, palsies and the rest? Yea how many are incident to euery seuerall part, and as it were in whole troopes attend vpon euery particular member of mans body? Surely so innumerable are they, that physicians to this day cannot discouer, much lesse cure them; and howsoeuer they haue filled many large volumes with them, yet they come farre short of their infinite number, though those which they haue already found, would make a man sicke but barely to reckon them. Many of which though some escape, yet few or none are exempted from them all; it being a thing impossible, though wee were all an eye, to keepe such narrow watch ouer our health as may bee sufficient to preserue it from the violence of so many enemies which assault vs on all sides, within vs, without vs, and round about vs. Vnto which wee may adde the tedious trouble and loathsome remedies which we are faine to vse when our health is impaired, when as we are bound to forbeare the things which wee chiefly desire, and to vse those which our nature abhorreth, pining our bodies with abstinence, which were oppressed with fulnesse, and swallowing into our stomackes loathsome medicines, which wee haue first distempered with licorous meates. Whereby it is hard to chuse whether the physicke or disease, the medicine or the maladie be the worse: seeing our cure it selfe is a sicknesse, our helpes hurts, and our medicines torments; neither can we be deliuered from our griefes, but by suffering more griefe, nor free our selues from these kinds of punishments, vnlesse we be content to bee further punished.

And these are some of those manifold miseries which are incident to the body; the which are not more in number, or so grieuous and pernicious in their nature and quality, as those which trouble and torment the mind. For sinne is the sicknesse of the soule, and therefore looke with how many corruptions it is infested, and with so many spirituall diseases it is endangered. The vnderstanding is subject to the blindnesse of ignorance; so as we may say with the Prophet, that wee are beasts by our owne knowledge; seeing we neither know God, nor his will, our selues, nor our owne soules. Our wills are crooked and rebellious, and so whirled about with a wilfull frensie, as neither reason nor religion can rule or gouerne them. Our memories are subject to a spirituall lethargie, forgetting still what we should remember, and remembring what we should forget. Our consciences are either sicke of the dead palsie, hauing no sense or feeling of God, mercies or iudgements; or else full of melancholicke feares and terrours, sores and wounds, so as they are ready desperatly to crie out, when they haue the least touch. Our hearts are the harborow of almost all diseases, there lodgeth the swelling tumor of pride, the wolfe of ambition, the dropsie of couetousnesse, the madnesse of anger, and burning feuer of furious reuenge. In it dwelleth our tumultuous passions, which continually rebell against reason, and denie subiection to God and his law; there is the seate of carnall loue, which setteth the heart on fire with the thing loued, and vexeth it with continuall torment when it cannot enioy it. There dwelleth enuie and hatred, the one tormenting a man with anothers happinesse, the other turmoiling him in plotting and contriuing his neighbours ruine, making himselfe presently miserable, because hee would haue another so in time to come. In it is mirth and mourning, joy and sorrow, the one pulling open the heart, and letting in much vanitie; the other contracting and shutting it, that it may keepe out all comfort and contentment, and both like rackets tossing a man interchangeablie the one to the other, till he be tired, and euen worne out with wearinesse. There harboreth hope, the great deceiuer of mankind, which maketh him continually to expect better, though he still findeth worse; and causeth him daily to beleeue it, and to refresh his soule with false comforts, after it hath ten thousand times failed him, and innumerably often defrauded his hungrie desires. And there also dwelleth feare, which maketh a man presently miserable because he seeth a possibility of future miserie, and tormenteth him not onely by aggrauating those euils which are present, but also by recalling those which are past, and by anticipating, and present apprehending those which are to come, many whereof are nothing so grieuous felt as feared, and many neuer happening at all. And yet these false feares beget true sorrowes, and cause no lesse griefe though they neuer happen, than if they were already happened, killing a man with an empty sound, and (as it were) with paper-shot; and making him miserable in truth, because hee is so in his owne conceite. Wherein we are much more wretched than the brutish creatures; for they forget euils past, and flie from those which are present, and hauing escaped are secure for the time to come, quietly enjoying their present delights without any perturbation of future dangers; whereas feare maketh vs to engrosse all griefes, and as though wee could not be miserable enough with present euils, it recalleth those which are past, and layeth hold on those to come. And whereas it were our wiſeſt courſe to flie our ſorrowes till they catch vs, and to delay our miſerie, which wee cannot wholly eſcape, that wee may prolong our comfort as long as may bee; feare maketh vs fooliſhly to runne vpon our owne ruine, and to meete our torments in the mid way, not ſtaying for ſorrowes vntill they come, but wilfully ſending for them with poſting ſpeed, and haling them into our hearts before their time.

¶. Sect. 11. Of the miſeries of man, through the contrarietie and fight of his owne paſſions.

Moreouer, beſides theſe miſeries which accompanie euerie ſingle paſſion, thoſe are no leſſe grieuous and troubleſome, which befall vs through their oppoſition and fight, not onely againſt reaſon, conſcience and religion (in which conflict we are woumded notwithſtanding our ſtrongeſt and beſt aproued armour, ſometime with vaine-glory, ſometime with auarice, ſometime with voluptuouſneſſe, often with anger, and deſire of reuenge, and not ſeldome with many other vnrulie and violent affections) but euen wee are no leſſe turmoiled with that ciuill diſſenſion, and inteſtine conflict which is among our paſſions and deſires, the one againſt the other, which are ſo oppoſite, & countrary among themſelues, that no wiſedome of man can reconcile them. Whileſt ambition haleth vs into the ſeate of honour, feare pulleth vs backe, putting vs in minde of the burthen, and danger which doth accompanie it, and whileſt the former hath the vpper hand wee condemne our cowardize, whileſt the other wee exclaime againſt the miſchiefes of ambition. So vaine-glory perſwadeth vs to procure at the deareſt rates the prayſe of bountie, and to purchaſe the loue of all that are about vs; but couetouſneſſe checketh this motion, and will not heare of parting with riches to buy ſmoake, and yet after auarice hath ſhut the purſe, pride, whether it will or no, doth againe pull it open. So voluptuouſneſſe inticeth vs to follow pleaſures, but deſire of profit oppoſeth againſt it, telling vs how fooliſh it is to ſpend vpon the ſtocke, and how vnſeaſonable thoſe pleaſures are for time of ſtrength, which is allotted to induſtrie and labour; and yet when we haue put our hand vpon the plow, pleaſure clapping vs on the backe, maketh vs looke behind vs, and leauing our profit to follow our delights. Thus wee deſire the eaſe of a ſolitarie life, but loath neglect and contempt, and are in loue with the reſpect that accompanieth action, but hate the care and labour. Thus wee deſire the multiplication of our yeeres, but feare old age and death, as though we would be alwayes trauelling, and neuer be the forwarder in our way, and haue a daily addition, without any increaſe; for what is old age but the multiplication of many yeeres? and what is death but the hauen vnto which wee faile, and the iourneyes end vnto which wee are alwayes trauelling? Thus we loue learning & wiſdome, but loath the paines of ſtudy and obſeruation; wee deſire to bee rid of the tedious troubles of life, but preſently vnſay that wee haue ſaid, being incountred with the feare of death. And finally, we are rauiſhed with ioy when we thinke of the fruition of God, and the kingdome of heauen, but when we heare that wee muſt ſell that we haue, and giue to the poore, forſake all, take vp our croſſe and follow Chriſt, we goe away ſorrowfull. Wee would bee conformable vnto Chriſt in glorie, but not in his ſufferings, and ſit vpon his throne on his right hand and on his left, but wee cannot indure to drinke with him in the cup of affliction: and to conclude, we doe not ſooner with one affection deſire any thing, than wee are ſtraight ready to vnwith our wiſhes, by reaſon of ſome inconueniences which croſſe another.

And thus haue I ſhewed the manifold miſeries which are generally incident to mankind, in reſpect of themſelues. From which if any plead immunitie, and that hee hath not yet drunke of this bitter cup, let him know that he is onely reprieued and not acquitted; and howſoeuer he is not brought out to execution, yet the ſentence of condemnation being paſſed vpon him, as well as vpon others, hee doth but ſtay the Iudges pleaſure till hee calleth him forth. Let him conſider that ſayling in this world (as it were) in a ſea of miſeries, he may for a time eſcape the tempeſt, but neuer the feare and danger; and that theſe miſeries which are incident vnto all, may happen vnto any, though they be not yet happened. Let them call to minde, that commonly after a faire ſummer, followeth a foule winter, and a bluſtring ſtorme after a ſun-ſhine calme; that proſperitie and aduerſitie haue their changes, and that no man ſauing the true Chriſtian can bee ſaid to bee happie before his death. But beſides theſe miſeries which reſpect a mans ſelfe, there are innumerable more which reſpect his friends; and to ſay nothing of falſe and pretended loue, whereby men proue moſt pernicious enemies, whileſt they profeſſe the greateſt friendſhip; to ſay nothing of the breaches, fallings out, and hot contentions which ſometime happen betweene thoſe who are coupled in the neereſt bond of amitie; and to paſſe by all thoſe diſcontents which are cauſed through the default of any partie: how many are the miſeries which accompanie true friendſhip, euen when it is moſt wiſely incertained, and religiouſly obſerued? For who can ſee his friend thunder-ſtrucken, and not tremble at the blow? who can behold him plunged into any miſerie, and not in in compassion, and fellow-feeling communicate with him in his griefes? who sorrowes not at his friends losses; who groaneth not in his sicknesse, and bleedeth not at his wounds? Or though any man should be so happy as to haue his friends also exempted from these miseries, or so potent to deliuer them; yet how is he afflicted with his death, grieuing with so much more sorrow, by how much he was more worthy of his loue; and neuer reioycing that hee so long had him, but lamenting that he hath now lost him, and that sweet comfort which he tooke in his society? All which miseries though they bee somewhat eased with the contrary comforts, yet considering that the griefes of this life doe so farre exceed the joyes, and that crosses and afflictions, the profits and delights; therefore it must needs follow, that he who hath most friends, communicates in most miseries, and by compassion and fellow-feeling participates in most griefes and perturbations.

CHAP. XXIII.

AND these are the miseries which are generally incident to mankind. Vnto which wee may adde those which are specially belonging to all ages and estates; for no sooner haue wee our being, than wee be in miserie; and long before we breath the aire, we draw in corruption, and are infested with the poison of sinne: before wee can sinne we are sinners, as being heires of our first parents transgression, and defiled with our next parents corruption: and we offend God, before we know what it is to offend him: for with our parents seed is mixed the seeds of all manner of sinne, and as we grow and wax strong, so sinne with vs groweth vntill it come to full maturity. Euen in our first conception wee also conceiue corruption; and then the foundation of wickednesse is laid, vpon which in the whole course of our life we build vp the strong holds of sinne. Then we are Atheists, Idolaters, blasphemers, Sabbath-breakers, adulterers, murtherers, theeues, false witnesse-bearers, not by actuall transgression, but by an habituall disposition; and so wee are said to be men, because we haue in vs the image of man; and seeds of [illegible] though we neuer did any manly sinne; seeing nothing is wanting but growth and maturitie: so by as good right we are called sinners of all kinds, because we haue the nature and very image of sinne; and the seeds of all corruptions liuing in vs, which if, wee grow still grow with vs, and come to full ripenesse, if we euer attaine vnto perfect age. And thus Dauid confessed, that he was borne in iniquitie, yea that his mother conceiued him in sinne; and Iob demaundeth, who can bring a cleane thing out of filthinesse, or how man can be cleane which hath borne of a woman? And the Apostle telleth vs, that by one man sinne entred into the world, and death by sinne; and so death went ouer all men, because all men had sinned. Now what a miserie is this to bee sinners, as soone as we be men? to be poisoned in the very fountaine, and leprous in the very first principles of nature; seeing our sicknesse is the more incurable, because it is hereditarie? to bee dead in sinne, as soone as we are aliue to the world, the slaues of Satan, before we are out of the prison of the wombe, and in the state of damnation, before we are in the state of the liuing? And as we are thus miserable in our spirituall estate when we are first conceiued: so our outward and corporal condition is also full of wretchednesse; for what are our matter and first principles, but a base excrement of nature and impure seed? what is the habitation of the noblest, but the strait and darke prison of the wombe, inuironed with the filth of nature? and what is his nourishment, but the impurest part of his mothers blood? But though it bee a prison in respect of misery, yet not in respect of safety, for the child in the wombe is sicke of the mothers diseases, surfeited with her intemperance, and pined with her want, it is subiect to euery rush, and endangered with euery spreine, euery small bruise bringing with it a maime, & euery maime, monstrous mishape. Finally, it is in danger of stifling, before it breathe, of choaking before it feed, and the wombe in which it is borne, is oftentimes the tombe in which it is buried.

But say that hee escapeth the dangers of the wombe; say hee perisheth not with the miseries of these nine moneths close imprisonment; yet how great paine and perill indureth hee, when the day commeth of his mothers deliuerance and his liberrie? vnto what torments doth he vnwittingly put her, who hath so long borne and nourished him, himselfe bearing a great part in these paines and miseries? how paine are they to part the one from the other, and yet what sorrow is there at their parting? into what dangers and extreame hazard are both exposed, the mother in bearing, and the child in suffering? how many are there which depart, as soone as they are parted, perishing on the coast as soone as they are launched out into this sea of miseries? And they which could no longer liue together, die because they are seuered and put asunder. No marueil therefore if they are borne weeping and crying, not only presaging future miserie, but as feeling present paine; receiuing these first sorrowes of their birth as the earnest of all the rest, which they are to suffer in their ensuing life. For though hee escape these dangers, and recouer of the hurts which he sustained in his first conflict, yet what is the prolonging of his life, but the increasing of his torments? seeing man about all other creatures is compassed with miseries; for whereas they are able as soone as they come into the world, to stand, goe, and helpe themselues, wanting but few things, all which they find ready for them: man as soone as he is borne, being poore, naked, and miserable, wanteth many things, and hath nothing to make supplie; hee standeth in neede of milke to feed him, cloathes to couer him, fire to warme him, nurses to tend him, being altogether vnable to helpe himselfe. Hee hath no vse of vnderstanding to know his wants, nor speech to discouer them, onely he giueth some generall notice of them by his bitter crying. Hee cannot goe, stand, or creepe, nor with all his wit and strength repell the iniuries of a fillie flie. And in this impotencie he continueth long, bringing much trouble to others, before hee hath any pleasure in himselfe. In respect of which present and ensuing miseries, Ieremie wisheth that his mother's bulke had beene his graue, and her wombe a perpetuall conception, because hee came forth of the wombe to see labour and sorrow, and that his dayes should be consumed with shame.

But proceed we from the birth to the infantie and childhood of man, and here we shall find no immunity from miseries; but rather as they increase, so these increase with them, and grow stronger with their strength. For no sooner are poore infants deliuered from the prison of the wombe, but they are presently bound hand and foot, and wholly at the dispose of others, as not hauing obtained liberty, but onely changed the prison and place of their restraint. And all the time of this infancie being without knowledge and vnderstanding, and darkned with more than brutish ignorance, is spent in naturall actions, eating, drinking, sleeping, crying, and such like, being destitute of all worldly delights and comforts, and onely sensible in griefes and miseries. Next vnto infancie succeedeth childhood, which as it hath more sport and pleasure, so also more feare and danger; for no sooner can they goe, but presuming about their strength, they get many falls and bruises; and hauing legs to carrie them, and little wit to guide them, they are exposed to many perils; and except they haue the better prouision, are ouertaken with many dangers. And whence is it, most part of men are ouercome, after they begin a little to relish pleasure, and their delights in sports and pastimes, especially they are checked in them by their superiours, and subjected to the gouernment of some master, who restraineth them of their liked liberty, and forceth them to follow their loathed studies. And now being kept in awe, they begin to distast the bitternesse of limited liberty; and either play with feare, or learne with tedious wearinesse, hauing their eye on their booke, and their hearts on their pastimes, and being forced with feare to displease themselues, whilest vnwillingly they please their ouerseers. So that now againe they recall in their wishes the impotencie and ignorance of infancie, that they might also recouer their secure liberty: or finding that impossible, they set spurres to running time, and wish the end and death of this seruile age, that being set at liberty, they may be at their owne dispose without controll. Vnto which when they haue attained, and pulling their necke out of the yoke of subjection, haue together with the age the priuiledges and liberty of youth, they are as farre from happinesse, and full of miserie as they were before. For now it fareth with them as with the bird which hath beene brought vp in the cage, who searcheth euery hole and corner to get a passage for her escape, and at length finding the doore open flieth out, and reioyceth in her new got liberty; but with little cause; for wanting wit and experience to shift and prouide for her selfe, she is presently endangered to killing by reason of her tamenes, or of staruing, because shee knoweth not how to get her liuing. Or like a new backed colt, who hauing cast his rider, doth for a while with frolicke wantonnesse course about the field, but being spent and tired, hee wisheth himselfe in the stable, subiect againe to his masters rule, that hee also may be partaker of his prouision. So these yonger prodigals, hauing shaken off the yoke of gouernment, and being wholly at their owne dispose, doe wildly runne many desperate courses, expose themselues to innumerable dangers, and hauing neither the skill of getting nor care of keeping, they consume all in riot and voluptuous pleasure, till their state is brought to so low an ebbe, that they are ready to starue for want of necessaries, who before surfeited of superfluitie, and to be in truth fellow-commoners with the hogs in this course fare of mast and draffe, who before were like vnto them in the allegorie, glutting themselues with pleasures, and wallowing in carnall and sensuall delights. And howsoeuer they haue now got a name of liberty, yet in truth they were neuer in the like thraldome: for they haue changed the gouernment of one father or master, into the tyrannie, or rather anarchie of innumerable passions. And reason being not yet setled in the throne, they are like vnto the people of Israel without without a King, who did nothing well, because they did euery one what they would. And whereas their other Gouernours ruled with discretion, aimed at their good, restrained them from running on in licentious course, and kept them in some good order; these new guides, like Lords of mis-rule, leade them with head-long rashnesse into all desperate attempts, riot, excesse, and all kind of disorder, which seemeth but to promise the present fruition of some vaine delight: Now fond loue, and filthy lust, mad anger, and furious reuenge, proud emulation, and scornfull contempt, vngrounded hopes, and causelesse feares, immodest wantonnesse, and immoderate mirth; sports and pastimes no lesse full of sin and vanity, than of harme and dangers, and voluptuousnesse in all kinds, as surfeiting, gluttony, drunkennesse, gaming, whoring, rioting and reuelling, swaggering and swearing, are in their full strength, and chiefe predominance. Which if they yeeld vnto, they finde themselues tossed from one to another and neuer at rest, and (as it were) distracted and haled betweene so many furies, which day and night haunting them, carry them head-long into innumerable dangers of body, soule, [illegible] fame, wherein many suffer shipwracke, [illegible] are deuoured of these inticing Syrens, [illegible] they who escape with life, are so shaken and shattered, so full of leakes and rifts, that with much paines and difficulty they arriue at the hauen of safetie; where they haue just cause to spend the remaynder of their dayes, in bitter repentance lamenting the errours, and ill-guided courses of their sinfull and vnbridled youth. Or if God giue them grace to resist their passions in their full strength; how tedious and troublesome is their taske? With how many foiles and wounds do they obtaine the victory? How often are they ready to yeeld, and to looke backe to Sodome with strong desires of enjoying her sinfull pleasures? Finally, how hard and difficult doe they finde it to resist their naturall corruptions in their full vigour, to spend their time in fasting, watching, reading, hearing, and praying, when as corrupt nature with her full strength haleth them to vaine pleasures and sinfull delights? it being as our Sauiour Christ saith all one, as if they should plucke out their eyes cut off their right hand and foot, mortifie their members, deny themselues, and voluntarily beare the crosse, vpon which their owne bodies must bee crucified.

And these, with many more, are the errours, vanities, and euils which accompany youth, whereat wise men being sired and wearied doe desire to attaine vnto ripe and perfect age, that they may shake off all these infirmities and inconueniences, and spend the remaynder of their liues in a setled and well gouerned estate, vnder the guide of reason, and conduct of wisedome. But when they haue their wish, they finde themselues no more happy, or lesse miserable than they were before, hauing onely changed their euils and troubles for those which are greater, lesse pleasant, and more burthensome and intolerable. For still they remayne subject, and in bondage to their affections and passions, and are not freed from the seruitude of them all, but onely haue changed their Masters. And this alone difference there is, that the passions and affections of youth are more hote, rash, and violent, and consequently more vnconstant, short and momentany; whereas those to which this perfect age is subject, are somewhat more stayed and moderate, but withall much more dangerous and pernicious, because they are more constant and permanent. And whereas the foolish affections of youth are neerer vnto repentance, because men for their grossenesse are apt to bee ashamed of them, as directly contradicting and opposing against reason and the light of nature; these of riper age are more vncurable, because they are mad with reason and fill their mouthes with arguments to backe and maynteine their inordinate desires as lawfull and warrantable; calling their vices by the names of those vertues, which in some shadow of similitude they doe a little resemble. Now they leaue their prodigality and excessiue riot, and subject themselues vnto auarice and couetousnesse, vnder the name of frugalitie and good husbandry; defending all their vile courses of oppression, deceit, bribing, vsury and the rest, vnder the shadow of that laudable care, which euery one should take to maintaine his charge. They set aside their wanton pleasures and vaine sports, and giue themselues ouer to be ruled by ambition; with insatiable desire affecting one Honour after another, vnder the colour of preseruing their fame and reputation. They now dislike their open rashnesse, and violent courses in accomplishing their wils; and giue themselues to the practice of cunning plots, to dissimulation, double-dealing, treachery and deuilish subtilties, all which they intitle with the name of wisdome and good policy. Vnto which wee may adde the manifold cares which accompany men of this age, and the toylsome labours which they take in setling their state, in prouiding of such things as they call necessaries, in purchasing lands, building houses, and procuring sufficient maintenance for their wife and children whilest they liue, and after their departure; all which is requited oftentimes with vnfaithfulnesse in the one, and with vnduteifull vngratitude and stubborne rebellion in the other, the great difficulties which they finde in gouerning their household, the disagreeing of children, contentions of seruants, and manifold disorders of their families, which they are faine oftentimes to passe ouer, because they cannot tell how to reforme them; with innumerable other euils, which it were too long to stand vpon.

§. Sect. 5. Of the miseries incident to old age. Cum sibi homines optant senectutem, quid aliud optant, nisi longam infirmitatem? August. de Catechiz. rudibus cap. 16

Finally, if we attaine vnto old age, which all desire, and none like; what shall we there find but misery and affliction? For what is old age but a continuall sickneſſe, the receptacle of all humane infirmities, and the preludo of death? And howsoeuer men vsually make it the chiefe Harborough of their hopes, and are content to learne in their childhood, and to take paines and care in their youth and riper age, that now hauing plentie, they may liue vpon the stocke, take their ease and enjoy their pleasures; contrariwise olde age comming, is accompanied with so many infirmities, that though they haue much, yet they enjoy little, though they may haue many sports, yet they haue but a mouth and few delights. For to say nothing of those who haue gray haires and greene wits, and being olde in yeares are againe children in vnderstanding; to let them passe who loſe the chiefe priuiledges of that age, for want of wisdome and discretion, and are strong and vigorous in nothing which concerneth either body or minde, but only in their vices and corruptions: to let them alone who haue spent their time so ignorantly and vnprofitably, that they are ready to die, before they know what it is to liue, and to leaue the earth before they haue learned the way to Heauen: how many other infirmities and sorrowes doe attend it, which are sufficient, (if grace support not) to make it miserable? For then vsually the soule is vexed, and the conscience troubled with the errours and crimes of ill-guided youth, and with the wrongs, deceits, and oppressions committed in riper age. Then the body is tormented with the rushes and bruises taken in youthfull sports, and violent exercises, enfeebled with the cares, watchings, and labours sustained in that age which is accounted most perfect, and punished for the intemperance, voluptuousneſſe, surfeiting and exceſſe of them both, with innumerable sicknesses and diseases. Then is the time when Palsies, Gouts, Stone, Strangury, Collicke, and innumerable such like tortures chiefly sway: then the head shaketh, the back stoopeth, the joynts tremble, the limbes are weakned, lame and stiffe, ready to stagger and ruin because they cannot goe: the spirits languish, the vitall heate decayeth, hauing both spent the naturall moysture, and like a lampe consumed that whereby it was nourished: the eares deafe, or thicke of hearing, the eyes bleared, the sight dimmed, the feeling benummed, the smell and taste lost and perished, the face wrinckled, the skin riueled, the teeth rotted, the breath corrupted, and in a word, the whole body enfeebled and diseased. Vnto which wee might adde the infirmities of the minde, whet with vsually in this age it is extraordinarily cumbred, as the dulneſſe of conceit and vnderstanding, the stiffe perverſeneſſe of the will, the decay of memory, the disorder of the affections. For being made tender with infirmities they are easily angred, and hardly pleased; apt to conceiue jealousies and suspitions, and not so ready to receiue satisfaction; ouer-heauy and sorrowfull, repining and complayning, and senſelesly couetous and greedy in heaping vp wealth, when they are ready to leaue it, and haue no time to enjoy it. In a word, whether we consider the euils naturally incident to this age which respect the body or the minde, wee must needs conclude that it is full of miseries.

CHAP. XXIV.

THe like also may bee said of all estates & conditions of men, which are all so full of wretchednesse, that euery one hauing experience of their owne euils, wish rather to be any other than that they are; whereas if all should bring their miseries to a common banke, and plainly discouer them to open view, offering to exchange estates with one another; euen those who most complained of their condition, as being more wretched than any other, seeing the common miseries incident to all degrees of men; no leſſe grieuous than those which they sustain, would contentedly take their owne againe, and willingly depart without any desire of commutation. For there is no estate which hath not miseries euen attending on it, to make them wretched who liue in it, if they be not strengthened with present patience, and hope of future happineſſe. There is none in the World so happy, who if they compare their honey with their gall; and their comforts with their crosses, haue not just cause to complain of their vnhappineſſe. For doth a man leade a single life? Why then as he hath not the cares, so neither the comforts of wedlocke; and as he is priuiledged, hauing none to care for, so hee is punished hauing none to care for him: as hee hath few to bring vnto him want, so if hee be in need, he hath as few to relieue him; as he hath no children to trouble him, so neither to cheere and refresh him, when hee is otherwise troubled: to say nothing of his solitarineſſe vsually accompanied with sad melancholy, of the loſſe of halfe his kindred and friends which by marriage stage are doubled, of the continuance of his life and memory in his posterity: of the troublesome conflict which hee continually hath against his owne concupiscence, of the discontents which he endureth, whilest either sitting his first vnder another mans Table, he is faine to eat when they are hungred, to goe to bed when they are drowsie, to make their appetite the rule of his diet, and to be subiect to their orders; or keeping a house without an huswife, & wanting an helper, which is (as it were) the one halfe of himselfe, he is subiect to receiue many indignities from his seruants, and to haue his estate wasted, and hauocke made of all, by those to whom he giueth food and clothing. On the other side, doth a man liue in the state of marriage? Then surely as he hath some comforts, so also many troubles: for besides his paines and care in prouiding for, and gouerning of his family, he hath many crosses in his chiefest comforts; for hath he a good Wife? Hee feareth to lose her, and is tormented with her losse. Hath he a bad one? shee is as a continuall dropping to his bed, and as a coruidian Ague to his bones? Hath hee no children? then with the holy Patriarch hee complaineth, that all he hath is nothing, hauing no heires of his body, to enioy his labours. Hath he but one? commonly he spoyleth him with cockering, and by ouer-louing him he maketh him vnworthy loue, and is more troubled with feare of losing him, than comforted with enioying him. Hath he many? then commonly some vndutifull and rebellious, by whom he is most vexed and grieued, than pleased & delighted in all the rest. Hath he few seruants? then also small attendance: hath he many to doe his worke? Then also many to whom hee must pay wages, many mouthes to feede, many businesses to ouersee; and hauing many to rule, hee hath so much the harder taske if he gouerne well.

The like also may bee said of other states and conditions: for doth a man leade a priuate life? He is subiect to contempt, injuries, and oppressions of those who are in authority. Is he a publick person? He is (as it were) openly vpon the Stage, obnoxious to the censures of the basest people, lyable to their slanders and euill reports, exposed to many dangers, surmoyled with much labour and many cares, enuied of his inferiours, and hated of the most, if they cannot serue their owne ends by his authority. Is a man of meane quality? His vertues, wisdome, and goodnesse, passe and perish vnrewarded, yea, vnobserued, as the Wise man noted. Is he nobly descended? He is exposed to more tentations, more prone to fall into many sins, and being ouer-taken, the greatnesse of his birth doth but aggrauate the greatnesse of his fault. And as he beareth a great port, so he is at great charge to maintaine it, at great care also to furnish himselfe with meanes: And if he come short, his state ouer-matching his ability, then are his cares multiplied and increased according to his imployments and occasions, wherein he is defectiue; then is he as bare and discontent, as hee who carrying a low sayle possesseth least, and all his pompe and greatnesse is nothing else but proud penury, and glorious beggery. Is a man in the state of subiection? His life and Lands, body and goods, are at his Soueraignes command; and if Conscience and Religion restraine him not, his frowne is as a Sword, and his displeasure bringeth death. Is he seated in the Royall Throne? the greatnesse of his command, doth but adde to the greatnesse of his care and paines; increaseth his feares, and exposes him to greater dangers, not onely of forraine force, but also of secret Conspiracies, and hidden Treacherie. Doth a man liue as a Merchant? hee liueth (as one saith) neither among the liuing nor the dead, there being in his best health but an inch betweene him and death; his person and goods are often at the mercy of the vnmercifull Seas, and more mercilesse Pyrats; and standeth at the deuotion of forraine Potentates, and barbarous people. Is hee a Tradesman? His honesty dependeth vpon the credit of other men, failing when it failes; his state is continually endangered with bad debters, who decaying, bring him also to ruine, and vsually hee is so prodigall in giuing credit to others, that in the end he leaueth not any for himselfe. Is he a Lawyer? he selleth his breath, if not his honesty and truth; he loseth his peace in finding his profit, and spendeth a great part of his time in wrangling and contending, whilest hee pretendeth to accord differences, and decide controuersies. Is he a Husbandman? his life is a continuall toyle, and after all his labour he is still in feare of losing all by vnseasonable weather, one while complayning of raine, and another of drought, now of too much heate, and soone after of frosts and cold; one yeare of mildewes and blasting, and another of wormes, cankers and caterpillers. In a word, there is in this World no mans estate so happy, but besides the innumerable miseries which are incident to all mankind, hee hath many euils proper and peculiar to his particular calling and condition.

Now if any thinke that Christianity, and the true feare of God will exempt men from this misery, and aduance them vnto happinesse; let him know, that howsoeuer this estate doth bring with it such inward comforts, as will not suffer them by misery it selfe to be made miserable, yet in respect of freedome from the miseries of this life, they haue but little priuiledge aboue others, and as little preferment in worldly happinesse; so as they may truely say of their felicitie, as Christ of his kingdome, that it is not of this world, but reserued in the heauens: Yea rather (setting aside our spirituall comforts, and future hopes) that they of all men are most miserable, as the Apostle speaketh. For besides that they haue a large share in those miseries which are commonly incident to other men; they haue certaine others proper and peculiar to themselues; for no sooner hath our Sauiour Christ chosen them out of the world, but presently it professeth against them open enmitie, it enuieth their prosperitie, and plotteth their ruine; it scorneth, derideth, backbiteth and slandereth them; it wrongeth, oppresseth, afflicteth and persecuteth them, haling them before the iudgement seates, accusing, condemning and killing them for the profession of Gods truth. So that our Sauiour Christ might well say peculiarly of them aboue others, that in the world they shall haue trouble; because none in the world are so troubled. Vnto these we may adde the griefes which their righteous soules doe suffer in seeing the abominations committed by these cursed Sodomites among whom they liue; as when they behold Gods Worship neglected, and Idolatry erected, some adoting Images, and some making an Idoll of the World; the holy Name of God blasphemed, his Sabbaths prophaned, Authority despised, Gouernment disordered, Murthers committed and pardoned, the whole Land defiled with tolerated filthinesse. When they see all preferments attained by bribing and corruption. In the places of Iudgement, Iustice peruerted, Truth wrested, Equity contemned, the Guilty acquitted, the Guiltlesse condemned, wrong maynteined and right suppressed; and all things carried with fauour and respect of persons. And among priuate men cruelty and oppression bearing sway, every shop full of lying and deceit, every street full of pride and vanity, and almost euery man abhorring simplicity and faithfull dealing, and affecting the art of dissimulation, hypocrisie, treachery, double dealing, complementall friendship, and disguised enmity. What a griefe, I say, must this needs bring to a child of God, to see his heauenly Father thus dishonoured, his Lawes neglected, and trodden vnder foot? Yea, when hee shall behold those most aduanced and respected in the World, who most dishonour God by running on in the course of wickednesse? When hee shall see him who hath vsed most deceit most enriched, and he who is most rich most esteemed, the World measuring his goodnesse according to his goods, and not his vertues. When he beholdeth the Oppressour, Extortioner, Vsurer, who should stand at the Barre, sitting on the Iudgemente Seate; the rich Foole made a Magistrate to rule others, who hath not wit enough to gouerne himselfe; the Poet and Player more esteemed than the painfull Preacher; the ambitious aduanced, hauing nothing to rayse them but their pride and impudency, whereby they haue resolued that they will rise; the humble, though neuer so worthy, neglected and kept vnder; audacious boldnesse hauing free entrance, when as modestie is repelled and excluded; the Parasite and Flatterer much esteemed, & he who faithfully admonisheth and speaketh the truth from his heart, hated and disgraced. But besides the griefe which the faithfull sustaine in beholding the sinnes of professed Worldlings, they are much more vexed with the scandalous liues and exemplary sinnes of those who are the Professours of Gods true Religion; when as they who daily heare the word, make conscience of an Oath, abstaine from the vnprofitable corruptions of the time and make some outward reformation in their Family; are neuertheless as proud and phantastical in their apparell, as vnfaithfull to their friend, as false in their word and promise, as deceitfull in their dealing, as backward in all workes of mercy, and as couetous in all their courses, as the prophane contemners of all Religion: Seeing these sinnes doe more dishonour their heauenly Father, as being committed by those who are of his owne Family, and that against the light of knowledge, the often admonitions of Gods Spirit, & checks of their owne consciences: And also do more disgrace them who are professours of the same truth; whilest they besprinckle them with their filth, and dimme the light of their holy conuersation with the duskish smoke of their discouered wickednesse; causing them to be suspected of the same crimes, because they are of the same profession, and exercise themselues in performing the duties of the same Religion. Besides all which griefes which haue an outward ground; they haue inward causes of much misery, trouble, and bitter sorrow. For they are continually exercised in that dangerous conflict against the spirituall enemies of their saluation; Sathan daily like a roaring Lion seeketh to deuoure them, by suggesting into their minds wicked temptations, whereby hee alloureth them to lose their soules by sinne, for the hire of some worldly vanities; the World maligneth them, and alloureth them vnto euill by offering some pleasing baytes, or discourageth them from that which is good by troubles and persecutions: the flesh lusteth continually against the spirit, and maketh them to doe the euill they hate, and to neglect the good which they like and loue. In which spirituall warfare they are alwayes troubled, and often foiled, being ouercome with temptation, and led captiue vnto sinne. And this is the last and greatest misery wherewith the the faithfull are in this life afflicted and molested, in that they are through the strength of their enemies, and violence of their owne corruptions, often besides their purpose ouertaken of sinne, and thereby offend their gracious God, whose displeasure they shun as the greatest euill.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the miseries which accompany worldly things, in respect of their getting, keeping and possessing.

AND thus haue I shewed some of the manifold miseries which doe accompany the life of man: which if any thinke that they may bee cured with the counterpoyson of worldly prosperity, and that wee may find in earthly things such comforts, as may beare vs out in all these crosses, making our joyes to exceed our sorrowes; let such an one know that he is much deceiued, seeing they are so farre from freeing vs from the former miseries, that they helpe to increase them; and though like Iobs friends, they proffer their seruice for the mitigating and appeasing of our griefes, yet before they depart they adde vnto our sorrowes, and aggrauate the waight of our affliction. For besides the euils which they find, they bring many with them, and like liberall Contributers, they adde abundantly to the banke and heape of misery. For let a man but set his heart vpon these vanities, and with what care is hee presently surmoyled? With what hopes and feares is he continually racked? With what enuy, emulation, jealousie, rage, hatred, and contention is hee forthwith wholly possessed? spending part of his time in mad mirth, when he hath his desires; and a greater part in sad melancholy, because hee is crossed of his hopes; one while ouer-joyed and snatched vp into the clouds with rauishing admiration, and soone after suddenly dejected with discontent, because he can ascend no higher in the pursuit of those things which chiefly affect him. Thus he who taketh all his paines in sowing the seeds of Honour, hath neuer a haruest that answereth his greedy expectation, but hauing sowne the winde of vaine glory, he reapeth the whirle-wind of trouble and vexation, as the Prophet speaketh. For his head is continually surmoyled with cares to rise higher, and with feares left missing footing in his climing, he fall from that height vnto which he is already aspired: euery honour which hee misseth is vnto him a grieuous disgrace: the not-couering of his inferiours head, is a corrasiue to his heart; and the greatest honour doth not bring vnto him any joy and comfort, when as hee is but touched with the least contempt. The least frowne of his Prince, as a piercing Sword, inflicteth such a deepe wound into his heart, that all the smoothing tongues of his fawning Flatterers cannot make it whole againe with their often licking; only it is the renued beames of the Princes fauour, that can doe away these clouds of sorrow. So what cares and feares, troubles and discontents accompany worldly wealth, if it be immoderately loued and affected? In regard whereof one saith, that no man can wish an heauier curse vnto a couetous man, than that he liue long, because like the Indians he is continually tormented with the Idoll which hee worshippeth; and when he aboundeth most in wealth, he is not so rich in any thing, as in woe and misery. For what tedious taskes doth his golden God impose vpon him? How is hee constrained to watch whole nights in sitting attendance? How doth it thrust him into desperate dangers; for the compassing of that which being obtained, will not giue vnto him power to enjoy? In regard whereof that may be truly said of thē, which is spoken of the Angell of the Church of Laodiceans, that they only haue a name and bare opinion of being rich, whereas they are wretched and miserable, poore and naked.

Apocal. 3. 17.

The like also may be said of worldly pleasures; which are not only the companions, but also the causes of many miseries: for joy and sorrow like two Twinnes are borne and bred together; and no sooner doth the one appeare, but presently the other attendeth on it. So the Wise man saith, that euen in laughing the heart is sorrowfull; and the end of mirth is heauinesse. Fitly therefore are these carnall pleasures called the Worlds Syrens, which haue the beautifull faces of women, but the hinder parts of Scorpions, they haue hony in the mouth, but a sting in the tayle; for though they delight at the first taste, yet in the end they proue as bitter as the gall of Serpents; though in the beginning they please the carnall appetite, yet poysoning vs with many sinnes, at last they bring horrour of minde, trouble of conscience, and at the best bitter griefe, and painfull, though profitable sorrow, and repentance. In which respect they may fitly be compared to Abners play, which began with pleasure, but ended with bitternesse; to Balthasers Banquet, which began with mirth and jollitie, but ended with feare and trembling; and to sweete meats of hard digestion, which are pleasant in the mouth, but lothsome and burthensome in the stomacke. For who seeth not that riotous reuelling in worldly delights, is commonly attended on with want and beggery? that vncleane lusts, and filthinesse of life, are accompanied with inward diseases and outward shame? that banquetting and excessiue fare, is the Mother and

Prou. 14. 13.

Nulla fere longa est, dolor at voluptas inuicem cedunt; breuior voluptas, Senec. in Thyeste. 2. Sam. 2. 14, 26

Nurse of the most sicknesses, and the common cause of vntimely death? yea, who seeth not that these carnall delights are not only accompanied with miseries, but in themselues miserable? for to say nothing of their common fellowship which they haue with sinne, which aboue all things in the World maketh a man wretched, we find by continuall experience, that these pleasures like sweet and luscious meates, grow presently lothsome, vnlesse our appetite be sharpened by the sowre sawce of interchanged miseries; that yet ill we haue enough of them, wee are troubled with our owne concupiscence, but no sooner haue we satiety, but there followeth tedious lothing: and seldome or neuer is there such a just equipoyse and proportion, but that wee are vexed with too much or too little. Finally, we find that extremity of joy is an heauy burthen, of which the heart seeketh no lesse to ease itselfe, by sending out whole floods of teares, than when the waight of griefe lyeth heauy on it: yea, that being excessiue it bringeth, as a more pleasant, so also more sudden death, than the greatest extremity of bitter sorrow; the heart letting out the vitall spirits, whilest it too much inlargeth and openeth it selfe, to let in pleasure and delight.

Gen. 45. 24. and 37. 29.

Q. Sect. 3. That worldly things are not gotten without great labour.

But the miseries which accompany these worldly things will better appeare, if wee more specially consider those which are incident vnto them, in respect of their getting, keeping and losing them: for they are gotten with labour, kept with care and feare, and lost with griefe and sorrow; or as it is in other words expressed; paines begetteth them, care nurseth them, and sorrow accompanieth them to their funerals. For first, howsoeuer these worldly things are of small worth, yet they are attained vnto with no small labour; neither is there any good thing in the earth to be bought and purchased without the Coine of continuall paines, and laborious industry: so the Wise man saith, that all things are full of labour, and that God hath giuen to the sonnes of men to humble them thereby, great trauaile with little profit. Neither is it small paines which men take in pursuing of these vanities, but so extreame and great, that euen they commonly consume and tire them; for so the Prophet saith, Behold, is it not of the Lord of hosts, that the people shall labour in the very fire? the people shall euen weary themselues for very vanitie? And surely who seeth not that worldly men doe take much more paines in attayning vnto earthly trifles, than Gods seruants take for heauenly treasures? and that with more ease wee might furnish our selues through Gods blessing, with all spirituall, sanctifying and liuing graces, than with a small competency of worldly necessaries? and secure our selues of the fruition of our eternall inheritance, with farre lesse labour, than is vsually taken in procuring of these worldly annuities, which last but for the short space of a momentany life, and oftentimes are not with all this paines enjoyed, they flying the more from some, the more earnestly that they are pursued? And yet so foolish we are that we neglect these rich treasures of spirituall grace, and eternall joy, which God (to take away all excuse) hath offered vnto vs freely and frankly without mony, and with lesse labour joyned with much comfort; and with all egernesse pursue these worldly trifles which cannot bee obtained without much paines and toyle: like little boyes who with great delight spend their sweate in catching a Butterflie; but are straight tired though they sit easily at their bookes to get Learning, and neuer take the least thought in securing vnto themselues the title which they haue to their inheritance.

Hab. 2. 13.

Eccles. 1. 8. & 3. 9, 10.

Gigauntur labore, nutriuntur curis, & sepeliuntur dolore.

The which folly is so much the greater, in that men doe not take these extraordinary paines for obtayning worldly necessaries, but for the most part needlesse superfluities, nor such as the necessity of our temporall life requireth, but such as insatiable concupiscence desireth & affecteth. For those things which are necessary to nature, and to the preseruation of life, as meate and drinke, clothing and lodging, Aire, Fire, Water, and the rest, are giuen liberally by God to those who take some moderate paines in their lawfull callings, & they lie out in common without inclosure, to be obtained with ease by those that need them: but superfluities are not so easily compassed, being either hid and not found without great search, or inclosed about with so many difficulties, that men cannot approach them without great paines and danger. For example, the Mines of Gold and Siluer are hid in the secret caues of the earth; precious stones, in the Sea and Sands; gorgeous clothes bought at deare rates, and delicious meates with much cost and paines procured, and with no lesse cooked and prepared. And yet (as one saith) though gold be hidden by the Indian Emmets, watched by the Griffins, deeply buried in the earth, and not without restlesse labour, and extreame danger gotten and obtained; yet men willingly take all this paines, and boldly hazard themselues to all these perils: But though grace be freely offered without money, and Heauen opened to all that desire, & but striue to enter; yet the most neglect the one, as not worth the receiuing, & lose the other, because they had rather not haue it, than take the least paines in trauelling to it. Yea so are men besotted with the loue of worldly vanities, that they take all these paines and endure these restlesse labours with pleasure and delight, which otherwise would be intolerable, and as it is said of Iacob louing Rachel, they thinke many yeeres but a few dayes which are spent in compassing these things which they so fondly affect, that if this desire supported them not, would bee irkesomely tedious. They are in such hast in running after their trifles, that though they tread vpon prickles and briars they feele them not, so greatly doe they thirst after these worldly vanities, that though they bee made bitter with toilesome labour, yet they greedily swallow them with pleasing delight; and as the oxe accustomed to draw in the yoke, doth after he is loosed, againe yeeld his neeke vnto it of his owne accord, without compulsion; so these men being inured to the worlds slauerie, though they were set at libertie out of this thraldome, would againe voluntarily take vpon them the yoke of seruitude, and weare themselues out with toilesome labour, to attaine the vncertaine possession of these momentany vanities.

And thus doe ambitious men take infinite paines in attaining vnto worldly glory and preferment; for it is the seed of labour which bringeth forth the fruit of honour, and hee who will attaine vnto it must bee content to endure toilesome paines, and to runne himselfe into desperate perils, hee must spend the day in restlesse trauels, and the night in carefull watching, plotting those policies which the next day hee will put in practise, for the atchieuing or preseruing of honour and aduancement; like a common seruant hee is wholly taken vp by other mens businesses, his sleepe is broken by suiters, if not by his owne cares; his recreations are interrupted with affaires of State, and whilest hee becommeth other mens, hee ceaseth to be his owne; hauing no spare time to enioy himselfe, or to bestow on his priuate affaires, vnlesse hee will bee exclaimed vpon by his waiting clients, for their giuing too long attendance. He must in time of warre fight in the front, first enter the breach, and euen runne vpon the pike, and cannons mouth, exposing his body to wounds, and his life to the extremest perils, if he will haue honour. In time of peace hee must vndergoe no lesse perils, both of professed enemies, and vndermining foes, the one seeking to crush him, the other to trip him whilest hee is rising; nor yet indure lesse paines; for hee must labour whilest others rest, watch whilest others sleepe, and with a world of care vphold his state, whilest others liue at ease and taste their pleasure. So what paines and perils doe men vndergoe who will attaine vnto worldly riches? whilest they rise early, and goe late to bed, aduenturously, and get basely, pinching backe and belly, and withholding necessaries from themselues and theirs, to increase the stocke. If they stay at home they toile themselues in ploughing, and sowing, running and riding, with innumerable other labours to attaine vnto wealth. If their calling be such as imployeth them abroad, what miseries doe they indure? what paines doe they take? what dangers doe they runne into? they must leaue their owne country, and runne into voluntarie banishment, (as it were) into another world; they must forsake house and friends, parents and children, yea they must be content to part with their wiues, making a temporarie diuorce betweene them whom God hath conioyned, and (as it were) diuide themselues, leauing halfe at home, when the other halfe must goe abroade to seeke for worldly pelfe. They must commit themselues to the mercies waues, cruell pyrats, and barbarous people, and one while be in danger of drowning, and another while of spoiling, sometime of starueing on sea, and soone after of betraying when they are come to land. And thus as the Psalmist saith, man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himselfe in vaine; he heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The like also may bee said of pleasures, which haue more paine and griefe going before them, than ioy and contentment comming with them: for what preparations are required to delightfull shewes, reuels, and pastimes? and what running and riding, toiling and moiling, catering and cooking, is necessary for the prouision of vnnecessarie dainties? In so much as the epicure himselfe who made a god of his belly, and an idol of his pleasure, prescribeth to his disciples for their chiefe diet, rootes, apples, and ordinarie meates, which might bee procured with greatest ease; because exquisite banquets, and daintie fare, requiring for their preparation great care and labour, did bring vnto men more paine and trouble in their getting, than pleasure and delight in their enioying. In a word, whosoeuer purchase any of these worldly vanities, they are faine to buy them at so high a rate, that if at the first view the price were set vpon these deceitfull wares, all would passe by them, and not once cheapen them.

Hieron.lib.2. aduerſ.Iouin. Tom.2.

And thus haue I shewed what miseries accompanie these worldly things in respect of the paines which are taken in their getting. Now if we further consider that these wearisome labours of the body, are commonly ioyned with the sin of the soule, and that as they bring to the one temporarie troubles, so to the other eternall torments, if they bee not preuented by serious repentance, we may iustly conclude that in this respect also they are truely miserable. For what greater misery can be imagined than to toile for that which is not worth our paines, and after all our labour to giue our soules to boot, for the procuring of these trifling vanities? to sell our soules vnto sin, and by sinne vnto death, which the whole world cannot redeeme when they are once loste? For if it will not profit vs by the losse of them to gaine the whole world, as our Sauiour speaketh; then how wretched is their estate, who sustaine by sinning this vnrecouerable losse, for the obtaining of some small pittance, and slender share of the worlds vanities? But who seeth not that few of many compasse these worldly things by honest and lawfull meanes, but take indirect and sinfull courses for the atchieuing of their ends? Some wronging others by violence, oppression, trecherie, and falsitie, fraud and deceit; and almost all wronging themselues with vnmeasurable toyle, and carking care, spending their strength, and hastening their death, for the obtaining of these earthly trifles. Whereby also they grieuously sinne against God, not onely by destroying his creature, but by dishonouring the Creator, whilest wholly resting vpon their owne care and labour, and vsing their owne meanes, they denie his prouidence, and refuse to bee ordred in their courses by his directions prescribed in his word, as though either he were ignorant and knew not their wants, or careless and did not regard them; or insufficient, and not able to relieue them; whereas in truth, he seeth all, ruleth all, and hath enough in store for all that depend vpon him: so that as the Wise man saith, in the feare of the Lord is an assured strength, and his children shall haue hope: seeing he neither wanteth knowledge, power, nor will to prouide for them. And thus do men draw vnto themselues iniquitie with the cords of these worldly vanities, as the Prophet speaketh, swallowing vnder these baites the hidden hookes of sin, and receiuing these earthly trifles as the wages of wickednesse; whereby they eternally lose themselues, for the temporarie gaine of worldly vanities. And yet so foolish men are, that they conceiue not of this miserable losse, but thinke onely those things deare which are bought with money, and those cheape for which they sell their soules; that losse alone which diminisheth their outward estate, and that aduantage, which addeth to their stocke, though it robbeth them of themselues, and their owne saluation. And whereas they would refuse many things which they desire vpon the base price of some little money, they will not sticke to purchase it by sin, wrong, iniurie, oppression, lying and deceit, though thereby they hazard body and soule to hell and eternall death: whereby it appeareth how highly men prize these worldly trifles, and how meanely they esteeme themselues, seeing they are readie to make exchange vpon all occasions, and to make sale of their soules to buy their vanities.

Mat. 16. 26.

Esay 5. 18.

Thus those who are ambitious doe not onely toile themselues with excessiue paines, but also are ready to run on in any wicked course, which doth but promise to lead them vnto honour and preferment. They care not to breake the Lawes of God and men, they neither regard pietie nor humanitie, stranger nor familiar, kindred nor countrie, but are willing to confound all, to ouerthrow all, and to defile their consciences with blood, murthers, conspiracies, treasons and rebellions, rather than they will faile to attaine their proud hopes, thinking a kingdome well bought, which may be had at any price. They are euer plotting machiauellian policies, and think they are best aduanced, when they rise to their desired height by treading vpon others, whom by their fraud & treachery they haue supplanted; they make no account of lying, dissembling, swearing, forswearing, infidelitie and falshood, if by all, or any of them they can serue their owne turnes. Finally, hauing nothing in them worthie praise, they are ready to commend themselues by dispraising others, and hauing nothing simply good in them, they would appeare good in comparison, by making others seeme worse than themselues. Thus also couetous men are readie to commit all manner of wickednesse to increase their riches, as oppression, extortion, cruelnie, iniurie, briberie, vsurie, and all manner of fraud and deceit; yea they will not sticke with Ahab to murther innocents, that they may make a prey of their goods; with Demas to forsake Christ and follow the world; with Iudas to betray their master, and with Demetrius to stirre vp persecution against the disciples of our Lord and Sauiour, if they speake against that whereby they haue aduantage; yea in truth they are worse than Iudas, for he would not sell Christ vnder the price of thirtie siluer pieces, whereas they are daily ready to part with, and forfeit that right and interest which they haue in him by lying, swearing and deceiuing, for the base offer of a groat or penie. Yea when they haue sold their soules vnto sin, for the purchase of this worldly pelfe, they are ready (as the Wise man speaketh) to transgresse Gods Law for a piece of bread, and that euen when they abound with wealth, and haue no spurre of necessitie to pricke them forward; hauing full bellies, with riuenous greedinesse they hunt after euery prey, and like the fish which Peter caught, though they haue money in their mouth, yet are they nibling at euery baite, and so as rich theeues, they double their fault in stealing when they haue no need. Thus the

Wise man bringeth in couetous worldlings exclaiming vpon any wickednesse for the obtaining of riches: Come, (say they) we will lay waite for bloud, and sodainly fall vpon them: we will swallow them vp like a graue, euen whole, as those that goe downe into the pit: we shall find all precious riches, and fill our houses with spoile. And left you should thinke that this is the custome of those men only, he concludeth, that such are the waies of euery one that is greedy of gaine, and it will take away the life of the owners thereof. So the Lord complaineth by his Prophet: among my people (saith he) are found wicked persons, that lay waite, as birders vse to watch fowles, they haue made a pit to catch men: and as a cage is full of birds, so are their houses full of deceit, and thereby they are become great and wealthie rich, they are waxen fat and shining: they doe ouerpasse the deedes of the wicked, they execute no iudgement, no not the iudgement of the fatherlesse, &c. And the Prophet Micheas complaineth, that the couetous oppressors of his time did take the good and leaue the euill, plucke off the skinne of the poore people from them, and their flesh from their bones, that they did eate also their flesh, flay off their skinne, breake their bones, and chop them in peeces as for the pot, and as flesh within the caldron. And elsewhere, that they did vse false measures, false balances and deceitfull weights: that their actions were full of cruelty, and their mouthes full of deceit and lies; the which the sin is threefolde vpon their sinfull soules, because by their cruelty and deceit they oppresse the poore, making choice to goe ouer the hedge where they find an entrie, and treading those vnder foote, who are not able to resist or make resistance. And in regard of these and many other sinnes, which vsually accompany riches in respect of their getting, they are called by one wicked riches; and by our Sauiour Christ, the mammon of iniquitie: and in this regard also they are compared vnto thornes, because as when they are hastily catched they wound the hand, so these the consciences of those who greedily set their hearts vpon them; and vnto snares, which being couered with a baite, intrappe vs whilest they allure vs: for he who greedily desireth to haue riches, taketh no care to auoid sinne, and being taken like a bird, who with an hungrie eye beholdeth the baite of earthly things, he is vnwittingly ensnared with the snare of sinne. Hence also it is that couetousnesse by the Apostle is called the roote of all euill; and by another it is called the metropolis, or mother citie of all vice and wickednesse, because where it is entertained, there also all manner of sinne increaseth, and (as it were) keepeth continuall hanne. In regard of which sinnes vsually accompanying riches, in respect of the vnlawfull meanes which are ordinarily vsed in their getting, one doubteth not to affirme that a rich man is vnrighteous himselfe, or the heire of one which is vnrighteous: which though it be not alwayes so, yet it seldome faileth in those who immoderately louing wealth, resolue with themselues that they will bee rich, and making haste to satisfie their greedie desire with all possible speed, doe in short time accomplish thereby their wish. For as sudden fatnesse and fatnesse is an vndoubted signe of the ill disposition of the body; so when as a man suddenly waxeth great, and (as I may say) fat in his state, by ordinarie meanes, and by his owne industrie and labour, it is an argument more than probable, that his mind is full of the grosse humours of sinne. Of the former the Apostle saith, that they who will bee rich (that is, pitch and resolue vpon it) fall into many tentations and snares, and into many foolish and noysome lusts, which drowne men into perdition and destruction, because the desire of money is the roote of all euill. And of the other, the Wiseman telleth vs, that he who maketh hast to bee rich, shall not be innocent; and that he who hasteth vnto riches, hath an euill eye: for as the Author of the booke of Wisdome saith, they make their whole conuersation to bee but as a market where there is gaine; and they resolue with themselues and doubt not to speake it, that they ought to bee getting on euery side, though it be by euill meanes. Yea this the Heathen man could discerne by the light of nature: There is no man (saith he) suddenly made rich liuing iustly; for a iust man increaseth his wealth by little and little, through sparing frugalitie: but he that treacherously lieth in wait for those goods which others possesse, doth forthwith seaze on all, and all at once becommeth rich. Now what greater miserie can there be, than to find that trifling gaine which bringeth with it the greatest losse, in getting siluer to forfeit the soule, and (as one saith) whilest wee gaine some gold to lose our faith, and whilest wee decke our selues outwardly with these worldly ornaments, to bee spoiled inwardly of all those spirituall ornaments of grace and vertue? But this miserie accompanieth ill gotten goods; for the couetous man by his sinfull gaining loseth himselfe, and whilest he deceiueth his neighbour of his siluer, the diuill cosoneth him of his saluation. Which he whether for the present worldly men will not, being ouer ioyed because they haue seised on their desired prey; yet if euer they come to remember themselues, and to feele the weight of their sinne lying heauie vpon their consciences, they will account these euill gaines the greatest losse, and will take no more pleasure in them, than I doe in the sight

Or if God present them with his grace, their wealth will comfort them no more than it did Zachæus; and that was neither in respect of his getting or keeping it, but as it did inable him to make restitution, and in liberall sort to relieue the poore. Let vs therefore take heede that wee doe not fall into this sinfull dotage of worldly men, who desire increase of their wealth though it be by euill meanes, seeing riches thus gotten are not onely vaine and momentanie, but also hurtfull and pernicious: for as the Wise man saith, the gathering of treasure by a deceitfull tongue, is vanitie tossed to and fro of them that seeke death. And the Prophet Ieremie telleth vs, that as the Partridge gathereth the young, which shee hath not brought forth: so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leaue them in the middest of his dayes, and at his end shall bee a foole. So also they are hurtfull and pernicious, seeing whileft they treasure vp wealth, they treasure vp sinne; and in treasuring vp sin, they also treasure vp wrath, and hauing in heaping vp wealth, heaped vp sin, they also prepare for themselues an intolerable waight of condemnation and destruction. And therefore let vs not set our hearts vpon this mammon of iniquity, but vpon the rich treasures of Gods spirituall graces, and heauenly ioyes; which as they are infinitely of more worth and value, so may we certainly attaine vnto these things purely good, by good and holy meanes; seeing our Lord and Sauiour of his free grace and mercy, being infinitely rich, for our sakes became poore, that we through his powerty, might be made rich, as the Apostle speaketh.

Finally, worldly pleasures are seldome compassed but sin accompanieth them; they being the diuels ordinarie baites which hee casteth before men, when he indeauoureth to catch them in the snares of destruction, and (as one calleth them) the very gate of sinne, which leadeth vs to the committing of all wickednesse. More specially men sin in getting of their pleasures, whileft they pursue them with immoderate loue, farre esteeming them aboue their worth and value; when as they are at excessiue cost in compassing them, spending those rich talents which God hath lent them, in their superfluities, which they ought to employ in relieuing the poore members of Iesus Christ. When as they take vp the greatest part of their cates and poinct, and not onely their owne, but many others also which are at their commaund; who spend a great part of their life in preparing theyres, sparry and pastimes, & in trauelling sea and land to make prouision of delicious drinkes, and daintie meates, which may delight their curious palates, causing a number of seruants many dayes for the procuring of that which bringeth but a momentanie delight, lasting no longer than their dainties are in swallowing downe, and in passing that short iourney betweene the mouth and stomacke. Finally, when as they raise their delights out of other torments, and maintaine their pleasures by oppression, cruelty, deceit, wrong and iniurie, making many heauie and sorrowfull their whole liues, that they may delight themselues with a few houres mirth. All which vnlawfull pleasures in euery Christian carefully auoide, and thinking it sufficient for vs that we haue spent the time past of our liues after the will of the Gentiles, walking in wantonnesse, lusts, drunkennesse, in gluttonie, drinkings, and in abominable idolatries: let vs passe the remainder of our time in holinesse and feare, labouring to take all our delight in those spirituall pleasures, which may be lawfully obtained, and being once inioyed, shall neuer be taken from vs.

1. Pet. 4. 3.

And thus hauing shewed some of those many miseries which accompanie these worldly things in respect of their getting and obtaining. Now further let vs consider of those which are incidents vnto men in respect of their keeping and possession. For as they are gotten with great toile and labour, so are they kept with much care and feare, in regard whereof they are no lesse troublesome in the inioying than they were in the obtaining; like herein vnto wild and sauage beasts, which cannot bee taken without great paines and perill, and being in hold, bring no lesse labour and danger to restraine them from doing mischiefe. And in this respect the Wise man passeth this sentence on all worldly things, that they are not onely vanity, but also vexation of spirit, troubling and molesting men both in their pursuit and possession. So hee saith elsewhere, that the house of the righteous hath much treasure, but the reuenues of the wicked is trouble: where if hee had vsed the antithesis, he should haue said, that as the one had much treasure, so the other much trouble; but to note the great molestation and anxiety of mind, which waiteth on the estate of worldly men, he is not contented to say, that it is troublesome, but trouble it selfe, or in it selfe trouble. The which trouble and restlesse vexation the Prophet Esay expresseth, by comparing wicked worldlings to the raging sea that cannot rest, whose waters cast vp mire and dirt. Now the cause of this care and feare in the keeping of these worldly vanities, is the immoderate loue which their owners beare vnto them; for as we securely possesse those things which we little regard: so if once we set our heart vpon any thing though neuer so vaine, wee are presently tormented with a iealous care in keeping it, and feare of losing it. And as little children are neuer at quiet when they are fond of any body in the familie, but crie after them as soone as they see them, and when they haue their companie, crie as much if they but seeme to stirre, for feare of losing them: so if wee once waxe fond of these worldly vanities, wee possesse them with such care and feare, lest they should bee taken from vs, that they bring vs much more disquietnesse and griefe, than comfort and contentment in their fruition. Neither can we euer securely enioy any worldly thing, or take delight in it without molestation, vnlesse louing it lesse than we loue our Creator, and possessing it with a desire moderated by his will, we be content to retaine it as long as it pleaseth him, and can part with it willingly, when it is his pleasure to take it away. For when we loue the world or any thing in it with vnlimited affection, and affect the creature more than the Creator, it is just with the Lord, that this excessiue loue should be punished with excessiue cares and feares, and that by immoderate louing wee should lose the comfort of our loue. Now if any shall say that they feele no such torment or molestation through these cares and feares; let them know that it is not the want of a burthen (which procureth their ease, but their madnesse of affections which maketh them senseles in feeling the waight: it is not for want of trouble that they are so well contented, but because their foolish loue causeth them to mistake crosses for comforts, and turneth torments into delights. Like those who are well pleased to haue their backs almost broken, whilest they are loaded with gold; or vnto such as being diseased with the dropsie, take their chiefe pleasure in drinking, though it be the chiefe cause of their paines and torments.

But how many miseries accompanie these worldly vanities it may more plainly appeare, if we insist in the speciall instances: for first as honours are begotten, borne and bred by perils and labours; so are they by the same nursed and preserued; neither can glorious fame bee long maintained, vnlesse it be vpheld by watching care, and painefull labour. And as those who climbe vp the high and steepe rocke of honour, must before they can get vp spend much sweate, and be euen tired with their laborious trauell, so being come to the top, they shall stand (as it were) vpon a narrow ridge, and find but tickle and slipperie footing, whereby they shall bee in danger of falling, vnlesse they haue a good braine, and a carefull eye. And this causeth those who are aduanced to high places, to be iealous and suspitious of all that stand about them, not thinking what they will doe, but what they can doe, nor what presently they vndertake, but what they may attempt in time to come; making their power of infringing their glorie, to be vnto them a continuall terror, as if already they were assaulted. They feare those who are vnder them, lest they pull them downe, that themselues may more easily ascend; those that are their equals, and (as it were) on euen ground, lest they should iustle them out of the path of honour, and crosse or ouerthrow them by competition, as being corriuals in the same loue, and much more doe they stand in feare of those who are aboue them, lest they should crush and tread them vnder foot, hauing the aduantage of the vpper ground. So that the ambitious man hauing with great paines ascended to the steepe top of honours hill, findeth himselfe not exempted, from the stormie tempests of troubles and dangers, but rather exposed to them; and these high Cedars are more often blasted, and shattered with thunders and lightnings, than the lowest shrubs. Which perils howsoeuer many escape, yet few or none the feare; for as the thunderbolt striking but one or two, doth affright and terrifie all those who stand about them; so when those who are highly aduanced, haue their greatnesse ruined and ouerthrowne, by those who are higher than they, or by the furie of popular rage, or because it is no longer able to beare its owne waight, those liue their part in the feare, though not in the danger, who are of the same qualitie and estate. Moreouer, adde vnto these feares and cares the manifold molestations, and fretting griefes, which are incident to those who are of honorable condition, whilest they vindicate their reputation, vpholding, and preseruing those honours which alreadie they haue receiued, or aspire vnto new preferments, being distracted betweene hope and feare of rising; whilest they enuie their superiours, emulate their equals, and magnifie themselues to their inferiours. Euery checke of their Soueraigne woundeth their heart, euery repulse or disgrace crusheth & breaketh it: they are vexed with euery salutation which they giue vnto their equals, if they be not resaluted; they are tormented if their inferiours faile in dutifull respect; and if any outstrip them who was behind in this glorious race, they sincke downe with sorrow, and eate their hearts with griefe. They are tormented if they doe not ouer-top all in height and greatnesse; and though they bee too high already, they haue little ioy in their aduancement, vnlesse they can rise to the full pitch of their proud hopes. Often they desire to doe euill, and yet are fearefull that it should bee discouered; and louing those courses of pride, insolence and tyrannie, which expose them to the enuie and iust hatred of all, they are neuertheleſſe fretted and vexed, when they are reputed to be ſuch as indeed they are, and when they find that they haue no more loue and reſpect than they haue deſerued. They would be lords ouer all, raigning and ruling at their owne pleaſure, and yet their pride abaſeth them to a ſeruile condition, ſeeing ouer them ſo many maſters as they haue familiars and acquaintance, whom they often, euen vnwillingly obſerue and pleaſe, becauſe they would not haue them diminiſh their fame and glorie, by detracting their praiſe and commendations. In a word, innumerable be the griefes and diſcontents accompanying this eſtate, many whereof are in their owne nature grieuous and very burthenſome, and many in themſelues but light, made heauie and intolerable, by the great ſpirits and ſmall patience of thoſe that beare them. Whereby it appeareth that theſe worldly honours, though they make outwardly a glorious ſhew, yet inwardly they are full of miſeries; and therefore when the world offereth, and beſtoweth them vpon its friends and fauourites, it dealeth with them, as the ſouldiers with Chriſt; for it giueth them glorious robes, but it is to mocke them; it putteth a ſceptre into their hands, but it is of reed, which breaketh in the managing, and moſt faileth when it is moſt reſted on; it beſtoweth vpon them crownes indeed, but they are of thornes, which being often ſmitten to their heads with the cruel ſtroakes of aduerſe accidents, wound in ſtead of comforting, and bring in the place of expected ioy, innumerable moleſtations and bitter griefes. Or though they be of pure gold, yet their worth is ſo much exceeded by their waight, that none will care to weare them, but onely ſuch as cannot ſafely lay them aſide, or thoſe who are ſo wholly carried with the furie of ambition, that they take pleaſure in their paine, and loue that which is their torment which being the caſe of many, gaue iuſt occaſion to one of making this exclamation: O ambition (ſaith he) which art the croſſe and torment of the ambitious, how doſt thou torment all, and yet pleaſe them in their torments, nothing more bitterly vexeth, nothing more grieuouſly diſquieteth, and yet nothing among miſerable mortall men is more magnified and extolled.

Mat. 17, 28, 29.

O ambitio ambientium crux, quomodo omnibus torqueris, omnibus places? Bernard. lib. 3. de Conſiderat. cap. 2.

The like or greater miſeries accompany riches, whileſt they are in cuſtodie and poſſeſſion, both in reſpect of that care and labour of body and mind, in keeping and diſpoſing them; and alſo in regard of the feare of loſing them, and of many miſerable effects which accompany them both. For as they are gotten with intolerable labours of the body, ſo they are poſſeſſed with infinit cares and perturbations of the mind, either whileſt they who haue them are troubled in diſpoſing and imploying them ſo, as may returne vnto them the greateſt increaſe; or in ſharing them with ſome indifferencie to thoſe who are of their family and charge (for when goods encreaſe they alſo are increaſed that eate them, as the Wiſe man ſpeaketh) or finally (if at leaſt they be poſſeſſed with a good conſcience) in watching ouer themſelues, that they be not corrupted with their abundance, and that their plenty of gold doth not make them poorer in godlineſſe. In which reſpect riches are compared to thornes, which being griped wound the fleſh, but be harmeleſſe if they lie in the open hand. So if they, being exceſſiuely loued, be (as it were) griped with immoderate cares, they pricke and wound the heart with many griefes and troubles; but if wee careleſſly keepe them, and ſlightly hold them, being ready to part with them vpon all good occaſions, and to ſuffer them to take their flight like an Eagle, when God calleth for them, they will become to their owners not onely harmeleſſe, but alſo profitable. To which purpoſe one demandeth: Who (ſaith he) would beleeue me, if I ſhould interpret thornes to be riches? eſpecially ſeeing they pricke, and theſe delight; and yet in truth they are no better than thornes, becauſe by their pricking cares they rent the mind, and when they intice vs vnto ſinne, they make it bloody with the wounds of wickedneſſe. And as they are continually vexed with theſe cares in keeping them; ſo alſo with feare of loſing them; for as before they had them, they purſued them with burning deſire, ſo being poſſeſſed of them, they keepe them with quaking feare. No ſooner haue they gotten riches, but preſently they loſe their ſecuritie, and now they are in feare of that wealth which before they wiſhed, ſicke of injoying their owne deſires; and fall into trauell, as ſoone as they haue their longing: for as Eliphaz ſpeaketh, A ſound of feare is alwayes in their eares, leſt in their peace and proſperitie, the deſtroyer ſhould come vpon them. If the couetous rich man ſeeth one ſtronger than himſelfe, he feareth violence and robberie; if one wiſer, fraud and deceit; if one richer and mightier, then he is afraid of being ſpoiled by oppreſſion; if one poorer and weaker, by theft and ſtealth; abroad he feareth theeues and robbers, at home hee ſuſpecteth his owne ſeruants; in time of warre he is afraid of common ſpoilers, in time of peace, of enuious and ſpitefull ſlanderers, which are ready to make him faultie becauſe he is rich, and an enemie to the common wealth, becauſe he hath too much for his owne particular. Finally, the couetous rich man is afraid of all things, things, shuning Gods displeasure; and of louing all, except it be his owne soule, and the ioyes of Heauen: and such is his folly, that whilest he seareth to lose his Gold, Riches, Lands & Possessions, he is in no fear of losing himselfe, as though (excepting his owne person) he had nothing in his custody vnworthy the keeping. Hence it is that he keepeth such a mirror with such his wealth, and hauing inclosed and shut it vp vnder the sure custodie of many locks, Iron bard Chests, and strong lockes, which neither picking nor breaking can indanger, he addeth also to his aid so many seruants, as his couetous minde will suffer him to maintaine, that they may the better keepe the watch, and bring securitie; but all in vaine, for within a while he groweth iealous of his Guard, and suspicious of his Assistants; and the more able they are to keepe out outward violence, the more feareful he is lest they should breake open his Chests, and so spoyle him of his Treasures. And therefore thinking no house strong sufficient to keepe his Gold and Siluer from force or fraud, he hideth it in the ground, being ready to suspect his eyes & hearts, as priuy to his secrecy, lest inquiring into his tongue, it should reueale it as vnawares either waking or sleeping. And as one of the Ancients notes, such is the madnesse of these greedy Muck-worms, that after they haue with sweating paines, searched for their Treasures in the bowels of the earth, they are ready with shiuering feare to hide and couer them in the earth againe; like the Adders young, which being newly come out of their Dams belly, glide and returne into it for safety, when as they are frighted with any danger. Yea, and as though notwithstanding all this, it were not safe enough, they are ready (as one saith) to lie ouer the place in which their Gold is hid, and to bury their hearts together with their Treasures, that it may be the better watched. In a word, as they neuer thinke their money safe from danger, so are they neuer free from feare, they neuer securely eat or sleepe, but as the holy Martyr said, they sigh in their banquets, although they drinke in the richest plate; and after their Feasts, when they haue laid downe their bodies made lame with cares, and euen hid them in their beds of downe, they watch and can take no rest in their safe Lodgings; and when but a Mouse stirreth, they are ready to bustle vp, suspecting a Theefe; not vnderstanding, wretches that they are, that all their wealth doth but bring vnto them glorious punishments, that they are fettered with their Gold, and possessed of their riches, whilest they thinke they possesse them. The which folly of euer carefull keeping their wealth, as it is in all sorts and shapes, so is it most ridiculous, and yet most common in elder men; which though they haue already one foote in the Graue, yet doe they in this kind shew their foolish feare more than any other; burying their Treasures in the earth, not long before themselues are buried, as though howsoeuer they neuer had any good of them in this life, yet they were in some hope to haue it in the life to come. The which dotage befalleth men through the iust iudgement of God; for when as they neglect the loue of their Creatour, who is loued without any labour, he giueth them ouer to dote vpon the creature which they loue with laborious paines, and enjoy with many griefes; being ready at the command of their concupiscence to endure all labours and dangers for the obtayning of it; and to what purpose? Surely that they may fill their Chests with Treasures, and empty their mindes of peace and securitie; gaine Gold, and lose their sleepe. To which purpose one saith, that couetousnesse desireth Gold, sorrowfull labour findeth it out, and narking care keepeth it: It is the master of labours, perillous to the possessours, a weakener of vertue, an ill Master, and treacherous Seruant; no man thinketh that he hath it safe, vnlesse hee alwayes hide it, because it shineth to the owners destruction; in darknesse it is sought, and it is kept in darknesse. And the reason of all these miseries is, because men make Idols of their wealth, and loue it out of measure; neither can that be securely possessed which is excessiuely ouer-valued; whereas if louing God aboue all, they could in all estates be content with that which pleaseth him: if in the time of prosperity and plenty, they would learne the vanity of abundance, and make poverty familiar vnto them, not only by meditation, but by accustoming and inuring themselues to indure some want, they would enjoy their riches with much more security, and entertaine poverty if it happen to seize vpon them, with much more patience and Contentation.

August. Serm. 16. In Acts 3. Tom. 10.

And thus haue I shewed the care and feare which accompany riches in their possession. Now let vs consider of some miserable effects which issue from them both; as first through this care and feare they deprive their bodies of rest, and their minds of peace and quietnesse. For as the Wiseman speaketh, the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleepe. Whom the sonne of Syrach imitating, saith, that waking after riches driueth away the body, and the care thereof driueth away sleepe; their waking care breaketh the sleepe, as a great sickenesse breaketh it. Thus their concupiscence keepeth them waking, whilest it forceth them to tire their thoughts in plotting how they may keepe their owne store, or get other mens, and so turne their sufficiency into abundance, no lesse vexing their soules with enuy when they see other mens mens state hastily increase, than with sorrow because their owne estandeth as a they, orgoeth backward. One while sorrowing because the earth not yeelding fruitfull increase nor sufficient plenty, they haue not enough; another while no lesse grieuing at the great abundance of all commodities, because the Market falling, they cannot sell their owne at their owne rates, bewayling all that as losse wherein they come short of their greedy expectation. In which respect one truly saith, that when the loue of riches is excessiue and vnlawfull, they much more torment the soule with greedy desire, than they doe refresh it with any comfortable vse; and whilest a man too much leaneth towardes them in loue, they failing him, hee slideth and falleth into griefe and sorrow. He who lodgeth them loseth his rest, for when he waketh he thinketh of increase, and when hee sleepeth he dreameth of Theeues: hee is afflicted in the day, fearefull in the night, and alwayes in want and beggery, continually robbing himselfe of rest, for feare lest at any time hee should bee robbed of his riches. So also they load themselues with vnsupportable burthens; and as the Prophet speaketh, with thicke clay: and as Birds of heauy bodies cannot flie though they haue wings, being pressed downe with their owne waight; so though worldly Misers haue soules and minds which might carry them into Heauen in spirituall meditations; yet the burthen of their wealth, and their worldly conuipiscence, will not suffer them to rise, but presseth them downe grouling vnto the earth. Which burthen (as one saith) is not more vnreasonable, in that it being the time of warfare, and our enemies still in field, it is altogether vnmeet before the battell beended to load our selues with spoyles, which will make vs vnfit to continue the fight; but after we haue obtained the victory, then may we securely enjoy our Treasures. Moreouer, with their cares, feares, and restlesse watching they weaken their strength, and bring vpon themselues sicknesse, and vntimely death, and all for the obtayning of such trifling vanities as are not worth the labour in seeking and trouble in keeping them. In which respect their earnest endeuours, are fitly by the Prophet compared to the weauing of the Spiders web, in making whereof shee consumeth her owne intrailes, and being finished, it is good for nothing but to catch Flies: so couetous men weare out themselues with cares and labours, for the obtayning of Gold and Siluer, and when they haue them, breake their rest, and oftentimes their hearts in keeping them, hauing for all their paines, cares, and feares no reuenue of true profit: nor any more good by all their trauels, than their Bags and Chests wherein they keepe their mony, which are but worms out, and sometime broken open for the Siluers sake which they keepe in custodie. Finally, by their cares and feares they make themselues of Masters and Owners, Keepers and Iaylours of their riches, or rather in truth fellow prisoners; for not the limbes but the heart is bound with these Golden Chaines, and whilest they locke vp their Gold in their Iron-bard Chests, their minds also are imprisoned with it.

And thus haue I shewed that those who keepe their riches with immoderate loue, do together with them harbour many miseries. The which should serue as an effectuall perswasion to weane our hearts from the excessiue loue of these miserable vanities, and to make vs affect with our heartiest desires the rich Treasures of Gods spirituall graces, and heauenly ioyes, which bring comforts without cares; because all our cares are cast vpon God, who careth for vs, and true happinesse without the mixture of any misery; To make vs loath these vaine and worldly riches, which (as Zopher speaketh) filling vs with abundance, fill vs also with paine; and to be more in loue with those heauenly Treasures, which wee shall securely enjoy without any perturbation of our rest. Or if our affections cannot be withdrawne from this earthly Mammon, let vs as our Sauiour Christ exhorteth vs, labour to make friends of it; which we may doe if we vse it friendly, and loue it truly, as it ought to be loued, and we to loue. Now riches are truly loued when we vse them in their kind, and according to their owne nature, helping them forward to the attaining of their chiefe and best end, for which they were created; euen as we are said to loue Bookes best, when wee euen weare them out with studying; and meate best, when with a good stomacke wee feed vpon it; and our Neighbours best, when we moue them to glorifie God in their saluation, because these are the mayne ends for which they were made. But the chiefe end of riches is that wee may glorifie God in their vse; as when we imploy part of them to the necessary and sufficient maynetenance of our selues, and those who are committed to our charge; and that which remayneth, to the releeuing, feeding and clothing of the poore members of Iesus Christ, which is the mayneend of our plenty and superfluity; from which end also they haue their name, being called goods, because they inable vs to doe good, and are the instruments of well doing. And therefore they who hinder them of these ends, and will not vse them according to their owne nature, which is to doe good, by being communicated to those who stand in need, but keepe them fast locked vp (as it were) in close prison, not suffering their Gold and Siluer to be at liberty, which were created and ordained to be (as wee also call them) them) current money passing from man to man, as need requireth, they can neither be said to loue their riches, nor yet themselues; because altering their vse and nature, they make them to degenerate, and ceasing to be good & profitable, they cause them through their abuse to be hurtfull and pernicious. In which respect they are compared to hand-dogs, which are most fierce when they are tied vp, but gentle when they are set at liberty: and to Riuers, which if they be suffered to haue their naturall course in their owne current, they runne quietly and doe much good to the whole Country, but if any will stop their course, as desiring to ingrosse them to his owne vse, they rage and swell, breake downe their bankes, and drowne all that are about them: or vnto springing fountaines, which if they may purifie and cleanse themselues by sending out their pirling streames, they continue cleare and sweet, but if their liue be damned vp, and they made a standing poole; their water putrifieth and corrupteth: so if we suffer riches to haue their naturall course, like streames issuing from vs, by communication and Christian liberalitie, and to fill the empty places which are in their way, they will retaine their naturall purity and perfection, being vsed in their kind, but if we imprison and hoard them vp, they will corrupt and become vnprofitable, yea, in truth noysome, hurtfull and pernicious. Thus Clothes laid vp become Moth-eaten, Corne reserued ouer-long, becommeth musty and vnsauoury; meate kept past due time putrifieth and stinketh, and Coine it selfe being hoarded vp and not vsed, loseth its beauty and brightnesse, and is fretted with rust and canker. And that which is worst of all, these Moth-eaten Garments, corrupted riches, and cankered Gold and Siluer, shall be a witnesse against those who thus abuse them, eate their flesh as fire, and for their false and wrongfull imprisonment, shall cast them into the prison of vtter darkenesse, as our Sauiour Christ and his holy Apostle haue plainly taught vs.

If therefore wee truly loue riches, as our seruant, let vs not by hording them vp increase our owne cares and feares, and hinder them of their right vse and end, but let vs so dispose of them, as they may be most safe, and wee most secure, they preserued in their naturall perfection, and we benefited by their fruition. Now this we shall do: if wee enjoy part of them to our owne comfort, and communicate the ouerplus to the good of others, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and relieuing those who are way-stand in need. For we lose them truly riches in keeping them, and keepe them in bestowing them: if we giue them we shall euer enjoy them: if we reserue them wee shall surely lose them, seeing we cannot long continue with them, for either they shall be taken from vs, or we for them, carrying nothing with vs out of the World, but returning naked as we came into it. So that if wee would haue these perishing things permanent vnto vs; wee must giue them that we may alwayes haue them; and leaue them for a time, that we may enjoy them for euer. For as the Wise man saith, if wee cast our bread vpon the face of the waters, after many dayes we shall find it; if wee giue vnto the poore, wee lend vnto the Lord, and hee will recompence and repay vs that which we haue giuen. So our Sauiour telleth vs, that if wee giue to the poore wee shall haue heauenly Treasures. And the Apostle teacheth vs, that those who be rich in good workes, and ready to distribute and communicate, doe lay vp in store for themselues a good foundation against the time to come, and obtaine eternall life. If therefore wee so loue our riches, as that wee would eternally possesse them, let vs not hoard them vp in the earth, where we are sure to leaue them, carrying nothing with vs but the canker of our Coine, which shall beare witnesse against vs at the day of iudgement; but let vs send them before vs vnto Heauen, deliuering them to the poore who are Gods Factors and Receiuers; and so hauing conueyed and made ouer our goods (as it were) by bils of exchange, wee shall find the Lord a sure and all sufficient pay-master, who will giue vs more than double vsance, and yet pay vs at the first sight. If wee would haue our Corne continue sweet and good for a great space, let vs know that there are for this purpose no Garners comparable to poore mens stomackes, which will preserue our Graine for our vse vnto life eternall: if wee would haue our Clothes preserued from Mothes, and so last long, the backes of the naked are our safest Wardrobes: if we would keepe our Gold and Siluer from rusting and cankering, let vs commit it to the custodie of the poore, and they will not only keepe it bright, but become our Porters to carry it before vs vnto Heauen; whereas whatsoeuer they beare not for vs wee shall surely leaue behind vs. In a word, if wee would be rich truly and eternally, let vs as our Sauiour Christ counselleth vs, not lay vp our treasures vpon the earth, where the Moth and Canker corrupt, and where Theeues digge through and steale, but let vs lay vp our treasures in Heauen, whereas they shall be securely safe from all these dangers. And as elsewhere he exhorteth vs, let vs sell that we haue, and giue almes, and so make vs bagges which waxe not old, lay vp a treasure in Heauen which can neuer faile, where no Theefe commeth, nor Moth corrupteth. And if wee looke so finde rich treasures when wee come to our heauenly Country, wee must not giue it pinchingly and with a sparing hand, but send it before vs in great plentie; if wee will therebe rich in glory, we must be heere rich in good workes, imitating our bountifull God, who giueth vs abundantly all things to enjoy, as the Apostle speaketh; if we will find there a fruitfull harueſt of joy and happineſſe, our ſeed time muſt not be niggardly and ſparing, for as the ſame Apoſtle ſaith, he which ſoweth ſparingly ſhall reape ſparingly; and he that ſoweth liberally, ſhall reape alſo liberally. The which liberalitie is not to be meaſured according to the greatneſſe of the thing giuen, ſimply conſidered; but as it is compared to his eſtate that giueth it, and proceedeth from a free and bountifull heart, in which reſpect the poore Widowes mite, and the cup of cold water giuen by him that hath no better thing to beſtow, ſhall haue as rich a reward, as hee that giueth much out of his abundance. But as our almes are fully in proportion to match our eſtates, ſo they are not to exceed them, for the Apoſtle giueth vs this rule, that we muſt lay vp for theſe charitable vſes, according as God proſpereth vs; and not whileſt we relieue others, bring our ſelues and thoſe who depend vpon vs to want and beggery. And as wee are to moderate our almes with Chriſtian wiſdome and diſcretion, leſt we lauiſhly powre out, in ſtead of liberall giuing; and by our preſent profuſeneſſe in waſting the ſtocke, diſable our ſelues for the time to come; ſo wee are much more carefully to take heed, that we doe not with-hold from the poore that which our ſtate will well beare, nor giue leſſe than our abilitie will preſently afford, for feare of wanting our ſelues in time to come; ſeeing this were but to bewray our diffidence and diſtruſt in Gods bountifull prouidence, yea, and after that he hath giuen vs a pawne and pledge of his liberall loue in prouiding for vs ſufficiens ſtore: from whence wee might conclude, that as God hath already furniſhed vs with neceſſary and conuenient plenty, ſo (as the Apoſtle ſaith) he is ſtill able to make all grace to abound towards vs, that we alwayes hauing all ſufficiencie in all things, may abound in euery good worke. To ſay nothing of their extreame folly, who vpon a ruinelleſſe ſuſpition, and diffident feare, neglect theſe workes of mercy, ſeeing hereby they certainly deprriue themſelues of the eternall ioyes of Heauen, vpon an vncertaine feare of wanting hereafter theſe temporary trifles, and without all doubt caſt themſelues into the torments of Hell: for as true, as truth it ſelfe hath ſpoken it, thoſe who haue not fed the hungry, giuen drinke to the thirſtie, cloathed the naked, and lodged the harbourleſſe, ſhall in the day of Iudgement heare that fearefull ſentence paſſing on them; Depart from me ye curſed into euerlaſting fire prepared for the Deuill and his Angels; for I was an hungred, and you gaue me no meate, &c. Euen as contrariwiſe thoſe who haue performed theſe deeds of Charitie, ſhall with infinite comfort heare their Iudge and Sauiour pronounce that ioyfull ſentence; Come yee bleſſed of my Father, inherit the Kingdome prepared for you, from the foundations of the world, &c.

And therefore if we will eſcape this curſe, and be partakers of this bleſſing, let vs not with carnall Worldlings take all our delight in poſſeſſing abundance; and (as it were) in burying our ſelues vnder an huge heape of this worldly droſſe, hiding theſe lent talents, and not imploying them to the glory of our Maſter, and good of our fellow ſeruants; but let vs liberally communicate of our ſtore to thoſe that ſtand in need. Which that wee may doe with more cheerefulneſſe, let vs further conſider that herein we ſhall approue our ſelues to be children of our heauenly Father, ſeeing wee reſemble him in his bountie and liberalitie, giuing abundantly according to our ability to the reliefe of all that want our helpe; and that wee take hereby the beſt courſe to rid our ſelues of carking care, and vnquiet feares of loſing theſe things which wee ſo much loue, ſeeing wee haue laid them vp in Heauen, where they ſhall ſafely be kept for vs (as it were) out of the gunſhot of any danger. Let vs call to mind that it is a more happy thing to giue than to receiue, and that thoſe who are moſt liberall in beſtowing almes, doe hereby obtaine farre greater benefits than they vpon whom they are beſtowed; for they giue tranſitory trifles, but ſhall be recompenſed with eternall treaſures, as it is written, he hath ſparſed abroad, and hath giuen to the poore, his benevolence remaineth for euer: his horne ſhall be exalted with glory. They beſtow ſingle benefits, but they ſhall haue them returned an hundred fold, and haue euerlaſting life to boot. And therefore if we truly loue our money, and be wiſely coueticus, let vs fall into the practice of this Chriſtian vſury, which will not onely bring vs in for gaine ten in the hundred, but an hundred for ten, yea, an hundred for one; for as wee may well ſay with the ſonne of Syrach, that if wee beſtow our treaſures after the commandement of the moſt high, it ſhall bring vs more profit than our gold. Neither is there any cauſe why wee ſhould ſuſpect our payment, ſeeing hee who hath promiſed it, is true and al-ſufficient, and neuer failed of his word. If therefore men be willing to commit their ſeed to the ground in hope of a fruitfull Harueſt, though there bee many accidents often happening which fruſtrate their expectation; if they can be contents in hope of a little gaine to truſt our their wares and goods to ſuch as they thinke ſufficient, though they are often miſtaken and deceiued of all; how intolerable is their diffidence, who dare not giue credit vnto the Lord, promising them to repay that which they lend him with such infinite increase, but rather let their seed waxe mustie in their Garners, than they will imploy it in this spirituall husbandry, and repose more confidence in vnable and deceitfull men, than in the most true and al-sufficient God?

And thus haue I shewed the cares, feares, and manifold miseries which accompany riches in their possession, as also some meanes whereby wee may be vnburthened of them. It followeth that I adde briefly a word or two of worldly pleasures, which as they are gotten with labour and paine, so they are kept with much trouble and feare. For what care doe they bring to those who set their hearts on them to continue them so, that they may neither be wanting to their appetite, nor their appetite to them? How curiously doe they diet themselues one day, that the day following they may be more able, and (as it were) better breathed, to run on in their voluptuous courses? How discontented are they when hauing pleasures they can take no pleasure in them, because they are cloyed, and haue already surfeited of their delights? How are they vexed if they doe not answere their expectation, nor please their wanton palate, when as oftentimes there is no want in their pleasures, but because they being glutted with satiety cannot rellish them? How are they turmoyled whilest they feele an inward conflict betweene voluptuousnesse, and desire of Honour, and stand in feare left by enjoying their pleasures, they lose their credit and reputation, when either they are in themselues vnlawfull, or in their vse immoderate? What inward pangs feele they, when their consciences tell them that their voluptuous courses will not agree with Religion, and the feare of God, no nor yet with ciuility and common honesty? and what remorse, and stings of repentance doe they endure, when the sweetnesse of their pleasures are ouer-past; though they are so bewitched with these pleasing sorceries, that with the Drunkard in the Prouerbs, after they haue found themselues sicke, and surfeited of their delights, and euen beaten with the scourges of many miseries, they continue in their voluptuous courses, and with no lesse fondnesse than before doote vpon their pleasures? Finally, whereas the temperate man who hath learned to abound and to want, doth securely enjoy his delights, as not greatly valuing them, because he can as well bee without them as with them; contrariwise hee that is voluptuous, hauing set his heart vpon these bewitching vanities, and made an Idoll of his pleasure, is in continuall feare of losing that which he so much loueth; and when hee abounderh with those things which his heart desireth, his rejoycing is not so great in their fruition, as his feares, jealousies, and suspitions, left in time to come he should be depriued of them. And howsoeuer these carnal pleasures are but base vanities and childish toyes; yet men setting their hearts vpon them, they become great, not in themselues, but in opinion, which is the chiefe measure of worldly excellencie. Which opinion as it maketh them to enjoy them with loue; so it causeth them to keepe them with feare; like little children, which with no lesse care watch ouer their worthles trifles, than if they were the most precious jewels, and richest treasures.

9. Sect. 17. The miseries which accompany worldly things when they are lost.

But hauing sufficiently shewed the miseries which are incident vnto these worldly things, whilest they are in custodie and possession; let vs now in the last place consider, that as they are gotten with labour, and kept with care, so they are lost with sorrow and bitter griefe. For men hauing aduanced them infinitely aboue their worth, both in their judgement and affection, and made them their Idols, vpon whom they haue wholly set their hearts; when they are depriued of them they bewayle their losse no lesse, yea, in truth much more bitterly, and with farre greater passion, than if they had lost all part and interest in God himselfe, his Sonne Iesus Christ, and all those glorious joyes in his heauenly Kingdome. And hauing reposed in them all their joy and comfort, their hope and confidence, when with Laban they are robbed of their Idols, they lament their losse with more true griefe, and sustaine this burthen with much more impatiencie, than if they were at once spoyled of their wife, children, and all their friends; because they are together with them robbed also of their hearts, which are fast nailed, and inseparably affixed to them. Neither in this case is the worth of the thing lost to be considered, but the affection & estimation of him that loseth it; for those things which are possessed with immoderate loue, are lost with immoderate griefe, although in themselues they are vaine and worthlesse: euen as we see little children lamenting with no lesse true sorrow the taking away of their childish and contemptible trifles, than if they were depriued of their inheritance. So in like manner, worldly men ouer-valuing earthly vanities aboue their worth, are more tormented with griefe when they are forced to forgoe them, than for losing the glorious inheritance of the Saints, and the eternall joyes of Heauen. Yea their sorrow is so intolerable oftentimes, that to ease their griefe, they murther themselues; as thinking lesse torment, in death, yea, in Hell it selfe, than in liuing to sustaine so great a losse. For the greater they conceited their happines in the fruition of their vaine desires, the more miserable they thinke themselues when they are depriued of it; and now they heartily wish that they had neuer enjoyed these pleasures, because at the last they are spoyled of them. Though in truth with great folly, for they hauing had formerly the fruition of their desires, might, were it not for their owne peeuishnesse, still delight themselues with the remembrance of it, and when they are most destitute and forsaken of the things they loued, they are (setting passion and opinion aside) in no worse case, than before they had them. Yea, sometime men are thus afflicted with bitter sorrow, when as they are deprined but of some small part of these worldly things, though they haue still the greatest share left behind; neither can their great remaynder so much delight them, as their little losse grieueth them, as though their joy and comfort were bound joyntly to all, and seuerally to euery part of these vanities, so that if any part be wanting, a forfeiture must presently be made of the whole summe. Wherein they may fitly be compared to little children, who though they haue twentie trifles wherewith they play, yet if but one of them be taken away without their consent, doe presently fall a crying, and in a moody discontent cast away all the rest, taking no delight in many, vnlesse they may still haue all. Yea, oftentimes it commeth to passe, that though they make but meane account of a thing whilest they haue it, yet they value it when they must forgoe it, beginning then onely to loue it, when they lose it, and highly to esteeme it, when they can keepe it no longer. And as their damage indeareth their affection, so answerably it increaseth their sorrow; and the arguments which they gather to amplifie the greatnesse of their losse, are so many quarrels against their owne quietnesse, and so many motiues to augment and aggrauate their impatiencie and griefe. In all which respects worldly men haue much more sorrow for the losse of these earthly vanities, than euer they had comfort in enjoying them, and after their false and counterfeit joyes, sustaine true and piercing griefe. And that which is worst of all, this worldly sorrow hath no comfort attending on it, but as the Apostle telleth vs, it bringeth death, and that not only of bodie, but of soule also, vnlesse they haue grace to bewaile this griefe, and be heartily sorie, that they haue so sorrowed.

Stultus quod perdidit, tantum amat.

2. Cor. 7. 10.

3. Sect. 18. Of the miseries which are incident to men for the losse of honours, riches and pleasures.

And as these things are of vndoubted truth in all other worldly things: so especially in Honours, Riches and Pleasures; for how vncomfortably doth the ambitious man grieue, and with what impatiencie doth he sustaine his losse, if hee bee deprined of his Honours and Preferments? How much more bitterly and heartily doth he bewaile it, than the death of his first-born or neerest friends? Yea, how much rather had hee die himselfe, than to liue disgraced, though it be but in the opinion only of his owne consorts? And though hee haue many Preferments, and much glory in the World, what comfort doth he take in all the rest, if he be deprived but of one, yea, if hee come short of his hopes where hee thought to obtaine; losing that which he neuer had, but only in conceit? So the couetous man bewaileth his lost riches, as if he had lost himselfe; and that not out of passion only, but out of an ill grounded judgement, which maketh him so to esteeme them, as though all his good and happinesse consisted in hauing them, and all ill and miserie in their want. And hence it is that in their vsuall phrase of speech they say when wealth is conferred on them, that they are made, and when it is taken away that they are vndone, or (as it were) vnmade againe; judging, that in hauing, or not hauing riches, their making or marring chiefly consisteth. Yea, so fast hold doth their immoderate loue of this earthly Mammon take of them, that they can more easily part with their soules than part with it, as wee may see in the example of the rich man in the Gospell, who when hee could learne of our Sauiour no other meanes to be saued, than by parting with all and following him, he went away sorrowfull for the losse of his soule, but yet resolued to keepe his wealth. And such as their loue is whilest they haue it, so such is their griefe when they are forced to leaue it, and that not only when they lose all, but also some small part or portion of it; in regard whereof, hee who hath the greatest riches, hath also most plentifull matter of sorrow and griefe; because in such abundance, and so many particulars which are all casuall, some things must of necessity euery hand-while miscarry, the losse whereof so much and often troubleth him, that it were much better for him, that he had neuer had them, than to sustaine such griefe in losing them. Neither can the greatnesse of their estates lessen their sorrow when any losse befalleth them: for as one said wittily; An hairie man doth with no lesse paine suffer his haire to be pulled off, than hee who is almost bald; and a wound bringeth as much griefe to a Giant, as to a Dwarfe; and so in like manner it is all one, whether a couetous man hath much or little, because his heart adhearing, and being (as it were) fast glued to his wealth, the paine is all alike when it is pulled from him. And this maketh men so impatient to thinke of parting with their riches, that they are readie with the Heathen, when they make their will, to make themselues their owne heires, and to bequeath vnto themselues their owne possessions. The like also may be said of voluptuous pleasures, which howsoeuer they bee but childish toyes, and of small worth; yet those whose their hearts vpon them, are vexed with with no small sorrow, when they are depriued of them; and howsoeuer they had neuer any good by them in their fruition, either in respect of soule or body; yet being inured to them, they bewaile the losse of their company with bitter griefe: and whereas men remember their crosses, dangers, and troubles, with great comfort and contentment, when they are once past; contrariwise the greater their passed pleasures haue beene, the more bitter sorrow they bring to their hearts when they thinke vpon them.

And thus haue I shewed not onely that worldly things are mixt with, but also in themselues full of miseries. The consideration whereof, as it should weane our hearts from the immoderate loue of these vanities; which howsoeuer at the first they seeme sweete and pleasant, yet their after-taste is full of bitternesse; and though they bee crusted ouer with a thinne rinde of sugred delights, yet that being presently melted away, as soone as it is relished, the whole body and substance that remaineth, is no better, or more pleasing to our taste than gall or wormewood: so on the other side it should moue vs highly to esteeme, and chiefely to affect, and seeke Gods spirituall graces in this life, and heauenly glorie in the life to come, seeing the former in themselues are free from miseries, and leaue no after-sting behind them; but howsoeuer at the first taste they seeme a little bitter to flesh and blood, yet the more wee feed vpon them, the more sweete they will bee vnto vs; vntill at last hauing made them the ordinarie diet of our soules, they will taste more sweetely and delicately, than the hony or the hony combe, as the Prophet Dauid spake by good experience; and so they will not only delight vs in themselues, but relish our mouths when they are distasted with the bitternesse of worldly miseries. And for the other they are not onely in themselues sweet and pleasant, but also free from the mixture of all worldly euils, not tainted with the least trouble, nor distasted with the smallest griefe; for then all teares shall be wiped from our eyes, and all matter of mourning ceasing, wee shall be replenished with fulnesse of ioy, and be euen rauished with those happy pleasures which are at Gods right hand for euermore. Which if wee would truely seeke, wee should surely find, and attaine vnto them with farre lesse labour than we spend in compassing worldly vanities, and hauing obtained them, wee shall securely possesse them without trouble, care or feare; and neuer haue cause to bewaile their losse, because they are eternall, and shall neuer be taken from vs.

CHAP. XXVI.

That though with all our endeauours we seeke for worldly things, wee are not sure to obtaine them.

HAuing shewed the manifold miseries which accompany worldly things: it followeth that according to my generall order propounded, I come to the next maine argument, which may dissuade any from the immoderate loue of the world and worldly vanities; which is their great vncertaintie in respect of those who desire, and set their hearts vpon them. For though it were imagined, that the things of the world which men hunt after with such hungrie appetites, were in themselues truely good, and of great worth and excellencie; profitable to those that haue them, so long as they keepe them in their possession; and exempted from all the former miseries; yet were there great reason why wee should contemne and despise them, in comparison of Gods spirituall graces and heauenly ioyes; and why wee should giue these the preeminence farre aboue them in our iudgements; and in our affection and practice with much more feruentie and earnestnesse loue and seeke them; seeing these are certaine and permanent; and the other most vncertaine and fickle; and that both in respect of getting and keeping them. For though wee should vse all indeuour, and spend all our strength in seeking and searching for these worldly things, wee are not sure with all our labour to obtaine them: And though wee should get them into our possession, yet haue wee no assurance to retaine and keepe them. Concerning the former; we find by continuall experience that the sweat of worldlings is not alwayes fruitfull, but after that they haue beaten their braines, wearied their bodies, and consumed their strength with working, watching, and continuall carking and caring; yet are they oftentimes at the end of their liues, as farre from the end of all their labours, as when they first began. We see many daily like greedy kites, snatching and striking continually at the prey, and yet misse of it after all their earnest indeuours; howsoeuer many times they pierce themselues vpon the pikes of tentations and sinne, which Satan like a cunning fowler hath hidden vnder these worldly baites for their destruction. And howsoeuer these worldly prodigals being poore, beggerly, and emptie of heauenly riches and spirituall grace, doe desire to fill their bellies, and appease their raging hunger, by feeding vpon the drosse and mast of worldly vanities, yet no man giuing them, they lose their longing.

1. Sect. 1. That worldlings often faile in their desires, and lose all their labour.

Wisd.5.14.

Luk.15.16.

Neither is this any great wonder: for all in the world is nothing neere sufficient to affoord plentie of these things so much desired, to all that seeke them; and therefore the same thing hauing many competitors, it must of necessity fall out as it doth in hunting, that one starteth the game, and another catcheth it; and as the prouerbe is, a man cannot thriue for throng of his neighbours. Yea in truth, themselues doe crosse themselues, their desires being contrarie one to another, as affecting things which will not stand together; for at once they would take their pleasures, and heape vp riches, and be glorious in the world for their bountie and liberality, and so griping more than they can hold, oftentimes they retaine but little, and sometime lose all. And as when diuers contrarie winds meete, they cause a whirlewind, whereby all is scattered and dispersed: so they entertaining desires, the one crossing and conflicting with another, they scatter those things which they desire to gather. Thus the voluptuous man would inioy his pleasures, and his riches too; but as the Wise man saith, hee that loueth pastime shall be a poore man, and he that loueth wine and oyle, shall not be rich: and losing his wealth hee commonly also loseth his delights, hauing nothing left to maintaine his pleasures. But the chiefe reason of all is, because they making idols of their owne wit, prouidence, industrie, and labour; trusting in them more than in God, and sacrificing vnto them the chiefe praise of all their welfare; the Lord iealous of his owne glory, crosseth them in their courses, and bringeth all their counsels and indeauours to nought. And this reason the Prophet Haggai yeeldeth why the Israelits laboured in vaine, and failed of all their hopes, because the Lord would not suffer them to prosper in their enterprises. Ye haue sowne much (saith he) and bring in little; yee looke after many things, and yet attaine vnto few; for that which yee did bring home, I did blow vpon it, &c. The which God doth sometime in iustice, not suffring wicked men who haue forsaken him to enjoy either the things of this life, or the life to come: And sometimes in mercy he causeth these huskes and draffe of worldly vanities, to be withheld from his prodigall children, that very penurie and hunger may enforce them to returne to their heauenly father, and wanting this swines meate of earthly trash, they may desire and long after that sufficient food wherewith hee feedeth his owne family, euen his spirituall graces, and eternall ioyes.

Luk. 15. 17. 18.

9. Sect. 2. That the world and the prince thereof abuse their fauou-

It is true indeed that the world like a bad paimaster promiseth most, when it performeth least; and the prince of the world making a muster of many worldly vanities, saith vnto men as he said to our Sauiour, all these will I giue thee, if thou wilt fall downe and worship mee: but when the worke being finished, the wages is expected; at the day of paiment, either they haue a come againe, or a flat deniall; either they are beaten and punished as not hauing well performed their worke; or when there is no such exceptions to bee taken, they must bee content to take their wages with great abatements, or receiue for currant siluer, counterfait slippes and copper money. For sometimes the world and the prince thereof vse their seruants as they vse the silly Indians, cruelly whipping them, when with great superstition they haue performed vnto them their blind deuotions; or as the Egyptians vsed the Israelites, vnmercifully beating them at night, when they had tired themselues with their dayes labour. And though when they set them a worke they promise them good things, yet when it is finished they pay them with euill. For example, they promise long life, and continuall health, when as oftentimes there follow grieuous diseases, and immature death; they promise rest, and behold disquietnesse; they promise them honours, and pay them with disgraces; they promise riches and abundance, and reward them with penurie and want; they vndertake that they shall leade their life in all ioyes and pleasing delights, when as they find nothing but griefe, trouble, and vexation of spirit. In a word, when they hire them into their seruice, they promise that if they will bee at their command, there shall no wages part them, that they shall leade their life in a golden age, and haue in all things contentment, and their desires fully satisfied; when as notwithstanding all these faire promises they spend all their dayes in sorrow and discontent. Sometimes they delude & abuse them, giuing shadowes in stead of substances; and (as it is said of some witches) they giue them siluer in shew, but leaues in deed. Or as cunning iuglers, hauing offered them something which they chinke worth the hauing, when deliuerie is to be made, they nimbly conuey it away, and chop into their laps some base trifle. Dealing herein with their seruants; as Laban with Iacob, who hauing vndertaken seauen yeeres painfull seruice for his beloued Rachel, receiued loathed Leah, for the reward of his labour; for after all that slauish seruice which they performe for them, euen to the hazarding of body and soule to eternall destruction, they haue for their wages either contemptible trifles, or burthensome gifts. In which respects as Satan and the world are to bee accounted deceitfull paimasters; so their wages are iustly called false and deceitfull vanities, which make some shew of good when they are offered, but but are nothing worth when they are receiued. So the Psalmist saith: I haue hated them which giue themselues to deceitfull vanities, for I trust in the Lord.

And yet though Satan and the world doe commonly abuse men with these false rewards, and draw them on with deceitfull hopes to doe them seruice; and though they haue often found their fraud by their owne experience, and haue euen daily been deluded by their faire promises, and disappointed of their expected rewards; yet are they more ready to beleeue them still vpon their often falsified word, than the Lord himselfe who neuer failed of his promises, and is almightie to performe, though he hath committed his couenant and promises to writing, confirmed them by his seales, and further ratified them by his neuer deceiuing oath; and are more ready to doe seruice to these deceitfull masters, vpon a vaine hope of these vncertaine rewards, than vnto the King of Heauen and earth, who offereth to assure them of the eternall ioyes of Heauen, though hee bee as farre from deceiuing, as from being deceiued. Yea in truth to doe wee naturally dote vpon these earthly vanities, because they are subiect to our senses, and put vs in some hope of present possession, that wee need not Satans forceries, nor the worlds witchcrafts to deceiue vs, seeing we are ready without their helpe to abuse our selues with vaine hopes, and to bee still in loue with the world and worldly vanities, not for that we had, or presently haue, but for that wee expect in time to come. And thus are we content to spend our liues in hoping well; and feeling euill, still expecting better, though wee find it daily worse, vntill death comming, depriueth vs of our worldly hopes, together with our liues. And that which seemeth vnto me (if it were not so common) like vnto a miracle, men still entertaine these deceiuing hopes, not onely against reason and sense, but euen against the common experience which they haue had in others, both which haue gone before them, and now liue with them; yea which they haue had in themselues from time to time; still hoping for better, till they cease to be. And though hauing past a great part of their life they haue found no cause why they should desire to liue; yea haue injoyed so small comfort and beene turmoiled with so many miseries, that if it were put to their choice they would not care to liue, if they might liue no better; yet in hope of amending their estate, and of attaining vnto some new happinesse, which they haue not yet injoyed; they are in loue with life and the world still; though commonly they neuer obtaine the things hoped for; or if they do, yet they haue their new hopes so attended on with new miseries, that when they come they bring little comfort. For vpon the accesse of new benefits which they haue long desired, either they lose the old, which were more in number and better in worth; or else are ouertaken with some vnthought-of euils, which discomfort their new-come guests, and turne all their sweet into gall and bitternesse. And as those who trauell, though they haue found the wayes which they haue already passed, foule and vncomfortable, and those in which they presently are, no more faire and pleasant; yet casting their eyes a good distance before them, and seeing the fields greene and plaine in shew, conceiue hope of amendment, and imagine that they shall end their iourney with more delight; but all in vaine: for when they come vnto it, they find the ground wet and rotten; and many slowes and lakes which before they approached them, they could not discouer: so wee trauailing in our pilgrimage, and hauing in our trauell experience of the miseries which we haue found in our childhood and youth; seeing before vs riper and elder age seemingly pleasant, in respect of that plentie and authoritie which doth accompanie them, together with the comforts of wife and children, and such other benefits; doe presently conceiue a deceiuing hope of some future happinesse, when wee shall enjoy those things which so long before wee did expect: but often we are altogether frustrate of our desires, or if wee attaine vnto them, we find the faire field in shew to be nothing in proofe but bogs and marish grounds; and that the life which wee so much liked, is so full of cares and feares, troubles and discontents, infirmities and aches, sicknesses and diseases, that wee are ready vpon triall to couclude, that wee haue but exchanged the frying-pan for the fire, and that as in a quagmire, whilest wee haue gotten one foot out of the dirt, the other is faster and deeper in. Now what reason there is why men should after this manifold experience both in themselues and others still deceiue themselues with vaine hopes, I can render no other, but that they for their owne parts are willing to bee thus deceiued, and dare not expect that which in truth they are to find, lest their life should be altogether vncomfortable and miserable before the time, when as they haue not so much as hope to assist them, and make their burthens tolerable. And therefore rather than they will haue no hope to beare them company in their miseries, they are ready to admit of such as are deceiuable and ill grounded; that these false hopes may bring vnto them some true comforts, and small refreshings though they continue onely for the present. And God for his part is contented to let them con-continue in this blindnesse or wilfull winking; and to haue these false and deceiuing hopes alwayes attending on them; that wicked men abusing themselues with their owne sophistrie, may go on in their courses to their perdition; and whilest they hope to attaine vnto these worldly things which they so dotingly loue, neuer labour to attaine vnto better hopes, nor to assure themselues of euerlasting happinesse. And partly that they might not hurt humane societie, nor in despaire lay violent hands vpon themselues, when as they should be forsaken of all hope to receiue contentment, either in things appertaining to this life or the life to come. Yea and whereas Gods dearest seruants being partly flesh and partly spirit, as they haue the spirituall part cheered and comforted in the time of their pilgrimage, with the assured hopes of future happinesse, so the fleshly part admitteth of no refreshing or contentment, but that which is receiued from things present; therefore God thought it fit to suffer them also to entertaine some worldly hopes, lest the flesh being vtterly frustrate of its chiefe desires, might with excessiue murmuring, repining and discontent, bee too heauie a clog to the spirituall man, and too much discomfort him in his way to heauen, being to trauell as in a desolate wildernesse, and hauing no hope of conuenient lodging, and comfortable entertainment as hee is going on his iourney. Whereas hauing for the present but an ill welcome to the world, and many an hungrie meale and hard lodging, yet still being in hope of better, it lesse struggleth & resisteth, but suffereth him to goe on, if not with more patience and agreement, yet with lesse impatiencie and opposition.

And thus you see that though we should set our minds vpon these worldly things, and pursue them with all our endeauours and desires, yet wee are not sure to attaine vnto them. But I may adde further, that those who earnestly labour after these vanities, do not onely many times faile of their hopes, but doe therefore faile most commonly because of their too great earnestnes, their too much desire hindering their obtaining the thing desired, and their ouermuch haste in running after the things they doe vpon, making them to haue but the worse speed, whilest either they fall for want of taking heed, or runne past the goale at vnawares, whilest with vnprouident eagernesse they thinke to preuent all others. Wherein wee may see the Wise mans obseruation verified, Volvntas nimia effectum necat, Vehementius tentata segnius succedunt. Eccles. 9.11. I returned (saith he) and I saw vnder the Sunne, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battaile to the strong, &c. For those who grasp most greedily these waterish vanities, doe hold least of them in their hands, and they who serue the world with all paines, and laborious industrie, are oftentimes by this vnthankfull master punished for their ouermuch diligence, and lose their reward, because they haue beene too earnest in their busines, and ouer laboured themselues in doing their worke, hauing now onely their labour for their paines, and in stead of their wished wages, nothing else but griefe and miserie. Others there are whom the world seemeth to vse with more fauour in the beginning, not onely giuing them intertainment with a smiling countenance, but also putting earnest into their hands, and after some seruice done vnto it, paying them liberally (as it were) their first quarters wages: but after they (being incouraged with this liberall pay) doe with more diligence performe their busines, in hope of greater reward, for their greater labour, it quite frustrateth them of their hopes, and not onely denieth to giue them more, but also taketh from them that they haue. For how many are there, who by their moderate labours hauing gotten many things, doe in more eager seeking after more, lose that which they already haue? How many doe wee see daily before our eyes, who lose their certainties, whilest they labour for vncertainties, and not thinking that they haue enough, when they haue too much, doe in ouer-reaching catch a sprcine, & whilest they greedily seeke after superfluities, doe lose not their sufficiencie alone, but euen necessaries? And this commeth to passe, not onely because the world is vnfaithfull and vnthankfull to those that serue it, but also because it is impotent and insufficient: for howsoeuer it is ready (like Satan the prince thereof) to vndertake great matters, and to make large promises, that it may moue men to leaue the Lord, and leane vnto it, yet the truth is, that though it were willing, yet it is altogether vnable to performe; for the earth is the Lords, and all that therein is, and hee giueth to the sonnes of men, as it seemeth best to his infinite wisdome. So that though the world brag neuer so much of its possessions, and great abilities, and proudly arrogating vnto it selfe Gods royall priuiledges, doth what it can to rob him of his right, yet the truth is, that it hath not the worth of a penie at absolute command, because euen the least matters are gouerned and disposed by diuine prouidence; neither is it the painefull indeauors of greedy worldlings, that can compasse the things which they so much desire; seeing they wholly proceed from the blessing of God; for as the Psalmist hath taught vs, Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vaine that build it; and except the Lord keepeth the Citie, the keeper watcheth in vaine. And therefore the world oftentimes (like a needy and bare master, who notwithstanding his pouertie, standeth much vpon his credit and reputation) dodgeth and paltreth with his seruants, when in truth it hath nothing to pay, and deceitfully picketh quarrels with them, after long seruice sending them away emptie handed, because by reason of its pouertie, it is not able to giue them their wages. Where, by the way, wee may note the miserable seruitude of a wretched worldling; for God will not reward him because hee hath renounced his seruice, and the world cannot, hauing nothing to dispose of; onely it cosoneth him with base shifts, and with alluring promises inticeth him to spend his strength in vaine, hauing after all his painefull seruice nothing to bestow vpon him.

But the vncertainety of obtaining of worldly things will better appeare, if wee briefly consider some speciall instances; for how many ambitious men haue we read of, and in our owne experience obserued, who haue most hungerly hunted after honours and preferments; and for reward of all their labours, haue receiued nothing but contempt and disgrace? How many haue earnestly striuen to enter the gate of honour, whereof some haue beene troden vnder foot in the presse, others thrust backe by some more strong than themselues, others haue stucke fast in the gate by reason of the crowd, & few haue entred, besides such as haue climbed ouer other mens shoulders, making themselues high by the downefals of other men, and erecting Trophees to their owne prayse, vpon the ruines of other mens fame? Will you haue examples? The old world would needs build a tower reaching to heauen, that they might get them a name; but it was rightly called Babel, bringing in the end nothing but confusion to them, and their proud building. Absalon whilest he desired to bee exalted into the throne, was hanged in a tree; Adonias aspired to the crowne, but because God had not appointed it to bee set on his head, he lost both it and his life too: yea our first parents themselues whilest they desired a state aboue the condition of men, and equall with God himselfe, they lost their present excellency and made themselues vassals and slaues to the wicked spirits. Others make some little progresse in their wished way to honour and preferment, but yet neuer come to the goale, nor obtaine the garland, being either crossed in their course, or fainting for wearines, or tripped vp by those that come next after them, who as suddenly fall, as rise, and no soones make some glorious shew, but presently they are againe obscured; like vnto falling starres, which in the same instant appeare and vanish. And that either because they ambitiously hasten, and vnseasonablie aspire to these honours before their time, desiring to reape the fruit of glory and preferment, before they haue sowne the seeds of vertue and true desert; whereby they expose themselues to the danger of many oppositions, euery one being ready to hate their pride and to enuie their preferment, and to vse all meanes to stop their course in this ouer great hast; in which they fitly resemble hastie fruits, which blooming before the ordinarie time, doe seldome come to maturitie and ripenesse, because either they are nipped with the frosts, or blowne off with the tempests. Or else because they aspire to greater preferments than is befitting their gifts, whereby they suddenly burst, because they swell themselues bigger than their skins will hold; and wanting true worth and good parts to support their greatnesse, they suddenly fall and come to ruine: like vnto those who will climbe higher than the bowes will hold them; or vnto such as being weake and feeble, doe take vpon them heauie burthens. Others desire honour and glory in the world, but yet neuer attaine vnto it whilest they liue, because presence is an enemie to fame; and therefore many whom the world scarce tooke notice of whilest it had them, are magnified and extolled when it hath lost them. In which respect honour is fitly called the shadow of vertue; for as the shadow sometime goeth before a man, sometime side by side, sometime followeth after him, and sometime doth not appeare at all, as when the sunne is set, or obscured with the clouds: so sometime a man is honourable and not vertuous, his glory and fame running before true desert; sometime it accompanieth vertue, and euen whilest a man liueth he hath deserued prayse; sometime he neuer heareth in the whole course of his life, that he hath done any thing worthy fame, and yet after his death hee hath the prayse of all; and sometime the best deserts doe neuer in this world come to light, but either being done in obscurity, or obscured through others enuie, or the meanesse of the agent; they for euer lie hid, till at the day of Iudgement the God of light doth open and discouer them. Now (as one saith) what is fame after death, but a good gale of wind after shipwracke? Or what good doth it a man to haue spent his whole time in painefull labour, & in well deseruing; when the vnthankfull world in his life hath paid him with enuy & detraction, though it magnifieth him after his death, seeing hee hath not the sense, much lesse the comfort of his commendations.

vpon it, and ambitiously affect it, they shall surely attaine vnto it: whereas in truth they who most swell with pride, and aspire vnto honours with all their indeauours, doe most commonly misse of it, and seeking for glory find disgrace; the world vsing their ambition as the meanes of their deiection and abasement, which is promised should be the meanes of their aduancement. Wherein as the world sheweth its trecherie and deceit towards those that faune vpon it; so also impotency and insufficiencie, in that it is vtterly vnable to aduance men to that glory and dignity which it promiseth. For howsoeuer possible the world would bee willing and forward enough to giue priorities to his forward children, and to aduance those into the seate of honour, which make most suit, and take the greatest paines to rise; yet it cannot helpe and raise them as they would, because God crosseth them in their courses, and will not suffer them to aspire vnto their proud hopes, but because they will rise of themselues without his helpe, and attaine vnto the height of honour by their owne meanes, therefore he meeteth them in the mid way, casting them downe againe, when they thinke themselues nearest to aduancement, and glorifying his owne power and iustice, in their ruine and vtter disgrace. And this is that which is often threatned against the proud ambitious in the Scriptures. So the Prophet Esay saith: The high looke of man shall be humbled, and the loftinesse of men shall bee abased, and the Lord only shall bee exalted in that day. For the day of the Lord of hosts is vpon all the haughtie, and vpon all that is exalted, and it shall be made low. And our Saiuour Christ threatneth, that whosoeuer will exalt himselfe, shall bee brought low, and whosoeuer will humble himselfe shall be exalted. And the Apostle telleth vs, that God resisteth the proud, and giueth grace to the humble. So the Virgin Mary speaking out of her owne experience, saith, that God hath put downe the mightie from their seats, and hath exalted them of low degree. Whereof we haue manifold examples in the booke of God, as of Creesus and his companions; Athaliah, Haman, Herode, Nebuchadnezzar and many others. So that greedy ambition and hungrie hunting after honour, is not the meanes of attaining to it, but rather the high way to disgrace and shame: for as the Wise man saith, the pride of a man shall bring him low, but the humble in spirit shall enioy glory.

9. Sect.7. That the right way to seeke shall find true honour.

If therefore we would seeke true honour and be sure to find it, let vs not (no lesse foolishly than ambitiously) begge it of the world, who hath it not to giue, but desire to haue it of the Lord, who alone hath it at his disposing. Neither let vs seeke it of our selues, and by our owne ambitious courses; for the Wise man teacheth vs, that to search our owne glory, is not glory: and euen our Saiuour (who might challenge this priuiledge better than any man,) affirmeth, that if he honoured himselfe, his honour was nothing worth. And that it was his father that that honoured him: But let vs seeke it of God to whom all honour belongeth, and from whom also it proceedeth. For hee it is, as Hannah speaketh, that bringeth low and exalteth; he raiseth vp the poore out of the dust, and lifteth vp the begger from the dunghill, to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the seate of glory, his is greatnesse and power, glory, victorie, and prayse; his is the kingdome, and riches, and honour come from him, as Dauid acknowledgeth. So elsewhere he affirmeth, that preferment, commeth neither from the East, nor from the West, nor from the South; but God is the Iudge, who maketh low, and maketh high. Yea euen Cyrus though an heathen confesseth, that the Lord God of heauen had giuen him all the kingdomes of the earth. And contrariwise Balaam affirmeth, that hee was surely purposed to haue promoted Balaam vnto honour, but that he could not, because the Lord had put him backe, and kept him from it. And therefore seeing it is the Lord alone which both helpeth and hindreth, exalteth and abaseth; of him alone let vs seeke it, from him let vs expect it, and not from the world or worldly men, who though they would, yet cannot bestow it. And if wee would seeke it from God with hope of obtaining, let vs returne all glory from our selues vnto him, seeing those who honour him hee will honour. Let vs if we would haue honour from men, be truly honorable in our selues, being fully repleniished with the substance of vertue, pietie and good deserts, and so honor likes shadow, euen though we be vnwilling, will attend vpon vs. And howsoeuer we be acquainted with our own good parts, and be full fraught with the rich treasures of vertue and goodnesse, let vs not exalt our selues, nor wax proud of our gifts, remembring that whatsoeuer wee haue, it is not our owne, but receiued from God, and therefore the richer we are, the greater are our debts, the greater also our reckoning and account, but let vs humble our selues vnder the mightie hand of God, that he may exalt vs in due time: for the [a] Lord will make the meeke glorious; and if [b] we cast downe our selues before him, he will lift vs vp. An example whereof wee haue in our Saiuour Christ, who because he [c] humbled himselfe, therefore God did highly exalt him, and gaue him a name aboue euery name, that at the name of Iesus euery knee should bow, &c. So that if we would haue honour to follow, we must as sir last d Humilitie goe before; if we would be glorious in the sight of others, we must with a Dauid bee vile in our owne estéeme, and low in our owne eyes; and if we would be highly aduanced in the Kingdome of Heauen, wee must become humble like (little children, as our Sauiour hath taught vs. Yea, in truth this is the way of becoming Honourable, not only in the sight of God, but also in the sight of men, for as they are slowest in praysing those, who most affect it, and are ready to detract from those who are high in their owne conceit: so they magnifie them most, who hauing greatest vertues, haue also the greatest humilitie; and they hold them in greatest admiration, and most willingly attribute vnto them the fairest prayses, who hauing well deserued, conteyte themselues with the approbation of God, and testimonie of their owne consciences, and doe not ambitiously affect Glory and Commendations. As for example, It is not ambitious Cesar, proud Pompey nor Alexander, greater in his owne conceit, than in his conquests, that the World now magnifieth, because it plainly perceiueth that they aimed at this marke in all their actions, and made glorie the mayne end of all their enterprizes; but it hath entertained Paulus, poore Fishermen, and despised Carpenters Sonne (as they disdainefully termed the most glorious and eternall Sonne of God) whom it now prayseth and admireth; so plainly discerning that in all their good and vertuous actions, they sought not their owne glory, but the glorie of God, and the eternall good of Mankind. By all which it appeareth that the way of attaining true honour, is not greedily to desire it, but worthily to deserue it, neither doth it alwayes happen vnto them who most desiring it, doe also best deserue it; but rather vnto them who best deserving it, doe most auoid it. In which respect Honour may fitly be compared to the Meteor which is called ignis fatuus, or the going fire, which flieth the followers, and followeth the flier; or vnto a mans shadow, which can no otherwise be catched than by falling downe vpon it.

And thus haue I shewed the great vncertainnesse of obtaining worldly Honours, although they be sought with all carefulnesse. The like also may be said of riches, for how fewes many worldly men doe wholly set their hearts vpon them, and pursue them with all their care and endeauours, rising early, and going late to bed, toiling and moyling, designing and circumuenting, preuenting and supplanting one another, defrauding and pilfering their Masters and Lords, thus they may encrease great estates, and gather riches in abundance; yet how few of these many doe attaine vnto them? Yea, how many are there who making this Mammon of iniquitie the Idoll wherein they chiefly trust, doe make vnto it many a weary pilgrimage, vndertaking painfull journeyes, sustaining much penury and miserie, and hazarding themselues to innumerable dangers both by Sea and Land, and all to haue their Idoll fauourable and propitious; and yet are turned away with a frowning countenance, and lose all their labour, ending their dayes in want and pouerty? And whereas almost all men spend their whole time and trauell in finding out these rich Mines, and faile to these Golden Indies, for the multiplying of their Treasures, yet how few find that they seeke? How many in their Voyage running themselues on the rocks of seuerie accidents, doe make shipwracke of their whole estate? And how many hauing gotten that they sought, are robbed of all when they are returning, and thinke of nothing but of selling their estates, and of spending the rest of their time in peace and quietnesse? So that it is not all a mans care and labour that can assure him of these vncertaine riches, as the Apostle calleth them; seeing many want them who haue sacrificed all their strength and endeauours vnto them; and some obtaine them with ease and moderate labour, all their great expences which seeme so much losse turning to their aduantage, and like seed, which though in outward shew it seemeth to be cast away, to rot and perish, yet it returneth a fruitfull Harueft of plentie and increase. And this the Wise man obserued: There is (saith he) that scattereth and is more increased, & he withholdeth more than is right, but surely comes to pouertie. The liberall person shall haue plentie, and he that watereth shall haue raine. Yea, the greater care and paine that a man taketh, and the more eagerly hee haſteth to be rich, the further oftentimes hee is from his desire, and the neerer to want and miserie. So the Wise man also saith, that with a wicked eye he hasteth after riches, and knoweth not that pouertie shall come vpon him. And who doth not see that many hauing gotten into their possession sufficient store, if they would bee contente with that which is enough, and yet not being satisfied, doe whilest they labour after more, lose that they haue, and like the Dogge in the fable in greedy snatching after a shadow, forgoe the substance? In which respect the World oftentimes abuseth and contemneth vs, like those who keep great lotteries; for whilest it incourageth them by propounding hope of great and bountifull gaine, to hazard their small monies which already they possesse, is desirous of them of all; there being an hundred blancks for one good prize, and therefore as hatefull to one that buyes who venteth, as that is welcome, and close if he purchase his great, but yet fooli-lish and ill grounded hopes, thee will in the end bring his something to nothing, and in coueting that he hath not, lose that which he already hath. And yet so are mens eyes dazled, and their concupiscence set on fire with the glorious shew of some few rich booties, that though not one of a thousand can possibly haue them, yet euery one is possessed with a vaine hope, that he shall be the man who shall draw the rich Lot, and carrie away the costly prizes from all the rest.

And thus also though men, like worldly Epicures set their minds wholly vpon voluptuous pleasures, and more heartily affect, and earnestly seeke these carnall delights, than those neuer fading pleasures, and eternall ioyes in Gods Kingdome, yet doe they often faile of their desires, and howsoeuer like sweet singing Birds they allure and inuite them with their melodious harmonie to come vnto them, yet no sooner doe they approach or seize vpon them, but presently they hide themselues, or flie away; leauing their admirers and seekers in the Thickets and Bushes, where they oftentimes prick themselues in their pursuit, and find nothing but Thornes and Briars which rent and scratch them, in stead of those sweet delights which inuited them vnto them. For how many are there who aboue all things desire to solace themselues with these worldly pleasures, and yet are forced, whether they will or no, to spend the greatest part of their life in griefe and miserie? How many seeke to delight themselues with sports and pastimes, games and recreations, who being crossed in them, when as they doe not succeed according to their desire, doe find torment, in stead of pleasure, and change all their mirth into fretting and fuming, cursing and sweating, as though because they can take no ioy in the pleasures of men, they would trie whether they could find it in the delights of the Deuill, and (as I may say) in the exercises of Hell? How many are there who seeking to please their damnic palate, with delicate drinkes, and curious cooked meates, take a surfet and drinke their bane greedily like a sweet poyson, falling into dangerous diseases, which often bring with them vnlooked death? How many seeking their chiefe delight in the pleasures of the flesh, do thereby vnfasten their strength, consume their bodies, and receiuing contagious infection, cast themselues into many desperate and incurable diseases, no lesse shamefull than full of extreme [illegible]

and therefore seeing we may [illegible] and labours in seeking these worldly things, and yet neuer find them, nor obtaine to our earthly ends, after we haue with our whole indeuours sought to compasse them, which notwithstanding (as hath been shewed) are so vaine, worthlesse, and vnprofitable, that though they might be gotten with ease, yet they were scarce worthy our labour; let vs not set our hearts vpon these vncertaine vanities, which if we should obtaine, neuer come vnaccompanied with certaine miseries: but rather affect and desire Gods sanctifying and sauing Graces, and the eternall ioyes of Gods Kingdome, which if we truly seeke, wee shall surely find, and bee at no hazard at all of losing our labour. And this argument of not spending our paines in vaine, the Apostle vseth to encourage the Corinthians in the constant profession and practice of Christianitie. Therefore my beloued brethren (saith he) be ye stedfast, vnmoueable, abundant alway in the worke of the Lord, for as much as ye know, that your labor is not in vaine in the Lord. For though the World be so seamed in these earthly things, and so full of inhabitants, that if it had the disposing of them all (as in truth it hath not) yet hath not sufficient to giue content to the meanest; yet it is not so with the Lord, and with our spirituall riches of grace and saluation; for he hath of these such infinite store, that hee can giue vnto euery one abundance without impaiting of his stocke, or making one more empty, by anothers fulnesse. And besides he hath freely bound himselfe by his gracious promises, confirmed with his Oath and Seales, that if we a hunger after his spirituall Graces, he will surely satisfie vs: if we b seeke them, we shall vndoubtedly find them; and if feeling our wants wee doe but begge them at his hands, in the c Name of Iesus Christ, he will without faile giue them vnto vs. Neither is there lesse certainty of the other, to those who seeke for that eternall happinesse; for first, that there is that euerlasting ioy, and heauenly glory prepared for Gods Saints and Seruants, it may be proued by diuers arguments; for it is written in the hearts of men by the finger of God, and reuealed by the light of nature, that after this life there are ioyes prepared for the good and vertuous, and punishments for the wicked and vitious: which euen while we continue in the World, refresheth the one with comfort in all their miseries, and affrighteth the other with terrours and feares, in all their pleasures and prosperity. Againe, the immortalitie of the soule being acknowledged by both Diuine and Heathen Writers, it followeth hereupon that there is also an euerlasting life, wherein is immortally liueth, either in ioy or misery. Furthermore there is a naturall desire implanted in mans heart and minde, to enjoy his happinesse and chiefe good, which neuer any man attained vnto in this life, and therefore must certainly be reserued for those who seeke it in the life to come. Or else this naturall desire should bee in vaine, as neuer attaining vnto its end. Finally, if wee know that there is a God, then them must wee also acknowledge that hee is iust: as being the chiefe Iudge of Heauen and Earth; and consequently that hee administreth righteous iudgement, rewarding the godly and vertuous, and punishing the wicked and euill doers; but this he doth not doe in this life, seeing for the most part, here the wicked flourish, and the righteous are afflicted, and therefore these rewards and punishments are chiefly reserued for the life to come. And this argument the Apostle vseth: If (saith he) in this life onely we haue hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable: from whence wee may assume, that it will not stand with Gods Iustice, that those who faithfully serue him, should bee more miserable, than they who oppose and rebell against him; and therefore of necessitie it followeth, that after this life they who feare and serue the Lord haue better hopes, and more rich rewards reserued for them. Vnto these reasons wee may adde those infallible promises of Truth it selfe, which can neuer deceiue nor faile. The Prophet Daniel saith, that those who sleepe in the dust shall awake, some to euerlasting life, and some to shame and perpetuall reproach. Our Sauiour Christ affirmeth also, that the wicked shall goe into euerlasting paine, and the righteous into life eternall: and in another place hee promiseth that hee will giue vnto his sheepe euerlasting life. So the Apostle Paul telleth vs, that after our earthly house of this Tabernacle is destroyed, wee haue a building giuen vs of God, an house not made with hands, but eternall in the Heauens. And that we haue here no continuing Citie, but we seeke one to come. And the Apostle Iohn saith, that this is Gods promise that he hath promised vs, euen eternall life. Yea, this wee also confesse in the Articles of our faith, that God hath prepared for all that in this life obtaine remission of sinnes, life euerlasting: and therefore they are worse than Pagans and Infidels, who continually with their mouthes confessing this truth, doe not in their hearts beleeue it; and worse than fooles and mad men, who doe not obtaine all things in the World with all their endeuours seeke to obtaine it.

And as it is certaine that there is life eternall; so haue wee no lesse certaintie that wee also shall obtaine it, if we set our hearts vpon it, and before all things seeke it: for first God hath in many places promised it to all the faithfull who feare and serue him. So the Prophet Daniel saith, that many who sleepe in the dust shall awake to euerlasting life. And our Sauiour promiseth, that he will giue vnto all his sheepe life eternall: and that whosoeuer we shall for his sake to leaue any thing in the World which they dearely loue, shall haue euerlasting life. And the Apostle assureth vs, that godlinesse hath the promises, not only of this life, but also of the to come. All which promises being apprehended by a true and liuely faith, doe certainly assure vs that wee shall be inheritours of this eternall happinesse: for he is faithfull that hath promised, and his promises in Christ are yea and Amen; and though Heauen and earth may passe away, yet not one iot or tittle of his word shall fall to the ground vnperformed: for He is Truth it selfe and cannot lie, and immutable and vnchangeable, so that what hee hath decreed, shall surely come to passe. And therefore in the assurance of faith, resting it selfe vpon these vnfallible promises, we may euen in this life be certainly perswaded that wee shall be heires of life eternall; yea, so infallible is this assurance, that our Sauiour Christ saith, that hee who beleeueth hath already euerlasting life; and his beloued Apostle affirmeth, that we know that we are translated from death to life, because wee loue the brethren. And this assurance of faith the Apostle Paul had, vndoubtedly concluding, that a crowne of righteousnesse was laid vp for him, which the righteous Iudge would giue, not onely to him, but also to all them that loue his appearing. Yea, we haue not only Gods promises to assure vs of these eternall ioyes, but also a reall pledge and pawne of them, euen his holy Spirit, which is the earnest of our inheritance, and hath sealed vnto vs the truth of the Gospell after we haue beleeued, as the Apostle speaketh. By which holy spirit working in our hearts sanctifying and sauing graces, wee haue euen in this life, life eternall begun in vs; as when thereby our minds be enlightened with the true knowledge of God, and our Sauiour Christ, whom it is eternall life to know, as himselfe speaketh; when it worketh in vs faith, by the assurance whereof we are entred into the possession of life eternall; whom being iustified thereby we haue peace with God, being assured of his loue, and our reconciliation; and by reason hereof haue peace of conscience, and ioy in the Holy Ghost: and when in loue and thankfulnesse towards God, who hath so dearely loued vs, wee loue him againe, performing chearefull and willing obedience vnto his Commandements, and taking our chiefe delight in doing those things which are pleasing vnto him; for so the Apostle saith, that the Kingdome of God is not meate and drinke, but righteousnesse, peace, and ioy in the Holy Ghost. So that whosoeuer they are that find these graces of God dwelling in them, they may certainly be assured, that the Kingdome of God, and eternall life is begun in them: wherefore it is that the Apostle saith, that hee that doth not liue now, but Christ liueth in him, and whose life hitherto is hidden in the flesh, he liued by the faith in the Sonne of God. And whosoeuer haue his life eternall begunne in them, they may certainly be assured, that it shall be perfited and accomplished vnto them, and hauing begun it in the life of grace, that they shall finish it in that euerlasting life of glory: whereas contrariwise, those shall neuer liue in that glorious happinesse eternally, who haue not in this World made an entrance into it, by liuing this life of Faith and Grace. Now vnto this certainty let vs adde also the facility of obtaining; for howsoeuer these heauenly treasures are infinitely of more value than this earthly trash, yet wee may not only attaine vnto more certaine assurance of them, but also compasse them with much more ease; for though wee haue neuer so great a loue and desire of obtaining these worldly vanities, it helpeth vs not much to their fruition; yea (as I haue shewed) oftentimes too much desire after earthly things, frustrateth our hope, and hindereth vs from attaining vnto the things desired; But (as one saith) a iust life, which is the way that leadeth to life eternall, is alwayes present when wee will; because it is iustice it selfe, if wee effectually desire it, neither is there any thing more required to the perfecting of righteousnesse, than to haue a perfect will to embrace it; and therefore what great labour is in that, where to will is also to obtaine? For whereas it may be obiected that our Sauiour saith, that the way to life eternall is strait, and the gate that entreth into it narrow; this difficultie is to be vnderstood in respect of flesh and bloud, which indeed is too grosse for this narrow passage; but if wee lay aside the old man, with the grosse corruptions thereof, and become spirituall and holy in our minds, affections and actions, wee shall haue roome enough to enter. Again, this difficultie and straitnes is only at the first sight when we behold this way afar off, without any desire to goe into it; whereas if we come neerer hand, with a full resolution to enter into this narrow passage, wee shall finde it open, easie and large enough; euen as when being in a broad way, and looking farre before vs vpon a narrow lane, we thinke it quite closed vp, and are ready (if experience helped vs not more than sight) to turne backe, as being hopelesse in finding any passage; but when we still goe forward and come neere vnto the place, wee finde an easie entrance for foure or fiue together, which wee supposed was not large enough for one: so although the way to Heauen seemeth strait to those who looke vpon it with carnall eyes, yet this is not so much in the narrownesse of the passage it selfe, as in the errour of our sight; for they who approach vnto it find an open passage, and being once entred, doe trauell forward with great delight. And therefore seeing this way is certaine, assuredly bringing vs to our iournies end of eternall happinesse, and easie also to those who trauell in it; let vs leaue our earnest pursuite of worldly vanities, which if they were not to be forsaken, because they are contemptible, yet because after great paines and care taken, wee can haue no assured hope of obtaining them; and wholly set our hearts and affections vpon these heauenly excellencies, pursuing them with hearty desire, and earnest endeuour, seeing they are not only in themselues of infinite more worth and value, but also may be enjoyed with much more certaintie and facilitie.

CHAP. XXVII.

HAuing shewed that these worldly things are not much to be esteemed or desired, yea, to be contemned and despised, in comparison of Gods spirituall graces and heauenly ioyes, in regard that they are most vncertaine in obtaining, though we should set our hearts vpon them, and pursue them with all our endeuours, and these most certaine and assured, to all that loue and seek them: Now let vs further consider, that if by our great care and labour wee doe obtaine them, the possession is no lesse vncertaine than the suit. And that both in respect of the things themselues, and also in respect of vs, who are possessed of them. For first, all worldly things are most vncertaine when they are possessed, because they are momentany and mutable: momentany in regard of themselues, as being in their owne nature corruptible, and subject to dissolution; and mutable in regard of vs; as being changeable, and subject to alteration. In respect also of vs they are vncertaine, because wee are mortall, and our liues momentany; and therefore though they should not be taken from vs, yet wee cannot long continue together, because wee shall in short time be taken from them. Concerning the momentany continuance of these worldly things, it may euidently appeare, if wee consider that the whole World it selfe generally, and specially all that is contained in it, are but of short continuance, and subject to corruption; for such as are all the parts of the Word, such also is the whole, but experience teacheth, that all the parts of the World are subject to corruption and dissolution, and consequently this whole vniuerse cannot be incorruptible and eternall; but shall in the appointed time bee dissolued and come to ruine. And this the Scriptures also plainly teach vs, that as the World had a beginning; so also it must haue an ending. To this purpose the Apostle Iohn saith, that the World

1. Ioh. 2.

2. Iohn 2.17.

passeth away and the lust thereof; but hee that fulfilleth the will of God abideth euer. And the Apostle Peter plainly affirmeth, that the Heauens and Earth are reserued vnto fire against the day of iudgement, and of the destruction of vngodly men: and that the day of the Lord will come as a Theefe in the night, in the which the Heauens shall passe away with a noyse, and the Elements shall melt with heat, and the Earth with the works that are therein, shall be burnt vp. Now as we are certaine that the World is corruptible, and shall haue an end; so are we vncertaine how soone this end shall bee, but for ought wee know, it may be this yeare, as well as the next, and sure wee are that it cannot be farre off; seeing we liue in the latest times, of which the Apostle speaketh; yea, in the latter end of the last houre: for the Apostle Iohn making the whole age of the World in respect of Eternitie, to be but of a few houres continuance, saith, that all were spent saiuing the last, in which he liued; and therefore if the whole time from Christs Incarnation, to his second comming to iudgement, were but one houre, it is not probable that we are farre from the houres end, seeing so great a part is already past.

Now who would fix his heart and ground his hopes vpon such a rotten foundation, as cannot possibly long stand, and may for ought we know presently fall? Who would build his house in such a Citie as he certainly knew would within a while bee consumed with fire, being vncertaine in what part of of this short time, it would come to this expected ruine? What Wise man will build his house vpon the sinking sands, where it is either ready to sinke with them, or to be beaten downe at the next high floud, and not rather vpon the firme Rocke, where it shall remaine vnmoueable? But the Scriptures teach vs that the World is but a bog or sandy ground, subiect euery day to fleeting and falling, and to be carried away with a floud of fire: and why then should wee labour with such paines to build abiding places vpon a foundation so deceitfull and vnsure; and not rather bend all our studies to be admitted into those mansion houses, and eternall habitations, which Christ hath prepared for vs in the Heauens? If a skilfull Carpenter, in whose knowledge and truth we repose much confidence, should certainly assure vs, that all the principals of our house were so olde and rotten, that they would within a yeere as the surbest faile, and the whole building come to ruine, who would not flit out of such an house, in which he cannot one night sleepe securely, and vse all meanes to place himselfe in a surer habitation? Who would not thinke him a foole that would so fondly loue this ruinous building, as that by staying still in it, he would be contented to indanger himselfe, to be ouer-whelmed and buried in its ruines? But the Lord our God the skilfull Builder of this great frame of Heauen and Earth, whose cunning cannot be deceiued, nor truth deceiue, hath plainly told vs that this great building shall within short time fall; and therefore who would heere seate his hopes? Who would not change his dwelling, especially seeing wee are proffered the fee-simple of that goodly Building not made with hands, but eternall in the Heauens? yea wee are assured of the Worlds approaching ruine, not only by the Word of God, but euen also by our owne experience; for wee our selues doe see its rottennesse, wee daily behold how the strength thereof decayeth, and that all the creatures doe waxe more feeble, being much abated in their naturall powers and vertues, and shewing by their weaknesse and sicknesse that they approach neere their end. The Heauens haue not that vertue in their influences as in ancient times; the heate of the Sunne is much abated, and his vitall operation in sublunary and terrestriall bodies greatly weakned, and though (as the Learned haue obserued) this life-giuing fire be lower and neerer vnto vs, yet his vertue being decayed, we haue lesse comfort and feeling of his heate. The earth also which is the mother and nurse of all inferiour creatures, being come to to old age, and weary and spent with much bearing, hath not her ancient vertue and vigour in bringing forth her fruits for the vse and nourishment of man; by reason whereof he is much lessened in growth, enfeebled in strength, and obnoxious to many more infirmities and diseases than were his Ancestours. All which shew that the World is in its old and decrepit age, and not farre from death. For as in the little World of Man, so also in this greater World and large Vniuerse, there is a time of youth, and full strength, and a time of old age, and decrepit weaknesse; a time of life, and a time of death. And as man in his youth is lusty and strong, hauing his bones full of marrow, and his sinewes of strength; his skinne full of flesh, his whole body full of naturall heate and moysture, and quickned with vitall spirits: but when age commeth, his strength is abated, his backe crooked, his spirits spent, and all parts so full of infirmities and weaknesse, that they are not able to performe their naturall functions and actions, till at last the limbes being altogether vnable to support the staggering body, it stumbleth and falleth at the threshold of death: so the World had its time of youth wherein it flourished in beauty, health, and strength, and was able to propagate a posterity like it selfe, and to nourish and make it fat with all delights; but now it is come to old age, wherein all the powers thereof are so weakned and enfeebled, that it cannot be but the death thereof neere approcheth. And therefore let vs not set our hearts vpon that which is ready to vanish; let vs not now foolishly dote vpon the World in its withered old age, wherein it hath lost all its beautie, and is so full of wrinkles, infirmities, diseases, and manifold miseries, that setting our dotage aside, it hath not so much as a shew of comelinesse to allure vs, nor any baite of beauty to entice vs. For looke how much those great Worthies of ancient times, the Patriarches and Prophets are to bee commended for contemning it, in its greatest bravery, refusing when it chiefly flourished to flourish with it; so much are wee to be blamed and condemned, for esteeming and loving it, when all excellency being vanished, and it now being full of blemishes and miseries, hath nothing in it, worthy so much as carnall love.

2. Cor. 5. 1.

Quantum illi laudandi atque prædicandi, qui diguati non sunt, etiam cum mundo florente florere; tantum increpandi & accusandi sunt, quos perire cum pereunte delectat, Aug. ad Armentarium, Epist. 45.

9. Sect. 3. That all worldly things are momentany & corruptible.

And as the World is momentany and corruptible; so much more are al the things therein contained, especially if we consider them in our vse and fruition; for whereas all things in the World are past, present, or to come; that which is past is perished, and as though it were not; that which is to come, is vncertaine, hauing not yet its being; and therefore wee can truly be said onely to enjoy the present, which is momentany and ready to vanish. In respect of which momentany continuance of worldly things, they may fitly be compared to fiery Meteors, which make for the instant a glorious shew, but are inflamed and extinguished in the same moment; to the vncertaine windes, which suddenly blow, and suddenly cease; to deceitfull dreames, which bring a seeming short pleasure, but vanish when one awaketh; and to the Houses, Castles, and Characters which Children in their play do make in the sands, which either are ouerthrowne and defaced with euery blast of winde, or washed away with the next tide. The authour of the booke of Wisedome likeneth the riches, pompe and glory of the World, to the passing away of a shadow, or post, and to the passage of a ship which glideth ouer the waues, and being gone by, leaueth no trace or path behinde it in the flouds, or to a Bird that flieth in the aire, and no man seeth any token of her passage, or finally to an arrow shot at a marke, and parting the aire, which immediately commeth together againe, so that no man can know where it went thorow. Another demanding what humane things are; answereth, that they are as dust and ashes before the face of the winde, a smoke and a shadow, flowers and falling leaues, a dreame, and tale told, a winde and soft aire suddenly vanishing, flying wings, and running water, or some other thing yet more momentany and vncertaine. And in truth who seeth not that these worldly things doe flow and reflow like the Sea, there following presently after a full tide of prosperitie, a low ebbe of aduersitie; after a bright day of joy, a darke night of sorrow; after faire weather, and a pleasing calme of comfort, a blustering storme, and turbulent tempest of crosses and afflictions; after a bright full of mirth and delight, the darke waine of sorrow and discontentment; in regard whereof there is no more constancie to be found in the World or worldly things, than in the Moone, the Sea, or Aprill weather. And therefore hee is no lesse foolish who imagineth that he can hold stedfastly this slippery Eele, than hee who would inclose the Winde, or keepe the Sea in continuall calmenesse. For when this swelling of prosperitie is fullest, it is neerest to breaking; and when we thinke our worldly estate securest, our downfall suddenly approcheth. And yet there were some indifference if these worldly things were as soone gotten as lost, and that our estate were as quickly repaired as it is ruined; but contrariwise experience teacheth vs, that the ascent to the obtaining our worldly desires is by little and little, and the descent head-long; that we are long in gathering that which in a moment is scattered; and lose that in an houre, which with great care and incessant labour, we haue hardly attained vnto in our whole liues.

Chrysost. in Hebræos 6. Homil. 9.

It is true indeed that howsoeuer these worldly things bee in themselues alike momentanie and vncertaine, yet with some they make a longer, and with others a shorter stay, as it pleaseth our great Lord and master to dispose of them. For some are long in obtaining them, and in a moment are spoiled of them, and haue no time to enjoy the fruit of their tedious labours, these worldly things whose company they so long desired, saluting them and bidding them far-well in the same day. The which the Wise man signifieth, when as hee saith, that the deceitfull man roasteth not that he tooke in hunting. In which case worldlings haue no good by these things whereupon they haue set their hearts, hauing onely a taste of them to increase their longing, and long lasting griefe, for their lost delights. Sometime they make a longer stay, and giue some little comfort by their fruition: But though they presently perish not, yet are they alwayes as perishing; and though they haue some short reprieue, yet the sentence of mortality, and momentany mutability being passed, they can giue vnto vs no assurance of their abode. In respect of which vncertainety the wise man willeth vs, not to boast our selues so much as of to morrow; because wee doe not know what a day may bring forth. To which purpose another saith, that euery man who entrusteth those things which hee gathereth to the earths custodie, is is vtterly ignorant to whom hee gathereth them, whether to the consuming moath, or to the vndermining theefe, or spoyling enemy, or deuouring fire. In regard whereof howsoeuer wee may for some time be possessed of these earthly things, yet we cannot haue the fruition of them with any quietnesse of mind, or peaceable comfort; for as one saith, the soule enioyeth nothing with liberty, vnlesse it enioy it with security, and no man can be secure in the fruition of those things which hee esteemeth good; if hee may lose them whether he will or no.

Seeing therefore these worldly things are momentanie and vncertaine, from hence wee gather that they are not truely good, nor of any great worth or excellencie; for that which is truely good, as it cannot bee receiued vnwillingly, so neither can it bee vnwillingly lost, but remaineth with the owners to their perpetuall comfort; whereas these worldly vanities are but of momentany continuance, and may euery day, whether we will or no, bee taken from vs, leauing behind them a proportionable sorrow, according to the quantity of their supposed goodnesse; so that though a mans ioy were neuer so great in their fruition, it shall at their last fare-well bee matched, if not ouermatched with bitter griefe. In respect whereof when this day of parting commeth, a man would willingly desire, that his comforts and delights in those things which hee formerly affected had beene lesse, that now also he might haue lesse sorrow. Whereby it appeareth that there can bee no great happinesse in any thing which is but of momentany continuance, and that nothing is much to bee desired which is mortall and must end: because when the time is once past, though it haue beene neuer so long, it will appeare to those who looke backe vpon it, but as a moment; and the greater ioy it hath brought in the fruition, the greater griefe will it also bring, because at last they are depriued of it. Againe, seeing these worldly vanities are momentany and vncertaine, from hence it necessarily followeth that the hope, confidence, and comforts of worldly men, which are built vpon this weake and rotten foundation must also bee vncertaine and deceitfull. So Bildad saith, that the hypocrites hope shall perish, his confidence also shall be cut off, and his trust shall be as the house of a spider; he shall leane vpon his house, but it shall not stand; he shall hold him fast by it, yet shall it not endure. And the Author of the booke of Wisdome affirmeth, that the hope of the vngodly is like the dust that is blowen away with the wind, and like a thinne foame, that is scattered abroad with the storme, and as the smoke which is dispersed with the wind, and as the remembrance of him passeth, that tarieth but for a day. And in regard of momentany vncertaintie of earthly vanities, the Prophet Esay compareth the indeauours of worldly men, in seeking to obtaine and possesse these mutable and vnconstant things, to the weauing of the spiders web; for as to this idle worke there is required great industry and labour, and being made, it is of no continuance, because euery blast of wind is ready to breake it, and euery beesome to brush it downe: so these worldly vanities are compassed with great paines, and when with carefull toile we haue obtained them, euery blast of aduerse casualty, euery brush of outward violence is ready to blow them away, and breake them downe. And in the same respect the world by others, is fitly compared to the Moone, who in her chiefe brightnesse hath her shining mingled with spots and is alwayes mutable: so the world, though it make a glittering shew, is spotted in his greatest glory, with miseries, and aduersities, and this shining brightnesse in the space of a few dayes is turned to blacke and vncomfortable darknesse. And therefore how glorious soeuer it seemeth, the wise Christian will not set it on his head, nor at his heart, but with the woman in the Reuelation, will tread this vnconstant Moone vnder his feet, and contemne these momentany vanities, which though wee could stay with them, are continually in readinesse to flie from vs. Especially he who truly considereth this momentany vncertainty of these earthly trifles, will carefully take heede that he doe not with the least sin compasse the greatest good, and thereby hazard his eternall ioyes, and indanger himselfe to perpetuall punishment; for what folly is it for any, to buy these momentany and vnconstant vanities at the high price of euerlasting torments, and for a short and false ioy, to hazard body and soule to neuer ending punishments? And when with these worldly baits he is allured vnto sin, he will be ready to say with that godly Father: The eternall God hath promised me eternall ioyes; and if I beleeue him, I also of a mortall man, shall bee made eternall: why then O impure world, why then doest thou mutter in mine eares thy bewitching charmes? why dost thou seeke to seduce me out of the right way? thou wouldest for loue of thee withhold mee from eternity, and yet thy selfe art ready to perish. O what wouldest thou doe if thy ioyes were permanent? if thou were truly sweet, whom wouldest thou not deceiue; when as being bitter, thou counterfeitest pleasing nourishment? And yet though the world were sincerely sweete, without the mixture of any gall of miserie, there were little reason, why wee should match it in our loue with our gracious God, seeing it were all but a drop in comparison of this infinit ocean of sweetnesse; if this creature should endure for euer, yet how much more should we loue the Creator, from whom it hath receiued all its goodnesse, as a little sparke from a great fire? how much more then should wee now neglect it in comparison of that infinit goodnesse, seeing its sweetes are bitternesse? and if in respect of him, wee might well contemne it though it were permanent, let vs now much more contemne it, because it is transitorie. And seeing as the Apostle speaketh, hee that soweth to his flesh, shall of his flesh reape corruption, let vs sow to the spirit, that of the spirit wee may reape life everlasting.

Galath. 6. 8.

9. Sect 6. That worldly honors are momentanie and vncertaine.

But let vs consider the vanity of worldly things in the speciall instances. And first, what can bee more vncertaine and momentanie than honours and preferments, which though they stand against the violence of outward accidents, yet oftentimes fall with their owne waight? For how many are there, who hauing with great paines climed vp step by step the ladder of honour, are in a moment cast downe by a superiour power into the lowest degree of disgrace and contempt? How many hauing with much sweat and labour ascended almost to the highest top of the steepe craggie rocke of honour and glorie, doe misse their footing, and so tumble downe into the lowest bottome of a despised condition? Looke vpon the example of our first parents, who not content with the glorious condition of the most excellent creatures, but climing higher, and aspiring to the glorie of their Creator, got a fall as low as hell it selfe, and made themselues equall to the damned spirits, had not God in mercie raised them vp. Looke vpon the example of Haman, who in the middest of all his glorie was vtterly disgraced, and adiudged to die a shamefull death. So Nebuchadnezzer whilest hee would be more than a man, and worshipped as a god, was suddenly deposed from his regall throne, and became equall with the brutish creatures. In respect of which momentany vncertaintie of worldly honour; it hath (as one obserueth) its name of vaine glorie giuen vnto it, and is called vaine, because it vanisheth, and hath nothing firme and stable in it, but is onely a deception of the sight, flying away before it fully appeareth. In which regard it may be compared vnto a flash of lightning, which for the instant filleth the whole aire with glorious brightnesse, but presently is turned into grosse and more than vsuall darknesse; or to a bubble, which commonly is no sooner made than broken; because it is suddenly blowne vp (as it were) with the breath of the vulgar people, and with the same as suddenly broken. Others compare it to the dust or chaffe carried aloft by the violence of the wind, which of it selfe falleth downe to the ground, when its accidentall helpe ceaseth; to the smoake, which the higher it is aduanced the more easily it is dispersed, and the sooner vanisheth; to a cloud, which by the same Sunne, and in the same day, is drawne vp, and dissolued or consumed; to the dew, which falleth ouernight, and the next morning vanisheth; and to a bladder, which the more it is blowne, the more it swelleth, and the neerer it is to bursting. But most fitly is the monentany continuance of an honourable condition, by the Prophet Esay expressed, when hee compareth the glorie of man to the flower of the field, which one day flourisheth more gloriously than Salomon in all his royaltie, and the next withereth and fadeth away: one day it is worne in the bosome of Princes; and the day following carelessely neglected, and cast vpon a dunghill. Neither doth this worldly honour take as great leasure in departing, as it doth in approaching, but (as one saith) it commeth haltingly and slowly, (as it were) on lame legs; but all at once it flieth away, and posteth from vs with winged haste. Nor doth greatnesse of aduancement in this case giue any priuiledge, or yeeld any support, yea rather the higher men are extolled and lifted vp, the greater and more vnrecouerable is their downefall; euen as he who falleth off a low stoole, receiueth no great hurt, and easily riseth againe, and recouereth himselfe, whereas hee who falleth from an high steeple, or the top of a lofty tree, is mortally bruised, if not dismembred and shattered in pieces. And thus (as one obserueth) Adam had the more grieuous downefall, because hee fell in Paradise, from a most high and glorious condition: for to be ouerthrowne from an high place is an head-long downefall, whereas it is but a slip or foile to fall on plaine ground. The reason hereof is, because the more highly men are aduanced, the greater commonly is their pride; and the more full they are of the wind of vaine-glory, the neerer they are to bursting; because the Lord opposing against the proud man aboue all other sinners, by reason of all others he most opposeth against him, doth cast him suddenly downe, and bringeth him to nought, when he is most secure, and standeth strongest, and out of danger of falling in his owne conceit. So Zophar speaking of the wicked man, saith, that though his excellencie should mount vp to the Heauen, and his head reach vnto the clouds; yet shall hee perish for euer like his dung; and they which haue seene him shall say, where is hee? hee shall flie away as a dreame, and they shall not find him, and shall passe away as a vision of the night. And the Wise man affirmeth that all which are proud in heart are an ab-

abomination vnto the Lord, and though they ioyne hand in hand, yet they shall not be vnpunished: and consequently, that pride goeth before destruction, and an high mind before the fall. Yea so doth the Lord abhorre the proud, that hee contenteth not himselfe to haue brought them to ruine, but subuerteth and destroyeth their house and family, as elsewhere he speaketh. And therefore seeing worldly honours are momentanie & vncertaine, begetting in vs pride, & pride destruction, let vs not foolishly affect, and set our hearts vpon them, seeing men are but thus aduanced that they may catch the more grieuous downefall, the world vsing them therein like a cunning wrastler, who lifteth them vp highest, to whom it meaneth to giue the most dangerous ouerthrow; but rather let vs esteeme and seeke the true honour of vertue and godlinesse: for (as one saith) the glory of the world doth not descend with the sunne; but the glory of goodnesse will ascend with the vertuous. And if wee will bee wisely ambitious, let vs despise these earthly honours, and aspire to that excellent dignitie and aduancement, of being the sonnes of the glorious king of heauen and earth, brethren to the sonne of God, and heires apparant to the crowne of glory; which honour all shall certainely obtaine, which doe loue and seeke it, and being obtained, shall eternally enjoy it.

But as earthly honours are momentanie and transitorie, so there is no more constancie or perpetuitie in worldly riches; for when with great labour they are obtained, there is no certainty in their possession, seeing within a short time they shall be taken away from vs, or wee from them; either they shall haue their end, or we our end, they shall leaue vs, or wee them. And in the meane while they are subiect to innumerable casualties; for the moth may eate them, the rust may consume them, theeues may steale them, fire may burne them; yea oftentimes of themselues they melt away like butter in the sunne; or are taken away by outward force and violence. For the world vseth men like spunges; sometime it filleth them full, and soone after squeezeth all out againe: one day it maketh them to surfet of variety, and within a few dayes after pineth them with want. In regard of which vnconstancie and corruptibility of riches, they are called by the Apostle vncertaine riches, in which we may repose no trust and confidence. And by the Wise man, the riches of a day, because they are continually ready to vanish, & to come to nothing. Neither are they in truth substance, as they are called, or true and substantiall riches; but rather shadowes, and dreames, which seeme something whilest we sleepe in sinne, but vanish away as things of no worth, when we are awakened by Gods spirit. To which purpose one saith: Can not those riches which are not so in truth, seeing they are full of pouerty, and obnoxious to innumerable casualties. For what kind of riches are these for whose sake thou standest in feare of the theefe, yea of thine owne seruants, lest they kill, robbe thee, and runne away? If they were true riches they would bring vnto thee security, and when thou once haddest them, thou couldest neuer lose them. As long as they are in the earth, they are not true riches. And therefore when the world calleth them riches, our Sauiour Christ addeth, of iniquity. Call them then by what names you will stile them as you please, with the glorious titles of inheritances, fee simples, and perpetuities, yet in truth they are but vncertaine vanities, and momentanie moueables, which are still flitting from vs, or wee from them. So the Wise man telleth vs, that riches remaine not alway, nor the crowne from generation to generation. Yea oftentimes they suddenly depart, and forsake vs without giuing warning, or taking leaue; in which respect they are not onely current, as we call our coine, hasting away as fast as their legs will beare them, but volant also, as the Wise man maketh them, where hee giueth them the wings of an Eagle to expresse their hast in flying from vs: wilt thou (saith he) cast thine eyes vpon that which is nothing? for riches taketh her to her wings as an Eagle, and flieth into Heauen. So our Sauiour Christ sheweth this corruptibility of riches, where he exhorteth vs, not to lay vp treasures for our selues vpon the earth, where the moth and canker doe corrupt, and where theeues digge thorow and steale. And the Apostle expresseth it, where hee attributeth vnto gold, the epithete of perishing, and calleth it and siluer things corruptible. Neither in truth is there any kind of riches which are not subiect to this corruptibility, or exempted from continuall danger of perishing. For if wee are rich in treasures, the theeues may steale them; if in ships and merchandise, the sea may swallow them, or pirats spoile them; if in apparell and goodly furniture, the moathes may consume and eate them; if in corne fields, the blasting and mildewes may destroy them; if in cattell and sheepe, they are in danger of the roe and murraine; if in gold and siluer, the rust and canker may fret them, or they may bee taken away by violence or deceit; if in buildings, the fire may consume them; if in lands and possessions, the title may bee called into question, and indangered by euery vnconscionable lawyer, or contentious person. Nor can our care and diligence preuent these dangers, or secure vnto vs the things wee enjoy; yea rather (as the Wise man telleth vs) riches doe often perish euen by our trauell: and the more wee labour to hold them, the sooner they forsake vs; like water in the hand, which is lost with griping. And the reason hereof is, because wee are not absolute owners of them, but our great Lord and Master which hath chiefe right vnto them, doth dispose of them according to his owne pleasure, giuing, and taking away, enriching, and making poore, whom, and when he will. So that though wee haue neuer so great an heape of this shining dust of gold and siluer, yet if hee but blow vpon it, it will presently flie away, as himselfe speaketh by his prophet. In which respect the Wise man saith, that the treasures of wickednesse profit nothing, because God casteth away the substance of the wicked. An example whereof wee haue in the whore of Babylon, who being rich in fine linnen, purple, and skarlet, gold, precious stones, and pearles, is said to haue all her riches in one houre brought to desolation. In regard of which vnconstancie, and momentanie continuance of wealth and worldly treasures, they are fitly compared to fugitiue seruants, who will not stay long in any place, but runne from master to master. Whereof it is that worldlings hauing no assurance of them, and yet doting in their loue, doe keepe them vnder the safest custodie of bolts and barres, locke and key, and watch ouer them continually with vigilant and carking care, for feare they should make an escape, and so depriue them of their seruice.

Q. Sect. 2. That riches are daily in danger of losing; and that the greater losse brings the greater griefe.

And yet such is the folly of worldly men, that though they are taught by continual experience of others losses, that their riches are also momentanie, yet doe they dreame that their own will be permanent and perpetual, and that they shall long enjoy their wealth themselues, & after leaue it to their children for many generations. Which vaine hopes when as they faile, and their riches contrary to their expectation are taken from them; they torment themselues with bitter griefe, and the greater their riches haue beene, the greater is their sorrow for their losse, vexing themselues the more, by how much the more they haue abounded. And thus the griefe of a lost kingdome, pierceth the heart with farre greater sorrow, than he who hath lost but a small lordship. Thus the merchant more bewaileth the wracke of his rich ship, than the poore fisherman his little boate; and the rich man being robbed of all his treasures, taketh his losse much more heauily, than a poore man who is spoiled of some worthlesse trifles, though they be his whole substance. In which respect riches are right runawayes, which are kept with great care, and alwayes doe their masters more hurt at their parting, than they haue done them good in their whole seruice. And therefore seeing these earthly riches are alwayes momentanie, and oftentimes harmefull, let it be farre from any Christian from fixing his heart vpon these vnconstant and fickle vanities, which like the waues of the Sea rising and falling, will tosse it vp and downe in the restlesse motion of hope, care and feare. Farre be it from vs who professe godlinesse, either to compasse or keepe these vncertaine and flitting trifles, by vnlawfull meanes, and for their sake by sinne to hazard the eternall joyes of heauen, and to cast our selues headlong into hell: seeing the things wee gaine are transitorie, and the things wee lose permanent and perpetuall; the pleasures which wee take in our earthly treasures vnconstant, and momentanie, and the torments which attend vpon their sinfull fruition endlesse and euerlasting; in which respect the Apostle Iames thus speaketh to couetous misers; Goe to now yee rich men, weepe and houle, for your miseries which shall come vpon you. Your riches are corrupt, and your garments motheaten. Your gold and siluer is cankred, and the rust of them shall be a witnesse against you, and shall eate your flesh as it were fire. Yee haue heaped vp treasure for the last dayes; euen the treasure of wrath against the day of wrath, and of the declaration of the iust iudgement of God, as the Apostle Paul expoundeth it. And therefore let vs not set our hearts vpon these momentanie and flitting vanities, but rather vpon those substantiall treasures, Gods spirituall graces and heauenly ioyes; which as they are infinitely of more worth; so are they eternall and euerlasting, and shall neuer be taken from vs, or we from them. For when wee haue enioyed them ten thousand times the age of a man, there shall not the least moment of our time be spent, but at the end of so many yeeres, our ioyes shall bee so farre from ending, as they were in their first beginning. When therefore the world calleth and allureth vs, to set our affections vpon these moueable and momentanie vanities, let vs stop our eares against his bewitching inticements, and hearken vnto the call of saving wisdome and true godlinesse, promising vs long-lasting treasures, and an heauenly inheritance which shall neuer haue end. Riches (saith she) and honour are with mee, euen durable riches and righteousnesse: my fruit is better than gold, euen than fine gold, and my reuenewes better than fine siluer; I cause to walke in the way of righteousnesse, and in the middest of the pathes of iudgement, that I may cause them that loue mee to inherit substance, and I will fill their treasures.

Or if our hearts be so fixed on our earthly riches, that wee will not heare of leauing them, let vs learne at least to lose them wisely, and so as wee may euer injoy our loue; the the which wee cannot deale by keeping them in earth, where they are subiect to corruptibilitie, as our Sauiour teacheth vs; but by laying them vp in Heauen, where neither the moth nor canker corrupteth, & where theeues neither digge thorow, nor steale. Let vs vse them as comfortable helpes in our iorney to our owne countrie, and as meanes to assure vnto vs the fruition of our heauenly ioyes; and as our Sauiour exhorteth vs, Let vs make vs friends with the riches of iniquitie, that when we shall want, we may be receiued into euerlasting habitations. And if wee would for euer possesse neuer decaying riches; let vs, as our Sauiour counselleth vs, sell that we haue, and giue almes, make vs bags which wax not old, a treasure that can neuer faile in heauen, where no theefe commeth, nor moth corrupteth. For keepe them long we cannot, seeing they are vncōstant and still flying, and wee mortall and daily dying; but the best way for euer to enjoy them, is to send them before vs by the Lords factors, the poore members of Iesus Christ, into our heauenly countrie, where they shall for euer bee reserued for vs. For howsoeuer our goods are momentanie, our good deeds shall bee euerlasting, though our riches bee corrupcible, yet our Christian liberalitie, mercie, and righteousnesse shall remaine for euer; according to that; he hath distributed and giuen to the poore, his righteousnesse remaineth for euer, his horne shall be exalted with glory. And therefore the surest way to keepe our treasures for euer, is to bestow them vpon the poore, and vpon charitable and Christian vses, for whilest we thus lay them out, we eternally keepe them, and in thus parting with them, we for euer reserue them: whereas if wee locke them vp we lose them, if wee keepe them in our owne custodie, though it be vnder locke and key, bolt and barre, wee shall surely bee spoiled of them, if not by theeues, yet at least by death. If wee giue not a peny to the poore, wee shall not find a peny of all our rich treasures which wee had in earth, in the world to come: and they who with the rich glutton will not giue the crummes of their tables, to the reliefe of those who are in penurie and miserie, crying out for hunger, and begging their almes; shall with him crie out in hell torments, for a drop of cold water to coole their tongues, and shall not receiue it. Let vs learne of husbandmen to cast away our corne that wee may keepe it, and sow liberally, that we may reape a plentifull haruest: yea let vs learne of rich misers in the generall, to chuse the surest and safest place for the keeping of our treasure, though not in the particular, to make their choice of the earth, where there is no treasurie vnto which wee may securely commit it; but let vs lay it vp in heauen, and desire to haue it reserued in Gods owne custody, where it shall not onely remaine safe for our vse, but be increased vnto vva thousand fold, and of momentanie moueables become an euerlasting and most glorious inheritance. And this counsell an ancient Father giueth vs; If (saith he) worldly riches be wanting, let vs not by euill workes seeke them on earth; if they doe abound, let vs by good workes reserue them in heauen. For (as he saith in another place) if we couetously hoord them vp, and will not part with them to good and charitable vses, wee may be said indeed to loue our riches, but it is fondly and foolishly, killing and destroying them with ouermuch kindnesse, whilest wee hugge them too hard in our bosomes; but not truly and wisely, for by euill keeping, we make them to perish in our hands, and by fond louing them wee eternally lose them: whereas if we loued them aright, wee would send them before vs into heauen, whither wee shall shortly follow after, and they remaine with vs, and we with them for euermore.

Finally, as worldly honours and riches, so also worldly pleasures and delights are short and momentanie; like vnto delightfull dreames, which please for the present, but vanish away when one awaketh: for when men with great paines and labour haue procured for themselues these worldly pleasures, they are ready to forsake them, as soone as they salute them, and to end in their fruition, dying (as it were) in the very birth. Thus doe the pleasures of eating and drinking presently vanish, as soone as the meate and drinke is swallowed into the stomacke; thus sports and pastimes are inioyed and ended in the same moment; thus sweet musicke delighteth onely whilest it is in hearing, the pleasure and sound at once leauing vs; and finally, thus goodly maskes and shewes, giue onely delight whilest they are looked vpon, and like apparitions no sooner appeare, than vanish. In a word, though we should enioy all worldly delights euen our whole life, some few dayes excepted, all that are passed would not minister any comfort, to cheare and vphold vs in this short time of their absence; and so is all the ioy of pleasures tied to their presence, that though we should enjoy them the age of Methuselah, one houres aduersitie would make them all to be forgotten, vnlesse they be called to mind, as arguments to aggrauate our present vnhappinesse, because now when wee neede most comfort, wee are forsaken of all our former delights. And this momentanie continuance of pleasures, is by Iob plainly expressed, where he obserueth, that of old, and euer since God placed man vpon the earth, the reioycing of the wicked hath beene short, and that the ioy of hypocrites hath lasted but for a moment. And the Wise man man familiarly explaineth it, by comparing these worldly delights to the noise of thornes vnder the pot, which howsoeuer for the instant they make a great crackling, and a glorious blaze, yet euery one knoweth, that as they are suddenly kindled, so also they are as suddenly extinguished. For howsoeuer they delight for the instant, yet they perish in the very tasting, and passe away as soone as they are come, leauing behind them nothing but griefe and sorrow, either because they were at all enjoyed, or are so soone departed. So another doth most finely expresse the short tarriance of these worldly pleasures, by comparing them to letters written in the waters, which in the same moment are made and defaced, no print or impression of them being left behind: for as in that, the paine is no lesse, than if a man did write in lasting in parchment, but the continuance of the letters written no longer than they are in making: so there goeth as great paine to the obtaining of these worldly delights, as of those which are heauenly and eternall, and yet the fruition lasteth no longer than the very act and operation, and being once past, no print or impression of them remaineth after them. And therefore seeing these worldly pleasures are so momentanie, and of short continuance; let vs not set our hearts vpon them, but rather affect and seeke for those which are spirituall and heauenly; for if we delight our selues in the Lord, & in the fruition of his mercies, vouchsafed vnto vs in his Sonne Christ, our Sauiour himselfe hath assured vs, that this ioy shall euer last, and no man shall be able to take it from vs; and the Psalmist telleth vs that those heauenly pleasures which are at Gods right hand, endure for euermore. Especially let vs take heed that we do not compasse vnlawfull pleasures, or by vnlawfull meanes, or immoderately loue those which in themselues are lawfull; for what folly and madnes were it, to hazard by sin the losse of much more excellent pleasures which are eternall, for the fruition of these which are no lesse vaine than momentanie? yea to indanger our soules to euerlasting torments, for the present enioying of these fading delights?

CHAP. XXVIII.

HAue shewed that all things in the World are momentany and corruptible: Now wee are also briefly to shew, that as they are momentany in themselues, so they are mutable and vnconstant in respect of vs. For though they be but of short continuance, yet if they were friends for life, and would not forsake vs till either they perished, or wee died, they might bee thought more worthy our loue, if not for their vtilitie and profit, yet at least for their fidelitie and constancie; whereas now they are not so momentany as they are mutable, being ready to leaue and forsake vs euery day of their short continuance, like fickle flatterers, of whose fauour and loue there can be no certainty or assurance. And no maruell that these earthly things vpon which men dote are so subiect to change, seeing all things in the World are obnoxious to mutabilitie: the Heauens themselues are not free from alterations; the Sun and Moone haue their Elypses; the times varie and change one with another; the day with night, and night with day; Winter with Summer, and Summer with Winter, and neuer stand at a stay: the Elements haue continually their transmurations one with another, and by maintayning continuall warre among themselues, procure a peacefull harmonie, and well agreeing temperature in sublunary and inferiour bodies, vntill one of them hath vanquished and ouercome all the rest, with whose victorie their peace and harmonie endeth. Thus also Monarchies and States, cities and townes haue their changes & alterations, the same Nation one while imperiously commanding, and another while seruilely obeying; and the same City at one time flourishing in stately buildings, profitable merchandise, and abundant riches; and at another time dispeopled, decayed, burned, and buried in its owne ruines. Thus you shall see the Assyrian and Babylonish monarchy for a time ouertopping all, and then stouping to the monarchy of the Medes and Persians; and this for a while welding the scepter ouer all the neighbour countries, and soone after casting it downe at the feet of the Grecian monarchie; and this also after it hath had its turne and commanded in its course, conquered and ouerthrowne, and the Romane monarchie raised out of its ruines. And finally, though this were stronger and more durable than all the rest, yet it had its period as well as its beginning, and though it had none stronger to ouercome it at once, yet it was at length ouerthrowne by its owne power, perished piece-meale, and came to ruine, not because it wanted strong props to vphold it, but because it selfe was ouer burthensome. Thus also wee shall see a change in Cities and townes: as for example, in famous Babylon, Niniue, Tyre, Carthage, Athens, Sparta, Corinth, Ephesus, yea in Ierusalem it selfe the glory of the world.

And therefore if these great alterations are to be obserued in things more durable, there is no maruell if they be more frequently seen in

in humane estates and conditions, which are innumerable times more sickle and vnconstant in themselues, and are also subiect to partake with all the rest in their changes and alterations. For when the Sunne and Moone are Eclypsed, we suffer in their defects; when they goe their iourney from the East to the West, we also trauell with them towards the setting of our life; onely this difference there is, that they goe and returne againe, but after our Set there is no rising, vntill by the power of our Iudge wee rise to iudgement. So time though winged cannot haste so fast away, but we either by a voluntary or forced motion, equall its speed, and beare it company till we rest at death. The Elements are subiect to continuall change, and we are partakers with them in their alterations: and when in the conflict which they hold in our bodies the naturall fire hath deuoured, and (as it were) conquered the airy water, it selfe also, hauing no other food but its enemies prouision, is ouercome in conquering, and we with them both do fall in the battell, and die of their wounds. And finally, there can be no change in States, Monarchies and Cities, where we inhabit, but we likewise haue a share in their alterations, laughing in their mirth, and weeping in their mourning. No meruell therefore if the estate of man bee changeable, seeing he hath a great part in the alteration of all other creatures, and besides hath in himself innumerable internall causes of variable mutation. In regard whereof one saith, that none of vs are the same in our age that we were in our youth; no man is the same to day that he was yesterday; but our bodies are carried in a continuall motion, like vnto Riuers, and all we looke vpon doth run away with time, nothing remayning the same to morrow as wee now see it; yea euen I (saith he) whilest I speak of changing, am my selfe changed. Neither are our bodies more mutable than our Estates, which through the whole course of our liues are daily subiect to alterations, and nothing continueth firme and permanent in them, but as the Traueller is sometimes on the high Hils, and sometime in the low Vallies, and sometime walking on euen ground: so we in our pilgrimage are one while aloft in the Mountaines of prosperitie, and soone after in the low dales of aduersitie, and sometimes in a mean and euen condition between both, or like vnto those that are sailing on the Sea, who are one while lifted (as it were) to the Clouds, and in an instant buried in the deepe; one while becalmed so as they cannot goe forward, and by and by hurried with a boysterous tempest; now in danger of rushing one against another, and soone after of dashing against a Rocke; sometimes suffering shipwracke, and alwayes fearing it; neither are they euer secure, and at rest, till they be arriued in the Hauen: for so in this life we are sometime aduanced, and somtime abased, one while sluggish with too much prosperity, so as we cannot moue in any good and Christian courses; and another while tossed and turmoyled with the blustring stormes of aduersity, whereby though wee make a more speedy progresse, yet not without many troubles, and much danger. In regard whereof the saying of the Sonne of Syrach is verified, that no man is to bee iudged happy before his death, because a pleasant beginning, hath often a sorrowfull progresse, and a worse ending; yea, sometime hee who hath acted his part well in the rest of his life, spoyleth all in the last Scene, concluding an happy life in respect of worldly prosperity, with a shamefull and miserable death. Neither in truth is it any maruell that our worldly estates should be so variable and vnconstant, seeing the ground whereupon they stand is so moorish and deceitfull; for euen the World it selfe is fickle and false; and therefore as it is impossible to stand firmely on a dancing Quagmire, or steadily and immoueably in a tottering Ship, when it is tossed with surging waues in a tempestuous storme: so is it alike impossible to ground an vnchangeable estate on this mutable World, or not to be moued with this worldly earthquake. Yea, euen those things in the world which chiefly intitle prosperity are most variable and subiect to change, and like vnto the dust raised by the winde, they are tossed to and fro, and from one to another, as it pleaseth Gods prouidence to dispose of them; or vnto shadowes and apparitions, which vanish away and slip betweene the hands, when a man thinketh to take surest hold. So that this Idoll of worldly prosperity when it doth most gloriously shine must needs be continually in danger of falling and breaking, seeing both the matter thereof is (as it were) of brittle glasse, and the base or foundation whereon it standeth rotten and vnconstant. And yet such is the folly of worldly men, yea, sometimes also of Gods dearest seruants, that when they haue this Eele in their hand they thinke they can hold it fast, and are ready to say in their prosperitie that they shall neuer bee moued. And as Eue thought that her sonne Cain would haue bin a sure possession, though he proued a runnagate; so they imagine that these births of their carefull braines, and fruits of their labours, will bee constant and permanent; whereas the euent sheweth, that (like beggers Brats) they will not stay long in any place; and that like run-away seruants almost euery moneth they change their master. In which respect the constancie of humane affaires is fitly compared to the rowing of the Cart-wheele; the lowest part being within a while vppermost, and soone after as low as it was before. So that they who who thinke to find sure footing on this vnstable ground, are like vnto those who hauing no commandement or promise, will presume by sole vertue of a miraculous faith to walke vpon the waters; who (as one saith) are so much the deeper plunged into the gulph of misery, by how much the more securely they presumed of their permanent prosperitie, there being no greater misery than a false happinesse. For there is no constancie or stedfastnesse in these worldly things, but they are continually ready to remoue themselues from one to another, at the least beck of the great Creator, & to alter the estates of worldly men by their comming and departure, as Hannah in her Song notably obserueth: The Lord (saith she) is a God of knowledge, and by him enterprises are established: the bow and the mightie men are broken, and the weake haue girded themselues with strength. They that were full are hired out for bread, and the hungry are no more hired, the barren hath borne seuen, and she that had many children is feeble: the Lord killeth and maketh aliue, bringeth down to the graue, and raiseth vp, &c.

1. Sam. 2. 3, 4, 5.

Q. Sect. 3. Of the mutabilitie and vnconstancie of honours and preferments.

But let vs briefly consider the mutability of worldly things in the speciall instances. And first, what can be more vnconstant and variable than Honours and preferments? seeing those who are thus aduanced, do continually walke in slippery places, where they are still ready to catch a fall; and borrowing their glory in a great part from the vnconstant opinion of the fickle multitude, which like the Weathercocke turneth with euery wind, their fame and reputation must needs be exceeding variable, resting it selfe vpon such an vnstable ground. In which regard worldly men are fitly compared to shel-fish, which depending vpon the Moone, are subiect to all her changes, increasing as shee increaseth, and decreasing, as she inclineth towards the waine; for so their Honour standing at the deuotion of the vnconstant multitude, altereth and changeth, riseth and falleth, according to the full or waine of their variable conceits. The World promiseth indeed perpetuitie of Honours to those who will set their hearts vpon them, and preferre them before the glory of God, and the saluation of their owne soules, but hee dealeth sometime vnfaithfully with his Fauourites, treacherously betraying them vnder shew of loue, and lifting them vp, whom he meaneth to ouerthrow with the greatest downefall. Wherein the World and the Prince thereof, vse ambitious men as the Crowes the shel-fish, carrying them aloft vnto the highest places, that from thence casting them down, they may bruise them with the fall, and so more easily prey vpon them. But as they deale thus with their owne friends, sometime because they will not, and sometime because they cannot preferre them; so much more fatally and vnconstantly with those who neglect and contemne their deceitfull Honours, being ready to magnifie and disgrace them with the same breath, when as they cannot allure them to bite at their bewitching baits. An example whereof wee haue in Paul and Barnabas, whom the vulgar people (admiring their miracle) would needes deifie; which honour when they had refused, and perswaded them to returne all the glory vnto God, they presently vpon a groundlesse information, laid violent hands vpon them and stoned them, now thinking that they deserued capitall punishments, whom ere-while they esteemed worthy diuine Honour. Thus others shewed the like vnconstancy, whilest one while they condemned Paul, as a malefactour, and presently after were ready to adore him as their Idoll. But most notably doth the mutabilitie, and fickle vnconstancy of the variable multitude appeare in their carriage towards our Sauiour Christ; whom one day they sought after to make him a King; and soone after rejecting him, preferred before him an Heathen, yea, a hated Monarch: one while they flocked about him, to giue him all louing and respectiue entertainment, strewing greene boughes in his way, and (because they thought them not good enough) spreading also their garments, euen vnder his Asses feet; and another while mocking and reuiling him, buffeting and spitting vpon him, whipping and crucifying him, and in stead of bestowing their garments vpon him, they take from him his owne: this day they meet him with ioy, and salute him, saying, Hosanna the Sonne of Dauid, blessed be hee that commeth in the Name of the Lord, Hosanna in the highest; but within a few dayes after they cry out with an vniuersall consent, Away with him, away with him: crucifie him, crucifie him. Which as it notably sheweth the mutabilitie of Honours, and the vnconstancy of the common people, so also the malice of Satan, who would (as one saith) haue his Procession goe immediately before his Passion, these Honours before those disgraces, and this high exaltation before his lowest downfall, that by this sudden alteration he might be the lesse prouided, and his Passion made more bitter and intolerable: although the Lord who disposed of all had another end, namely, that the Scriptures might be fulfilled which testified of his Son, to the further conuincing of the Iewes, and the just condemnation of all, who would not beleeue: and therefore if our Sauiour Christ who was worthy of all honour, found this sudden and vndeserued alteration, what constancy can they hope for, who come infinite degrees short of his excellencies?

Matt. 27. 22. Mark 15. 13. Luke 23. 21. John 19. 6. 15.

But in truth howsoeuer this vnconstancy of Honours may be attributed to the mutabilitie bility and treachery of the World, and the Princes thereof, in regard that they promise to their followers, and faile in performance: and as they are made the instruments of God, both in the conferring and taking away of Honours, wherein they take occasion to shew their fawning in the one, and their malice in the other; yet the supreme and chiefe cause of these alterations in honours and preferments, is the wise prouidence of Almighty God, who would haue these worldly honours variable and vnconstant, chiefly for his owne children's sake, both for their triall and chastisement, and because hee would not haue them to set their hearts too much vpon them, and so neglect that eternall glory of his heauenly Kingdome; and secondarily for the just punishment of the wicked, from whom hee taketh away these honours after hee hath aduanced them, because they abuse them to pride and tyrannie. And thus Alexander of a great Conqueror of Kings, became worse then a Slaue, and equall to a Dogge, eating the offalse vnder the Table; wherein the Lord measured justly vnto him, according to that measure by which hee had metted vnto others. Thus Haman was one day the chiefe Fauourite in Court, and the next day hanged on his owne Gallowes; because he had abused his greatnes to the ruine of Gods Church: and thus Gods owne Church and people after they had received many testimonies of his loue, and were by him exalted aboue all other Nations; for abusing of these speciall fauours, were dejected and brought vnto a base condition: for so the Prophet complaineth; Ierusalem hath grieuously sinned, therefore shee is a derision; all that honoured her, despise her, because they haue seene her filthinesse. No maruell therefore if the World be vnconstant in conferring these Honours, seeing in truth it hath no power to continue them, more then that which it receiueth from God; who as he is the chiefe Authour of these Honours, so hee giueth and taketh them away at his owne pleasure. Thus Hannah confesseth, that the Lord bringeth low and exalteth; hee raiseth vp the poore out of the dust, and lifteth vp the begger from the dunghill, to set them among Princes, and to make them inherit the seate of glory. So the Psalmist maketh this the chiefe cause of the ruine of the wicked, when they were in the top of all their prosperity, because the Lord had set them in slipperie places, and cast them downe into destruction. But whether we consider the chiefe or instrumentall causes of this vnconstancie, sure wee are that honours are most mutable and slitting, vncertaine to winter where they haue Sommered, or to lodge where they haue rested all day. And this mutable inconstancie the Wise man obserued; I haue (saith he) seene seruants on horses, and Princes as seruants walking on the ground. To which purpose also the Sonne of Syrach noteth, that many mightie men haue beene brought to dishonour, and the honourable haue beene deliuered into other mens hands. The which mutabilitie commonly happeneth when men are most secure, and are puffed vp in pride, in regard that they assure themselues of the constant continuance of their honours and preferments; their proudest hopes yeelding nothing vnto them but shame and disgrace. For so the Wise man saith, that pride goeth before destruction; and an high minde before the fall: and againe, when pride commeth, then commeth shame, but with the lowly is wisdome. And therefore seeing these worldly honours are so mutable and vnconstant, so hardly gotten and easily lost, let vs not too much esteeme them, nor immoderately loue and seeke them, but rather let vs set our hearts vpon sauing wisdom and true godlinesse; for as the Wise man saith, Exalt her, and she shall exalt thee, she shall bring thee to honour, if thou imbrace her, she shall giue a comely ornament to thy head, yea, she shall giue thee a crowne of glorie. And this honour shall be most constant and permanent, lasting as long as life, yea, after death, for the memorial of the iust shall be blessed; but the name of the wicked shall rot. Yea, this honour of grace shall be but a step to aduances vs to the honour of heauenly glory, the which shall continue not for a few yeeres onely, but for euer and euer, as being eternall and euerlasting; for so the Apostle telleth vs, that the God of grace hath called vs to his eternall glory, by Iesus Christ.

The like mutabilitie and vnconstancie is in riches. For though our riches corrupt not, nor we die, yet there is no certaintie in their possession, they are so flitting and mutable. For who seeth not that they do often change their masters; he who ere-while wanted, abounding, and he who not long since abounded, being now brought to want and penurie? Looke but to Houses, Lands and Coine, and consider how often they haue new Owners, this day being in the possession of one, and to morrow of another, and not many many moneths after, both being stripped of them, they are deuolued vnto a third. In which respect Zophar compareth riches to the waters of Riuers, which make no long stay in any place, and passe from Land to Land, and field to field, till at last they are swallowed vp of the Sea. The increase (saith he) of his house shall goe away, and it shall flow away in the day of Gods wrath. For so riches runne from one to another, till in the end they lose their name, being corrupted, and (as it were) swallowed in the gulfe of destruction. In the same regard one of the Ancients likeneth them to allaying Harlots, which make loue to many, keepe faith with none. And to the same purpose another saith; that there is nothing more false & treacherous than riches; & that like a fugitiue & vngrateful seruant, they haue no honesty or fidelity; for though thou bind them with innumerable bonds, they will goe away, and draw their chaine after them. And for this cause oftentimes, they are kept and fast locked vp vnder the custodie of strong bolts, and fast barred doores, hauing besides many seruants as Iaylours attending on them; but they oftentimes intice their keepers, and flee away together with them. So that there is nothing more vnconstant than these earthly moueables, which are euery day subject to change and alteration: in which respect one wittily saith, that Money most fitly is stamped round, to signifie by the very figure that it is truly current, not standing still, but rolling and remouing from one to another. The which inconstancie and mutabilitie of riches, as it proceedeth instrumentally from the World, who is vnconstant in its fauours, aduancing those to wealth whom soone after it is ready to impouerish; so chiefly and principally from the Lord, who in his gracious prouidence made earthly riches mutable, because wee should not fix our hearts vpon such changeable vanities, but vpon those heauenly treasures which are immutable, and not subject to any alteration; and that seeing euery day they are ready to leaue vs whether we will or no, wee might be the rather willing to part with them to such good & charitable vses, as may glorifie God, and further ascertaine vs of our eternall treasures. Whereas if hee had made them immutable and permanent, whome would they not haue bewitched with their loue? For if now men hauing no securitie or assurance, to keepe them in their possession but one onely day, do notwithstanding dote so much in their loue, that by right & wrong they lay violent hands vpon them, & wring them vnjustly out of others custodie, hazarding euen their soules to increase their wealth; what would they haue done if they had beene constant and faithful friends, that doe all this, they being treacherous and deceitfull flatterers? What Widow would they not haue robbed? What Orphane would they not haue spoyled? What weake and poore man would they not haue oppressed, to get these perpetuities into their possession? To conclude, seeing these riches of the World are so mutable and vnconstant, let vs not set our hearts vpon them; and (as one saith) let vs not runne a madding after these false fugitiues, for there is nothing more deceitfull, nothing more perfidious. To day they are on our part, but to morrow against vs; arming enimies eyes against our safety; and strengthening malicious hands to vndermine our peace; so that they who haue them, are beſet on euery ſide with familiar and chamber foes, and inuironed with domesticall enemies: but rather let vs fix our minds on those firme treasures reserued for vs in Gods Kingdome, which are permanent and perpetuall euen to eternitie.

Finally, there is no more constancie or lesse mutability in worldly pleasures; for though there be alwayes worldly men and worldly delights, yet are they neuer ascertained the one to the other; but as men change, their pleasures, so pleasures change men, and euery hand-while leauing the old, they are ready to betake them to new Masters. Some waite not so much vpon men themselues, as vpon their age: as for example, some attend vpon infancy, and leaue them in their youth; some delight them in their youth, and forsake them when they come to full maturitie, and some accompany them in their full strength, and will by no meanes stay the approach of old age. Others are tied to seuerall times of the yeere, as to Spring, Autumne, Summer, Winter, and bring great delight when they are vsed in their season; but failing herein they change their nature, and become irksome and tedious. And as for those pleasures which are vsuall and daily, delighting all persons, and at all times, we see vpon what common mutation they are subject, lasting no longer but for the present, and then degenerating into tedious molestations and cumbersome burthens. Thus meates and drinkes delight for the instant; but after surcharging the stomacke, they recompence an houres pleasure, with a whole dayes paine. And thus pleasures of the flesh are but of momentany continuance, and suddenly impaire the strength, and bring the bodie to many infirmities, and much weaknesse. Besides which losse of speciall delights, how many doe wee daily see, who abounding in all manner of sensuall pleasures, are soone after abandoned of them all, and spend the remainder of their dayes in misery and mourning? And though they remayne in their judgement and affection Epicures still, making their belly their God, and the World their Paradise, yet find their Idoll whom they serue, so auerse towards them, that of necessitie, whether they will or no, they are robbed of all pleasures, and passe their time in griefe, and sharpe affliction? And thus it appeareth that all these worldly things which men so fondly affect, are mutable and vnconstant. The consideration whereof should moue vs lightly to esteeme, yea, carelesly to contemne these changeable and fickle vanities, in comparison of Gods spirituall graces and heauenly joyes. For what is this mutability, but a certaine kinde of mortality, seeing though they die not in themselues, yet they die vnto vs? Yea, in truth what is the continuance of these worldly by things, but a kind of vnobserued corruption: for whilst any thing passeth from the present to the time to come, that which is past dieth and perisheth. God onely is immutable, because nothing past taketh from him; nothing to come addeth to him, but whatsoeuer was, is, or shall be, is with him all present. And therefore despising these vnconstant and perishing trifles, let the Lord be our glory, treasure, and delight, in whom there is no change or shadow of change; and let vs set our hearts and affections vpon his spirituall and sauing graces; for these gifts of God (as the Apostle telleth vs) are without repentance; neuer wholly or finally failing those to whom they are once giuen. For being placed on this sure Rocke of Grace, wee may securely contemne the dashing waues of boysterous malice, which in the Sea of this World, are by turbulent men raised against vs, seeing they shall be all broken into the foame of their owne shame, and wee in the meane time remayne vndamnified; for these immutable graces, giuen vnto vs by the immutable God, will make our peace and security also immutable. And let vs chiefly affect and seeke those Honours, Riches and Pleasures reserued for vs in Gods Kingdome, which cannot be altered by any accident, nor impaired by any enemy, but shall eternally remayne to our infinite ioy and comfort, firme and permanent.

CHAP. XXIX.

HAuing shewed that the things of the World are in themselues momentanie, and in respect of vs mutable: wee are in the next place to speake of our mortalitie, which may serue as another mayne argument to make vs contemne these worldly vanities; for though they were eternall, yet we are momentanie; though they were constant and permanent, yet our liues are fraile and flitting; though they had not their end, yet wee shall haue our end; and though they would for euer continue with vs, yet shall wee but a while continue with them, because our liues are but short, and with their shortnesse, so fraile and vncertaine, that this momentany time, is only sure of ending, and in nothing else certaine but in its owne vncertainnie. For we are continually sailing towards the hauen of death, and wee neuer want the winde of winged time to driue vs forward; sometime in the way we perish by the leakes of our own intemperance; sometime we split our selues vpon the Rocks of dangers, or vpon the sands of carelesse securitie; sometime wee are cast ouer-boord by Pirats and Enemies, and sometime carrying all our lofty & proud sayles, wee are ouer-set and sunke with the boysterous blasts of aduerse accidents; and though wee scape all these dangers wee shall not be long in comming to our hauen of rest; seeing we are neuer becalmed nor stand still, but night and day goe forward with a prosperous wind. It is true that the World, yea our owne deceitfull hearts, doe promise vnto vs long life, yea, dreame of a kind of eternitie which hath neuer end; for there is scarce any so olde who thinketh not to liue a day longer, and when that is spent, another day after that, and so continueth day after day in the same minde, and by consequence frameth to his hopes an imaginary perpetuitie; eternitie being nothing else but a constant continuance of time without any ending. And that men haue this inward conceit, it may easily appeare by their outward practice: for if they were throughly perswaded that their liues were momentany and vncertaine, what shew of reason had they by deferring their repentance, to hazard their eternall saluation? Why should they set their hearts vpon the things of this life, and preferre them before euerlasting happinesse? Why doe they who thinke it folly to bestow great cost in building vpon a lease of one and twenty yeeres, grow excessiue in these charges, and erect stately Houses, hauing no posteritie vnto whom they may leaue them? Why do they not prepare themselues to meet the Lord, and take some paines to set straight their accounts; if they thought that euen this day they might die, and be called to a reckoning? But the true cause of all these errours and negligence is this, because they dreame of long life, and put the euill day farre from them.

Now as this opinion and vaine hope of long life is an vsuall cause of impenitencie, and of the committing and liuing in all manner of sinne, so especially of the loue of the World, and worldly vanities: for because men thinke to continue long with them, they accordingly esteeme and set their hearts vpon them; whereas if they beleeued and remembred that not only the things which they so affect are momentany and mutable, but also that they themselues are mortall, and of final continuance vpon the earth, and that euen this short time is most vncertain; they would neuer preferre these transitory trifles before their eternall patrimonie. And therefore seeing it is a forcible argument to moue all men to the contempt of the world and worldly vanities, because our liues are so momentany and fraile (for though they were neuer so constant and permanent, yet we cannot long enjoy them, seeing we are mortall, and of short abode on earth) let vs a little further consider of this point; and shew the momentany shortnesse of mans life both by testimonies of Scripture, and also by experience and reason. The Holy Ghost in the Scriptures doth amply and plainly set forth the breuity and vncertainty of mans life, and that by simple affirmation, and also by comparisons. For the former the testimonie of Iob is plain, who affirmeth, that: Man the sonne of a woman hath but a short time to liue, and is full of trouble. So the Patriarch Iacob, speaking of his owne life, which much surmounted the vsuall age of men in these dayes, saith, that his dayes were few and euill: and it is ordinary in the Scriptures, to reckon mens liues by dayes, and not by yeares, to note their breuity: yea, comparing them with eternitie, they make them not so much as a minute; for so the Apostle Peter saith, that with the Lord a thousand yeares are but as one day. And thus the Apostle Iohn calleth all that time, from the first comming of Christ in the flesh vnto his second comming to iudgement, the last houre, whereby hee would intimate vnto vs, that the worlds continuance being compared with eternity, is but of a few houres standing, and that all the rest being spent, we are now come to the last: and therefore if all this time being thus compared, is in respect of eternitie but a short houre, then surely a mans life according to the same proportion is scarce a minute.

Sect. 3. The breuity of mans life illustrated by similitudes.

The similitudes also which are vsed to expresse the breuity of mans life, are very significant, and fit for our purpose, for it is compared to a [a] pilgrimage, which is not long in trauelling; to a [b] warfare, which is short and full of trouble; to the dayes of an [c] hireling, which as they are commonly but few, so by reason of their paines and labour, irkesome and tedious: to the [d] wind, which seldome stands long in one place, and euery day is in some likelihood of changing, that which now bloweth passing away without returning: to the flower of the field, which one day flourisheth and the next day withereth: to the [e] grasse, which in the morning groweth in his full strength, and is cut downe before night. All which similitudes imply, that mans life is but (as it were) of one dayes continuance. Like vnto those creatures neere Pontus, whereof Plutarch maketh mention, whose life and the day begin and end together; for at morning they are bred, at noone they come to their full growth, and at euening die with olde age; for what is our childhood, but a morning, our youth and ripe age the mid day, and our olde age the fall, set and night of life. The which proportion holy Iob seemed to ayme at, where hee saith that wee are but of yesterday, and scarcely full out of two dayes standing. But because wee are ready to flatter our selues with a vaine hope of long life, and to imagine that euery day is many yeares: the Holy Ghost compareth our liues to many other things which are lesse than of a day in continuance, as vnto a [g] vapour that appeareth for a little time, and afterwards vanisheth away: to a [h] dreame, which vanisheth as soone as a man waketh: to a [i] Post, which passeth by in all haste, and maketh no stay till he come to his iourneyes end: to the most swift [k] Ships, and to the [l] Eagle, which flying to seize vpon the prey, doubleth her ordinary speed: to a [m] cloud which is suddenly blowne away with the winde, or else dissolued or dried vp with the Sun: to the [n] smoke, which whilest it ascendeth vanisheth; to the swift passage of a [o] Weauers shuttle, which in a moment passeth from hand to hand; to a [p] span in length, which is measured in an instant. And as though these reall things were not sufficient to expresse the shortnesse and vanity of mans life; it is compared also to a [q] shadow, which hath neither substance nor continuance; and to the swiftnesse of a [r] thought, which farre exceedeth in speed all other motions: yea, as if any thing were too substantiall to expresse sufficiently the momentany shortnesse of it, it is compared to [s] vanitie, which is nothing; for so Dauid saith, that [t] man is like to vanity, his dayes are like a shadow which vanisheth: and it is not only said by way of similitude, that mans life is like to vanity, but that it is vanitie it selfe; for so Iob saith, that he [u] had as an inheritance the moneths of vanitie; yea not only mans life, but also himselfe in regard of his vncertaincy and mortality is called vanity, and that when hee is in his best condition; for so the Psalmist saith, that: euery man in his best estate is (not only in part, and in some respects, but) altogether vanitie: and as though this nothing were yet too much, hee contenteth not himselfe to say, that the children of men are vanitie, but that if vanitie and they were laid vpon the balance, vanitie it selfe would ouer-poyse them: [f] The children of men (saith hee) are vanity, the chiefe men are lies, to lay them vpon the balance, they are altogether lighter than vanitie. The which vanitie, euen an Heathen man being desirous to expresse, thought it not enough to call the life of man a shadow or a dreame, but ioyneth both together, and calleth it a dreame of a shadow. Now if a thousand yeares in comparison of eternitie, be as the Psalmist speaketh, but as yesterday, and as a watch in the night; and as a few drops of raine to the Sea, and a grain of grauell in comparison of the sand, as the Sonne of Syrach likeneth them; then how short and momentany is the life of man being thus compared, which is so vaine, and of such short continuance?

But if we would adde to this momentanie shortnesse of mans life, the frailty and vncertainty of it, whereby we haue no assurance to enioy it so much as a minute of this

ſhort time, the vanity thereof would more euidently appeare. And of this wee need no other proofe but our owne experience, which daily teacheth vs, that as men haue but a ſhort paſſage from the birth, to the vtmoſt confines of an aged life; ſo they ſeldome goe thorow to their iourneyes end, but are cut off in all parts of this ſhort way, with vnexpected accidents. In which reſpect the life of man may fitly be compared to a candle, which whileſt it ſhineth, conſumeth; and as the candle is ſometime waſted with the wind, ſometime quite blowne out, before it bee halfe burned, and ſometime burneth to the end: ſo mans life is waſted with griefes and miſeries, ſometime extinguiſhed by immature or violent death; and though it laſt as long as the naturall heate hath moiſture to feed vpon, yet that being conſumed, like a candle it goeth out of it ſelfe for want of nouriſhment. For how many haue wee knowne in our owne experience who haue beene intombed in their mothers belly, before they did euer ſee the light of the ſunne, and ſo withered in the bud? How many doe wee daily ſee, who ſeeme to enter into the world (as the heathen man vpon the ſtage) that they may goe but againe; as though they came onely to take their leaue, and ſo to bee gone? How many wither when they are in their flouriſhing prime of their infancie and childhood, and (as it were) rot before they bee ripe? How many are taken away in their perfect maturity, death getting the victorie of them in their full ſtrength? and how few are they that attaine vnto old age, which notwithſtanding all doe hope for, though againſt all reaſon in regard of themſelues, and experience in reſpect of others? For would men conſider the manifold ambuſhments, which death daily laieth to indanger our liues; would they but remember how many by-paths leade to this common way, they could not but confeſſe the ſhortneſſe of mans life, and their vncertaintie to continue this ſhort time. For I pray you how many, yea how innumerable bee the cauſes which produce this one effect, ſome whereof are internall, and ſome externall? For ſuppoſe that we were exempted from all outward dangers, which notſtanding doe in whole troups beſiege mans life, yet we continually carrie death in our owne boſomes. For looke how many kinds of diſeaſes there are whereunto mans life is ſubject, and ſo many ſecret enemies doe wee harbour in our ſelues, which fight againſt our liues, and giue death an eaſie entrance. Wee are not too cold, or too hot, without danger; hunger and exceſſe are alike pernicious, ſeruing both as harbingers to prouide death a lodging in our hearts; yea euery ſmall crumbe going awrie, maketh a breach whereby death may enter and ſurpriſe vs. So that wee cannot ſaue our liues by fighting, becauſe wee nouriſh ſo many in vs which are daily ready to betray vs; nor eſcape by flight, vnleſſe wee could flee from our ſelues, ſeeing whether we will or no, we continually carrie the enemies of our liues about, vs yea within vs.

But let it bee ſuppoſed that there were peace at home; let vs imagine that there were within vs no ſecret foe to ſupplant vs, yet how many open and outward enemies are there, which are hourely ready to aſſault our liues; if the great Commander doe but giue ſigne of battell? For to ſay nothing of common calamities, which hang ouer whole common-wealths, as famine, ſword, and peſtilence, which are Gods publicke heralds to denounce againſt vs warre and deſtruction, how many priuie wayes are there wherby death commeth vnto vs, yea we vnto death? For which way can wee turne vs, what action or enterpriſe can wee take in hand, but that there is ſome danger, that death will encounter vs? If wee take ſhip, we are but a few inches diſtant from death, the immoueable rockes, and the mutable winds, the ouerflowing waues, and ſwallowing ſands, the tempeſtuous ſtormes, and ſpoiling pyrats haue our liues at their mercy and command. If we ſtay on the land, wee are daily obnoxious to no fewer perils; if we take horſe, our liues are in danger euery time he ſtumbleth; if wee goe in the ſtreets, looke how many carts and coaches wee meete, yea how many tiles be on the eaues of houſes which wee paſſe vnder, and to ſo many dangers are we ſubject. If wee walke in the countrie, wee are in hazard to bee incountered with brutiſh creatures, and with theeues and robbers more cruell than they. If we retire our ſelues into our well fenced gardens, wee are not there ſecure, for among the ſweeteſt flowers oftentimes lieth hid the moſt hideous ſnake. If we reſt in our houſes in the night, we are in perill of cutthroates and robbers; or though wee were ſafe from theeues, yet we are in danger of all-deuouring fire. If we walke abrode in the day, euery one that hateth vs hath our liues at his command; and as one ſaith, whoſoeuer contemneth his owne life, is maſter of ours. In a word, be we on ſea or land, in Citie or Countrie, at home or abrode, waking or ſleeping; death ſtill like a ſergeant waiteth vpon vs, till he bee commanded by the Lord chiefe Iuſtice of heauen and earth, to arreſt, impriſon, and bring vs to iudgement. Now if any will obiect, that there are many which eſcape the foreſaid dangers, and going through them all vnhurt and vntouched, doe ſafely come to old age and naturall death: I anſwere, that many more doe fall into them; and why may not wee thinke to bee in the greater number? many escape them, but all are subject vnto them; and that which is incident to all, may happen vnto any: finally, many escape some of these perils, but yet fall into others, and though to day they are free from them all, yet to morrow they may be obnoxious to many. By all which it appeareth, that our liues are not only in themselues momentany, but also in respect of outward accidents, and inward infirmities, vncertaine, and full of frailty; in regard whereof the Apostle calleth our bodies earthly houses, which wanting solid matter, and strong principals to support them, are easily ouerthrowne, or of themselues, in short time moulder away; and in the same place hee calleth them tabernacles, which stand not long any where, but are still flitting and remouing. And another maketh them much more fraile and brittle than glasses, which though they bee subject to many casualties, yet may they outlast the longest liuer. What (saith he) is more brittle than a glasse? and yet it may bee so reserued, that it may continue for many ages; for though it bee indangered to a fall or knocke, yet not to a feauer, or old age, whereas we are more fraile, as being subject to the fals and knocks of outward casualties, and though we were free from them, yet time and age weakeneth and wasteth vs; though we could shun outward blowes, yet we cannot auoid our end; though we should be free from outward dangers, yet wee can neuer escape inward diseases. And howsoeuer some may last longer, and some a shorter while, yet all in their appointed time come to their end. Wherein men are fitly compared to the leaues of trees, of which some are blasted in the bud, euen in the spring, some are blowne off with the wind in the middest of summer, and those that continue so long on the tree, doe when autumne and winter commeth, fall of themselues. To this purpose one demandeth: Shall wenotall (saith hee) in a little while be the same dust? doe wee not by the addition of a few more dayes gaine this alone, that wee partly see, partly suffer, and partly act the more euils? and so wee at length also shall pay to nature the common and certaine tribute; by our death following some, and going before others; now bewailing our friends departed, and soone after our selues departing leaue them to bewaile vs; and receiue the kind gifts of teares in as bountifull maner from them, as we haue in our liues bestowed it vpon those who haue gone before vs, &c. For wee are all but a vanishing deame, an apparition that leaueth no signe behind it; dust, a vapour, the morning dew, and a flower of the field, which quickly groweth, and more quickly withereth.

Quiſquis ſuam contempſit vitam tuæ dominatur. Pub. Mimus.

9. Sect. 5.
Of the innumerable dangers vnto which mans life is daily ſubiect.

August. Serm. 1. Tom. 5.

Gregor. Nazianz. in laudem Cæsarij.

But howsoeuer vaine man be so mortall, fraile and momentanie (as I haue shewed) yet is he so blinded with selfe-loue, and bewitched with deluding hopes, that though hee acknowledge all this in the generall, yet hee seldome applieth it to his owne particular; though he can say we are all mortal, yet hee dreameth of his omne immortality; and howsoeuer hee can in his politicke bargaines reckon three of his neighbours liues, at no longer time than one and twentie yeeres, yet doth hee flatter his too credulous heart with this foolish conceit, that his single selfe shall continue to old age, and fill vp the reckoning of three or fourescore yeeres; and that hee continueth long in the same condition, though hee seeth others hasting away, and euen now arriued at the gates of death. As when two boates meet, they which are in the one imagine that themselues moue not; and the other that passeth by them goeth swiftly; whereas in truth they both make alike speed; so men are ready to thinke that though others run towards death with posting haste, yet they in the meane time stand at a stay, and remaine immoueable: than the which nothing can bee more absurd, seeing wee are all cast in the same mould, and are of the same nature and condition, in so much as there cannot be a more liuely and perfect looking glasse wherein wee may see our owne frailtie and mortality, than other men which are of the same quality. So that if wee bee not made blind, deafe, and quite senseless, we cannot daily want examples, and (as it were) schoole-masters which may teach vs this lesson; for who can walke in the Church or places of burial, and not thinke that he also must bee buried? who can see anothers funerals, who is of the same nature and condition, and not conclude his owne mortalitie? who can heare the knels and passing peales for his neighbours, who were some of them yonger, and much stronger, and not thinke them heraulds sent of God, to summon him by death to make his appearance?

But though it were supposed, that wee could now liue the age of Methusolah; and were exempted from all outward accidents, and inward infirmities, which might shorten our dayes; yet all this were nothing in comparison of eternitie; in regard whereof that cannot truly bee said to be long, which one day shall haue an end; neither doe wee slowly attaine vnto that end, from whence wee shall neuer returne, when we are once come vnto it: for how can that bee truly long, which is continually in spending, and the more dayes are added vnto it, the more it is shortened? what firmenesse is in that, which in holding slippeth out of our hands, and is lost in keeping? But such is mans life, from which so much is detracted, as is added vnto it, and the longer it hath laſted, the more it is waſted, and the neerer it approcheth to its end. Now what can bee called long, which by its continuing and being, waſteth and ceaſeth to be? or how can our dayes be many, which grow fewer and fewer by daily multiplication? how can our liues bee ſlow in paſſing, when that time which ſeemeth to ſtay them, drieth them forward to their iorneyes end? In which reſpect mans life is fitly compared to a weauers web; for as the wouen web continually encreaſeth by the addition of threeds, ſo our age by the addition of dayes; but as the more is added to the cloth, the leſſe is vpon the beame, and the more the one increaſeth, the neerer the other approcheth to its end, and cutting off; ſo the more is added to our age, the more is detracted from our life, and the more time paſt is increaſed, the more time to come is ſhortned and diminiſhed. Thus the time of infancie periſheth, when childhood approcheth; and childhood dieth when youth beginneth; and youth paſſeth, when ripe age commeth; and all is loſt & vaniſheth, when old age and death ſeazeth vpon vs. Whereby it appeareth, that our continuance in the world cannot truly bee called a life, ſeeing it is but a continuall paſſage, wherein wee like pilgrimes trauell vnto death; ſo that whileſt wee liue, we daily die, and neuer ceaſe dying till we ceaſe to liue; our life being nothing elſe but a paſſage from life, and a neerer approching vnto death. For from the day of our birth, to the day of our death, our liues are in a continuall conſumption, and no ſooner doe we begin to liue, but we alſo begin to die; for daily ſome part of our liues are taken away, ſeeing all which is paſt, is periſhed, and whileſt our bodies grow and increaſe, our liues decreaſe and are diminiſhed. They therefore are much deceiued, who account the laſt day onely, the day of their death, ſeeing wee die (as it were) piecemeale, and the longer wee liue, the more death ſeazeth on vs, all the time which is already paſt, being loſt and conſumed. And ſo likewiſe they abuſe themſelues, who feeling no decay of health or ſtrength, doe imagine day after day that they are equally diſtant from death, becauſe the alteration which is in their liues, comming by degrees and by little and little, is not ſo eaſily diſcerned. For as their folly were ridiculous, who not ſenſibly perceiuing the going forward of the ſhadow in the diall, or hand of the clocke, would therefore bee perſwaded that it ſtandeth ſtill; for though they ſee not the motion, yet euery houre they may plainly diſcerne, that it hath moued: ſo alike fooliſh are they, who not ſenſibly perceiuing, how far they haue trauelled towards death, doe conclude with themſelues that they ſtand at a ſtay; ſeeing the more dayes are added to their liues, the neerer they approch to their death, though their paſſage cannot palpably be diſcerned. For as thoſe who ſaile in a ſhip, whether they ſleepe or wake, ſit or ſtand, goe forward with ſome deſire to arriue at the hauen, or backe as farre as the ſhip will ſuffer them with a contrary motion, as deſirous to returne, yet they are ſtill going on, and carried whether they will or no, with the motion of the ſhip whither the skilfull pilot ſitting at the ſterne doth giude and conduct them: ſo we being placed in the world, as in a ſea of mortality, are ſtill ſailing towards the hauen of death, and whether we ſleepe or wake, ſtand ſtill or walke, willingly goe forward, or deſire to continue in the ſame place, both when we are in ſicknes, and when we enjoy perfect health and ſtrength, in the lengthening of the ſeaſons of the yeere, as well as when they ſhorten, wee are daily going on as our great maſter doth appoint and guide vs, and whether wee will or no, we muſt ſtill goe forward; and though our motion may bee ſometime inſenſible, yet in truth wee alwayes make alike haſte, and neuer reſt till we arriue at the hauen of death.

Now if we would further conſider (as the truth is) that our liues are nothing in compariſon of theirs who were before the floud, and that they are now limited to the ſhort ſtint of three or foure ſcore yeeres, wee may more ſenſibly conclude, that they are leſſe than a moment, in compariſon of eternitie: eſpecially if wee would account of ſo much time onely of this ſhort age, as deſerueth to be entitled with the name of life: for almoſt halfe a mans life is ſpent in ſleepe, which is nothing elſe, but (as it is called) the elder brother of death; and therefore cannot fitly be added in this our diuiſion, to the tearme of life. Now if out of this halfe that remaineth, wee would ſubduct ſo much time as is ſpent in ignorant and vnprofitable childhood, wherein wee neither glorified God, nor did any good to Church or Common-wealth; ſo much as is conſumed in ſickneſſe of body, and diſcontent of mind; ſo much as is ſpent in doing nothing, or in doing that which is ill; ſo much as is croſſed, and made miſerable, by the ſenſe or feare of ſome outward afflictions, or ſome inward griefe; and then looke onely on that part of time remaining which is ſpent in ioy, peace, contentment & a good conſcience, the which in truth only deſerueth to be tearmed a life, all the other being but branches and degrees to death, wee ſhould eaſily perceiue that our liues might bee meaſured with the ſhort ell of a few dayes. But if we will not enter into this conſideration of the ſhortnes of our liues, whileſt it is paſſing, nor learne this leſſon of our mortalitie, and momen-tany continuance, neither by reason nor experience; yet shall wee hereafter (when perhaps it will be too late to make any good vse of our knowledge) easily both see, and seeing acknowledge it; for howsoeuer time to come may seeme long in approching, and when it is come, somewhat long in spending; yet if wee looke backe vpon it when it is once passed, it vanisheth in the view, and appeareth as nothing. Neither in this regard is there any great difference, betweene that age or time which is long, and that which is short, if we looke vpon them when they are both passed; for as we can take no faster hold on a great shadow, than on a lesse, both alike in a moment vanishing out of our sight; so the longest life, when it is once spent, is all one with the shortest: neither doth it profit or content vs any more, or afford vnto vs better hold for our further continuance, than if we had liued onely to the time of childhood. Now the reason why man, Gods most excellent creature on earth, and created after his owne image, should bee subject to this mortality, and of so momentanie and short continuance, is not originally in the Lord that made him, who being infinit in all eternity, could haue giuen to his creature an euerlasting being; but in man himselfe, who hauing the free choice of death and immortality, chose the worser part, and preferred the path of death, before the way of life. For the Lord hauing threatned man, that in the day which he transgressed his Commandement, he should die the death; he notwithstanding sinned, and so sinning died. And (as one saith) because sinfull man would not stay in the place of true happinesse where hee was created, God would not suffer him to remaine long in the place of his supposed happinesse, where he was fallen: and because he willingly lost his countrey, which he should haue loued, he is vnwillingly drawne out of this place of his pilgrimage, which (though vndeseruedly) he loueth too much.

Q. Sect. 9. That by reason of the shortnes of our liues, all things are momentany and vncertaine vnto vs.

And thus haue I shewed that these worldly things are not much to be desired; because though they were permanent, and would for euer stay with vs, yet we are mortall and momentany, and therefore cannot stay long with them: for though men seeke to eternize their houses, and labour to multiplie their pleasures, so as the matter of them may continue for many ages; and though they turne all their coine into lasting gold, and furnish their houses with most durable stuffe, and haue all their lands in free-hold, fee-simple, and as inheritances for euer; yet all these are but names and titles, wherewith they delude themselues, and the Worlds witchcrafts whereby he intangleth his foolish followers, with sottish loue of these earthly vanities: for though we may prouide lasting lands, yet not enduring liues; though our possessions would remaine for euer, yet our selues are but of momentanie and short continuance, euery day ready to be taken from them; and though the world would make vs beleeue, and our owne deceiuing hearts are apt to perswade vs, that our possessions are fee-simples, and our lands and houses inheritances for euer, yet the truth is wee are but tenants at will, holding all wee enjoy at our great Landlords pleasure. And when we haue gotten the best assurance that we can, yet we are more sure, that we shall hold nothing longer than only for tearme of life; for as we brought none of these things with vs when wee were borne, so wee shall take nothing with vs at our buriall, but as wee found them all in the world, so when we depart, to the world we must leaue them. And this holy Iob confesseth; Naked (saith hee) came I out of my Mothers wombe, and naked shall I returne againe: to which the Apostle alluding saith, that we brought nothing into the world, and it is certaine that we can carrie nothing out: and the Preacher speaking indefinitely of all men, saith, that as man came forth of his Mothers belly, hee shall returne naked to goe as he came, and shall beare away nothing of his labour, which hee hath caused to passe by his hand. And howsoeuer there is great difference in mens estates whilest they continue here, some liuing in prosperity, and some in aduersitie; some in plenty, and some in want; yet (as the authour of the booke of Wisedome affirmeth,) all men haue one entrance vnto life, and alike going out. And this wee may cleerely perceiue in the looking glasse of common experience: for how many houses and lordships doe wee see, that haue (themselues remaining) turned their owners out of doores, and changed them for others, not onely of the same kindred and posteritie, but for strangers to the former family? How many haue wee (with the Psalmist) obserued who haue beene strong in their prosperity, spreading themselues like a greene bay tree, who are now gone, and though we should seeke them, yet wee cannot find them? How many haue wee seene honoured, and in high places, who are now laid low in the graue, and troden vnder their feet, who not long since bowed vnto them, yeelding them at the first sight the reuerence of cap and knee? How many, who haue before time abounded in gold and siluer, houses and lands, who are now stripped of all? and whereas formerly they ioyned house to house, and land to land, as though they could not indure a neighbour, but would (as the Prophet speaketh) dwell alone in the middest of the earth; yet are they now contented with lesse than seuen foot of ground; and to haue a multitude dweldwelling with them in a little place. How many haue wee seene passing their time in pleasures and delights, eating and drinking delicate and costly meates and drinkes, in curious and more costly vessels and plate, spending their dayes in hunting and hawking, laughing, and sporting, dancing, and reuelling, who are now by death stripped of all their ioyes, and in all likelihood haue changed them for torments and miseries, weeping and gnashing of teeth, eternall woe and the horrors of hell? How many haue pampred their bodies, that now are the meate of filthie wormes; and gloriously adorned their backes in rich apparell, that are now couered with rottennesse and corruption, and that haue filled the streets with their sweete smelling perfumes, that now would fill them with a greater stench? And finally, who exceeded all their neighbours in all manner of worldly prosperity, who being now dead together, are all so alike, that no difference at all can bee made betweene them. Looke (saith one) into the graues of these worldlings, and see if you can discerne any print of their passed pride, or any signe remaining of their riches and luxuriousnesse. Enquire now where is their glorious apparell, their externe odours, their delightfull maskes and shewes, their great retinue, and many suters; their costly banquets, loud laughter, game-some mirth, and immoderate and vnbrideled delights? whither are they now all gone, and what is become of them? where is all their worldly prosperity, and where are they themselues? What end is there now of both? Come neere and search their sepulchres, and behold there is nothing but dust, and the filthy reliques of the wormes feast: for this is the end of all humane bodies, as well of those who haue lead their liues in pleasure and delights, as of those who haue passed their dayes in painfull labour. In which respect the world is fitly compared to a stage, and the life of man to a play, lasting a little longer than the ordinarie time. For as in them one acteth the part of a king, another of a beggar, one of a wise counsellor, and another of a naturall foole; and great difference there is betweene them whilest the comedie continueth; but when the play is ended, they are stripped of all their apparel, and hauing acted their parts, & come off the stage, they are all fellowes, and of equall quality and condition: for euen he who is greatest in the world, hath but a short part to act, and when it is done, he must lay aside his glory, and become equall to him who is of least degree. And therefore seeing these glorious worldlings haue not much greater or longer happinesse, than he who acteth his part vpon the stage; let none bee proud of such momentarie felicity; let no man too much loue riches, or hate pouerty, because men are but personated in these worldly habites, and when the enterlude is ended, they will be all alike.

Neither are these worldly things we possesse our owne, but the worlds heire-loomes, which when we are gone, must remaine vnto posterity; for if they were truly our owne, then might we when wee goe, carrie them with vs; but now the world whose indeed they are, when we depart (whether we will or no) will haue them all left behind, and keepeth them still in store to deceiue with them the following posterity, as before they haue deceiued their abused progenitors. In respect whereof the Prophet Habakkuc saith, that the faithful seeing the folly of wicked worldlings, shall take vp a parable, and a taunting prouerbe against them: saying, woe be to him that increaseth that which is not his, (how long?) and to him that inabundance heapeth vp to himselfe thicke clay. For death like a Porter standeth in the gate, when men are to passe out of the world, and causeth them whether they will or no to leaue all behind them; sauing their sinnes which they haue committed in compassing these vanities. For well were it with wicked worldlings, if they could as well leaue their sinne behind them as their sinfull possessions; but this is their miserie, that when their gold forsaketh them, their guilt accompanieth them, and when they are plucked vnwillingly from the things of the earth, whereupon they haue set their hearts, (which goeth as neere them as if their body were pulled from their soule, or their heart out of their body) their sinnes and the gaules of an euill conscience, which they haue gotten in compassing them, by wicked and vnlawfull meanes, doe attend as inseparable vpon their soules, as their shadowes vpon their bodyes, and will neuer leaue them, till they haue brought them to the fearefull tribunall of Gods iudgment, and haue thereby accusing them, caused the Iudge of Heauen and Earth, to pronounce against them the sentence of eternall condemnation.

§. Sect. 10. That the things we possesse are not our owne but the worlds heire-loomes.

And thus haue I shewed that all men are of momentanie and short continuance. Now let vs more specially consider of the breuitie and shortnesse of their liues who abound in all worldly prosperity; for so farre are these worldly things from prolonging our liues, and from establishing them against their their naturall frailty, that they rather cut them off and shorten them, as being the meanes when they are abused by sinne, to bring vpon vs Gods heauie iudgements, and to hasten our death, when we too much let our hearts vpon them. And hence it is that in the Scriptures, there is not only mention made generally of the frailty and momentany continuance of mans life, but more especially pecially of theirs, who abound in all worldly prosperity. So it is said of those who are in honourable place and calling, that their aduancements shall not preserue them from the encounters of death; yea rather it is more ready to shoot at them before others, as being the fairest marke, and greatest conquest. So Eliphaz vseth an interrogation, the more to assure and conuince vs of this truth. Doth not (saith he) their dignitie goe away with them? doe they not die, and that without wisdome? And the Psalmist telleth vs, that man shall not continue in honour (or as the word signifieth, shall not stay in his estate all night) hee is like the beasts that die. This their way peruerteth their foolishnesse, &c. And though in respect of their honourable calling, hee aduanceth them to the glorious title of Gods, yet hee will not attribute immortality vnto them, but telleth them, that though they were Gods they should die like men, and though they were children of the most high, yet they should fall like other men: and else where he exhorteth vs, not to trust in princes, because their breath departeth, and they returne to their earth. So the sonne of Syrach telleth vs, that which we also learne by common experience, that hee who is to day a king, to morrow is dead. And therefore seeing all our policie, power, and endeauours, cannot continue vs in this honourable condition (for though honours should remaine for euer, yet wee are mortall and of short continuance; so that when with all our labour and care wee haue aduanced our selues, and by our proud ambition, haue mounted aloft vnto the highest pitch of worldly glory, wee haue in this state no manner of stay, but when death commeth, and clippeth our soaring wings, we presently fall into the lowest condition, and become inferiour to the meanest liuing creature; for a liuing dogge is better than a dead lyon, as the Wise man speaketh) therefore, I say, let vs not set our hearts on that, with which wee cannot stay, nor yet when wee must leaue it, haue the power to bequeath it to our posterity: for as Iob speaketh, when as hee who is aduanced in the world passeth away, hee knoweth not if his sonnes shall bee honourable, neither shall hee vnderstand concerning them, whether they shall be of low degree: But let vs set our hearts and affections vpon those heauenly honors, and eternall glory, which as they will neuer leaue vs, so shall we neuer be taken frō them.

p. Sect. 12. That the rich mans life is short and vncertaine. Luk. 12.19,21.

And this also is the condition of them who abound in all worldly wealth; for howsoeuer rich men trusting in their idoll the earthly mammon, promise vnto themselues long life, and say with the foole in the Gospell, soule thou hast much goods laid vp for many yeeres, liue at ease, eate, drinke, and take thy pleasure, yet in the same night God is ready to take away their soules, and to place their substance in other mens possessions: Howsoeuer they imagine, that their houses and habitations shall continue for euer, euen from generation to generation, and therefore call their lands by their owne names; yet they shall not continue in their estate, but shall bee like the beasts that perish, as the Psalmist speaketh. So Ieremie saith, that hee who getteth riches and not by right, shall leaue them in the middest of his dayes, and at his end shall be a foole. And in this respect the Apostle Iames compareth rich men, to the flower of the field, which vanisheth away; for as when the Sunne riseth with heate, then the grasse withereth, and the flower falleth away, and the beautie of the fashion of it perisheth: euen so shall the rich man fade away in all his wayes. And this Baruch obserued in the experience of his times; where (saith hee) are the princes of the heathen, that hoarded vp siluer and gold wherein men trust, and made none end of their gathering? They are come to nought, and gone downe to hell, and other men are come vp in their steads. Whereby it appeareth that worldly wealth is no true riches, for then it would make vs eternally happy; nor wee true owners of the things wee possesse; for if they were ours, wee might take them with vs, whereas now we leaue them behind vs, to become for a time other mens, as before they were ours; and that which is truely our owne we take away with vs; that is, either our vertues and graces, to be crowned and rewarded; or our faults and sinnes, to be condemned and punished. Neither will they though they abide with vs, preserue vs from death, that we also may stay with them; for death will not bee bribed, and the God of life and death will take no price for the redemption of our liues; for wee haue nothing to giue but that which is his owne; and though all wee possesse were ours, yet it were not a price so sufficient as would be accepted. And therefore let vs not with worldly men trust in our goods, nor boast our selues in the multitude of our riches; for a man can by no such meanes redeeme his brother, he cannot giue his ransome to God, that he may liue still for euer, and not see the graue. So precious is the redemption of their soules, and their continuance for euer; for wise men die as well as fooles, and leaue their riches for others; as the Psalmist speaketh. Let vs not greedily gape after abundance, seeing a little will serue vs for our momentanie liues; for why should wee ouerburthen our selues in carying such great prouision, for so short a iourney? and our liues being short, why should wee looke after long hopes? Why should we be so eager in gathering, when as wee cannot stay by it when it is gathered?

Psal. 49.11. Ier. 17.11. Baruch 3.17,19. Psal. 49.7.

And

And store vp abundance in a strange Country, where we haue no assurance of abiding so much as a day? If (as the Heathen man well obserued) wee were assured to liue the long age of an Hector Rauon, our greedinesse in gathering were the more to be pardoned; but seeing wee are mortall men, who speedily hasten to old and decrepit age, it is folly and madnesse to dote vpon abundance, seeing we shall consume our hearts with intolerable sorrowes, in scraping that together, which others when we are gone wil riotously spend. How much better were it to part with our riches freely for the loue of Christ, than to be forced whether we will or no, to leaue them by death? how much better were it, seeing we cannot stay with them long on earth, to send them by the hands of the poore before vs to Heauen, where wee shall remayne for euer? For if we keepe them still in our owne custodie, wee shall haue no further comfort in them when the day of death approacheth; for as Iob saith, What hope hath the Hypocrite when hee hath heaped vp riches, if God take away his soule? Finally, if seruing God wee want these earthly riches and abundance, let vs not bee discontented in our selues, nor enuie wicked men who flourish with them, seeing the time is but short, both of our want, and their plenty; for death is hard at hand, and seizing on vs both, will strip them of all their store, and further vs to the possession of our eternall treasures. Be not thou afraid (saith the Psalmist) when one is made rich, and when the glorie of his house is increased; for hee shall take nothing away when he dieth, neither shall his pompe descend after him. The like incouragement another giueth to the godly man oppressed with pouertie. Doest thou see them (saith he) strouting in the streets, and drawing after them their long and rich traines, whereby they raise vp a cloud of dust in the Aire? Let not these things moue thee, for all these they shal lay aside at the hour of death, when as thy vertues and holines shal still accompany thee: they are not their own clothes which they weare: for when death commeth they must put them off, and leaue them behind them; neither shall their glorie descend with them. To the same purpose another exhorteth, Let vs not (saith he) afflict our selues when wee behold the vnexpected prosperitie of worldly men; seeing when we see rich men painted on a Table in all their bravery, & poore men in their rags; we neither admire the one as happy, nor pitie the other as being miserable; & yet these dead pictures are oftentimes of longer continuance than liuing men represented by them. For a painted table may last about an hundred yeeres, when as rich men who please themselues in their abundance, are often taken frō al in a few moneths.

Yea, but this is their comfort, that whilest they liue they shall enjoy their wealth, and when they die they shall leaue it to their heires. It is true indeed that though rich men cannot promise vnto themselues long life, yet they may be assured that they shall haue heires, but if they meane by heires their own children and posteritie, they ground their hopes and comforts vpon a false and deceiueable ground; for howsoeuer men may prouide heritages, yet it is God who appointeth heires: and though they may rake and scrape together riches with a purpose to bequeath them to their friends, when themselues can keepe them no longer; yet oftentimes God with his ouerruling hand so disposes of them, that they neuer enjoy them. For some outliue their heires, and hauing lost their posteritie and kindred, are forced whether they will or no, to leaue vnto strangers the fruits of their labours. Others haue heires vnto whom they leaue their goods, but they are not sure that they shall enjoy them; for the Children doe not alwayes rost that which their Fathers caught in hunting; but as many enjoy those goods which were neuer bequeathed them, so many vnto whom they were bequeathed neuer doe enjoy them, it being onely in their power to giue their riches, and bequeath Legacies to whom they will, but not to maintaine their gift when they are gone, nor to vphold that right vnto which they haue intitled them. And this the Psalmist plainly affirmeth: Doubtlesse (saith he) man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himselfe in vaine; he heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. To the same purpose Iob saith, that though the children of wicked men be in great number, the sword shall destroy them, and his posteritie shall not be satisfied with bread. His remnant shall be buried in death, and his widowes shall not weepe. Though he should heape vp siluer as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay; he may prepare it, but the iust shall put it on, and the innocent shall diuide the siluer. Yea not onely strangers doe often become heires, but sometimes also enemies, and those whom a man in his life most hateth, after his death make a prey of his riches, and scornfully insult in his spoyle. In which respect one saith, that the couetous mans labour is certaine, but the fruit of his labours vncertaine. For hee taketh paines and consumeth himselfe with cares in gathering riches, and after his death his inheritance and possessions come into the hands of his enemies, who haue circumuented him with innumerable treacheries, and taking onely with him his sins, he leaueth his substance to other men. Now what can be more miserable, than to tire and spend a mans selfe with paine, that his enemies may reape all the profit? And to with-hold euen necessaries from ones own vse for the increasing of that wealth which his enemies will spend spend it superfluitie and excesse? In which respect one justly much preferreth the riches of faith and a good conscience, before the wealth of the World. Faith (saith he) labo-Ambros. in Psalm. 8. enarr. Tom. 4. reth for God, and covetousnesse for the tempter; that gathereth such things as profit a mans selfe, this heapeth vp those which profit others. And what more vaine, than to labour for other men, and not know who shall be his heire? For who can tell whether his owne Sonne, or Nephew shall survive him? Seeing the Heire oftentimes goeth before the Testator to the buriall; or out-living him, riotously deuoureth the inheritance, or luxuriously scattereth it; or being foolish cannot defend it; or loseth it by confiscation, yea, oftentimes their enemie is their Heire, and the Successour insulteth ouer the deceased, persecuting those whom he loued, and selling for slaues those whom he tenderly loued. But though he knew who should inherit his labours, and bee sure to haue an Heire of his owne chusing, yet how can hee tell what he will proue? Whether a Wise man or a Foole; a frugall Sauer, or a wastfull Spender; one who will thankfully remember his Predecessour and Benefactour, or one that will forget him, vnlesse it be to censure his infirmities? Finally, whether such an one as will shed gratefull teares at his Funerals, or smile vnder his close Hood? And this the Wise man noted as a great vanitie, which made euen his life bitter vnto him: I hated (saith he) my life, and also my labour wherein I had trauelled vnder the Sun, which I shall leaue to the man that shall be after me. And who knoweth whether he shall be wise or foolish? Yet shall he haue rule ouer all my labour, wherein I haue trauelled, and wherein I haue shewed my selfe wise vnder the Sunne, this is also vanitie, &c. But if these momentany riches, which are thus bequeathed to posterity, haue beene defiled with sinne, either because they haue beene vnlawfully gotten, as by greedie couetousnesse, fraud, deceit, cruelty and oppression; they will not proue greatly beneficiall, either to Heire or Predecessour: for as he leaueth vnto his child his wealth, so also enuie, because he is the offspring of such a Father, and (as it were) a young one of the old Serpent, which though he haue done no hurt hitherto by reason that he is young, yet it is feared he will doe, when he commeth to age, not onely because hee is likely to resemble his Fathers nature, but also hath beene poysoned with his precepts of couetousnesse in his very youth. For as one obserueth, when rich Misers see that they can keepe their goods no longer than for the time of life, they confirme and strengthen their hearts, by reading vnto them Lectures of auarice, making them to become impregnable Castles, wherein their riches may be better vsed after their departure. Yea, oftentimes with their wealth they leaue vnto them Gods heauy anger for their injustice, and wicked getting, or keeping their riches, which burneth against sinners vnto the third and fourth generation, and often consumeth their House and whole Posteritie; and with their sin they leaue their shame and punishment: as the Prophet speaketh: Woe vnto him (saith hee) that is giuen to the getting of vnlawfull gaine for his house, that hee may place his nest vnhigh, and be deliuered from the power of euill. Thou hast consulted shame to thy house, by destroying many people, and hast sinned against thine owne soule. In which respect the couetous man, as he is not much beneficiall to his Heire, so lesse vnto himselfe; for what will it profit him after his momentany fruition of the Mammon of iniquitie, when being cast into Hell fire, and there tormented with intolerable torments, hee shall remember, that hee hath left abundance of wealth to his posteritie? Seeing neither hee nor they, can with all this riches release him from his paine, nor procure so much as a drop of cold water to allay a little his burning heate: For if when wee haue all these goods in our owne possession, they will not ease or comfort vs in the extremitie of the Toothake only, what consolation or refreshing can bee expected from them, being in the keeping of others, when body and soule shall suffer for euer the wrath of God, and the grieuous tortures of the damned spirits?

Finally, though voluptuous men abound in all delights, yet shall they not long enjoy them; for though they were constant, yet themselues are fugitiue, though their pleasures are many, yet their yeeres being few, they cannot long rejoyce in them. So Iob speaking of voluptuous wicked men, saith, that they take the Tabret and Harpe, and rejoyce at the sound of the Organs; they spend their dayes in wealth, and suddenly they go downe to the graue. Neither can pleasures, though they neuer so much delight vs, make our ioyes immortall, or any whit prolong our liues; yea, contrariwise (as I haue shewed) being immoderately vsed, they are the ordinary meanes to shorten life, and to bring vnto vnto vntimely and immature death. But howsoeuer these pleasures of the World are most momentany, both in respect of themselues, and also in respect of vs, yet their punishment when they are abused is not of so short continuance; for when voluptuous men shall leaue their delights, oftentimes in the middest of their dayes, that fearefull woe denounced by Sauiour Christ shal accompany them for euer: Woe be vnto you (saith he) that now laugh, for yee shall waile and weepe. So the Apostle Peter saith, that those who are led with sensualitie, are made to be destroyed; and shall receiue the wages of vnrighteousnesse, as they which count it pleasure to liue deliciously for a season. And therefore seeing these worldly pleasures are so short & momentany, both in respect of themselues and vs, and seeing also their fruition is temporary, and their punishment eternall; let vs not set our hearts vpon them, but rather on those heauenly ioyes, which shall be eternall to vs, and we to them; and hauing with Moses respect vnto the recompence of reward, let vs chuse rather to suffer aduersity with the children of God, than to enioy the pleasures of sinne which shall last but for a season. For who would settle his loue on these flitting vanities? Who would place his affections on worldly pleasures, chambring and wantonnesse, lurfeiting and drunkennesse, delightfull sports and daintie fare, sweete smels and costly rayment, wherby this lumpe of flesh is pleased and pampered; if he consider, that within a while his bodie shall bee the meate of Wormes, his sweet perfumes turned into lothsome stinke, his rich attire into a goose winding sheet, his tender flesh, and faire skin, into rottennesse and putrefaction; and not rather on those heauenly and vnspeakable ioyes, in which wee shall euer ioy, they continuing with vs, and we with them for euermore?

And thus haue I shewed, not only that the World, and the things thereof are momentany and vncertaine, but that wee also are mortall, and our liues of short continuance: by reason whereof nothing can bee vnto vs firme and durable, because our selues, whilest we continue in these earthly Tabernacles are still flitting, and altogether vncertaine of our abode; for nothing is stedfast to him who is vnstedfast, nothing eternall, to him who is fraile and mortall. And therefore seeing we haue no sure hold of the things of this life, let vs not set our hearts vpon them; for though we be called their Masters and Owners, yet wee haue in them but a momentany interest, and though they be with vs, yet they are not ours; seeing we are daily readie to leaue them. Let vs build in earth Tabernacles, and not Mansion houses, seeing wee are still removing, and cannot long stay. We are Pilgrimes here, and therefore we should not set our affections on the earth, and earthly things, where we shall rest (as it were) but one night, and then be gone; but on the ioyes reserued for vs in our owne Country, where we shall remaine for euer. We are now Souldiers in the Campe, and therefore there is neither time nor place heere to build vs Houses, to purchase Lands, to sow, plant, or play the Merchants, with a purpose of continuing here still; only Tents are fittest for vs, till hauing gotten the victory, wee shall with triumph be receiued into our heauenly City: if wee place our treasures heere, we may die in the potrell and so lose all, and therefore let vs make that our treasure, where we shall liue for euer. And as the Apostle exhorteth vs, If wee be risen with Christ, let vs seeke those things which are aboue, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God; and set our affections on things which are aboue, and not on things which we haue on the earth; for wee are dead (in the World) and our life is hid with Christ in God. And for as much as our life is momentany, let vs labour to improue it to the best purposes; and especially before we die, let vs take care that our sins may die before vs. If wee were sure that wee should liue but one yeere, no man would deferre his repentance, but forsaking his former wicked wayes, would betake himself to the seruice of God with all zeale and deuotion; what folly therefore and madnesse is it, to deferre our repentance and amendment, seeing we haue no assurance of liuing a moneth, no not a short minute or the least moment? Why should wee be so frugall of the time which is certaine, and so prodigall of that which is vncertaine? If wee were certainly assured of continuing a yeere longer only, yet wee might with much more safety deferre our repentance to the latter end; but now that our liues are so momentany and vncertaine, that we are not assured of liuing one day longer, what frenzie should so possesse vs, which should cause vs to make any delay of our amendment, vpon which the eternall saluation of our soules dependeth? Let vs therefore whilest this short and vncertaine time lasteth, forsake and mortifie our sinnes and corruptions, that when death taketh vs away, they may not accompany vs to iudgement. Let vs set our hearts vpon Gods spirituall graces, and in comparison of them contemne the World, and worldly vanities; for these will either leaue vs or we them; but they will neuer forsake vs, no not in death; but departing from the World, we shall carrie with vs these rich treasures, and hauing these precious iewels in our hands, wee shall with ioy and comfort meete the Bridegroome, and present our selues in Gods presence, offering vnto him his owne gifts and graces, to bee rewarded and crowned with glory and euerlasting happinesse. Finally, seeing our life is but a shadow, let vs hasten to the Sunne of righteousnesse, that hee with his vitall heate may preserue vs from the cold of this shade: let vs set our hearts vpon him with all loue and affection, and so shall wee be sure for euer to enioy our loue, and in him to find eternall happines and endlesse glory, seeing hee being life it selfe dieth not, and with his quickening Spirit will make vs immortall, and to liue eternally with him who is eternall. Whereas contrariwise, if with the fiue foolish Virgins, we haue not the pure Oile of Gods sanctifying graces shining in our Lamps, we shall be thrust out of the bridall Chamber, and when we would most be

knowne, wee shall heare that fearefull sentence, Depart from me I know you not: if we deferre our repentance, and doe not vse the meanes appointed by God whereby wee may be assured of our saluation. If wee doe not hunger and thirst after Christ and his righteousnesse; and setting our loue and affections vpon our heauenly Countrie, seeke and endeauour with all our powers, to bee enfranchised, and made free Burgesses of the new Ierusalem; these gracious offers will once be pulled backe, and the acceptable time and day of saluation will within a while be passed, neuer again to be recalled. Whilest the vnfaithfull Steward wasteth his Masters goods about his owne pleasures, ruffling it out in his Silkes and Veluets, and reuelling in all delightfull sports & pleasing pastimes; eating and drinking, masquing and dancing, commanding and ouer-ruling all his fellow seruants, euery one enuieth his happinesse, and wish in their heartes that they were like him; but when the day of reckoning commeth, that hee must leaue his place, and giue an account of his Stewardship to a iust and powerfull Master, then all his former pompe and pleasure vanisheth like a dreame, and the meanest of his fellow seruants, which is assured of his owne integritie, and his Masters loue, would not now change with him estates, because his glory is past, and his reckoning to come: And so howsoeuer Gods poore Seruants may for a while enuie the prosperitie of wicked Worldlings, when they see their brauery, abundance and great authoritie and command; yet when the day of their death being come, they are turned out of all, and readie to be haled to the barre of Gods iudgement, to giue an account of his mis-spent talents, and to answere for their cruel tyrannizing ouer their fellow seruants: then they see how much a good conscience is better than earthly treasures, and the assurance of Gods loue and their saluation, to be preferred before the vanishing glory of the World; and now they would not change condition with them, whom not long since they enuied, though they might haue the Monarchie of the whole earth to boot. For alas, what will their passed pleasures, honours and riches, now profit them, when being stript of all, they must giue their account at the Tribunall seat of Gods iudgement, for their often abusing these rich gifts? yea, what misery will it now bee, that they haue beene so happy, when as they shall be forsaken of all, and change their estate, hauing no hope nor comfort of bettering themselues in their letigation? yea, what trembling and feare shall then possesse them, when they leaue that estate which they know, and must change for one which they know not? And when being abandoned of all their delights, they shall haue only their sinnes attending on them; not now disguised and gilded ouer as heretofore, but in their owne vgly shape, and horrible deformitie as lothsome as the Deuill, and as black as Hell? O what would they not now giue to haue their quietus est, and Gods Debt-booke cancelled? At what price would they refuse a good conscience, if it were offered them to sale? how would they now with readinesse strip themselues out of all, to procure the rich Robe of Christ Iesus his righteousnesse, that therein they might with comfort appeare before their Iudge? Or if they die of a spirituall lethargie, and be rocked asleepe of the Deuill in the cradle of securitie, and so carried quietly into Hell, so as they haue no leasure to thinke of these things, or time to entertaine these fearefull Meditations; yet how much more hellish horrour haue they when they are awakened out of their deepe sleepe, with those intolerable torures? O how doe they then besoole themselues, for hauing preferred Temporalties before Eternities, and made sale of their soules, for earthly vanities? What paines would they now refuse, to free themselues out of this damned condition, if they might liue againe? How many Worlds would they now giue, for one houre of that acceptable time, which they haue formerly mis-spent in whole yeeres with careless neglect; that they might therein repent of their sinnes, and so escape that pursuing wrath of God, and those hellish and eternall torments? But all too late, for now the time is past, the sentence pronounced, the gate of Heauen shut, and condemnation, and the fearefull execution thereof begun, which shall neuer find terme or time to end. O let vs therefore now whilest wee haue space, preuent these after-reckonings; and because our liues are momentany and vncertaine, let vs not defer the day of repentance, vpon which dependeth our saluation, but so spend this vncertaine time, that we may be certaine to escape these euerlasting punishments, and to inherit those heauenly ioyes, which being once begun shall neuer end, but bring all glorie without miserie, and felicitie with eternitie.

CHAP. XXX.

Of the great hurt which worldly things bring to their Owners, when they set their hearts vpon them, and first by weaning their hearts from God, and making them Idolaters.

HAuing shewed in the former part of this Booke, that though wee much esteeme, set our hearts vpon, and seeke these worldly things, yet wee cannot by all our loue and labour, bee assured that they

they will being vnto vs any good: it now followeth, that according to my vndertaken proceed, I also proue that they being vnto vs such euill; not in themselues, and in their owne nature; for so (as I haue shewed) they are good; and the blessings of God but through our corruption, whereby we are almost prone to abuse them vnto euill. Neither vnto all men (for vnto Gods children, who haue a right vse of them, they are both good, and also instruments and furtherances of well doing) but vnto carnall Worldlings, who ouervalue, & set their hearts vpon them, seeking them with greater labour and loue, than either Gods spirituall graces, or heauenly ioyes; whereby they turne these blessings of God into curses, and his gracious benefits, into cumbersome burthens, and pernicious euils; as being vnto them the causes and occasions of much sinne and wickednesse. For as God by his infinite goodnesse, doth bring good out of euill; so contrariwise Satan, and our corrupt nature, being opposite vnto him, are readie through their sinfull abuse, to bring euill out of good, and to make those things which in their own nature are helpes and furtherances to all holy duties, and to the aduancing of Gods glory and our saluation; to become prouocations vnto sinne, and the meanes of Gods dishonour, and our destruction. That therefore I may not be mistaken in the following discourse, I would pre-admonish the Reader once for all, that whereas I shew the manifold mischiefes which accompany the fruition of these worldly things, it is not my meaning to derogate any whit from these blessings of God, or to ascribe these euils vnto them, in their owne nature; or finally to proue that they are absolutely vnlawfull in their vse and possession vnto all men indefinitely; but only to shew that they degenerate from their owne nature, and become the occasions of all the ensuing euils to carnall Worldlings alone, when as they esteeme, loue, and seeke them, more than the rich treasures of spirituall graces, and eternall glory. And of these I may truely say with the Prophet, that they doe not only trust in vanitie, setting their hearts and affections vpon things which are of no worth, but also that in thus doing, they conceiue mischiefe, and bring forth iniquitie. In the former respect he compareth the painfull indeuours of carnall Worldlings to the weauing of the Spiders web, which is a worke of great pains, and small profit; for as hee saith, their webs shall be no garment, neither shall they couer themselues with their labours; and in the latter, to the hatching of the Cockatrices egges, which is no lesse painfull, than full of danger: for as the brooding Hen sitteth close vpon these Serpents eggs, and depriueth her selfe willingly not only of libertie, but also of food, that she may bring forth her yong; and after all this labour doth hatch a pernicious brood, who begin their mischiefe with the destruction of her, which hath taken all this paines in bringing them forth: so Worldlings are very laborious in hatching their desires, and in bringing forth the brood of worldly vanities, depriuing themselues of their liked liberty, yea, euen of necessaries for backe and belly; and when all is done (not by reason of any poyson in the things themselues, but only that which they communicate vnto them, whilest they houer ouer them with their greedie desires) they become vnto them deadly stinging Serpents, as being occasions and motiues vnto sin, which will wound them to death, and bring them to eternall destruction of body and soule. For as meate is safe being moderately vsed: becommeth wholsome nourishment, whereby the body is refreshed, and the life preserued; but if it be eaten with a greedy appetite, and in excessiue measure, it oppresseth the stomacke, and becommeth the Mother and Nurse of all diseases: so if wee seeke these things with moderate loue, and in temperate measure, they will refresh and comfort our hearts and soules, so as they will be more cheerefull and strong in performing the duties and workes of godlinesse; whereas if with a greedy desire wee hunger after them, and not contenting our selues with sufficiencie, labour after superfluitie, our soules will be surcharged with a spirituall surfet, and the diseases of sin which bring with them eternal death, will abound in vs to our destruction.

9. Sect. 2. That worldly honours bring much hurt to those who dote vpon them.

Thus howsoeuer Honours and earthly Preferments are (as before I haue shewed) good and lawfull, profitable and to be esteemed with due respect, yet if they be excessiuely ouer-valued aboue their worth, and preferred in our iudgement and affection before spirituall graces and heauenly glory; they presently become not onely vain and vnprofitable to them that thus haue them, but also hurtfull and pernicious. Because ouer-prizing them in their iudgement, and ouer fondly doting on them in their affection, and in both preferring them before those spirituall and heauenly excellencies; they will be accordingly ready at all times, to hazard the losse, yea, to make a voluntarie forfeiture of those things, which in truth are infinitely better, so they may either gaine or retaine these worldly trifles, which in their deluded iudgment, and corrupted affection, they imagine to be of greater worth. For who seeth not that ambitious men immoderately louing, and excessiuely prizing Honours, and the glory of the World, are ready to run headlong into all manner of sinne, and by sinning, to hazard the losse of grace and glory, all opinion of vertue, and hope of happines, either for the compassing or maintayning of their reputation and preferment? For thus they they are ready to raise themselues by others ruines; to honour themselues by dishonoring God; to aspire vnto preferments, by Machiauellian policies; to play the Hypocrites in making a semblance and shew of those vertues and good parts which were neuer in them, and a thousand such like wicked courses, whereby when they haue attained vnto their desired Honours, they are now readie to repeate their lesson againe and againe, and to renue, yea, adde vnto their former wickednesse, as often occasion is offered, to maintaine their reputation, and preserue their honour from impeachment. In regard whereof one exhorteth vs to flee vaine glory and ambition, as being a sweet robber of spirituall riches, a pleasant enemy of our soules, the moth of vertue, a flattering spoyler of all our goods, a coucrer and colourer of deceitfull poyson, vnder the shew and taft of the sweetest honey, reaching out to the minds of men, these impoysoning cups of sinne, whereof if they drinke they eternally perish. To which purpose another saith, that vain glory flieth lightly about as being vain, and of no waight, and lightly and easily pierceth into mens hearts; & yet it inflicteth no light wound, but suddenly killeth, and destroyeth at vnawares.

Basil. Constit. Monast. cap. 11

b. Sect. 3. That riches hurt those who immoderately desire them, by drawing them into all sinne.

Thus also riches are hurtfull and pernicious to those who ouer-value their true worth in their judgements, and setting their hearts vpon them, doe with all greedinesse desire & seeke them, more than Gods spirituall graces and heauenly glory; seeing vnto such they are not onely the Causes and Occasions but also the instruments and meanes of all sinne and wickednes. For they who set their hearts vpon this earthly Mammon, are ready (to obtaine their loue) with Iudas and Demas to sell all their part in Christ and his saluation, to make shipwracke of a good conscience, and of all spirituall graces, to forgoe their right in our heauenly inheritance in Gods Kingdome, and to expose their bodies and soules to temporall and eternall punishments, by vsing all sinfull and wicked meanes to get, keepe, or increase their wealth. In respect whereof the Prophet Dauid maketh couetousnes, and obedience vnto Gods Law flat opposites, which will by no meanes be reconciled and stand together: Incline my heart (saith he) vnto thy testimonies, and not to couetousnesse. And the Apostle Paul doubteth not to affirme, that the immoderate desire of money is the root of all euill; because if men haue it not, they are readie to vse all vnlawfull meanes to get it; if they haue it, they vse the like wicked meanes to keepe it. So that (as one saith) it is a matter of great difficultie to haue riches dwelling with vs, and not to be corrupted with their acquaintance and neighbourhood. The which as it is true of al wealth immoderatly loued, so especially when in respect of quantity it is grown to abundance and superfluitie, for as the Ship when it is ouer-loaded cannot bee kept from sinking in the least tempest, by all the care and cunning of the skilfull Pilot, vnlesse it be vnburthened of some part of its lading: so when our minds are surcharged with these worldly superfluities, is it almost impossible with all our care and vigilance to keepe our soules from sinking into the gulph of sinne, vnlesse we vnburthen our selues of this abundance, by bestowing our superfluities on charitable vses, and in the relieuing of our poore Brethren. In regard whereof one truly saith, that he who addeth to the wealth of a couetous man, giueth Wine to him who is sicke of a burning Feuer, Honey to a cholericke man, banqueting dishes to a sicke and surfeited stomacke; which though they may please the taste, yet they increase the disease, and hurt in stead of helping. For they who abound in riches doe commonly keepe them like the vnprofitable seruants Talent, doing no good with them to themselues or others; or else imploy them in such sinfull seruices, that they were better to haue lien hid still, than to become the instruments of wickednesse, and furtherances vnto sinne. As for example, when they are abused to surfeiting and drunkennesse, and spent vpon Harlots and Parasites, in gaming and reuelling, in excessiue bratery, or in furthering reuenge, oppression and cruelty: for then they become the Harbingers of Hell, and like Pioners, smooth and lay open the way which leadeth to destruction. In respect of which sinfull abuses, the Wiseman saith, that he had obserued, riches reserued to the Owners thereof for their euill: and the sonne of Syrach affirmeth, that many are destroyed by reason of gold, and haue found their destruction before them. And in regard of this harmefulnesse of abused riches, they are by one compared vnto thornes, as our Sauiour Christ also himselfe likeneth them: for as Thornes are barren of fruits, so they of good workes; as they pricke the hands that touch the, so these the hearts that are set vpon them; as they are easily caught with the fire, and are hated of the Husbandman, so these being hated of God, are easily consumed with the fire of his displeasure; and finally, as in them harmefull Beasts, Vipers, and Scorpions doe hide themselues, that they may doe a mischiefe at vnawares; so in these lurke many sinnes and corruptions which daily wound and sting the soule to death eternall. So elsewhere he asketh what happinesse there is in the possession of riches? Vnlesse (saith hee) we account them happy which keepe wilde and sauage beasts, who dare not come neere, nor cannot touch them without feare and trembling: for so couetous men keeping riches, receiue from them, as from cruell

Beasts,

Psal. 119. 36.

1. Tim. 6. 10. Multum est non corrumpi diuitiarum contubernio, Senec. Epist. 20.

Beasts, many hundred wounds in their soules and consciences; although in a diuers maner: for wild beasts doe hurt when they are brought abroade; but these when they are kept within, kill their keeper, and become harmlesse when they are set at liberty. Vpon which manifold harmes happening through the abuse of riches, another groundeth an effectuall dissuasion from louing or seeking them ouermuch. How long (saith hee) will you spend your liues in getting gold, which is nothing else but a snare of soules, the hooke of death, and baite of sinne? How long will yee greedily gape after riches, the vsuall causes of warre and discord? for for their sakes kinsfolkes neuer thinke what nature requireth; brethren behold one another with froward and crabbed countenances; and thirst after one anothers blood; for their sake the Woods harbour theeues, and Cities sycophants and slanderers: who but they are the parents and patrons of lying, and the inuenters and framers of false accusations? what other author is there of periurie and trecherie? and yet they were giuen vs of God, for helpes to preserue life, and not as causes, occasions, and meanes to help vs forward in the course of wickednesse.

Finally, those who esteeme voluptuous pleasures aboue their worth, and set their hearts vpon these vanities, shall in the end find them, not onely vnprofitable, but also hurtfull and pernicious, as being the causes both of sinne and punishment. For hee who setteth his mind vpon these worldly delights, is ready to runne any wicked course for the getting or continuing of them; and to hazard the losse of the ioyes of Heauen, for the obtaining or keeping of his pleasures on earth. Neither are these pleasures vnto them causes onely of sinne, but are also themselues turned into sinne, when as they vse them in excesse, or without moderation; for seeing their goodnesse wholly consisteth in their iust measure, therefore when this measure is exceeded they lose all their goodnes, and become euill and wicked; to say nothing of them which are sinfull, not onely in respect of their quantitie and excesse, but also in their owne nature and qualitie. And as they vsually are the causes and occasions of sinne, so also of punishment; for seeing voluptuous men abuse Gods grace vnto wantonnesse, therefore in his just iudgement, hee turneth their feasts into mourning, and their songs into lamentation, as the Prophet speaketh; & as the Wise man affirmeth, euen in laughing, their heart is sorrowfull, & the end of their mirth is heauines. Neither in truth doe they onely cause after-punishments in the world to come; but also bring with them grieuous punishments euen in this life, as being exceedingly pernicious both to body and soule. For who seeth not that these immoderate pleasures, being loued and imbraced; as surfetting and drunkennesse, chambring and wantonnesse, Venery and filthinesse, doe both deforme the body, and bring it to a monstrous shape, making the eyes red, the cheeks puft vp, or vntimely wrinkled, the teeth rotten, the breath stinking, and the belly swollen; and also doe weaken the strength and impaire the health; loosening the sinewes, making the ioynts and limbs lame, and filling euery seuerall part with grieuous diseases? In which respect they are fitly compared to sweet poisons, which are pleasant in the swallowing downe, but soone after they no lesse torment, than they did before delight, either bringing immature death, or grieuous inward diseases, & outward sores: for so howsoeuer these pleasures doe delight whilest they are in tasting, yet sometime they kill outright, and sometimes bring tedious sicknesses, which torment to death, with grieuous tortures. And yet these euils are small which they bring vpon the body, in comparison of those which they bring vpon the soule; for where they are entertained, they spoile the soule of all vertues and graces (neither will, as one saith, vertue long continue in the kingdome of pleasure) and fill it full of all wickednesse; for as an ancient affirmeth, luxuriousnes hath no end, nor obserueth discipline, but is the seminary and fountaine of all vices. Neither doe I contradict the Apostle, who saith that couetousnesse is the root of all euill, because luxuriousnesse is the mother of couetousnesse; for when a man with riot hath exhausted his owne estate, hee greedily desireth to seaze vpon other mens: to which purpose elsewhere hee saith, that glutonie beginneth first with necessitie, and exceeding measure becommeth pleasure, and proceeding from that which is lawfull, to that which is vnlawfull, it bringeth forth fooliish mirth, filthy scurrilitie, much babling, heauines of the senses, and dulnesse of vnderstanding, &c. and so whilest it delighteth the eyes, and tickleth the eares, it inflicteth deepe wounds into the very soule. In respect of which manifold euils which they bring, both vnto body and soule, they are fitly compared to the locusts in the Reuelation, which haue the beautifull faces of men, the haire of women, and on their heads crownes of gold; but withall they haue the teeth of Lyons ready to deuoure, and teare all in pieces; or like vnto Serpents, which whilest with their beautifull colours they delight the eye, they are ready with their stings to conuey mortall poyson to the heart. The consideration whereof should moue vs with all carefulnes to take heed of these bewitching cups; for though these pleasant drinkes bee sweet in taste, yet shall wee find them deadly poysons in operation; though they delight for the present, they will torment vs hereafter: yea, and that which is worst of all, the pleasure and punishment shall not bee of alike continuance; for that is but momentany, but this eternall; and as one saith, pleasure killeth and vanisheth, woundeth and presently flieth, maketh men wretched, and departeth, bringeth them into miserie, and so leaueth them. Let vs therefore take heed, that we doe not put this Serpent into our bosome; that wee bee not inticed with the hony, to drinke the poyson; that wee bee not allured by the pleasing notes of these sweet singing Syrens, to plunge body and soule into eternall destruction. And finally, that we do not purchase these short delights, with the losse of our eternall ioyes, or the ouer high price of tedious repentance, or euerlasting sorrow. It is now the time of our pilgrimage, and therefore vnfit to bee spent in pleasures; wee are now in our warfare, and therefore wee must not be carpet Knights, pampring our selues with carnall delights, whereby wee arme our enemies, and make our selues sluggish and vnfit to fight; for if earthly Kings thinke the campe vnfit for reuels, and liue in time of warfare frugally and painfully, making themselues an example vnto others, to draw them on to the practice of their strait discipline, and all for the getting or keeping of a worldly Monarchie; why should wee, who are in the Christian warfare, and continually assaulted with most puissant enemies, the diuel, the world, and our owne flesh, thinke this a fit time to spend in surfetting and drunkennesse, reuelling and riot, excesse and wantonnesse, seeing we fight not for a corruptible crowne, or earthly kingdome, but for one which is heauenly and eternall? Now if we would flie these carnall pleasures, wee must take heed that wee doe neuer embrace them, for if they catch hold of vs, they will hardly leaue vs; wee must if it be possible be vtterly ignorant of them, and not so much as know them, that we may not couet them; for howsoeuer it may bee thought a point of more Christian valour to contemne pleasures, when they allure vs with all their baits; yet it is more secure continencie, and a more safe victorie, if we doe not so much as take notice of them. If wee will not hate them, defile vs, let them not touch vs; if wee will not suffer them to allure vs, let vs not admit of their acquaintance, nor heare hee their charmes. Finally, if wee would easily part with them, let vs not by custome incorporate and turne them into our nature; for as an ancient saith, It is one thing not to incorporate those things which are wanting, and another thing to pull them asunder when they are incorporated; for those, like meates, are easily refused; but these, like members, are not cut off without exquisit torments, and intolerable paine.

August. ad Paulinum. Epist. 34. Tom. 2.

And thus haue I generally shewed, that these worldly things are very hurtfull and pernicious to those who ouervalue them in their iudgements, and dote vpon them in their affections, preferring them before Gods spirituall graces, and heauenly ioyes. Now for the better vnderstanding of this point, let vs a little more insist vpon it, setting downe more specially the manifold euils which these worldly things thus immoderatly loued produce and bring forth; all which may serue as so many effectuall reasons to dissuade vs from this excessiue loue of the world and worldly things, seeing it is the mother of such a monstrous brood. And for orders sake I will referre all these euils, either vnto those sinnes which hereby wee commit directly against God, or those euils and mischiefes which through this immoderate loue are caused, both to our neighbours, and our selues. First therefore these worldly things ouer-prised, and excessiuely loued, doe make vs to neglect all dutie towards God, and to dishonour him diuers wayes with many grieuous sins. For whereas wee should cleaue vnto the Lord with all our hearts, louing, trusting, and hoping in him, wholly and solely, as being our chiefe goodnesse, our omnipotent Creatour, our all-sufficient preserver, and most gracious Father in Iesus Christ; this excessiue estimation and loue of the world and worldly things, doth weane our hearts and affections from God, and fixeth them vpon these vanities: for as our Sauiour hath taught vs, this which wee esteeme our chiefe treasure, on that our hearts will bee fixed and seated. It is true that carnall worldlings would faine reconcile these two together, the loue of the world, and the loue of God, diuiding their hearts betweene them, howsoeuer it bee in very vnequall portions, seeing for euery dram of loue which they afford vnto God, they most willingly yeeld to the world a pound. But hereby they discouer themselues to bee but meere hypocrites, which make shew of that which is not in them in truth; and those double minded and double hearted men, of which the Scriptures speake, who hauing, as the Psalmist saith, an heart and a heart, one for God, and another for the World, one for the seruice of their Creatour, and another for the Tempter, are odious and abominable vnto God. For as it is monstrous in the sight of men, to behold one looking with one eye vp to Heauen, and with the other eye downe vpon the earth: so is it no lesse monstrous in Gods sight, to see the heart diuided, one part serving him, and another the world and the Prince thereof. But let such know

Iames 4. Hosea 10. 2. Psalme 12.

know that the loue of God, and the loue of the world are not onely diuers, but flat contraries the one to the other, which cannot possibly in any great degree, continue together in the same subiect; but as the loue of God increaseth, the loue of the world abateth, and as the loue of the world getteth strength, the loue of God is weakened and diminished. And as the same piece of wax will not receiue at once, two prints of diuers seales; but the putting in of the one, is the blotting out of the other; or if through a slight impression, the latter doe not quite doe out the first, yet there is no distinct picture, but a confused mingle-mangle without forme or fashion: so the print of Gods loue, and of the loue of the world, will not at once remaine in the same heart, but the impression of the one blotteth out the other: for if there be an equall mixture of them both, it is an odious botch-porch in Gods sight. To this purpose our Sauiour saith, that wee cannot serue two masters, being so contrary in disposition, wee cannot serue God and Mammon. So the Apostle Iohn telleth vs, that if we loue the world, the loue of the Father cannot abide in vs. Yea the Apostle Iames goeth further, and plainely saith, that the loue of the world is enmitie with God, and that when wee once are the worlds friends, we presently become Gods enemies. And another treading in their holy steppes affirmeth, that hee who is ouercome with the loue of the World, cannot by any meanes take delight in God; and by how much a man burneth in the heate of his desire after temporall things, with so much more damnable numbnesse he freezeth towards those which are spirituall and eternall. Yea let them further know, that though they could bee content to offer vnto God the halfe sacrifice of a diuided heart, he will not accept of it; for of all other parts the Lord is most iealous of the heart, and therefore is impatient to haue any sharing, or to admit any corriuals in his loue; but either hee will haue all, or leaue all to the world and the diuell. So that if we thinke God may be pleased with a diuision, and will gately take his share and goe away, we deceiue our selues; for seeing hee hath created all, and redeemed all, and preserueth all, hee will haue all or nothing; and therefore to denie vnto him a part, is to deny the whole; and to afford him onely some, is to grant and giue him nothing. For well doth the Lord know, that if we be once luke-warme, wee will soone after become cold; if the heart of our loue be chamelion-like mutty minded, it will within a while bee dried vp; and if the force of our affection be enfeebled, it will easily bee ouercome. Besides, it is the nature of loue to transforme the louer into the person beloued, and to knit them together in a most neere bond, that he is no more his single selfe, but as it were a conioyned person, ruled by the same soule. No maruell therefore if (the loue of the world hauing transformed them into it, and made them worldlings) the Lord cannot indure to haue such a co-partner, or to haue his holy image conioyned with this misshapen monster, or to dwell in a corner of that house, whose fairest roomes are taken vp by Satan and the world. To this purpose one saith, that holy delight in the Lord doth shunne that heart which is prepossessed with worldly desires; neither can there bee any mixture of true substances with vaine shadowes, of things eternall with those which are transitorie, of spirituall things with corporall, and heauenly with earthly, that we may at once sauour those things which are aboue, and those which are beneath. So that if wee would tast how good the Lord is, we must first distast these earthly vanities; if wee would be delighted with his sweetnesse, we must first learne to loath the worlds bitternesse, for it is impossible that both should relish well at once, or that our hearts and affections should adhere both to God and the world, who are so farre distant and different, yea opposite and contrary the one to the other.

Bernard. de Ascensione Domini. Serm. 6.

That honours, riches and pleasure withdraw our affections from God.

And as this is true of the world in generall, so also of the things of the world; for whosoeuer setteth his heart vpon any of them, they presently estrange it from God, so as it cannot cleaue vnto him and them too. Thus worldly honours being immoderately loued, doe take away all loue of God, and those who serue this idoll of vaine glory, they cannot bee the seruants of Christ, as the Apostle speaketh. For so much do they thinke of gracing themselues, that they neuer thinke of glorifying God; and so much doe they set their minds vpon their owne credit and aduancement, that they haue no heart to honour the Lord, further than it will stand with their owne preferment and reputation: yea so they may attaine vnto their owne vaine glorious ends, they are ready to set the glory of God to sale, and to dishonour him, that they may honour themselues. So the earthly mammon if it bee affected with immoderate loue, will quickly weane our hearts from God; and if our treasures bee in the earth, it is not possible that our hearts should bee in heauen. For as our Sauiour saith, there is the heart, where the treasure is, there will the heart be also; and if wee serue riches, which is the god of the world, we cannot serue the Lord, the God of Heauen and Earth. If wee set our hearts vpon money wee shall soone neglect our Maker, and bee ready to sell all our interest in Heauen, by committing knowne sinnes, if wee may but a little aduance our worldly

profit. Finally, if wee fix our affections vpon worldly riches, wee will bee at their beck, so that when they command one thing, and God another, wee will bee ready to cast Gods commandement behind our backs, and to yeeld our obedience to our golden idoll; and that we best loue which we most obey: if wee put our affiance in riches, wee cannot trust in God; and therefore the Apostle before hee would haue vs to rest vpon God with sweet content, and to relie our selues vpon his gracious promises, doth first will vs to lay aside auarice, which maketh vs to trust in the creature. Heb. 13. 5. Let (saith he) your conuersation be without couetousnesse, and bee content with that which you haue, for hee hath said, I will not faile thee, neither forsake thee. And therefore if wee would loue our God, wee must not immoderatly loue our gold; if wee would trust in Gods prouidence, wee must not trust in our owne prouision; and if we would set our hearts vpon our Lord and Master, we must make riches our seruants, and not suffer them to haue any rule ouer vs. Now being put to our choice, that our hearts may cleaue to the better part, let vs consider the great difference that is betweene the excellencie of God and riches; this being but earthly trash, and He the chiefe goodnesse, infinite in all perfection; this impotent, and he omnipotent; this transitory, and he eternall. And if (as one saith) the Sunne, which is not the Creator, but a creature, doe so farre exceed gold in beautie and glory; how much more he, who made the Sunne, giuing vnto it (as it were) but the least sparke of his glorious brightnesse, and that not from his essence, but by sole vertue of his Word? Finally, if wee too much esteeme and fixe our affections vpon the pleasures of the world, we cannot take our delight in the Lord, if we be louers of pleasures, wee cannot be louers of God; for whereas they who loue him are carefull to please him by keeping his commandements; these chiefly intending to please their carnal appetites, will not sticke to displease God, to please themselues, and by sinne to prouoke his wrath, so they may procure vnto themselues some carnall delight. And thus the voluptuous wanton so wholly setteth his heart vpon his harlot, that hee seldome or neuer thinketh on God, and sticketh not to displease him in any thing, wherein he may giue her contentment. And thus the glutton and drunkard onely mind their bellies, and set their hearts vpon pleasing meates, and dainty drinkes; and so by withdrawing them from the Lord, the authour and giuer of all these blessings, they make to his place a God of their owne bellies, as the Apostle speaketh. And because where their idoll is, there also must bee their hearts; therefore it is said, that the glutton (like the fish which the Philosopher calleth the seasse) carrieth his heart in his belly, and not in his breast like other creatures.

Seeing therefore the world and worldly things being esteemed aboue desert, and loued out of measure, doe steale our hearts from the Lord, separating them here from his grace, and hereafter from his glory, let this serue as an effectuall reason to moderate our affections: and seeing, if the loue of the world doe remaine in our hearts, the loue of God will not enter into them; let the better haue preeminence of place, dislodging the loue of the world, that the loue of God may dwell with vs; for if wee draw our hearts drie of this worldly loue, Gods loue will spring vp in the place, and repleniſh vs with sweet delights. We are vessels naturally full of the liquor of carnall loue, and emptie of that which is diuine and spirituall, & therefore wee must powre out that we haue, that we may receiue that we haue not: naturally wee are carried downe the streame with the loue of worldly things, and there is no stay, vnlesse wee will catch hold of the true tree of life, and cling vnto him with a liuely faith, that so wee may not bee caried downe with this violent, or rather naturall motion. Which that we may doe, let vs consider, that whatsoeuer goodnesse, beautie, or excellency there is in the creatures, in some small measure, and for some short time, they are infinitely and eternally in the Creatour; and therefore though our hearts were inflamed with a whole world of loue, yet in comparison of him, they could not deserue the least sparke of our affection. Againe, let vs remember, that if wee set our hearts on these worldly things, we exceedingly abuse these gifts of God, and himselfe also who is the authour of them; for he gaue them vnto vs, not that our hearts should cleaue vnto them, and our loue be seated on them, but that as by his gifts and messengers hee might woo our loue vnto himselfe, who is such a bountifull suter; not that wee should rest in them as in our paradise, but that they should be comfortable companions of our iourney, and that receiuing them by faith, (the hand of the soule, as well as with the hands of our bodies) they might bee vnto vs pledges of his loue, earnest pennies of our heauenly inheritance, and as forcible arguments taken from the lesser to the greater, whereby wee might be moued with all earnestnesse to desire his glorious presence, and the ioyes of his kingdome; thus concluding with our selues, that if there bee any thing on earth worthy our loue, how infinitely more excellent and amiable is God, the authour of all their goodnes, & those ioyes which he hath prepared for vs in our owne Country? Or if

if we cannot, being tied with our sences vnto things present, set our affections wholly in Heauen, nor altogether fixe our hearts and minds vpon God, the author of all our good, because they are pulled downe from this the pitch of heauenly meditations, with the weight of our worldly necessities; yet at the least let vs imitate the Eagle, which stretcheth all her delight in soaring aboue the clouds, and in looking vpon the Sunne, and seldome stoopeth, but when hunger compelleth her to seeke after her prey: so let our conuersation be wholly in Heauen, and let vs take our chiefe delight in contemplacing the beautie and excellencie of the Sunne of righteousnesse, and King of glorie, neuer suffring our hearts and minds to rest longer vpon earth, than the necessities of nature doe constraine vs. And seeing wee cannot leaue the world altogether, yet (as one perswadeth vs) let vs so take hold of it, that it doe not take hold of vs, and so possesse the things of the world, that wee bee not possessed of them; let vs haue them vnder the rule, and at the command of our minds, that they doe not imprison them on earth in the slauish bands of carnall loue. Let vs haue earthly things in our vse, but heauenly in our desires; let them serue as helps in our iournie, but let vs reserue those eternall ioyes, as our chiefe hopes for our iournies end; let vs looke vpon worldly benefits, onely on the one side, as passing by them; but let the eyes of our soules be firmely, and with all intention fixed before vs on our heauenly happinesse, vnto which wee are trauelling. Finally, if the earth for a time must needs haue our bodies, yet let God haue our hearts and minds; and though we bee constrained to vse the things of the world, yet let vs take heed (as the Apostle exhorteth) that wee doe not abuse them vnto sinne, by setting our affections more vpon them, than vpon God himselfe, and the riches of his Kingdome.

The second maine sinne directly against the maiestie of God, which these worldly things ouervalued, and immoderately loued, doe cause vs to fall into, is that capitall sinne of idolatrie, whereby men as much as in them lieth, pull God out of his royall throne, and treasonably set vp in his place another Lord and King, to whom they acknowledge their fealty and allegeance. For when worldlings excessiuely dote vpon the world and worldly vanities, they erect them for their idols in the shrines of their hearts, and giue vnto them diuine worship. And in this regard, the Apostle Iames calleth worldlings adulterers, and adulteresses, because they commit this spirituall whoredome with the things of the world, adoring, loueing and trusting in them, more than in God himselfe. The which sinne is committed by worldlings, either properly and grossely, when as they worship idols of gold and siluer; an example whereof wee haue in the Israelites, of whom it is said, that as they abounded in these rich gifts of gold and siluer, so they multiplied their images: or as they bee hired with his wages of iniquitie, to commit idolatrie with these abominable idols made with hands, chusing rather to fall downe before them, and adore them with diuine worship, than they will bee depriued of their worldly profit and aduantage. An example whereof we haue in Demetrius, who worshipped the idoll Diana, and ragingly persecuted the Apostle Paul, not so much for loue to the image, or hatred to the Apostles person or doctrine, as because his idolatrie was aduantageable to him, and brought in with it earthly gaine and profit. Or else worldlings commit this idolatrie more improperly and couertly, when they displace God out of the temple of their hearts, and in stead of him set vp their idols of the world and worldly vanities, by setting their affections wholly vpon them; in which respect this may bee fitly called, the idolatry of the heart and affection, as the former was the idolatrie of the mind and iudgement. And this idolatrie is committed by worldly men, when as they loue these earthly vanities more than God himselfe, taking more care and paines both in getting and keeping them, and being more afraid of forgoing them, and more grieued for losing them, than for the enioying or losing of Gods fauour in this life, and his glorious and ioyfull presence in the life to come. So also when they put their trust and confidence in these worldly things, for the furnishing of them with all things which they desire, and for the freeing and deliuering them from all dangers, for howsoeuer these are rotten props to rest vpon, and weake helpes in time of need, yet so willing are men by nature, in the pride and sensualitie of their hearts, to leaue their dependancie vpon God, and to depend vpon themselues, and visible meanes; that when they haue in plentie and abundance these earthly things in their possession, they are readie to relinquish God, and to trust in their owne prouidence and prouision, to blesse themselues in the fruition of their store, and thereby to thinke themselues safe and secure from any dangers. The which idolatrous confidence, as it doth raigne, and wholy beare sway in carnall worldlings, who so onely rest in worldly things, that they are most confident when they haue them, and most desperate when they want them; so it sometimes taineth Gods dearest seruants; as we may see in the example of the Prophet Dauid, who being in prosperitie, so farre presumed vpon the strength strength of his state, that he concluded with himselfe, he should neuer be mooued. For which vaine confidence God seuerely punisheth, by breaking the staffe of their assurance when they most rest vpon it, and making their hopes to faile. According to the saying of Bildad: The hypocrites hope shall perish, his confidence also shall be cut off, and his trust shall be as the house of a spider. So holy Iob saith, that the eies of the wicked shall faile, and their refuge shall perish, and their hope shall be sorrow of mind.

Iob. 8. 14. & chap. 11. 20.

9. Sect 9. That ambitious couetous, and voluptuous men are idolaters.

But this idolatrie which worldlings commit, by setting their hearts too much vpon worldly things, may better appeare if wee consider the speciall instances. For who seeth not that the ambitious man loueth his honours and preferments better than his God? for he is readie so he may get them, to lose his loue, and preferreth the fauour of men before the fauour of God; not caring how often he sinneth against both his knowledge and conscience, so he may hide his sinnes out of the sight of men, and by them compasse his ambitious desgnes. So also being aduanced to authoritie and power, in the pride of his heart he neglecteth God, and trusteth in his owne might and greatnesse; for supply of all that is good, and deliuerance from all which is euill. According to that of the Psalmist: The wicked is so proud, that hee seeketh not for God. So when men set their hearts vpon carnall pleasures, they fall into this grieuous sinne of idolatrie, louing their pleasures more than God, and not caring to displease him, so they may please themselues. But aboue all other things, riches immoderatly loued plunge men into this sinne, making them to commit spirituall whoredome with this earthly mammon, and vtterly neglecting the Lord who hath inriched them, and that seruice which they owe vnto him, they are ready to make their getting of riches their religion, gold their god, and gaine their godlinesse, as the Apostle speaketh. And this the Psalmist plainely affirmeth, that when the couetous man hath gotten store of riches, hee blesseth himselfe in his abundance, and contemneth the Lord. In which respect, the couetous person is called an [a] idolater, and [b] couetousnesse idolatrie. Yea of all other idolatrie, it is the most contemptible and base: for whereas other men adore the Sunne, Moone, and liuing creatures, or else some glorious image, of some excellent man; they adore a dumbe and senselesse creature, which is their owne slaue, to be disposed of at their command. And this idolatrie couetous men commit, when they set their hearts vpon riches, more than vpon God, or the riches of his kingdome; as when they loue them better than him, taking more pleasure in their wealth while they haue it, than in the Lord who hath inriched them, and more sorrow when it is taken away, than for the losse of Gods loue and fauour. Or when they repose more confidence in it, either for the procuring of the good they want, or for deliuering them from the euill they feare, than in God omnipotent and all-sufficient: a sinne which is most commonly committed by carnall worldlings, as the Psalmist also obserued: They trust in their goods (saith he) and boast themselues in the multitude of their riches. So the Wise man saith, that the rich mans riches are his strong Citie; and as an high wall in his imagination. Vnto which vaine confidence wee are so prone naturally, that the Psalmist thought a caueat necessarie, that if riches did increase, wee should take heed that wee doe not trust in them; and the Apostle thought it needfull, that rich men should haue this waightie charge laid vpon them, that they should not trust in vncertaine riches: Because vnlesse an extraordinarie measure of grace preserue them from falling into this sinne, it is impossible for men to abound in wealth, and not to put confidence in it. Whereof it is, that Iob in his great affliction comforteth himselfe, in the assurance of his integritie and faithfulnesse, by calling this to mind, that he had not made gold his hope, nor said to the wedge of gold, thou art my confidence. And the sonne of Syrach maketh a note of a man so blessed and admirable, that hee is hardly to be found, but when he is found, much to be commended. Blessed (saith hee) is the rich, who is found without blemish, and hath not gone after gold, nor hoped in money and treasures. Who is he, and we will commend him? for wonderfull things hath he done among his people. Who hath bin tried thereby, and found perfect? The consideration whereof should make rich men carefull, that by their abundance, they be not drawne to the committing of this idolatrie. To which purpose, let them remember that the Lord being dishonoured hereby, is alwayes ready to frustrate their hopes, and to cause their confidence to faile: so the Wise man saith, that he who trusteth in his riches shall fall. Neither shall they steale this Fall vnseene, but they shall bee cast downe with shame and dishonour in the sight of the faithfull, and they who formerly enuied their prosperity, shall now laugh to scorne their deserued miserie. For so the Psalmist saith, that the righteous beholding the destruction of the wicked, shall laugh at him, saying: Behold the man that tooke not God for his strength, but trusted to the multitude of his riches, &c.

CHAP. XXXI.

Worldly things make men forgetfull of God, vnthankefull, proud, contemptuous, slothfull, and negligent in the duties of Gods Seruice.

THirdly, the World and worldly things, being excessiuely esteemed, and ouer-fondly loued, doe worke in vs likewise forgetfulnesse of God; for howsoeuer Gods gifts should put vs in minde of the giuer, and his manifold mercies vouchsafed vs in the fruition of these earthly benefits, should serue as continuall remembrancers to put vs in mind of him, who hath beene so gracious vnto vs: yet through our great corruption, the more of these temporall blessings wee receiue from God, the lesse we thinke we need him, and the seldomer wee remember him: like the prodigall child, who all the while he was in prosperitie, and had money to spend in superfluities, neuer remembred his bountifull Father, from whom he had receiued this rich portion; but when all was spent, and hee brought to want and penurie, then he commeth againe fresh vnto his memory, and hath a desire to returne vnto him. An example whereof wee haue in the Israelites in the time of the Iudges, who when they had the World at will, forgot the Lord, and serued Idols; but when for their sinnes, they were deliuered into the hand of their enemies, they againe remember, and returne vnto him. So afterward the Lord by his Prophet complaineth of them, as in their pastures, so were they filled; and their heart was exalted: therefore they haue forgotten me. And hence it is, that the Lord foreseeing that these would be the fruits of their prosperitie and abundance, is so carefull in giuing them warning of it, that they might not thus be ouertaken. When (saith he) the Lord thy God hath brought thee into the Land which hee sware vnto thy Fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Iacob, to giue it to thee, with great and goodly Cities which thou buildest not; and houses with all manner of goods, which thou fillest not, and welles digged which thou diggedst not, Vineyards and Oliues which thou plantedst not; and when thou hast eaten and art full, beware lest thou forget the Lord, &c. So elsewhere; when thou hast eaten, and filled thy selfe, thou shalt blesse the Lord thy God for the good land, which he hath giuen thee. Beware that thou forget not the Lord thy God, not keeping his Commandements, &c. And thus worldly honours make men to forget the Lord, who hath aduanced them, and to say with Pharaoh, Who is the Lord that I should heare him? And with Nebuchadnezzar, Who is that God that can deliuer you out of mine hands? Neither is it any maruell that they thus forget God in their ruffe and iollity, seeing their pride so ouershadoweth their memories, that they are ready to forget themselues, aspiring vnto Diuine Honours: as though they were Gods, and neuer remembring, though their memories bee rubbed with so many frailties & infirmities, that they are but mortall men. Thus also abundance and superfluity of riches doth make men ordinarily to forget God, as the Wise Agur insinuateth in that Prayer: Giue me not riches least I be full and deny thee, and say, who is the Lord? For so vnthankfull we are, that the more we haue, the more we forget the tree, & the pleasure it renders the fountaine from which they come; neither are we longer mindfull of God, than whilest our necessities constraining vs, wee implore his helpe. But aboue all other things in the World, carnall pleasures are apt to worke in those forgetfulnesse of God, who doe enjoy them; for whosoeuer drinke a deepe draught of these sweet waters of carnall delights (as it were of the lethe of oblition) their heads are so intoxicated with these bewitching cups, their senses so benummed, and all the faculties of their soules so stupified and deaded, that they neuer call the Lord to their remembrance, but like beasts wallow in their delights, and haue their hearts and minds oppressed, yea, buried in their carnall pleasures.

Prou. 30. 8.

Sect. 3. That worldly things abounding, make men vnthankfull towards God.

The fourth sin against God, which these worldly things immoderately loued, doe commonly plunge worldly men into, is vnthankfulnesse towards God for all his gifts and blessings; the which is a fruit of the former: for when men are forgetfull of their benefactour, they must needs be also vngratefull for his benefits; and that in the worst kind; for so farre are they from returning thanks, that they giue so much as thinke of him to whom they are so greatly beholding. Besides (as I haue shewed) the more that wordly men abound with these earthly things, the more their concupiscence is increased, & the more eager they are in seeking after more. The which is a notable hinderance vnto their thankfulnesse; for they who haue their minds wholly set vpon that which they haue not, do not remember what they haue, much lesse doe they thinke of returning thankes to their great benefactour; yea, they are ready rather to murmure for that they want, than to bee thankfull for that which they haue already receiued. Whereas contrariwise if wee should but remember the blessings which we doe from God daily enjoy; there is no man in the World so poore in his gifts, who might not find rich matter of praise and thanksgiuing, especially if hee would cast his eye, not on those who are preferred before him, but on those to whom he is superiour; nor on the things which hee wants and others enjoy, but on those which he

he enjoyeth, and they want. But so vnthankfull our corrupt nature is, that wee haue alwayes our finger vpon our sore, and our wants and grieuances in our memories, yea, and commonly the fewer they are, the greater is our repining, complaining that we haue nothing, if we haue not all: and the more rich wee are in Gods blessings, the poorer commonly we are in thankfulnesse. And whereas in reason, we should (as vnbling golden vessels) reflect from gratefull hearts, the beames of Gods shining benefits, with vnfained thankfulnesse, and multiply our prayses and thanksgiuing, the more God multiplyeth his gifts vpon vs; contrariwise wee are most gratefull when we receiue his benefits with a sparing hand, and better esteeme them, when wee enjoy them but some few dayes in the yeere, than if we had continuall vse of them throughout our whole liues. And as our eyes doe worse see those obiects which are closest to them, and those better which in a conuenient distance are remoued from them; so wee are most blinde in seeing and acknowledging those benefits which wee hold close in our possession, but better sighted when they are a little remoued from vs. By reason of which our grosse ingratitude, the Lord is faint to pull from vs some of his gifts, that wee may be thankfull vnto him for the rest; to withdraw them for a time, that wee may learne better to esteeme them for euer afterwards: and to deprive vs altogether of some of his benefits, that wee who neuer thought of them, whilest we had them, may giue them deserued prayse at parting; and that wee who were not thankfull for that which we esteemed not whilest wee had it, may by the want learne the value, and duly esteeming it, may now be thankfull, if it be restored againe; or if not so, yet at least because once wee had it. And thus Rehoboam was more thankfull because hee had two Tribes left vnto him, than when hee raigned ouer all the twelue. And Manasses returneth prayse to God for his restoring, who neuer thought of Gods mercy before he was restrained. Yea, who may not obserue in his owne experience, that the more men abound in all worldly prosperitie, the more vngratefull they are vnto God for his blessings; and that where hee soweth the most seed of his rich benefits, there hee commonly reapeth least fruits of thankfulnesse? Who seeth not that they who are in honourable callings, take least care to honour God? And whereas they being aduanced aboue others, should as much excell them in thankfulnesse, as they doe in place; and in a liuely acknowledgment of his mercies towards them, should confesse his goodnesse before the sonnes of men, and being set in their high places, should like Lights, shine to the glory of God in their liues and conuersations; they commonly are more vnthankfull than those, who are in the meanest condition, and become examples and precedents of all sinne, and in stead of acknowledging the mercy of God in their honour and preferment, are ready to rob him of his glory, and to attribute all, either to their Progenitours, the fauour of their Prince, or their owne wisedome and well deseruing. So who are more vngratefull vnto God, than those who most abound in riches? For so farre are they for the most part from desiring to shew their thankefulnesse in disposing of their riches to the glory of God that gaue them, in aduancing the meanes of his seruice, and in the workes of Charitie, that they seldome so much as in their hearts acknowledge him for the authour of all their welfare, but kisse their owne hands, sacrifice to their nets, and burne incense vnto their yarne; because by them their portion is fat, and their meat plenteous: attributing vnto their owne wits and indeuours the prayse of all which they possesse, as though by them alone they had ourstripped others, and made themselues owners of this plenty. Finally, who are lesse thankfull vnto God, than they who enjoy most pleasures, and euen wallow themselues in worldly delights? For so wholly are they taken vp with their sports and pastimes, that they haue no time to consider how gracious the Lord is, nor how in his mercies he doth abound towards them; & so are their minds, hearts, and affections fettered with their sensualitie, and belimed and clogged with these carnall pleasures, that they are not able to lift them vp to Heauen in any holy meditation, or to returne true thankfulnesse vnto God, as being the fountaine of all their good. By all which it appeares, that these worldly benefits doe rather hinder, than further vs in thankfulnesse towards our benefactour, and consequently remaining vngratefull debtors, who are not willing so much as to returne thankes for payment, wee deriue vnto our selues, the just displeasure of our Lord and Master, and bring vpon vs a fearefull reckoning against the day of his appearance, of which wee might be discharged, if we would but thankfully owne the benefits which we haue receiued. In regard whereof one saith, that from these earthly good things when they grow great, there doe arise great euils, when as being preferred before others in the vse of our Masters talents, wee doe vse his gifts, as not giuen, returning no glory to our benefactour. For so those who seemed greatest in respect of Gifts receiued, for not returning thankes, are reputed least in Gods estimate, &c. Yea, in truth, by so much a man is worse, by how much hee is better, if hee ascribe vnto himselfe that whereof he is deceiued, and so rob God of his deserued prayse: euen euen as he is the greatest malefactour, and worthy of most punishment, who hath most goods in his possession, if he hath couetously gotten them by theft, and by defrauding others of that which in right belonged to them.

The fifth sinne against God accompanying prosperitie and worldly abundance, is pride, whereby men are ready to aduance themselues euen against God, and to grace themselues by his dishonour: for whereas the more wee are inriched with Gods blessings, the more humble we should be vnto him, as standing indebted to his bounty in such great summes (for what haue we that we haue not receiued? And what haue wee receiued, of which wee shall not one day giue an account?) yet so foolish we are, that the more we are indebted, the more we insult in pride, and that not only towards those, with whom we stand vpon equall termes, but euen towards God himselfe who is our Creditour, and may euery houre call vs to a reckoning, and condemne vs for default of payment. Thus the Psalmist obserueth, that pride and plentie did commonly goe together. They are (saith he) inclosed in their owne fat, and they haue spoken proudly with their mouth. And elsewhere he saith, that because wicked Worldlings were not in trouble like other men, but flourished in all plenty and prosperitie, therefore they put on pride as a chaine about their neckes, esteeming it no disgrace vnto them, but a chiefe ornament: and not content to carry themselues aloft in this high pitch amongst men, they are ready (as hee saith) to talke presumptuously against God, and to set their mouthes against heauen. The which practise wee also may obserue in our times, among the ruffling gallants of the world, who hauing bin alwaies nursed in the lap of prosperity, & had all things which their hearts could wish, are ready in lieu of thankfulnesse towards God, to despite him (as it were) to his face, and to pull him out of his throne by their oathes, blasphemies, and bitter execrations. Whereby it appeareth that pride bordereth vpon prosperitie, and that these worldly vanities, though they doe not truly nourish vs, and make vs grow in substantiall goodnes, yet they puffe vs vp, and make vs swell with the wind of vaine glorie; & the greater our earthly abundance is, the the greater commonly is our tumour, and consequently the greater is our torment: this spirituall swelling being to the soule, like the swelling of wind to the bodie, which (as I haue shewed) tortureth, but doth not satisfie. Yea so forcible is this prosperitie, and abundance of earthly blessings in drawing men to this sin of pride, that it preuaileth not only with Heathens, Infidels, and worldlings; but euen with Gods faithfull seruants and deare children. Of both which we haue many examples; as of Pharaoh, who in the pride of his heart opposed against the knowne will of God; and in Nabuchadnezzar, who beholding all his pompe, glory and riches, attributeth the praise of all vnto himselfe, and robbeth God of the glory due vnto him, vaunting himselfe in the pride of his heart, and arrogantly bragging: Is not this great Babel, that I haue built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Maiestie? So it is said of Vzziah that finding the Kingdome in a perplexed estate, he did vprightly in the sight of the Lord, and sought vnto him, for which when the Lord had made him to prosper, and to waxe strong, his heart was lifte vp to his destruction, and hee transgressed against the Lord his God. Yea, good Ezechias was thus ouer-taken, waxing proud of his great prosperitie, and vaunting himselfe in his rich treasures: and holy Dauid himselfe, who had professed that his heart was not haughtie, nor his eyes lofties, but that hee was become humble like a little childe, was after this puffed vp with his great prosperitie, and in the pride of his heart numbreth the people. By all which it plainly appeareth, that worldly plenty is the Nurse of Pride; for as fat commeth of the superfluitie of nourishment, whereby the body is made bigger, but not better, either in health, strength, or nimblenesse; yea, rather it is the Nurse of many diseases, and maketh the body pursie, vnweldie, and vnfit for action: so this swelling of pride riseth from the superfluous abundance of wordly benefits, and maketh a man greater in his owne conceit, but not in true worth; for the soule is not thereby sounder in grace, or stronger and more actiue in the duties of pietie; yea contrariwise, this swelling of pride maketh way for all spirituall diseases, and causeth him who is infected withit, to be more sluggish and slothfull, vnweldie and impotent in all actions and duties of pietie and Christianitie.

Thus the greatest honors bring with them the greatest pride; and though a man climbe neuer so fast vpon the ladder of preferment, yet his proud heart will still be one step at least aboue his estate; yea oftentimes these earthly aduancements make the pride of men to mount so high, that they doe not only in their ambitious conceits and desires ascend vnto the clouds, and touch the heauens; but euen presume to approch vnto the throne of God, and to rob him of his glorie, that they may set the crowne vpon their owne heads. Thus Cæsar magnified by the people for a prosperous expedition by sea, wherein he had the victory ouer a few ships, magnified himselfe much more in his owne conceit, & was content to be called the god of the sea. So Demetrius being aduanced to a kingdome, would needs equall himselfe with God, and be be called Iupiter; neither must now Ambassadours come vnto him as vnto other Kings, to conferre of state businesse, but as vnto a God they must send to enquire of him, and take all his answeres for Oracles. So Alexander, Nebuchadnezzar, and diuers of the Romane Emperours, arrogated vnto themselues diuine Honours, and would needs haue their Statues worshipped; being so blinded with ambition, and surfeited with pride, that they forgot their mortalitie; and became Cotriuals with God himselfe in his honour and glory. The like may bee said of abundance of worldly riches, which are the bellowes of vaine glory, and the common causes of pride against God, who is the Author and fountaine of our wealth and welfare: whereof it is that the Lord so carefully admonisheth the Israelites, that when they should through his bountifull blessing abound in riches, they should take heed that their hearts were not lifted vp with pride, and that the Apostle would haue rich men so straitly charged that they should not bee high minded. And this is the cause why pride is vsually called the worme of riches, which breeding in them, eateth out all their goodnesse, and maketh them euill vnto vs, which are good in their owne nature; and hurtfull and pernicious, which in themselues are profitable and beneficiall. So the Sonne of Syrach saith, that riches lift vp the mind; and Salomon telleth vs, that the rich man is still wise in his owne conceit, though a poore man of vnderstanding can try him and discerne his folly. To which purpose one saith, That there is nothing so much to be feared in riches as pride, and that wee are not to feare riches themselues, but pride which is the disease of riches: for that mind is of great vertue and magnanimitie, which in the abundance of riches is not infected with this disease, and being in an high estate, is not also high-minded. Hee is a rich man truely great, who doth not therefore thinke himselfe great, because hee is rich, whereas hee who taketh all his worth from his wealth, may be truly said to be full of pride, but empty of goodnesse and desert; a boaster outwardly in his words and lookes, but inwardly a begger in his minde and heart; swelled and puffed vp with vaine glory; but not full and solide in vertue and true worth. And yet this empty pride swelleth and puffeth vp, as much as any other; and is full of insolencie, though in respect of the ground and cause thereof, it bee in truth most base and contemptible. For as the pride arising from the bodie is more base, than the pride which is grounded on the gifts of the soule, so the pride of riches which are no part of the person, is more base than the pride of bodily gifts; because being seated and grounded on those things without a man, which are farre inferiour to the gifts either of minde or bodie, they who are proud of them plainely shew, that they haue nothing within, and in their owne person, worth respect; or else they would neuer be proud of those things which are without, seeing a man alwayes groundeth his pride on those things, wherein he thinketh he most excelleth. The which if men would duly consider, they might well lesse this contemptible pride, if not because it is a sinne, yet at least for shame, seeing it doth discouer their vanity and worthlesnesse. For who would not blush to seeme proud of outward accidents, which may be wonne and lost, and (as one saith) bought and sold on the Mark-Hill? Which, when we haue them, adde nothing to the perfection of our persons, and being taken away, nothing is detracted from our essence, (yea, in truth) from our worth: neither is the minde made greater, or more magnanimous by desiring or hauing, but by light valuing and contemning them as worthlesse trifles, in comparison of things desireable and truly excellent. And yet nothing more commonly puffeth men vp with most insolent pride, than riches and abundance, and though like empty bladders they haue nothing but skin, they are made full with these vanities, and swell in conceit, though they are as empty of any substantiall goodnesse, as they were before. An example whereof wee haue in the Merchants of Tyre, who because by their trading they had increased their riches, their hearts were lifted vp, and thinking themselues more than men, they arrogated to themselues the titles of God. But we shall not need to goe so farre to seeke examples, seeing wee haue many such in our owne dayes, who measuring their worth according to their wealth, most proudly conceit of their own excellency, and insult ouer all others as worse, who are poorer; though they be vtterly disfurnished of all gifts and good parts both in body and minde, and as farre short of them in wisdome and worth, whom they contemne, as they are before them in earthly abundance. Although in truth there is no shew of cause, seeing there is no comparison betweene the gifts of minde and body, and the gifts of an outward estate. And besides, if there be any excellency at all in these earthly riches, it is not in keeping and possessing them, but in their bestowing and vse: neither is he in the Church and among Christians to be accounted rich, who hath much in keeping; but he who findeth much to bestow on charitable vses, and hath plenty for the poore: for it is not so much money, as the mind that maketh rich. Finally, thus worldly pleasures cause pride, as they are the vsuall meanes to make vs forget God, and to forget our selues, causing vs like pampred Horses to scorne our Master; especially if our delights be of such a na-nature, as that therein we may shew our excellency, and commend to those who are about vs the gifts of body or minde, which selfe-loue maketh vs beleeue, to bee esteemable.

In all which respects these worldly things thus abused, may bee truly said, not only, not to doe vs any good, but contrariwise much hurt, seeing they are the meanes to cast vs into this hainous sinne of pride, which aboue all others God detesteth, as the Scriptures testifie. And as he doth hate the sinne, so hee purposely opposeth, and setteth himselfe against those who are defiled with it; and because the proud man opposeth against God, robbing him of his glory which is most deare vnto him; therefore the Lord also opposeth against him, and crosseth him in all his courses. So the Apostle Peter saith, that God resisteth the proud, but giueth grace to the humble. The which opposition and resisting of God who is Omnipotent, must needs bring them to ruine and destruction, seeing their policies cannot ouer-reach his infinite wisdome, nor all their strength defend them from being ouerthrowne by his mighty power; especially seeing his will to bring them to confusion, is joyned with his ability, the Lord neuer more willingly shooting his arrowes of wrath and vengeance, than against the proud person. So the blessed Virgin in her Song saith, that God scattereth the proud in the imagination of their hearts, and doth put downe the mighty from their seats, exalting them of low degree: And our Sauiour teacheth vs, that he who exalteth himselfe shall be brought low, and he that humbleth himselfe, shall be exalted. As therefore men lift vp highest those earthen pitchers which they purpose to breake with greatest violence, into most pieces; so the Lord intending to batter and bruise these fraile persons puffed vp with pride, doth lift them vp on high, that he may giue them the soter fall. And howsoeuer the Lord who is chiefe Iudge of Heauen and Earth, is the punisher of all vice and sinne, yet because he executeth this vengeance more certainly, and seuerely vpon proud persons, therefore the Prophet Daniel maketh it one of Gods attributes and titles, whereby he will be knowne to be a punisher of them; O thou who dost feare the proud, and wicked, which erre from thy Commandements, take away from vs shame and contempt, because I keepe thy testimonies. And as he beareth an extraordinary hatred vnto this sinne aboue others, so hee inflicteth on it extraordinary punishments: hardning it with hainous and espiall offences; by imposing on it his greatest plagues. For whereas proud men in their ambitious desire would be equal with God, the Lord pulleth them downe in his fierce wrath, and maketh them lesse than men. For he striketh them commonly with frenzie and madnesse, and thereby depriuing them of the vse of reason, the essentiall forme of man, wherein chiefly his manhood consisteth, and whereby he is distinguished from the brutish creatures, hee maketh them equall with beasts, and so exposeth them, how great soeuer they were in former times, to the contempt, derision, and injuries of the basest and meanest, who before held them in such great respect, that they could not looke vpon them, or stand in their presence, but with much feare and reuerence. A plain example whereof we haue in Nebuchadnezzar, who for his pride was driuen from his Palace and Regall Throne, into the wilde Woods, and made of a great Monarch and Ruler of men, a companion with Beasts, and farre worse than his basest seruant. And the like we may obserue in many in our owne times, who offending in this sinne, are ouerthrowne with this punishment. For howsoeuer all excessiue pride is not thus punished (for then there would not bee enow in their right wits to tend and rule those who are mad) yet a man shall seldome see this punishment following, where excessiue pride hath not gone before. So that one may boldly affirme, that if pride onely be not plagued with this fearefull judgement of frenzie and madnesse, yet it is more often thus punished than all other sinnes besides. The which fierce and sudden vengeance of God, which he taketh on proud persons, the Prophet Malachie expresseth, by comparing Gods wrath burning against them, to a burning Furnace, and proud men to stubble. The day of the Lord (saith he) commeth, that shall burne as an Ouen; and all the proud shall be stubble, and the day that commeth shall burne them vp, saith the Lord of Hosts, and shall leaue them neither root nor branch. And therefore seeing these worldly things are the common causes of pride, and pride bringeth with it such confusion and destruction, let this serue as an argument to make vs contemne these harmefull vanities, not immeasurably desiring them when we want them; nor excessiuely esteeming and immoderately louing them when we haue them; and so if we want these things which we neglect, our minds will not be much dejected; or if wee haue them, they will not bee much exalted and lifted vp: neither can a man be proud of the possession of that which he doth not ouer-value in his judgement, and vnmeasurably loue in his affection.

Deut. 4. 17, 28, 30.

Mal. 4. 1.

Quest. 6. That worldly things bring with them contempt of God.

The sixth sinne against God, which these worldly things too much esteemed, and immoderately loued plunge vs into, is either neglect or vtter contempt of God himselfe, his spirituall graces, and heauenly ioyes, for our affections being finite are limited and restrained to their objects, so that being conuersant and exercised about some, they in the meane time neglect others. And therefore if they cannot with their full vigour and heate affect many things being diuers; how much lesse can they at once loue God and the World, spirituall graces and earthly vanities, eternall joyes, and these transitory trifles, seeing they are opposite and contrary the one to the other? And this our Sauiour Christ teacheth vs, where as he saith, that no man can serue two Masters; for either hee must hate the one and loue the other, or else he shall leane to the one, and despise the other; yee cannot serue God and riches. So that there is no halting between the Lord, & this worldly Baal, for the seruice of one, is the contempt of the other, and the louing of the one, is the hating of the other. It is true indeed in reason that the more wee abound with these earthly benefits, the more wee should loue, reuerence, and with all diligence and alacritie serue the Lord, they being his bountifull gifts and blessings whereby hee deserueth at our hands loue and seruice; howbeit such is the corruption of our hearts, that no sooner are wee inriched with these worldly benefits, but we presently loue the gifts better than the giuer; and laying herein aside all reason, we become like beasts, feeding vpon our prouender, and neglecting our feeder; and the more we are pampered and made fat, the more ready we are to kicke against him. An example whereof wee haue in the people of Israel, of whom the Lord complaineth, that whereas in respect of the manifold benefits which he had multiplied vpon them, they should haue serued him in vprightnesse of heart; they contrariwise by his gifts were made more rebellious: But hee (saith the Lord) that should haue beene vpright, when he waxed fat, spurned with his heele. Thou art fat, thou art grosse, thou art laden with fatnesse. Therefore he forsooke God that made him, and regarded not the strong God of his saluation. The like complaint the Lord maketh by the Prophet Esay; Heare O Heauens, and hearken O Earth for the Lord hath said, I haue nourished and brought vp children, but they haue rebelled against me. Yea, he maketh the herein more brutish than the beasts, Because the Oxe knoweth his Owner, and the Asse his Masters Crib, but (saith he) Israel hath not known, my people hath not vnderstood.

2. Sect. 7. That worldly things bring contempt of spirituall grace and heauenly glory.

And as they who set their hearts vpon these worldly things doe contemne the Lord himselfe; so also his spirituall graces and heauenly joyes: for so wholly are their hearts taken vp with the loue of these vanities, that they haue seldome or neuer leisure to thinke of those diuine excellencies; but like the Serpents brood, they take all their delight in lying groueling, and in creeping on the earth, hauing neuer so much as a thought of raising themselues towards Heauen in any diuine and spirituall meditation. Or though they should thinke of grace and glory with some desire to compasse them, or would lift themselues vp in any spirituall contemplation, yet as Birds with great bodies, though they haue wings cannot flie aloft, but when they attempt it, are pulled downe with their owne waight, and onely flutter vpon the earth: so though they haue spirituall soules, vnderstandings, and judgements as well as others, yet are their hearts so oppressed with the waight of worldly cares, and the loue of earthly things, that no sooner doe they offer to raise them in heauenly meditations, but presently they are pressed downe againe, and (as it were) flutter and tire themselues with worldly businesse. But in truth seldome haue they so much as any such desire, seeing the World like a thicke cloud, being neere vnto them, doth ouer-shadow and hide that bright shining Sunne of heauenly glory out of their sight, so as they cannot see it, and not seeing it, neuer desire it, there being no desire and loue of that which is not knowne. And as a little Pearle sticking fast vnto the eye doth blinde the sight, and is sufficient to hide from vs the whole Earth and Heauen, which are incomparably of greater quantie; so the World & worldly things like a Pearle sticking close to the eye of the soule, do make it so spiritually blinde, that it cannot discerne the Lord, infinite in all goodnesse, nor the joyes of Heauen, though without all comparison, they are of greater excellencie. To which purpose one saith, that if wee desire earthly things, we are wholly taken vp with the care of them; and so farre are we beaten back from heauenly contemplation, by how much wee are ouer-poysed with the cares of earthly affaires. But say notwithstanding this blindnes, they might haue some glimpse of the shining brightnesse of spirituall grace and heauenly glory, or wanting this, should haue it by others described vnto them, so that some knowledge of these diuine excellencies, might by the passage of the eare, be deriued to their vnderstandings; yet being wholly possessed with the loue of worldly things, they would little regard such discourses, and accounting these earthly vanities their chiefe treasures, their hearts are so fast fixed vpon thē, that no perswasion wil moue them to leaue them, or once to looke after those spirituall and diuine excellencies. For as hee who loueth truly his God, doth not much loue his Gold, because hee esteemeth him his chiefe treasure; and as he who highly esteemeth heauenly happinesse, doth presently contemne these earthly vanities; so contrariwise they who dote on the Idoll of the World, doe not respect the Lord of Heauen; and they who ouer-value earthly trash, doe contemne, and set light by those heauenly and eternall treasures. And this our Sauiour plainly teacheth vs in the Para-

bee of the guests inuited to the mariage supper; for they who were best disposed framed excuses, one that hee had bought a farme, and must needs goe out and see it; another that hee had bought fiue yoke of oxen, and must goe to proue them, and another that he had married a wife, and therefore could not come; all which though they pretended faire excuses, as though their desire had beene to come, if their businesses had not beene so vrgent, yet the true cause was, as our Sauiour telleth vs, because doting vpon their earthly affaires, they were so wholly taken vp at them, that they made light of these heauenly offers, and went their waies. And those who were worse affected, and carried with greater violence in their loue towards worldly vanities, tooke it so ill, that the messengers of the great king should presume to dissuade them from the loue of their chiefe iewels and most esteemed treasures, that they laid violent hands vpon them, sharply intreated them, and cruelly murthered them. Thus those who set their hearts vpon worldly honours, neuer thinke of eternall glory, but spend all their thoughts and labour in plotting the meanes whereby they may aspire to earthly preferments; and if any shall perswade them to leaue these courses, and contemning the vaine-glory of the world seeke after heauenly honour which shall bee eternall, and so glorifie God by their holy liues, and humble cariage, that hee may glorifie them in his heauenly kingdome; they will plainely shew their neglect and contempt of these euerlasting honours, by despising, if not deriding these Christian admonitions and persuasions. So he who too much esteemeth, and immoderately loueth earthly riches, doth neglect and contemne the Lord, and the vnualuable riches of his spirituall graces and heauenly treasures; being ready with Iudas to sell his Sauiour for a little money, and with Demas to forsake all communion with the Saints, to imbrace the world. So the Psalmist saith, that the couetous man blesseth himselfe in his riches, and contemneth the Lord. And as hee contemneth God, so also his spirituall gifts and heauenly glory; for as the heathen man could teach vs, where riches are highly valued, there all good things, as faith, honesty, modesty, shamefastnesse, are contemptible cheape, and basely esteemed; and consequently they are sought, when as these are neglected, and the rather because they are more easily compassed, and these with greater difficulty. For whereas vnto vertue there is but one way, and that hard to bee found, and painefull in trauelling, men find many wayes to get money, vsing all meanes both good and euill, that they may hereby obtaine their desire. So another saith, that they who set their affections vpon earthly treasures, and haue their hearts tied to the World with this golden chaine, they can neuer so much as thinke of the riches of Gods kingdome, their minds are so taken vp with thinking on their money, vsurie, paine, bargaining, and such other businesses. And if any man shall perswade them to alter their couetous courses, and to lay vp their treasures, not in Earth, but in Heauen, because wee cannot haue a treasurie in both places, nor serue God if wee serue Mammon, they are ready to laugh them to scorne, as the Pharisies did our Sauiour Christ; and euen to persecute them to the death, if they too earnestly insist in this argument. The like also might bee said of worldly pleasures, which being ouervalued, and too much affected, make men in comparison of them, to neglect the ioy in the holy Ghost, yea the ioyes of Heauen, and those surpassing pleasures which are at Gods right hand for euermore. And as the Hog feeding vpon the mast and swill which hee naturally loueth, and wallowing himselfe in the filthy mire, will not exchange his grosse feed, for the daintiest meates, nor his lothsome lodging for a bed of downe: so they being wedded to these sensuall and carnall delights, which are base and brutish, are ready in comparison of them to set light by, and contemne the spirituall ioyes of a Christian, and the eternall ioyes of Heauen, as though they were not worth the seeking and desiring. And therefore seeing the loue of God and these heauenly excellencies, and the loue of the World, and worldly vanities will not stand together, but hee who in his heart and affection imbraceth the one, doth presently neglect and contemne the other, let this also serue as an effectuall reason to weane our hearts from these earthly trifles, seeing if we giue them entertainment, and vouchsafe them too high a seat in the Temple of our hearts, they will instantly thrust out the loue of the Lord, and his inualuable benefits; and by our neglect and contempt make vs to lose these incomparable treasures, for this earthly trash, and worthlesse trifles.

Chrysost. in Mat. 6. Homil. 21.

Luk. 16. 14.

Lastly, the world and worldly vanities, being too highly esteemed and excessiuely loued, doe make vs slacke and slothfull in the duties of Gods seruice, and in vsing the meanes which hee hath ordained to attaine vnto the present possession of his spirituall graces, and the assurance of his heauenly ioyes. And this sinne is a necessarie fruit and effect of the former; for when we neglect the Lord, and contemne his spirituall and heauenly benefits, then are wee also careless and negligent in vsing the meanes whereby we may obtaine those things which we so little esteeme and desire. And as those who

9. Sect. 8. That worldly things immoderately loued make men slothfull in the duties of Gods seruice.

who haue drunke poysons doe presently wax stiffe and benummed, and soone after are seazed vpon by death, whereby they are made impotent and vtterly vnable to performe any humane action: so they who haue drunke of that benumming poyson of cold contempt, despising God and his rich graces, spirituall, and eternall, are made first sluggish, and soone after impotent and dead to all good duties. Neither is this rare and vnusuall to see those vpon whom the world fawneth, and who abound with earthly prosperity, to bee thus slacke and negligent in the seruice of God, and in vsing the meanes of their owne saluation; but so common and almost vniuersall, that seldome shall one find a man in great prosperity, who also is indued with great piety; seldome shall one see any burning in zeale, and deuout and earnest in religious duties, who hath the world at will, with plentie and abundance of all earthly blessings. It is true indeed, that in reason these temporarie benefits, should as the Lords wages, incourage vs to doe his worke, and hauing a tast of his bountie, of which we shall drinke our fill in the life to come, wee should with more alacritie and cheerefulnesse performe diligent seruice to so liberall a master: But contrariwise through our corruption and vnthankfulnesse it commeth to passe, that wee are rather hindered than furthered in all good duties by wordly abundance; and like gluttons and drunkards hauing store and plentie of these good blessings, wee feeding on them with a greedie appetite doe surfet, and drinking of these full cups with vnsatiable thirst, are made drunken with excesse; and so thereby our heads are intoxicated, our minds besotted, and our bodies enfeebled and disabled, so as wee become slothfull and impotent to performe any good dutie of the seruice of God; whereas by their moderate vse, we might haue beene made more strong and cheerefull for these holy actions, and religious exercises. And thus this worldly prosperity and earthly abundance draweth men from performing vnto God, the duties of his worship and seruice, and from vsing the meanes of their owne saluation; either as it vtterly hindreth them from performing these Christian duties, which is the case of prophane worldlings, who doting vpon these earthly vanities, are so wholly taken vp in businesse and imployments about either the getting, keeping, or disposing them, that they can find no leisure at all, either to vse in their owne families the exercises of prayer, reading, meditation; or to come vnto the congregation, to heare the word, receiue the sacraments, or to call publickly vpon the holy name of God: or else if they formally performe these duties, it hindreth them, as it doth distract their minds in prayer, and hearing the word, and carrie away their hearts, so as they doe not attend at all to those holy exercises which they haue in hand; or else carelessely, lumpishly, wearily, and without all life and feeling; which is the case of temporizers, and formall worldlings, who for some carnall respects make an outward profession of religion. And not onely they, but euen Gods dearest children are thus ouertaken, through the immoderate loue of these vanities; so as they sometimes neglect these holy duties of Gods seruice, and meanes of their owne saluation; and sometimes performe them with much distraction, dulnesse, and wearinesse, as appeareth in the example of Martha, who being cumbred with worldly businesse, neglected to hearken vnto our Sauiour Christ. To which purpose one saith, that worldly pleasures and abundance, doe make vs to neglect all good duties of piety towards God; and contrariwise, afflictions doe make vs holy, and most deuout in the exercises of religion. Which if any would clearely see, let him enter into the house of those who marrie, and into the house of mourners, into the prisons and theaters, banquetting houses, and hospitals of the sicke, and obserue the great difference betweene their seuerall carriages; what vanitie, lightnesse, irreligion, prophanenesse, swearing and ribaldrie, he shall see, and heare in the one; and what prayer, deuotion, contempt of the world, holy conferences, and other religious exercises, he shall behold in the other. But as this confluence and abundance of worldly benefits doe commonly make vs vnfit to doe seruice vnto God, and to performe religious and Christian duties; so especially and aboue all, they hinder Christian apologie, and profession of Gods truth, in the time of danger and persecution, and discourage men from suffering martyrdome for the testimonie of Iesus Christ, and for his glorious Gospell. For louing these worldly vanities, as well as they loue their liues, when the day of triall commeth, they haue a double conflict, as much fearing the losse of their highly valued trifles, as the vgly image of a torturing death. And this was one reason why our Sauiour Christ for the preaching and planting of the Gospell, made not choice of honourable persons, or of those who abounded in wealth, and wallowed in worldly pleasures, because such, in regard of their fearefulnesse, to lose their earthly loue and delight, were altogether vnfit to expose themselues to dangers, and to beare the brunt of persecution; but of poore and contemptible fishermen; whom also he inhibited the possession of much gold, siluer, apparell, and the riches of the world, because they should bee bee no cloge or hinderances vnto them in their confession of him, and his truth, and in suffering for his names sake. And so accordingly wee see, that these men, who had little to lose besides their owne liues, were bold and courageous, euen to the death; whereas others, who notwithstanding loued Christ, and beleeued his truth, inioying the prosperitie of the World, were thereby made cowardly and fearefull to indanger their great estates, by making an open profession of their faith in Iesus Christ. An example whereof wee haue in Nicodemus, a Ruler of the Iewes; who beleeuing in Christ, durst not publickly be knowne of it; and therefore secretly stealeth vnto him by night. And so it is said, that many of the chiefe Rulers beleeued in him, but because of the Pharises, they durst not confesse him, least they should bee cast out of the Synagogue.

But how cold and slothfull, the world immoderately loued, doth make vs in the seruice of God, and in the performance of Christian duties, it may further appeare in the speciall instances of honours, riches and carnall pleasures. For those who are in honourable place, and much stand vpon, and esteeme their dignitie and aduancement, are thereby made exceedingly prophane and negligent, or cold and superficiall in religious exercises. For how many are there, who thinking it a great disparagement to their honourable condition, if they should come into the common assemblies, and ioyne with the vulgar people in the seruice of God, doe vtterly neglect the publicke ministerie of the word, prayer, and such religious exercises, which are to be performed in the congregation, contenting themselues with their home deuotions, and with the ministerie of their owne chaplaines; who for the most part dare not touch their seared consciences, for feare of awaking the sleeping Lyon, nor come neere the quicke for feare of losing their fauour, and withall their owne preferment. Wherein they haue but a poore priuiledge, being like vnto the sicke patient, whose body abounding with grosse humours, hath no potion fit to purge them administred by his skilfull Physician, for feare of distasting his pallate, but is suffered to eate and drinke what best pleaseth him, though it hindreth his recouerie, and increaseth his diseases. Or like vnto those who are full of deep wounds, & festred sores, whom the Surgeon dare not touch for feare of paining them to paine, nor apply fit salues for the cleansing of the cure, for feare of incurring their displeasures, but rather letteth them alone to rot & perish for want of help, or applieth healing and gentle plaisters, which may skinne the sores, but leaue the core and corruption festring in the bottome. But such should remember, that when the Lord ordained congregations, and places of common assemblies, hee appointed not a Temple for the common people, & a Chamber or Chapell for the Nobilitie; but noble and base, yea King and subject, were commanded to meete together, because by a mutuall consent, and holy example, they might incourage one another, and performe the seruice of God with more alacritie. For howsoeuer there are diuers degrees amongst men in ciuill gouernement, yet in respect of God, and in the duties of his worship, they are all alike the seruants of God, brethren and sonnes of the same Father, fellow members of the same body, and of the same communion of Saints, of which, Christ Iesus is the head and King. From which common order, though Princes may in these dayes be exempted, in regard that we are not strictly tied to the Temple but may in all places offer vp pure hands vnto God; and because of their great families sufficient in themselues to make a sufficient congregation; and especially because the sinfulnesse of the times is such, and mens minds so poysoned with treacherie, and blood-thirstie crueltie, that Kings and Princes cannot with safetie to their persons and states, come into common assemblies; in which respects, necessitie and charitie may well dispence with circumstances and ceremonies: yet I can see no reason, why Nobilitie should pleade this priuiledge of exemption, or for state seuer themselues from the publicke congregation, and assemblies of Gods Saints, especially, seeing it is vnto themselues so hurtfull and pernicious. Against, these worldly honours immoderately loued and esteemed, doe puffe men vp with pride, the which hindreth them from profiting by the ministery of the word, though they should heare it; and that both as it moueth them to skorne the simplicitie of the Gospell, and the foolishnesse of preaching (as the Apostle speaking in their language calleth it) and to contemne the ministerie of the word, though neuer so powerfull, if it be not sauced with worldly wisdome, humane eloquence, and pleasing conceits of wit, to refresh and stirre vp their cloied appetites; and also as it causeth them proudly to pull backe their necks from the yoke of subiection, and holy obedience; refusing to bee ruled by the scepter of Gods word, and putting backe all admonitions and reproofes, as though it would not stand with their honours to humble themselues before God, or to stoope vnto his rebukes. An example whereof wee haue in Diotrephes, who would not receiue the Apostle Iohn, nor his doctrine, because being puffed vp with pride, hee loued his owne preheminence. Of whom it is truely said, that the [illegible] of honour and vaine-glory, doth smother and choake choake the flame of pietie, both as it blindeth mens eyes, so as they cannot find the way to the publike assemblies; and as it hindreth them from performing the duties of Gods seruice with fruit and profit. The like also may be said of riches, which commonly hinder those who set their hearts vpon them, from performing either priuate or publicke seruice vnto God; wholly taking men vp in businesses and imployments, so as they haue no leisure to exercise themselues in these religious duties: or as they distract and interrupt them, when they present themselues before God to heare his word, or to call vpon his name; in which respect, our Sauiour compareth them to thornes, which choake the seed of the word, and make it fruitlesse. And thus also pleasures immoderatly loued, worke the same effects, causing men to spend that time in carnall delights, which is allotted to Gods worship and seruice; and euen on the Lords Sabbaths to forsake the communion of Saints, and the publike exercises of religion, that they may follow their recreations, sports and pastimes: or if they get leaue of these eye-inious masters to ioyne with the faithfull, after a formall manner to serue God; yet it is only with their bodies; for as for their minds they runa whoring after their delights, either thinking of those which they lately enjoyed; or else of some new pleasures which they purpose to enjoy in the time to come. And therefore seeing these worldly vanities hinder vs from the performance of Gods seruice, if they bee immoderatly loued and esteemed; let this serue as another effectuall reason to dissuade vs from setting our hearts vpon them, seeing they disable vs for those maine and chiefe duties, for which we came into the world, and making vs vnfit to glorifie God in his faithfull seruice, which was the chiefe end of our creation, they cause vs to spend our liues in vaine, in the fruitlesse seruice of Satan and the world; and so making vs to neglect our seruice and dutie to our great Lord and Master, they also deprive vs of that wages which of his free grace hee hath promised as the reward of our labours, euen our heauenly inheritance, and the eternall crowne of glorie and saluation.

CHAP. XXXII.

That worldly things immoderatly loued, are the causes of many euils in respect of our neighbours: as of iniustice, wrong, pride, and vsurie.

§. Sect. 1. That worldly things immoderately loued are the cause

ANd thus haue I shewed that these worldly things, being ouerualued [illegible] iniust iudgements, and too much [illegible] in our affections, are the causes of many sinnes committed directly against God himselfe: Now we are come to speake of those euils and mischiefes which they cause both to our neighbours, and our selues. And first for our neighbours, these worldly things are the chiefe causes and occasions of all iniustice, wrongs, and iniuries which are offered betweene man and man; and (as it were) the diuels wages which hee giueth to worldly men to vndermine one anothers safetie, and to supplant their neighbours, that they may raise their state by their fellowes fall, and build their owne greatnesse out of others ruines. These are the causes why Iudges and Magistrates peruert righteous iudgement, acquitting the guiltie, and condemning the innocent, calling good euill, and euill good; right wrong, and wrong right; namely, that they may hereby attaine their worldly ends, and aduance their prosperitie, and earthly estates. These are the hire of all corruption, oppression, and crueltie, which are exercised of superiours towards their inferiours, rulers towards their subjects, and Landlords towards their tenants, that they may maintaine their greatnesse, and increase their wealth, or carnall pleasures. In a word, there is almost no vniustice committed, if it doe not proceed from malice, and desire of reuenge; which is not caused and occasioned by these worldly things immoderately loued: men not caring what they doe, nor what meanes they vse, whether they bee good or euill, right or wrong, so they may maintaine the prosperitie of their estate, and encrease their worldly happinesse. Neither is any man priuiledged in this kind from being thus wronged and oppressed by these vniust courses; for if the wages of these worldly vanities bee offered for their hire, the true louers of them are ready to lay aside all respect of persons, and desperately to breake all bonds of nature, countrie, kindred, friendship and common humanitie, dealing vniustly with all men, when by their vniustice they may gaine this wages of iniquitie. Thus for the attaining of worldly honours, Magistrates are ready to peruert iustice, to gaine the fauour of superiour Powers; and to oppresse maligned innocencie, to get the applause of the common people. Neither is it their present greatnesse that can satisfie them, and make them to hold on in a iust course; for the higher an ambitious man is, the more eager he is of rising still till hee come to the highest, and the more ready to vse all vnlawfull meanes, to raise himselfe to the height of his proud hopes. And as an image or building the higher it is, the more subiect it is to falling, if it doe not stand vpright; so the higher a man is aduanced in place and dignitie, the more prone hee is to fall into any sinne or euill,

euill, if his heart stand not vpright before God, when as by his wicked meanes he may aduance or strengthen his estate and reputation: and the more haughtie a mans heart is, and the more ambitious and desirous of glorie, the more easily is he moued to doe vniustly, as the Heathen Orator well obserued. And the like vniustice is vsed by more priuate persons, whilest with immoderate desire they seeke for aduancement, being ready to lie and dissemble, sweare and forsweare, backbite and slander, accuse and betray all those who stand in their way, and doe but seeme to hinder them in attaining vnto their desired preferments, measuring all friendship and enmitie, not according to nature, familiaritie or desert, but as they are helpes or hinderances in setting forward, or putting backe their proud desires. Thus also voluptuous pleasures immoderately loued and desired, moue men to vse all iniustice to their neighbours, making them to defile the mariage bed, to racke their inferiours, and out of their want and miserie, to sucke the sweetnesse of pleasure and delight; to take away their necessaries, and to pinch their backes and bellies, that they may exceed in superfluous dainties, and proud brauerie; and with Ahab to spoile those poore Nabothes that dwell neere them, of their inheritances, to make them parkes of pleasure and gardens of delight. But aboue all, worldly riches when men set their hearts vpon them, are the most ordinarie & powerfull meanes & inducements, to aduance iniustice, & suppresse all law and right; for when men couet them with vnsatiable desire, they become the measure of all their actions, accounting that iust which they find profitable, and nothing dishoneſt that bringeth in gaine. To which purpose one saith, that whilest men are greedy in increasing wealth in multiplying their treasures, and in getting the whole land into their possession, desiring to excell all others in riches and abundance; they lay aside all iustice, and lose common humanitie. For how can he be just which studieth to take from another, that which hee desireth to inioy himselfe? This is the cause of all publike iniustice committed by Magistrates in suppressing right and maintaining wrong, defending the guiltie and supplanting the innocent: for when loue of money hath once seazed vpon their hearts, they become like a paire of ballance, not weighing the equitie of the cause in an vpright iudgement, but whether bribe is heauier, that they may in giuing sentence incline to that side. So it is said of the Sonnes of Samuel, that they walked not in their Fathers wayes, but turned after lucre, and tooke rewards, and peruerted iudgement. And thus corrupt Felix hoped to receiue a bribe from the Apostle Paul, but failing of his expectation, he left him still in prison, though hee knew the Iewes malice, and his innocencie. This is the cause of the Simonie of vnconscionable Ministers and Patrons, of the extortion amongst officers, of the preuarication of Lawyers, of the oppression of Land-lords, of vsurie fraud, lying and swearing, cosening and circumuenting, which are commonly vsed betweene man and man. And were it not for this greedinesse of gaine, the Iudge would for the most part doe iustice, and execute righteous iudgement; Officers would bee content with common fees; Lawyers would neither betray their clients cause, nor tire them with delayes; Patrons would giue their liuings freely, and make choice of the worthiest persons, and such as best deserue to bee preferred: then would vsurie be banished, fraud and deceit be abhorred, simplicitie and truth be entertained and embraced. In a word, then should wee haue another golden age, wherein all men would loue iustice, mercie, bountie, vpright dealing, and all other commendable vertues and good parts; whereas now through the immoderate loue of money, they are vtterly neglected of the greatest number; and fraud, cruelty, oppression, and all manner of iniustice is committed, and commonly practised, when they will bring in any gaine. And thus the Prophet ioyneth these together: from the least of them (saith he) to the greatest of them, euery one is giuen vnto couetousnesse, and from the Prophet euen to the Priest, they all deale falsely. The which vniustice and oppression they doe not exercise against some few, or strangers and enemies onely; but against all without exception, there being no bond so neere which couetousnesse will not breake and violate; no estate so pitifull and worthy of compassion, which they will not oppresse for their owne aduantage. To which purpose one saith, that the couetousnesse of rich men is vnsatiable; they are alwayes taking and neuer full, they neither feare God, nor reuerence men; they spare not their owne Father, nor acknowledge their Mother, nor regard their Brother, nor keepe their fidelity to their friend. They oppresse the widow, and spoile the fatherlesse, they make free-men their bond-slaues; and for their profit giue false testimonie, &c. Now what madnesse is this, to lose life and desire death, to get gold and lose Heauen? But as they are vniust to all, so commonly most of all to the poore, both in taking away from them, that which is their owne, and alreadie in their keeping, and by withholding that which of right appertaineth to them. For as one saith, is he onely to be esteemed a robber, and common spoiler, who taketh by violence other mens goods? and not hee also, also, who appropriateth to himselfe those things, which he hath receiued to this end, that he should dispence and distribute them for the good of others? Is not the Almner to be accounted a theefe, who hauing receiued from his Soueraigne store of money for the relieue of the poore, doth put it into his owne purse, and appropriate it to his owne priuate vse? shall hee bee accounted a spoiler, who taketh away the poores garment; and shall hee bee acquitted, who doth not clothe the naked, if he haue abilitie? Thy spare bread is not thine owne, but belongeth to the hungrie; thou hast no true right to thy superfluous apparell, but they appertaine to the cold and naked; thy moulded shooes belong to those who goe barefoot; and thy hid and cankring siluer, to those who want money to buy necessaries: and in a word, thou offerest iniuries, and doest iniustice, so often to the poore, as thou doest neglect him, when thou art able to helpe him. And this our Sauiour Christ sheweth in the sentence of condemnation, which shall be pronounced against the wicked at the day of iudgement, whereby they are adiudged to Hell torments, not for spoiling the poore of that which they had, but because they did not supplie their necessities, by giuing vnto them that which they wanted. Matth. 25.42. [And the Apostle Iames telleth rich men, that they had cause to howle and crie, not onely because they had spoiled the poore of their money, but because their owne corrupted riches, moath-eaten garments, and cankered gold and siluer, would be a witnesse against them, eate their flesh as fire, and bring vpon them many miseries, seeing they should not haue kept by them these superfluities, but haue laid them out for the relieue of the poore. Iames 5.1.2.3.

And thus haue I shewed that these worldly things being immoderately loued, are the causes of all iniustice, which comprehendeth vnder it all manner of sinnes and offences, which are committed by one man against another: For not onely doth the excessiue loue of these earthly vanities make men to commit some kinds of legall iniustice, couered & coloured with some shew of right, or some slight and tolerable wrongs which greatly hurt not; but if men once set their hearts vpon them, they are the common causes of the most grosse and grieuous iniuries, raging cruelties, open violence, treason and bloodshed, whereby they consume and destroy one another. In which respect the world is compared to a Sea, and worldly men to fish, which deuour one another, the greater feeding vpon the lesse, and himselfe againe becomming the prey of another which is greater than hee. For that which a man doth to one, hee suffereth of another; wickednesse rebounding vpon the authour, and the oppressor being oppressed by that example which himselfe hath giuen. But this will better appeare in the speciall instances: and first for honours; there is nothing more than they, being immoderately loued, which will thrust men into all outragious, and pernicious courses for the obtaining of them. For when the ambitious man wanteth true worth and lawfull means to aduance himselfe into the seate of honour, he is ready to make steps, whereby he may ascend, of any mischiefe or villanie; betraying those that trust him, treading on their necks who helped him to rise, falsly accusing, supplanting, yea poysoning, and secretly murthering those who stand in his way, and hinder his preferments. To which purpose one saith, that nothing doth make men more madly and outragiously iniurious, than when by their proud ambition they are moued to desire immoderately vaine glory and earthly aduancement; and contrariwise nothing doth make them more honest, resolute, and like the adamant impenetrable by any vice, than when they doe neglect and despise it. Neither doth the ambitious man in this his outragious pursuit, suffer any thing to stay him; but runneth ouer friends and enemies, kindred and strangers, acknowledging neither Father nor Mother, Wife nor the Childe of his bowels, but treadeth all vnder foot without difference, if they stand in his way, and hinder his proud march. Thus Ioab stabbed Abner, and Amasa when he professed greatest friendship, that they might not bee preferred to his place of captaine general. Thus Kaine killed Abel because he was preferred before him. Thus Abimelech murthered all his brethren that hee might reigne alone. This was the cause of Corahs conspiracie against Moses; of Absalons rebellion against his owne Father; of Athaliahs murthering all the Kings seede; that hauing supplanted them, they might aduance themselues into the royall throne, and weld the Scepter of the kingdome. So likewise these worldly riches are the causes and occasions of all manner of mischiefe and outragious iniurie to those that set their hearts vpon them; in regard whereof the Wise man saith, that as the labours of the righteous tend to life, so the reuenues of the wicked to sinne. Seeing there is no outrage or wickednesse which they are not ready to commit for the increasing of their wealth. Thus by their hoording, they bring vpon the whole countrie a common dearth, and cause an vniuersall pouerty, for the filling of their priuate purse. Thus for their priuate gaine they are ready to offer all grosse iniuries, and that without colour of reason, vpon meere will by tyranny and violence; as we may see in the example of Hophni and Phineas the Sons of Eli,

9. Sect. 2.
That worldly things thrust men on to the committing of outragious wrongs.

Eli, who tooke by force what they lifted from the people, when they came to offer sacrifice. As also to exercise grosse deceit and extreame cruelties towardes inferiours, that they may increase their worldly wealth; as appeareth in the example of the Israelites, who vsed vnequall and wicked ballances, & the bagge of deceitfull waights, and in all their earinges were full of crueltie. Finally, this immoderate loue of siluer maketh men treacherously to betray euen those vnto whom they are most beholding, with Iudas selling them out to sale for a little money: yea, it is the cause of cruell murther and bloudshed, couetous Misers being ready to bring men to the shambles, and like cruell Butchers to cut them into gobbets, and sell them peece-meale for a little gaine. So the Prophet Ezechiel complaineth that there were among the people such, as did take gifts to shed blood. And the Prophet Micah saith, that they did pluck off the peoples skins, and their flesh from their bones, and that they did eat their flesh, breake their bones, chop them in pieces as for the pot, and as flesh in the Cauldron. And hence it is that in the Scriptures couetousnesse & bloudshed are joyned together: I haue smitten mine hands vpon thy couetousnesse which thou hast vsed, and vpon the blood which hath been in the middest of thee. And in another place: Thy eyes and thine heart are but onely for thy couetousnesse, and for to shed innocent blood, and for oppression, and for destruction. The like also might be said of carnall pleasures, which if they be immoderately loued, cause men to commit any injuries or outrage, and that euen to the taking away of the precious life of their Neighbours. For so the Apostle Iames saith: Ye haue liued in pleasure on the earth and in wantonnesse: yee haue nourished your hearts as in a day of slaughter; yee haue condemned and killed the just, and he hath not resisted you. An example whereof we haue in Dauid, whose carnall pleasure in the end brought him to the committing of cruell murther; as also in Ahab, who to get ground for a pleasant Garden, procured the death of innocent Naboth.

And these are some of those manifold wrongs and grieuous injuries, which men through the immoderate loue of these worldly vanities do vsually offer vnto their neighbours; which although many about them may escape, yet all haue just cause to feare, seeing in offering a wrong to one, they threaten it against all; especially, if their power be answerable to their will, they being so mighty in themselues, or so backed with their potent friends, that no man dare make resistance, or once call their actions into question. But if they be wanting in this power and ability, so as they cannot doe what they would; yet are their wils neuer wanting to doe what wrongs they can; and when they are able to doe no more, they cease not to enuy and maligne those who exceed them in worldly prosperity, hauing in their possession those things which they desire, and inwardly they repine at them, because they haue that which themselues want, whom selfe-loue maketh them beleeue to bee much more worthy. And thus those who dote vpon worldly Honours enuy and hate all those who are preferred before them, desiring nothing more, than that they may out-grow them in aduancements, or if not so, yet that the other may fall and so become equall vnto them. So also they who set their hearts vpon riches are filled with enuy and hatred, when they see others thriue faster, and to abound in greater plenty. And though they haue no other quarrell against their Neighbour, yet this is cause enough of a deepe conceiued grudge, if they exceed them in wealth; which enuy and repining they cannot commonly take away by all the humanity they can shew towards them, neither is there any thing but their losses, want, and misery that can giue them contentment, and worke a reconciliation. To which purpose one saith, that the couetous man, hateth all men both poore and rich. The poore, fearing lest they will beg of him; the rich because they haue that which he would possesse. For he thinketh that all men enjoy those things which of right appertaine vnto him; and therefore as though he were hurt of euery man, hee is angry with all. The like also might be said of worldly pleasures, which are the common causes of this enuy and hatred; to those that set their hearts vpon them. They being ready to grudge and disdain if any exceed them in dainty fare, and full tables, or in more stately Shewes, Masques, and Reuels, or in varietie of delightfull sports and pastimes.

Chrysost. in Math. 18. Homil. 61.

5. Sect. 4. That worldly things make men proud and insolent towards their neighbours.

Lastly, this earthly prosperity and abundance of worldly blessings being ouer-valued and immoderately loued, doe puffe men vp with pride, and make them carry themselues insolently and disdainfully towardes their Neighbours; vying with their Superiours as though they were their equals, neglecting their equals, as though they were their inferiours, and proudly insulting ouer their inferiours as abiects, and base vnderlings. And as waterish humours abounding in the body doe cause a Dropsie, which swelleth it much aboue the ordinary measure, & filleth it so full, that it is neere vnto bursting: so these worldly and waterish vanities doe make mens hearts and minds subiect to this dropsie of pride, whereby they are so swelled and puffed vp, that they are much greater in their owne conceit, than they were before, and thinke all their gifts and good parts though neuer so meane and superficiall, of such worth and excellency, that no man may be compared with them. So that a man shall disdiscerne a maruellous alteration in the same person, in respect of his different estate and condition; for whereas when he was but of meane qualitie, or touched with some affliction, hee was humble, affable, and full of courtesie; when the crosse is remooued, and he aduanced flourishing in prosperity, and euen wallowing in his abundance; presently his carriage and behauiour is quite changed; & now he swelleth with pride, ouer-looketh all that meete him, scarce vouchsafeth a side glance, or a complementall salutation vnto those, with whom formerly he was most familiar; and will scarce know his best Benefactours, lest his proud heart should be disquieted, whilest hee is forced to remember that hee was beholding; or those of his acquaintance, who were formerly much better than hee, lest his pride should receiue any checke, whilest he is put in minde, that hee was an vnderling. Which as he would haue all men to passe by, without taking notice of it; so would hee faine (if it were possible) forget it himselfe, and haue his memory in this as vnfaithfull and slippery, as his honestie and friendship, that so his pride might goe with full sailes, and without any occasion of blushing, carry it selfe insolently and disdainfully in all his courses. It is true, that all men are proud by nature, vntill grace doe subdue it, and bring humilitie; but yet there are many, who make no shew of it in a mean estate, wanting meanes and opportunitie, which might (as it were) set fire to the powder of their corruption. And as the Serpent may be safely handled when hee is stiffe and benummed with cold, though all his poyson be still in him; but beginneth to hisse when he feeleth the least warmth, and is ready to sting those, when hee is throughly heated who for pitie tooke him vp and put him into their bosomes: so this poyson of pride lurketh secretly and lieth hid in mens hearts, when it is pinched, and (as it were) benummed with aduersitie; but no sooner hath it had the feeling of the warmth of prosperity, but it beginneth to hisse in proud boasting, & to sting and empoyson with many insolencies, those who were the first meanes of their welfare & aduancement. And how soeuer in their low estate they might easily haue beene ruled and led, and like ships without sailes and tackle, were readie to yeeld themselues ouer to the streame and tide of other mens desires, and ouer-ruling perswasions; yet now hauing attained vnto prosperitie and worldly abundance (as it were) vnto their full sailes; they are onely carried with the winde of their owne pride, going against the tide of reason, and crossing the current of all other mens desires; no man now being more insolent churlish and vntractable, than these who lately were so pliable and curteous, after they are once corrupted with worldly felicitie. An example whereof wee haue in Hagar, who carried her selfe as became a seruant, whilest shee was in this base condition; but being made her Masters Concubine, and hauing borne a childe vnto him, shee presently begins to despise her Mistresse, who was the onely cause of her aduancement. Neither do they now mislike this pride, and desire to be freed from it, as being an infirmitie or blemish, which ill beseemes them, but as the Psalmist speaketh, their pride is a chaine vnto them, and they voluntarily put it on as a chiefe ornament. And as these worldly things bring them to this height of pride and insolency when they abound with them; so when as they haue raised them to their highest pitch, if they then faile, and are taken away, they presently fall downe againe, like a ruinous house, when the props that beare it vp are pulled from it, and become more abiectly base, and seruilely pleasing than euer before, now scraping vp the old fragments of their before scorned acquaintance, soothing and flattering those, euen in their contradictory speeches, ouer whom not long since they proudly insulted. So that these worldly vanities are the borrowed feathers and wings of pride, whereby men soare aloft in the high pitch of their owne conceits; which when they are pulled, or clipt by some aduerse accident, they come tumbling downe againe, like a Bird, which in his high flight is smiten with a shot.

And thus are mens hearts lifted vp in pride with worldly Honours and preferments, insulting ouer their inferiours, and insolently disdayning all those, whom they haue out-stripped, and in this race of Honour haue left behind them. To which purpose one saith, that as soone as the ambitious man is aduanced to Honour, hee is puffed vp with pride, and letteth the raines loose to arrogancy and insolence. Neither doth hee care to profit, but glorieth that he is preferred; presuming that he is so much better than others, as he is higher. Hee scorneth his old friends, and will not take knowledge of his ancient acquaintance, lest he might seeme to haue beene their equall. Hee consorteth himselfe with strangers, and contemnes those who were his familiars before his aduancement; hee turneth aside his countenance, stretcheth out his necke, sheweth his haughtie heart, speaketh bigge, and meditateth of high matters; hee is impatient of subiection, and aspireth to Soueraignetie; to which when hee hath attained, hee is burthensome, arrogant, sterne, and insolent to those who are in subiection to him. An example whereof we haue in Roboam, who before he could haue the Crowne set vpon his head, insolently tyrannized ouer his people. And in Haman, who being highly aduanced in the Kings fauour, was so puffed vp with pride, that he expected obeysance and duty duty from all men, and could not indure that Mordecai alone should neglect him in this height of glory. And hence it is, that the Lord feeling, like a skilfull Physician, the lofty beating pulses of great Potentates, and finding them inclinable to fall into the frenzie of pride, appointeth Kings and Princes, for the tempering and abating of their proud spirits, to haue his Law continually before them, that when the greatnesse of their place did lift them vp, they might be humbled by knowing, and continuall remembring, that burthen of duetie which did lie vpon them. Iehoa (saith hee) The King shall sit vpon the throne of his Kingdome, then shall hee write him this Law repeated in a Booke, by the Priests of the Levits, and it shall be with him, and hee shall reade therein all the dayes of his life, that hee may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the words of this Law, and these Ordinances for to doe them: that his heart be not lifted vp aboue his brethren. So also there is nothing more than riches and abundance which puffeth men vp with pride, making them insolent and intolerable to all that are about them: and whereas before they were adorned, or after they are stripped of these rich furnitures, euery one might rule and ride them; yet when they ruffle it out in their rich brauery, their hearts are so high and haughtie, that none but Kings and great Monarchs can haue them at command. And being filled full with these Golden spirits, they are ready to aduance themselues aboue their betters, thinking that their worth exceedeth as much as their wealth; and to offer wrongs and insolencies to all that are poorer, presuming that they can keepe them vnder with the waight of their Gold, and hinder them from righting themselues, when they haue these pleasing Oratours to pleade against them. So the Psalmist saith, that they trust in their goods, and boast themselues in the multitude of their riches. And the wise man shewing the humility of the poore, and the haughty pride of the wealthiest sort, saith, that the poore speaketh with prayers, but the rich answereth roughly. Whereof it also is, that the Apostle seeing the neere affinitie and acquaintance betweene pride and riches, the one being the Mother and Nurse of the other, would haue an especiall charge giuen to rich men, that they should not bee high-minded, because, of all others, they are most prone to fall into this sinne. The like also might bee said of worldly pleasures, which being enjoyed with immoderate loue, and in excessiue measure, doe make men wanton, proud and insolent; like vnto pampred Horses, which being fatted with prouender will stand on no ground, nor indure to be ruled with any rider; whose pride and brauery lasteth no longer than they are well fed: for so these voluptuous Wantons being pampered with carnall delights, grow proud of their pleasures, neither knowing themselues nor others; but when they are scanted of their full Tables, and are deprined of that wherein they most delight, they presently strike sayle, and the crest of their pride is taken downe, hauing its birth and death, rising and ruine, with those carnall pleasures wherupon they haue set their hearts. And these, with many other, are the euils & mischiefes, which these worldly things too much esteemed and immoderately loued, cause men to fall into in regard of their Neighbours. The which should serue as effectuall reasons to weane our hearts from the loue of these vanities, and to moderate our affections towards them, seeing otherwise, they will become not onely dishonourable to God, but also hurtfull and pernicious vnto our neighbours, whom wee ought to loue as our selues, and tender their good, as much as wee doe our owne.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of the ciuill euils which worldly things immoderately loued, bring to their Owners.

HAuing shewed how sinfull the loue of the World, and worldly things is in respect of God, and how many mischiefes it causeth towards our Neighbours; it now followeth, that I also shew, that as it is hurtfull and pernicious vnto others, so most of all to themselues, who are possessed of it, as being the cause of innumerable euils & mischiefes, and those both temporary and eternall. The temporary euils which these worldly things immoderately loued, bring to those who dote vpon them, are either ciuill, and meerely humane; or else such as are spirituall, respecting the soule, and the inner man. The euils of the former sort are diuers: for first, the prosperity of the World, and abundance of earthly blessings, doe soften and effeminate the heart and mind, making men impatient in bearing the least crosse, and impotent in performing any thing, wherein is any difficultie and labour: for prosperitie and plenty cause wantonnesse, and wantonnesse waywardnesse, if they be but touched with the least cause of griefe: and hauing beene long inured to tread onely in the soft path of worldly happinesse, their feete are made so tender, that the least hardnesse of aduerse accidents putteth them to paine, and the least paine maketh them to cry out, being made intolerable not in it selfe, but through their impatiencie in suffering it. Thus these worldly Honours weaken and soften the minde, making it impatient, in bearing the least iniurie, or shew of wrong, yea, though it bee but the suspition of a small neglect. Or if by superiour powers by whom they were aduanced, and by whose grace they stand, they be but a little frowned vpon, they presently fearing a downfall, or doubting that they shall rise no higher, haue their hearts broken, or at least fretted and consumed with griefe; whereas others, who either neuer had these Honours or neuer much esteemed them, hauing the comfort of a good conscience within them, feare no frownes, and beare with patience vndeserued disgraces, and the losse of those Honours, which they neuer highly valued. So also riches immoderately loued, soften the heart, and weaken the resolution of those that haue them, making them cowardly in attempting any thing which is good, if the least shew of danger be in it, either to their person or estate; equally fearing the losse of their liues, and the hazard of their wealth, lest either by the one, they should be taken from their Idoll, or by the other, it should be taken from them. The latter whereof is more grieuous vnto them than the former, because by the prolonging of their life, after the losse of their riches, their sorrow is continued, whereas the griefe which they sustaine, for being taken from their wealth, is taken away by death, which maketh them sensleſse in feeling their losse. By which feare and cowardize, possessing their hearts, they are made altogether vnwilling to stand in any cause for Gods glory, the defence of iustice and truth, or for the common good of the Church or Commonwealth, if any superiour powers doe oppose against them: yea, they are ready instruments, euen of those mischiefes, which their consciences doe condemne and abhor, rather than they wil by incurring their displeasure, hazard themselues to bee fleeced of any of their wealth. Againe, they are hereby made so impotent, and impatient of bearing any losse, that many, who haue bin suddenly, and (as it were) vnseasonably (before they could prepare their minds, & gather their spirits) depriued of some smal share of their abundance, & pruned of their superfluities haue murthred themselues, & like the vine, haue bled to death of these sleight wounds, hauing no patience so much as to think of out-liuing their losse. For after that the loue of riches hath once softned their hearts, they are made weake, cowardly, and vnable to indure any thing; and shew themselues onely patient & strong in indu-ring the base seruitude of their riches, and in vndergoing all those seruile and painfull offices, wherein they will imploy them. To this purpose one saith, that Christian fortitude fleeth couetousnesse, as being a blot or blemish vnto vertue, which doth effeminate and weaken it; neither is there any thing so contrary vnto true fortitude and magnanimitie, as to be ouercome with gaine. Finally, voluptuous pleasures being immoderately loued and affected, doe as much, if not more than any thing, enerusate vertue, and weaken the heart and minde; making them, though they be naturally couragious, soft and effeminate, when men too much are addicted to them. For when leauing labour and manly exercises, they betake them to carnall delights, inuring themselues to daintie fare, and soft lodging, and spending their whole time in chamboring and wantonnesse, dancing and reuelling, sports and pastimes, these Circes cups bewitch and poyson them, and causing them to lay aside all manlinesse, doe at best change them into weake women, or which is worse, transforme them into filthy Swine, abhorring all paines and labour, and taking all their delight to wallow themselues in the filthy puddle of carnall pleasures. And these cursed Dalilaes, lulling them asleepe in their laps with their sweete and enchanting Songs, doe take away from them all their strength, and so enfeebling them, make them to be easily ouercome of any vice or sin, and ready to yeeld vnto any temtation of Sathan or the World. So one saith, that in pleasures, the heart is made more soft and flexible; but in affliction and time of mourning, it contracteth it selfe, and gathereth all its forces together; and so returning to its selfe, it affecteth moderation, and being freed from the burthen and tyrannie of passions, it is made stronger and more nobly lofty. And hence it is, that politicke Conquerours, hauing with great danger and difficulty vanquished and ouercome some warlike Nations, haue to keepe them still vnder, despoyled them of their armes, and in stead of warlike exercises, drawne them to banquetting, gaming, and reuelling, that so their courage might be abated, and their hearts softned and effeminated with these pleasures and delights. And therefore if we make any account of Christian fortitude and magnanimity, which chiefly defendeth vs against our enemies; if wee would not haue our manly courage changed into womanish weaknesse, let vs not immoderately loue worldly prosperity, nor vnmeasurably affect either Honours, Riches, or carnall pleasures, which take away both our patience in suffering, and our strength in performing, and so make vs vnable for any Christian, yea, man-like employment.

A second euill or mischiefe which worldly prosperity, and abundance of earthly things bring vnto those who enjoy them with immoderate loue, is, that by their plenty they bring vpon them a necessity, and make them to stand in need of many things (whereas nature is content with a few) the want of the least whereof causeth vnto them sorrow and discontent. For by the vsuall accustoming customing of themselues to superfluities, they alter the course of their natures, and make them to become necessary; and whereas those who neuer vsed them, neuer need them, nature in it selfe being as well content without as with them; contrariwise those who haue inured themselues vnto them, hauing turned custome into a second nature, cannot want them without a mayme. In which respect worldly men abounding with these earthly things, are in a farre worse condition than those who neuer had them; for as he who by continuall vse of Physicke, hath brought his body to such a disposition, that he can enjoy no health, vnlesse he continually bee taking medicines, nor digest a meale without the helpe of hot waters, is in farre worse estate, though hee had the best Physicians to tend him, and a whole Apothecaries shop at his command, than a poore labouring man who needeth neither cordiall, pill nor potion, but without these helps, eateth his meate with a good appetite, and well digesting it, hath it turned into good nourishment, though he haue neither Physician to counsel, nor drugge to purge him, because his nature and constitution is so strong, that hee needeth them not: so is our estate farre better when wee haue few wants, than wanting much to haue many supplies (euen as it is better to bee in health without medicines, than to be weake and sickly abounding with them) not only because they bring trouble by their continuall vse, but also being outward things, they are both prouided and kept with care and labour, and though they now abound, yet within a while they may be wanting vnto vs; whereas when we haue few wants, we also need few supplies, which commonly are hard at hand and easily compassed. There is no man but would thinke his estate much better, who being necessarily to goe a journey should need but small prouision by reason of his strength and health; as bread and water, light clothing, and hard lodging: than another who though hee be but weake, yet is forced to carry a whole burthen of necessaries, both for Dyet, Physicke and Apparell: but we are all to trauell in our earthly pilgrimage towards our heauenly Country; and therefore how much better is their condition, who need fewest necessaries, which are as easily prouided, as lightly carried; than theirs who hauing abundance of these earthly things, cannot goe without them, nor yet carrie them with them without toyle and labour; seeing their store may faile, or by force bee taken from them, & so leaue them to pine in want and misery?

But this will the better appeare, if we consider the speciall instances: for who seeth not that worldly Honours doe bring with them many necessities, and cause them who haue them to want immerable things of which others haue no need? They cannot with their Honour goe alone in publike places, but must haue a retinue of seruants attending on them; they cannot visit a friend without Horses and Coaches, and (as one saith) they are so much carried with others legges, that they forget to vse their owne, or at least whatsoeuer need they haue, are not able to endure long trauell. They cannot remoue without Carts for their carriages, and Sumpter Horses for their Apparell: finally, they cannot sit downe to meate, but their state requireth furnished Tables; whereas nature would bee better satisfied with one dish. So likewise riches and abundance bring to their Owners many wants; from which the poorer sort are priuiledged; for according to their store and prouision, accustoming themselues to the vse of many things (whereas at first they were meere superfluities) they are now by custome become necessaries: for example, they haue diuers suites for the seuerall seasons, and wearing that which fitteth the time of the yeere; they accustome their bodies to a iust proportion or temperature betweene heate and cold; so also they carefully obserue the weather, keeping themselues warme within doores when the cold North winde bloweth, and onely walking abroad when the ayre is pleasant, and of a fit temper for their bodies. Finally, they liue at ease, shunning labour and any painfull exercise which might cause wearinesse, and doe all their businesses by the ministery of their seruants. To all which when they haue by long custome inured themselues, they cannot endure any alteration: if they bee a little warmer than ordinary, they are impatient of heat, and complaine as if they were broyled; if the colde winde doe but blow vpon them, they are ready to shake as if they were starued. If vpon some extraordinary occasion they are forced to take any paines, they are presently sicke with wearinesse, and soone after lame and vnable to stirre. Neither doe they take vpon them these things for the more state, or counterfeit them for wantonnesse, or are only subject to these infirmities through the impatiencie of their minds: but their niceneſſe, supplyed and nourished with their abundance, maketh this tendernes and weaknesse so habituall to their bodies, that they can in truth endure no hardnesse; nor want any thing vnto which they are accustomed without imminent danger. If vnseasonably they leaue off any of their ordinary apparell, or stand but a little in the cold ayre, they hazard their health by taking cold; if the weather be but a little too hot, they are ready to faint; if they take a little extraordinary paines it is grieuous vnto them, and the absence of their seruants whose ministery they vse, is as troublesome vnto them, as if they wanted their hands or feet. Whereas the poore labouring man is not hurt either with the cold of Winter, or heat of Summer, but dareth the nipping winds and scorching Sunne with his vncouered head, bare face and open breast, being best at ease, and euen singing or whistling to expresse his inward ioy, when hee is busiest at his labours: which when they are ended, he cheerfully and with a good stomacke feedeth on his course fare, and after sleepeth quietly in his hard bed. And therefore seeing riches haue so many infirmities attending on them, and subiect those that haue them to so many wants, from all which the poore estate is priuiledged and exempted; there is no reason why we should dote so vpon them with immoderate loue, and flie the other with such feare and hatred; seeing in this respect the meane condition hath iust pre-eminence: for though it bee good to haue much, yet it is better to want nothing; seeing herein wee come neerest to the estate of the blessed Saints and Angels, not in possessing worldly abundance, but in little needing such supplies. To which purpose one saith, that howsoeuer a rich man may seeme great and happy, because hee hath Horses, costly prouision, Seruants and Attendance; and though he may seeme to haue great power, because hee hath many at command, appointing to euery one their seuerall businesse; yet in truth these words of command, shew rather infirmitie and insufficiencie, than abilitie and power; seeing that which they cannot doe themselues, they are constrained to doe by the ministery of others: and their great store and prouision doth but argue the greatnesse of their want, and consequently of their misery; wee being then alone truely blessed when hauing all our sufficiencie in God, wee stand in need of nothing. The like also may bee said of voluptuous pleasures, which whosoeuer haue in abundance, and set their hearts on them with immoderate loue, they are so farre from being perfected by them, that they adde much to their imperfection. For though at first they were but meere superfluities, yet being by custome inured to them, they become so necessary, that they cannot want them without great griefe and discontent. Thus ordinary drinkes seeme to their taste loathsome medicines; common fare, a tedious fast; want of sports and pastimes, a discomfortable imprisonment; and ordinary societie, an irkesome solitarinesse; neither doe they seeme to themselues any longer to liue, than they enioy their vsuall delights, sitting downe at full Tables furnished with all dainties, enioying the societie of their pleasant companions, and spending the day in gaming and reuelling, in seeing shewes and playes, and in following their sports and carnall delights; wherein, as one saith, they are of all others most miserable, because they are come to that passe, that those things which were superfluous, are now become necessary, whereby they are made Slaues to their delights, not freely enioying, but basely seruing them; and that which is worst of of ils, they loue their slaueries; for then our vnhappinesse is compleate and perfect, when as filthy and dishonest things, doe not only a little delight, but fully please vs, and there is no hope of amendment when vices become manners. In which respect (as hee saith else-where) it is the greatest pleasure, not to stand in need of these pleasures, and to be (like the Apostle) free men, who can vse them, and not bee brought in subiection vnto them; enioying them with a careless contempt, and losing them without griefe: or vsing pleasures, as the Angels vse meate which they can eate for company, and as easily obserue perpetuall abstinence; their feeding being an action of power, and not of necessitie. Finally, seeing the abundance of these earthly things bringeth want, and the greatest plentie is the cause of the greatest penurie and necessitie, like meates which doe not satisfie, but increase the hunger; let vs learne to contemne them, or at least carelessely vse them: and let vs set our hearts on Gods spirituall graces and heauenly ioyes, by whose store wee are enriched, and whose plentie brings sufficiencie. For they that drinke of these waters of life, shall neuer be more a thirst, but they shall be in him a well of water, springing vp vnto euerlasting life, as our Sauiour Christ teacheth vs.

The third euill or mischiefe, which these worldly things immoderately loued, doe bring vpon vs, is, that they depriue vs of our liberty, and inthrall vs in a miserable seruitude, and cruell bondage. For after they haue vanquished vs with that power and strength which our owne opinions haue armed them with, they presently enchaine our hearts and affections with the links and fetters of their loue, and so lead vs away into a miserable captiuity; not suffering vs any longer to serue the Lord, whose seruice alone is perfect liberty; nor yet to bee ruled by holy reason, and aduised and counselled by a sound and vnpartiall iudgement; but putting out the eyes of our vnderstanding, they make vs to grind in their mill, spending all our strength in their seruice, and taking vs wholly vp in their imployments, either about the getting, keeping, or increasing them. And whereas the Lord offereth vnto vs, that if we will aknowledge him for our only Lord and Master, we shall haue a faire and easie seruice, and haue inward peace, and the quiet and comfort of a contented minde, and feed vpon the delicious and wholesome food foode of his word and sacraments, haunting for the present the vallies of his spirituall graces, and temporall necessaries, for our better encouragement in our easie labours, and his assured promises giuen vs when our seruice is performed, and our course finished, the wages of eternall life and euerlasting glory; yet like the wretched Israelites wee are so intangled with the loue of our bondage, that wee are ready to preferre our painefull seruitude, before Christian liberty, those consuming and cruell labours, before that spirituall ease and peacefull tranquillity, the seruice of the spirituall Pharao, before the seruice of our good and gracious God, and the flesh-pots, onions, and garlike of this worldly Egypt, without any further hope of future benefit, before the spirituall Manna of Gods sanctifying graces, and our euerlasting inheritance in the holy land. And that those who are worldly minded bee in this state and condition, and hauing shaken off the seruice of God are become true vassals of the world, it may appeare by that liuery and cognisance whereby the Apostle hath discerned them, namely their subiection and obedience vnto their master, Know yee not (saith he) that to whomsoeuer yee giue your selues as seruants to obey, his seruants yee are, to whom yee obey? And the Apostle Peter saith, that howsoeuer wicked worldlings promise vnto themselues liberty, yet they are the seruants of corruption; for of whomsoeuer a man is ouercome, ouer to the same hee is in bondage. Now if this badge of obedience bee an infallible signe of seruice and subiection, then most certainely they who immoderately loue these earthly things, are not the seruants of God, but the Bondslaues of the World. For what the Lord commandeth, they vtterly neglect, but what the World inioyneth, promising the wages of these vnprofitable vanities, that they most willingly obserue and performe. As for example, the Lord requireth that they should not minde earthly things, that they should performe the duties of his seruice, deale iustly and vprightly with their neighbours, and bee liberall and bountifull in the workes of mercy, releeuing the poore, and contributing of their goods to all religious and holy vses: and contrariwise the world commandeth that they should fixe their hearts and affections not on things aboue, but on things beneath, that they should for their worldly aduantage neglect Gods seruice and spend his Sabbaths about their owne affaires, and for the obtaining of these earthly vanities, vse fraud and deceit, dissembling and double dealing, oppression and cruelty: and that hauing by these meanes gotten much into their possession, they should labour daily to adde to their store, and not to diminish any part thereof by performing the workes of mercy, charity, and pitty, vnlesse they bee pressed from them by authority, and except it be now and then to giue out of their thousands a penny-Almes to still the cry of their conscience, or to incourage them to goe on with more quiet of mind in their fraude, vsury, oppression and other vnlawfull courses, which their owne hearts doe not iustifie, because by giuing these trifles, they thinke that they haue made God some part of amends, and thereby they haue as well bribed his iustice, that it will not condemne them, as they haue corrupted their owne consciences, that they doe no more accuse them. All which commandements of the World, they willingly obey, neglecting & contemning the commandements of God, whereby they make it plaine that they haue vtterly cast off his seruice, and are become the deuoted vassals, and bondslaues of the World.

5. Sect. 5. That worldlings are slaues in diuers respects.

And here by the World wee vnderstand both worldly men, and worldly things, vnto the seruice of both which this immoderate loue makes men subiect; for they forgoe their liberty and become the seruants of all those, who may helpe them to the obtaining, preseruing, or increasing of these earthly things, which they so fondly loue, or haue power in their hands to take them away, being ready at their command to doe what they know may please them, and to eschue those things, by the doing whereof they may incurre their displeasure. And because these are many and their minds and desires variable, yea often contrarie the one to the other, therefore that they may please them all, they are faine to transforme themselues into a thousand shapes, and in their words, and actions, according to the diuersity of their occasions, to vse tenne thousand contradictions, humouring euery one in their owne vaine, and like parasites studying to please all others rather than themselues; that so they may at least giue them contentment seuerally, vnto whom they meane to be beholding, seeing it is impossible to please all together. Which though they can doe with some facility (hauing brought their minds to a seruile subiection, for the more easie obtaining of their desires) when they haue to deale with them single and alone, yet how are they moiled and troubled with cares and feares of losing the fauour of some or all? How are their inuentions set vpon the tacke, when they labour to please many diuersly minded in the same company? and with what shame are they possessed, if they bee not growne vtterly impudent, when by conferring and comparing their words and actions, their contradictions, dissembling, and double dealing are discouered? So likewise they become the seruants and slaues of the things themselues which they seeme to haue at their command; for (as one saith) hee who through his greedy concupiscence wanteth many things, is the seruant also of many, although hee seemeth to haue them in his possession. And that both because by reason of their loue towards them, they are ready to be at their command, that they may still enioy them; and by reason of that trust and confidence which they repose in them, whereby they depend vpon them for sufficiency and defence, as much or more than the basest seruant, vpon his powerfull Master. Yea hereby they become slaues to their owne vile affections and neglecting both what Gods word, or their owne reason requireth, they suffer themselues to be wholly transported by their owne concupiscence, for the satisfying of their carnall desires: and as their passions and affections are ruled by these earthly obiects, so are they wholly ruled by their passions; not affecting things because are they good, but esteeming them good, because they affect them. The which gouernment of passion and carnall concupiscence, as it is most tyrannicall, so it argues the most base and abiect seruitude of worldly men, who are subiect vnto it; seeing they are in a farre worse condition than they who are oppressed with the most cruell tyranny. For that onely ruleth but the outward actions, this also the inward thoughts; that but at sometimes, this continually; that with some hope of freedome, they hauing some desire to be deliuered when opportunity serueth: but this desperate and hopelesse, seeing not onely their bodies, but their wils also are embondaged, so as they haue not so much as a desire to be set at liberty. Finally, as hereby they become slaues to their owne concupiscence, so it being carnall and corrupt, maketh them also the seruants of sinne; not daring to doe any thing which God commandeth, when it will hinder them from obtaining their earthly desires; and running headlong in any wicked course which promiseth to satisfie their carnall concupiscence. Now what can bee more miserable than the seruice of sin, which freeth vs from righteousnesse, as the Apostle teacheth vs, & maketh men also to become the slaues of Satan; whilest for the obtaining of these worldly vanities, they are ready by sinning to doe Satans will, and to please him, by displeasing God?

But though these worldly things should subiect men to the slauery of nothing else; yet the seruice which they who set their hearts vpon them, are constrained to doe vnto themselues, were sufficient to make them miserable: for what can bee more vgly and vile to leaue the seruice of the almighty Creator, and to become slaues to these base and meane creatures? To neglect our allegiance to the glorious King of Heauen and Earth, that wee may serue our seruants, and yeeld subiection to them, ouer whom wee are appointed to rule? Especially if wee further consider, that Gods seruice which we forsake is easie and profitable: for as Christ hath taught vs, his yoke is easie, and his burthen light; which notwithstanding whosoeuer take vpon them, shall find eternall rest to their soules. Whereas contrariwise the seruice which is performed to these worldly vanities, is tedious, tyrannicall, and full of trouble, bringing in the end to those that serue them, hell and destruction, as their wages and reward. For so the authour of the booke of Wisedome bringeth in the wicked complaining, in their horrour of conscience, and torments of hell: We haue wearied our selues in the ways of wickednesse and destruction, and we haue gone through dangerous ways; but we haue not known the way of the Lord. What hath pride profited vs? or what profit hath the pompe of riches brought vs? So that the more worldly men doe abound with their earthly things, the more insulting Masters and proud tyrants they haue to rule ouer them, and consequently the more grieuous is their seruitude. Neither is this tyranny mitigated by obeisance and submisse dutie; for to seruile is the nature of these tyrannicall Lords, that the more hartie and diligent seruice is done vnto them, the more they insult, and tyrannize ouer their seruants; herein more fraught and barbarous than the wild beasts, which grow more milde to those who are seruiceable vnto them, and are said to spare those who vse most submission. Vnto which wee may adde that this seruice is not performed with the body alone, but also with the minde, whereby it commeth to passe, that worldlings are neuer at rest, neither day nor night: for that time which should be allotted for sleepe, is spent in meditating of those businesses which when they arise, they are to performe to these cruel Masters. And that which maketh vp the height of the worldlings misery, there is no hope of their freedome, because they loue their seruitude; and are so much delighted with the glorious brightnesse of their golden chaines, that they will not bee set at liberty, because they will not part with their Giues and fetters, they with their shining lustre so dazling their eyes, and euen stupifying all their senses, that they neither see nor feele their bondage and seruitude.

Thus honours immoderately loued, make men subiect to a noble thraldome, and vnder the maske of glory and greatnesse, bring with them disguised bondage; for in ruling they must serue; and before they can haue the glory of the World they must abase themthemselues to be in subiection to many commanders. Wherein the state of an ambitious man is farre more wretched than the estate of the poorest seruant; for whereas these haue discharged their duety, and are at rest, when they haue by their seruice pleased one Master; they contrariwise turmoile themselues by seruing many, becomming their vnderlings, ouer whom they seeme to rule. For looke of how many the ambitious man desireth to bee praysed and honoured, vnto so many he standeth in awe and subiection. Hee dare not doe those things which best please himselfe, but those which hee knoweth most plausible to his admirers; and the more they are in number, the greater is his make, for hee serueth a beast which hath many heads, and euery head hath his differing opinions. The which maketh the proud man to stoup in his greatest bravery, to distract his thoughts, and beat his braines, in studying how to please a disagreeing multitude. Hee is alwayes in feare of loosing his fauorites, as though hee should fall out of the clouds to receiue a mortall blow vpon the earth, vnlesse they did support him with the wings of fame and hold him vp with the breath of their mouthes. He is alwayes most vigilant, that he neither say nor doe any thing which may displease; he counterfeyteth humility, and faineth honesty; hee maketh shew of affable courtesie, and dissembleth benignity; to all hee meets he vncouers his head, and boweth his body; hee riseth vp and embraceth, applaudeth and flattereth; he daily visiteth his fauourites, and obserueth vnto them all outward complements, he is in iealousie, not only of verball censures, but of meerall dislikes; hee obserueth the very lookes and countenance of all, and is as much afraide of a fained rumour, and false fiction, as of a just accusation, and deserued reproofe. And as he liueth in this slauery in respect of worldly men, whose prayses hee hunteth after; so also is hee seruant to his honours and preferments, whilest he spendeth his spirits, tireth his thoughts, and euen consumeth all his strength, either about the getting, keeping or increasing them. Yea they are slaues also to their owne lusts, and whilest they rule & command others, they themselues are ruled & commaunded by their own ambition, and that not with a gentle gouernment, or easie subiection, but with more tyranny and cruelty than can bee expected from a barbarous enemy. For after the Turkish fashion, this tyrant ambition, hath their goods at continuall commaund, spoiling them of all their riches to make golden steps, whereby they may ascend into the seate of honour; yea and when all their wealth is consumed, they are ready with the Egyptians to sell themselues into a miserable seruitude that they may feede their famished soules with the smoake of vaine-glory, which will neuer satisfie them. For it forceth them to trauell by Sea and Land, to weare out themselues with labours, to expose their bodies to wounds and scars, and their liues to innumerable miseries, and most desperate dangers. In which regard one saith, that the seruant of vaine-glory is seruant to euery one; and in his seruice more seruile than the basest bondslaue; for no tyrannous Master laieth such heauy burdens, and grieuous commaundr vpon his slaues, as it doth vpon his captiues, and the more obedient they are, the more this ambition increaseth its tyranny. Neither doth it tyrannize ouer their bodies and goods alone, but ouer their soules also. for it turmoileth them with many vnruly passions, racking them betweene hope and feare, and euen burning their hearts with boiling anger, and furious desire of cruell reuenge. It disquieteth them with continuall cares, whilest they tire all their thoughes in plotting the meanes of aspiring, or preseruing their glory and greatnesse; and (which is worst of all) it defileth them with all manner of sinne, whilest they are ready to put in practise any villanny to aduance themselues higher, as before I haue shewed. And consequently, whilest they aspire to bee aboue all other men, they become the seruants of sinne, and slaues of Satan; and willingly doe that, to which our Sauiour was tempted, and resisted, that is, fall downe and worship the diuell, when he promiseth vnto them the glorie of the World; and so first bring themselues into the most damnable seruitude, that afterwards they may bee extolled and aduanced.

So also riches when they are too much esteemed, and excessiuely loued, bring their owners into a miserable bondage; making them to serue the earthly Mammon, and their owne couetous lusts; the which ruling in them subiect them to the base seruice of all men, from whom they expect gaine and aduantage; yea of sinne and Satan, being ready to commit any wickednesse, for the increasing of their wealth. But this is not the state of all men that haue riches, but of those who too much esteeme and loue them; not so much of the rich, as of the couetous, who doe vpon them; not of those who being wise, know how to vse them, keeping them in seruitude, and hauing them at commaund, but of those fooles, who not knowing their right vse, suffer them to tyrannize and beare rule. For if we can possesse riches with meerelesse contempt, and moderate loue, if we haue them at commaund, and when we please can part with them liberally and chearefully for the reliefe of the poore, and for all pious and charitable vses, if we can possesse possesse them and humility too, being neuer the more proude and insolent, because of our abundance, then are wee not by them brought into this slauery, but continue free men, and Gods faithfull seruants, neither doth our hauing, but our immoderate louing of riches, hinder vs from seruing God, for our Sauiour Christ saith not, that it is impossible to haue riches and serue God, but to doe seruice vnto them both as our Lords and Masters. As therefore it is said of Fire and Water, that they are good seruants, but bad masters; so may it be truely said of riches, which whilest they are kept in subiection, and vnder commaund, are profitable seruants, but become tyrannous masters when they are suffered to rule and beare sway. So that whosoeuer possesseth riches, must either esteeme them, in respect of soueraignty, or become base himselfe; either hee must commaund and rule them as a Lord and Master; or they will rule him as a seruant or slaue. For so our Sauiour Christ saith plainely, that the couetous worldling serueth his riches, and euen reason and common experience teacheth vs, that they who ouervalue their wealth and set their hearts vpon it, howsoeuer they are owners, yet they are not masters of their riches, yea in truth that they are no better than drudges and seruants vnto them, carrying themselues towards them in all respects in a most seruile and slauish manner. For they haue not their riches at their commaund, nor haue power to doe with them that which their iudgement best approueth, as to bestow them vpon themselues for their owne comfort, and to distribute them for the releife of the poore; but they are commaunded by them, and enioyned still to scrape more, when already they haue too much. As seruants they minister vnto their money, and doe seruice vnto their wealth, keeping and tending it, watching ouer it, and in all dangers with the hazard of their liues defending it. To which purpose one saith, Thou art a iaylor, and not a master of thy riches, whosoeuer thou art that hidest them in the earth, thou art a seruant of them, and not a disposer and iudge: for he is a seruant of riches, who as a seruant waiteth vpon them; but hee who hath shaken off this yoke of seruitude, doth dispose of and distribute them as becommeth a Master. So likewise as a seruant, though he haue the care and paines in tending them, yet he hath not the power or courage to touch them, or to dispose of them to those vses which his iudgement best approueth, for feare of displeasing these tyrannous Masters, the earthly Mammon and his carnall concupiscence. For (as one obserueth) let a man aske of the most wretched miser, what hee thinketh of those, who haue not onely the ioyfull fruition of their riches themselues, but also giue of them liberally to the releefe of the poore, and hee will say that he doth well and wisely in so disposing of them. Aske him further, why then he doth not doe that himselfe, which hee approueth in another, and hee will say, hee cannot. Of which his inability, though he can giue many reasons, yet the true cause is, because his golden idoll, and his owne auarice will not suffer him. So that he is not a freeman, nor master of those things which hee doth possesse because they are not at his disposing; hee is not Lord of his money, but a seruant, and a iaylor rather than an owner. Yea hauing made gold his god, by louing, trusting, and hoping in it, hee abstaineth from touching it, and from imploying it to common vse, as though hee feared to commit sacriledge against his Idoll, and can as easily bee perswaded to breake his bones as his bags, and to teare off a perce of his flesh, or maime a member, as to communicate any part of his whole summes to charitable vses. Yea as though hee had receiued some speciall charge from his Soueraigne, the neglect whereof should bee punished with death (euen when himselfe stands in need of necessaries, wanting either clothes for his backe, or food for his belly) he dare not touch his full bagges; and as if they were not his owne, but the goods of strangers committed to his custody, hee dareth not diminish them, lest he should be condemned of theft. In which respect the couetous miser is truly said to be possessed of riches rather than to possesse them, hauing them as a prisoner hath his keeper, which seemeth to waite and attend vpon him as his seruant; when as in truth he is his iaylor, who will not suffer him to goe any where, but whither hee pleaseth. Or as a man is said to haue an Ague, whereas it rather hath him: or as he is said to haue a chaine who is bound with it, which enthralleth and captiueth him, and whilest he hath it in his keeping, is also kept of it, so as he can neither moue nor stirre, but onely so farre as it giueth him liberty.

By all which it appeareth, that he who setteth his heart vpon his riches, is by them of an owner, made onely a keeper, and of a Master, a seruant. Neither is this any light subiection, or easie seruitude, but a-boue all other slaury most greeuous and intolerable. For this earthly Mammon, and that greedy diuell of vnsatiable auarice, like cruell tyrants weare and consume the strength of their deuoted vassals, with carking cares, restlesse feares, and toilesome labours, they make them to trauell ouer Sea and Land, to worke night and day, in the cold of Winter, and in the heat of Summer, to expose themselues to innumerable dangers, and to runne with extreame hazard of

of their liues most desperate courses, and all to get or increase their riches. In all which indeuours, if they happen any whit to faile, and sustaine any losse, notwithstanding all their labour, their cruell Masters set all these losses on their scores, making them to pay for all that is miscarried, with the penuance of bitter teares, and hearty griefe. And where as the hardest Masters suffer their seruants to refresh themselues with resting in the night, that they may be more fit for the next dayes labour; these much more cruell than they, doe so continually haunt them with cares and feares, that though they go to bed, they can take no rest: for as the Wise man saith, The abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleepe. And as they hinder them of their sleepe, so also they skant and miserably pinch both their backes and bellies, and after their intolerable labours, keepe them from inioying the fruit of their labours, and suffer them not to eate till they be satisfied, nor to weare so many clothes as will keepe them warme. And howsoeuer they haue abundance in their keeping, yet will they let them haue scarce any thing in vse; and possessing much, they haue nothing in fruition. Wherein they may fitly bee compared to such Wards, who hauing a title to great possessions, die in their wardship, and neuer come to the vse of their lands: or to the Patriarches sacks, which hauing in them both corne and money, had no further vse of either, but to bee worne out in keeping them. In which respect, the miser and slaue of wealth is said, not to be rich, but, as it were rich, because in his abundance his Idoll and auarice keepe him poore. So the Wise man saith; that there is that maketh himselfe rich, and hath nothing; and that maketh himselfe poore, hauing great riches: because, though he haue much in possession, yet he hath nothing in vse: and therefore (as one obserueth) well might the couetous man who had bought the farme say, that hee went to see it, because as the Wise man saith, they haue no further vse of their wealth but to looke vpon it. Now what difference is there betweene wanting it, and thus hauing it, seeing they haue their riches no otherwise than the Phorcides had their eye, which (in a poeticall fiction, moralized by these misers) are said to haue kept it locked vp in a box, where as they in the meane time going abroad, were ready to fall into the pits and ditches for want of sight, till at last by force it was taken from them. Finally, where as good Masters spare their seruants in their old age, letting them take some rest after painfull labours, and after faithfull seruice performed, make them free men, and set them at liberty: contrariwise, these cruell tyrants neuer fauour their bondslaues, but the more faithfull seruice they haue done them, the more heauy burthens they impose vpon them. Neither will they euer suffer them to come out of their apprentiship, and to rest from their drudgery; but euen when they are old and decrepit, and (as it were) haue one foote already in the graue, they still turmoile them with feares and carking cares, and make them so trudge on euerie base errand which promiseth gain, when they cannot go without a staffe. And that which is worst of all, they daily spend and tire them, not onely in painefull but also in sinfull seruices, making them most vnconscionably to lie, dissemble, sweare, and forsweare, deceiue with fraud, and oppresse with crueltie all with whom they deale; and that when they are ready to leaue the world, indangering themselues in most desperate manner to eternall destruction, and that for no further profit in respect of their owne vse, but that they may haue a name to haue left much to their heires and executors. And therefore seeing this worldly wealth immoderately loued, doth bring its owners into this cruell seruitude, let this serue to weane our hearts from this excessiue loue. For (as one saith) wee are most Masters of our riches, when wee least couet them; and where as couetous men by greedy hungring after them, doe shew themselues base beggers, and drudging seruants; the faithfull by contemning them, approue themselues to be their Masters and true owners; the one beggeth in keeping them, the other keepeth in contemning them. Neither let any man excuse his greedy auarice in pinching his backe and belly for the loue of his golden idoll, by pretending his charge of Children; for God neuer taught any to rob himselfe, to enrich his Children, nor to depriue himselfe of necessaries, that hee may leaue vnto them superfluities, wherewith they may play the prodigals in riotous spending them, as their predecessors haue played the wretched misers, in greedy gathering them. For the Lord giueth his gifts to bee enioyed by those vpon whom hee bestoweth them; and would haue that alone laid vp for posterity, which may bee honestly and Christianly spared from naturall, ciuill, and religious vses taking vpon himselfe the care of prouiding for posterity, when their predecessors cannot by lawfull meanes lay vp for them sufficient plenty. Againe, let them remember, that God hath not giuen them children to bee causes or excuses of their couetousnes, and therefore when they thus abuse them, as occasions to increase their auarice, they may iustly feare, that God in his displeasure will take them away, that so depriuing them of these figge-leaues of vaine excuses, their couetousnesse may lie open and naked, when as it still continueth as raging and violent as it was before. For that children are not the true causes of their greedy scraping, it may appeare in that many who haue them, are liberall; and many who want them, most wretchedly miserable; some being neuer wearie of gathering, who haue but few or none, and some laying vp but little, who haue a great many; whereby it appeareth, that it is not care of their Children which maketh them thus greedy in scraping but the insatiable disease of their minde which tormenteth them with hunger, if they bee not continually feeding it with new supplies.

9. Sect. 10. That voluptuous pleasures make men to become slaues and seruants.

Finally, voluptuous pleasures, when men set their hearts vpon them, make them of free men to become vassals and seruants; spending all their thoughts, strength, and time, either in procuring, or inioying them, if at least they may be said to inioy that, which in most tyrannous manner doth inthrall and ouer-rule them. For they are content to lose their liberty to haue their delight. They set all aside, which may either concerne their credit or profit, that they may serue their lusts, and cannot so well be said to buy pleasures to please their carnall appetites, as wholly to sell themselues ouer vnto pleasures, not caring to bee their slaues, so they may inioy their company. And thus the glutton is a seruant to his owne belly, and the drunkard to his filthy appetite, spending all their time in furnishing and feeding at full Tables, and in procuring and drinking delicate wines, and most pleasing drinkes. The which Masters they serue with such seruile obedience, that the Apostle doubteth not to call them belly-gods, seeing they not onely haue all their seruice both of body and mind, but also performed with all deuotion. And thus also the whoremaster becommeth a slaue, not onely to his filthy lust, which maketh him to neglect all duty to God, his neighbour, and himselfe, and not caring for health, person, nor estate, to runne at the command of his concupiscence into all desperate dangers; but also becommeth a most slauish seruant to his harlot, being wholly at her command running when she appointeth, comming when shee calleth, going away when shee biddeth, giuing when she asketh, and fearing when shee threatneth. Neither is this seruitude to worldly pleasures and our owne voluptuousnesse light, or the euils few which they cause vnto vs: for no enemie can bee so tyrannous, or bring vpon any so many and grieuous mischiefes, as these carnall pleasures, when once they haue got men into their thraldome and subiection. For they doe not onely hold the body in most cruell bondage, making it to spend it selfe, consume its strength, and exposing it to innumerable sicknesses, and diseases, but also tyrannize ouer the soule, infatuating the vnderstanding, and so captiuating the will, heart, and affections, that they are in loue with their seruitude, and doe not so much as desire to be set at liberty, but being made sluggish and slothfull with this spirituall lethargie, they forget the ioyes of Heauen, and that true happinesse of reasonable creatures, and take all their delight and contentment in wallowing themselues like filthy swine, in the stinking puddle of carnall pleasures. The which maketh the estate of worldly epicures desperate and remedilesse because they are in loue with their diseases, and hate the medicines whereby they might bee cured. And as it is said of Vlysses retinue, that hauing drunke those impoysoned cuppes which Circes had prepared for them, and being by them transformed into Beasts, they were so in loue with their brutish condition, that they would not againe bee transformed into men: so these worldly epicures, (in whom this is truely moralized) being by this notorious witch of carnall pleasures infatuated in their vnderstandings, and turned into Beasts, are so delighted with this brutish estate, that they cannot bee perswaded to to leaue their brutishnesse, and to liue as becommeth reasonable men, & much lesse as it beseemeth the calling of Christians. And as it is said of the Torpedo fish, that it is of such a poysonous and venemous nature, that if it but touch the line of him that angleth, the poyson is thereby deriued to the rod, and from thence to the hand, whereby he is presently so stupified and benummed that hee loseth his strength, and the vse of his limmes: so when these poysonous pleasures doe but get the least acquaintance, and (as it were) but touch voluptuous minds, they are not onely made brutish, but euen so benummed and sensles, that they haue no power to moue in any good action. The which remedilesse bondage of worldly epicures, one expresseth after this manner: Doest thou (saith hee) thinke those freemen, or cleare from diseases, whom pleasures haue barbarously bound and enthralled? why, though they haue not a chaine to tie them, yet their owne luxuriousnesse holdeth them fast in bonds with vnauoidable tenacity; and being fallen into the snares of beastly pleasures, (as the bird catched by the subtlety of the fowler) the more they labour and striue to escape, the more they are entangled and ensnared: So that if any man would retaine his precious liberty, hee must carefully auoide the immoderate loue of carnall delights, and euen stop his eares against the bewitching tunes of these pleasing Syrens, that hee bee not allured and caught in this vnrecouerable thraldome. And if with importunity a present of voluptuous pleasures be forced vpon vs; let vs with the wise Emperour not keepe them them from our selues, and the vse of others, whom wee desire to continue in a generous and free disposition: but careleslly cast them away to be enjoyed by such Helots & slaues, as are of a base qualitie and seruile nature, as better beseeming them, than such as professe the glorious libertie of the sonnes of God. Especially, considering that as they take away the freedome of men, so much more the libertie of Christians, making them to become the seruants of sinne, and slaues of Sathan; and consequently vtterly vnable to doe seruice vnto God: for they who are addicted to voluptuous pleasures, are ready to attaine vnto the sinfull fruition of them, by neglecting all good duties which they owe vnto God, and to fall into any sinne which will bring delight: and so by continuall custome, their pleasures doe so weaken and seize vpon them, that those things which formerly they did of will, are now forced vpon them by vrgent necessitie, they being vtterly vnable to doe any other wise. And therefore to conclude this point, if we would not lose the liberty both of men and Christians, and subject our selues to a seruile estate, and most slauish condition, let vs not set our hearts vpon, nor immoderately loue these worldly vanities, but vsing them as though wee vsed them not, let vs stand fast in that libertie wherewith Christ hath set vs free, and place our affections vpon the sweet and comfortable graces of Gods holy Spirit, and the eternall ioyes of his heauenly Kingdom, wherein we shall be honoured, inriched, and delighted, without any impeachment to our freedome and libertie.

The fourth euill which abundance of these worldly things bringeth, is, that they expose those that haue them to the enuy and hatred of those who are about them: for superiours spite at them because they come so neer them; and inferiours enuie them because they are preferred before them; & equals hate them, because they are matched by them; whereas they ought (as selfe-loue maketh them beleeue) to haue had great pre-eminence: which maligning spite, and fretting enuy continue so long, as they continue in their worldly happinesse; neither is there any meanes to be freed from them, but by losing their prosperitie and becomming miserable. Thus the higher a man is aduanced in Honours and Preferments, the more commonly he is maligned, and the greater his glory is, the greater also is his enuy. Yea, and that which is worst of all, those often who are honoured with outward complement, as cap and knee only, haue inward grudges borne them from the very heart, and though they haue but false glory, yet they haue it for true enuie. The which is more bitter and spitefull, if their ambition whereby they haue raised themselues vp, haue plainly appeared in their aspiring. For (as one saith) ambition when it breaketh out into impudencie, doth lose its efficacie, and when this wicked affection grossely appeareth, it taketh no effect. And therefore ambition being the mother of Hypocrisie, doth loue secret corners, and, as impatient of the light, it lurketh in darknesse: but when it lieth lowest it looketh highest; like one in the bottome of a Well both darke and deepe, who is better inabled hereby to see the highest Stars, with a quick and strong sight, than they who stand on the top of a Steeple. For the ambitious man knoweth, that if hee haue many witnesses who are able to giue testimony of his pride, it is the next way to hinder him of his desired Honours, seeing the more glory is affected, the lesse it is apprehended and obtained, when the affectation is discerned: for there is nothing more inglorious, than to aspire vnto glory. An example whereof wee haue in in the Apostles Iames and Iohn: for howsoeuer the rest were so ambitious, that there was a great strife amongst them who should be greatest, yet because the aspiring ambition of these two Brethren did more grosly breake out in their suite made to our Sauiour, to sit on his right hand, and his left in his Kingdome; they hereby exposed themselues to the great disdaine of the rest of their fellowes. But howsoeuer this Honour attained vnto by ambitious aspiring is most maligned and enuied; yet that glory and preferment, which commeth either by inheritance or desert, wanteth not its share of enuie and hatred; men being herein naturally like night Bats and Owles, who cannot without some impatiencie, and grudging, looke vpon the bright beames of their neighbours glory, or aduancement. Thus Caine could not indure to haue Abel preferred before him, though he were farre more worthy of preferment. And the Patriarkes pined themselues with enuie, because Ioseph was deseruedly preferred in his Fathers loue: and were filled with spite and disdaine, when as hee did but dreame of his future Honours; which afterwards (they not being able to containe it any longer) did burst out into cruell reuenge. Thus was meeke Moses enuied and maligned, because God had aduanced him in place of gouernment aboue the rest; and that not only by Corah, and his fellow Conspiratours; but euen by his owne Brother, and Sister, Aaron, and Miriam, who were next vnto him. And thus though Saul, for his deserts affected, and greatly aduanced Dauid, yet when hee dimmed his glory, and in the womens Song was preferred before him; Saul hath slaine his thousand, and Dauid his ten thousand; hee was filled with wrath and enuie towardes him, and greedily thirsted after his bloud. The like also may be said of worldly riches, which which when they abound, expose their owners to enuie and hatred: and the fatter that men grow in their estates, the leaner the enuious man waxeth when hee looketh on them. An example whereof we haue in Isaac, who no sooner was inriched with sheepe and heards of Cattell, but presently the Philistims, among whom hee liued, enuied at him. And thus great Land-lords are enuied by their poore Tenants, when they behold their large Lordships; thus one Neighbour enuieth to another his better market, richer soyle, and more fruitfull crop; and thus among Merchants hee is most spited at by his fellowes, who hath made the most prosperous Voyages, and hath with vnexpected speed attained vnto abundance of wealth. Finally, howsoeuer a man would thinke that worldly pleasures were so base and contemptible, that they were beneath the reach of enuie which looketh vpward, and hath its sight alwayes fixed on high obiects; yet when these carnall delights, which are in their own nature low, are aduanced and extolled by mens ouer-partiall iudgements and opinions, they also presently become the marke of Enuie; euery one being ready to spite at their neighbours, when they see them wallowing in these earthly pleasures; especially if themselues want necessaries, notwithstanding they tire both bodie and minde with painfull labour. Now the reason why the abundance of worldly benefits is thus accompanied with Enuie and Hatred, is, because being finite, there is but a certaine measure of them; so that the more some abound, the more of necessitie must others want: and into the more parts these earthly things are diuided, the smaller share must euery one haue, to whom they are thus distributed. And therefore men louing and setting their hearts vpon these vanities, doe enuie and grudge that others should enjoy that which they desire; because their hauing it, is the cause why they want it, or at least why their portion is the lesse, so as they cannot haue it in that quantitie which they could wish; seeing a finite and limited proportion or quantitie, must of necessitie become so much the lesse in the seuerall parts, by how much the whole is more often diuided. And therefore seeing worldly prosperitie and the abundance of these earthly things, do bring as much enuy when wee haue them, as misery when wee want them; and will scarce counteruaile with their profit and benefit, the discontent which they bring with them through this malignitie and spite, especially when this malice and enuie, being armed with power, is ready continually to make anothers happinesse a sufficient cause of quarrell, and to take sharpe reuenge, because they presumed to receiue the Worlds proffered fauours; let vs not too much affect these maligned vanities, but wholly set our hearts vpon those heauenly Honours, ioyes, and treasures, which being infinite, are not diminished when they are communicated to many; but are rather infinitely multiplied and increased by this communion, euery one hauing them wholly to himselfe, and by vertue of their perfect loue enjoying them wholly in euery one of their fellow Saints & Brethren. So that ones fruition of these glorious ioyes, is so far from procuring anothers want, and enuie vnto themselues; that the more they are in number, the more their ioyes are multiplyed; for the more they loue, the more their ioyes are increased, and the more they are increased by this communion, the more they loue.

The fifth euill accompanying these earthly things, is, that as they procure secret enuie, so also they are the common causes of open enmitie, discord and contention; and that not only between strangers, but euen the deerest friends, and neerest kinred; Brother falling out with Brother, and the Father with the Childe, when this bone of worldly vanities, as the matter of contention, is cast amongst them. So the Apostle Iames saith, that warr, contentions, and bitter enuying one another, proceed from these carnall lusts, which fight in the members of greedie Worldlings, whereby one coueteth that which another enjoyeth, and are filled with enuie and indignation, when they faile of their desire. For when men haue set their hearts on these earthly trifles, & haue made them their Idols, louing them more dearely than Ionathan Dauid, yea, than the saluation of their own soules; then all inferiour loues must needes giues place, and when they crosse the other are turned into spite and hatred. And from hence it commeth that Worldlings are ready to lose their friends, for the getting of these worldly vanities, to neglect all duties which they owe to kinred and acquaintance, when they hinder their hopes, and will not stand with their carnall desires; to circumuent them by fraud & deceit, and to offer wrongs and injuries, iniustice, and all kind of oppression, that they may by diminishing their estate increase their owne, and seaze into their hands as a prey those things which they thus dearly loue. Which when the other, who affect them as much as they, do once discerne and perceiue, they become mortall foes, burning in hatred and desire of reuenge, and defending their owne with all their power, as much now for hatred of them who would rob them of their iewels, as for the loue which they beare to these things themselues. As then this loue of earthly things, doth take away that communitie, which should be among friends; whilest euery one desireth to haue a proprietie in the things which hee affecteth, both in respect of their possession, and also of their fruition and vse; so doe they with
